4. He is here dying, ver. 14, 15; dying in pain and anguish, because he was to satisfy for sin, which brought in pain, and for which we must otherwise have lain in everlasting anguish. Here is, 1st. The dissolution of the whole frame of his body; "I am poured out like water," weak as water, and yielding to the power of death, emptying himself of all the supports of his human nature. 2nd. The dislocation of his bones. Care was taken that not one of them should be broken, Jno. xix. 36, but they were all out of joint, by the violent stretching of his body upon the cross, as upon a rack. Or, it may note the fear that seized him in his agony in the garden, when he began to be sore amazed, the effect of which perhaps was, (as sometimes it has been, of great fear, Dan. v. 6,) that "the joints of his loins were loosed, and his knees smote one against another." His bones were put out of joint that he might put the whole creation into joint again, which sin had put out of joint, and might make our broken bones to rejoice. 3rd. The colliquation of his spirits; "My heart is like wax," melted to receive the impressions of God's wrath against the sins he undertook to satisfy for; melting away like the vitals of a dying man; which, as it satisfied for the hardness of our hearts, so the consideration of it should help to soften them. When Job speaks of his inward trouble, he saith, "The Almighty makes my heart soft," Job xxiii. 16; and see Ps. lxviii. 2. 4th. The failing of his natural force; "My strength is dried up," so that he became parched and brittle "like a potsherd," the radical moisture being wasted by the fire of Divine wrath preying upon his spirits. Who then can stand before God's anger? or who knows the power of it? "If this were done in the green tree, what shall be done in the dry?" 5th. The clamminess of his mouth, a usual symptom of approaching death; "My tongue cleaveth to my jaws." This was fulfilled both in his thirst upon the cross, Jno. xix. 28, and in his silence under his sufferings; for, as a sheep before the shearers is dumb, so he opened not his mouth, nor objected against anything done to him. 6th. His giving up the ghost; "Thou hast brought me to the dust of death;" that is, I am just ready to drop into the grave; for nothing less would satisfy Divine justice. The life of the sinner was forfeited, and therefore the life of the sacrifice must be the ransom for it. The sentence of death passed upon Adam was thus expressed, "Unto dust thou shalt return;" and therefore Christ, having an eye to that sentence in his obedience to death, here useth a like expression, "Thou hast brought me to the dust of death."

5. He was stripped. The shame of nakedness was the immediate consequence of sin; and therefore our Lord Jesus was stripped of his clothes when he was crucified, that he might clothe us with the robe of his righteousness, and that the shame of our nakedness might not appear. Now here we are told, 1st. How his body looked when it was thus stripped; "I may tell all my bones," ver. 17. His blessed body was lean and emaciated with labour, grief and fasting, during the whole course of his ministry, which made him look as if he was near fifty years old when he was yet but thirty-three, as we find, Jno. viii. 57. His wrinkles now witnessed for him that he was far from being what he was called, "a gluttonous man, and a winebibber." Or, his bones might be numbered, because his body was distended upon the cross, which made it easy to count his ribs: "They look and stare upon me," that is, my bones do, being distorted, and having no flesh to cover them, as Job saith, Job xvi. 8, "My leanness rising up in me, beareth witness to my face." Or, the standers-by, the passers-by, are amazed to see my bones start out thus, and, instead of pitying me, are pleased even with such a rueful spectacle. 2nd. What they did with his clothes, which they took from him; ver. 18, "They part my garments among them," to every soldier a part, "and upon my vesture," the seamless coat, "do they cast lots." This very circumstance was exactly fulfilled, Jno. xix 23, 24; and though it was no great instance of Christ's suffering, yet it is a great instance of the fulfilling of the Scripture in him. Thus it was written, and therefore thus it behoved Christ to suffer. Let this therefore confirm our faith in him as the true Messiah, and inflame our love to him, as the best of friends, who loved us, and suffered all this for us.

Secondly. Here is Christ praying, and with that supporting himself under the burthen of his sufferings. Christ in his agony prayed, prayed earnestly, prayed that the cup might pass from him. When the prince of this world with his terrors set upon him, gaped upon him as a roaring lion, he fell upon the ground and prayed; and of that David's praying here was a type. He calls God his strength, ver. 19. When we cannot rejoice in God as our song, yet let us stay ourselves upon him as our strength; and take the comfort of spiritual supports when we cannot come at spiritual delights. He prays, 1. That God would be with him, and not set himself at a distance from him; "Be not thou far from me," ver. 11; and again, ver. 19, Whoever stands aloof from my sore, Lord, do not thou. The nearness of trouble should quicken us to draw near to God, and then we may hope that he will draw near to us. 2. That he would help him, and make haste to help him; help him to bear up under his troubles, that he might not fail nor be discouraged, that he might neither shrink from his undertaking nor sink under it; and the Father heard him in that he feared, Heb. v. 7, and enabled him to go through with his work. 3. That he would deliver him, and save him, ver. 20, 21. 1st. Observe what the jewel is which he is in care for; The safety of my soul, my darling; let that be redeemed from the power of the grave, Ps. xliv. 15; Father, into thy hands I commit that, to be conveyed safe to paradise. The psalmist here calls his soul his darling, his only one, so the word is: My soul is my only one. I have but one soul to take care of, and therefore the greater is my shame if I neglect it, and the greater will the loss be if I let it perish. Being my only one it ought to be my darling, for the eternal welfare of which I ought to be deeply concerned. I do not use my soul as my darling unless I take care to preserve it from every thing that would hurt it, and to provide all necessaries for it, and be entirely tender of its welfare. 2nd. Observe what the danger is from which he prays to be delivered; from the sword, the flaming sword of Divine wrath, which turns every way. This he dreaded more than any thing, Gen. iii. 24. God's anger was the wormwood and the gall in the bitter cup that was put into his hands: O deliver my soul from that: Lord, though I lose my life, let me not lose thy love. Save me from the power of the dog, and from the lion's mouth. This seems to be meant of Satan, that old enemy, that bruised the heel of the seed of the woman, the prince of this world, with whom he was to engage in close combat, and whom he saw coming, Jno. xiv. 30. Lord, save me from being overpowered by his terrors. He pleads, "Thou hast" formerly "heard me from the horns of the unicorn," that is, saved me from him in answer to my prayer. Which may refer to the victory Christ had obtained over Satan, and his temptations, Mat. iv., when the devil left him for a season, Lu. iv. 13, but now returned in another manner to attack him with his terrors. Lord, thou gavest me the victory then, give it me now, that I may spoil principalities and powers, and cast out the prince of this world. Has God delivered us from the horns of the unicorn, that we be not tossed? Let that encourage us to hope that we shall be delivered from the lion's mouth, that we be not torn. He that has delivered doth and will. This prayer of Christ no doubt was answered, for the Father heard him always; and, though he did not deliver him from death, yet he suffered him not to see corruption, but the third day raised him out of the dust of death, which was a greater instance of God's favour to him than if he had helped him down from the cross: for that would have baulked his undertaking, whereas his resurrection crowned it.

In singing this we should meditate on the sufferings and resurrection of Christ, till we experience in our own souls the power of his resurrection, and the fellowship of his sufferings.

22 I will declare thy name unto my brethren:
In the midst of the congregation will I praise thee.
23 Ye that fear the LORD, praise him;
All ye the seed of Jacob, glorify him;
And fear him, all ye the seed of Israel.
24 For he hath not despised nor abhorred the affliction of the afflicted;
Neither hath he hid his face from him;
But when he cried unto him, he heard.
25 My praise shall be of thee in the great congregation:
I will pay my vows before them that fear him.
26 The meek shall eat and be satisfied:
They shall praise the LORD that seek him:
Your heart shall live for ever.
27 All the ends of the world shall remember and turn unto the LORD:
And all the kindreds of the nations shall worship before thee.
28 For the kingdom is the LORD'S:
And he is the governor among the nations.
29 All they that be fat upon earth shall eat and worship:
All they that go down to the dust shall bow before him:
And none can keep alive his own soul.
30 A seed shall serve him;
It shall be accounted to the LORD for a generation.
31 They shall come, and shall declare his righteousness Unto a people that shall be born, that he hath done this.

The same that began the psalm complaining, who was no other than Christ in his humiliation, ends it here triumphing, and it can be no other than Christ in his exaltation. And, as the first words of the complaint were used by Christ himself upon the cross, so the first words of the triumph are expressly applied to him, Heb. ii. 12, and are made his own words: "I will declare thy name unto my brethren, in the midst of the church will I sing praise unto thee." The certain prospect which Christ had of the joy set before him not only gave him a satisfactory answer to his prayers, but turned his complaints into praises. He saw of the travail of his soul and was well satisfied; witness that triumphant word wherewith he breathed his last, "It is finished." Five things are here spoken of, the view of which was the satisfaction and triumph of Christ in his sufferings.

First. That he should have a church in the world, and those that were given him from eternity should, in the fulness of time, be gathered in to him. This is implied here, that he should see his seed, Isa. liii. 10. It pleased him to think, 1. That by the declaring of God's name, that is, by the preaching of the everlasting Gospel in its plainness and purity, many should be effectually called to him and to God by him. And for this end ministers should be employed to publish this doctrine to the world, who should be so much his messengers and his voice, that their doing it should be accounted his doing it; their word is his, and by them he declares God's name. 2. That those who are thus called in should be brought into a very near and dear relation to him, as his brethren; for he is not only not ashamed, but greatly well pleased to call them so; not the believing Jews only, his countrymen, but those of the Gentiles also, who became fellow heirs, and of the same body, Heb. ii. 11. Christ is our elder brother, who takes care of us, and makes provision for us, and expects that our desire should be towards him, and that we be willing he should rule over us. 3. That these brethren of his should be incorporated into a congregation, a great congregation. Such is the universal church, the whole family that is named from him, into which all the children of God that were scattered abroad are collected, and in which they are united, Jno. xi. 52; Eph. i. 10. And that they should also be incorporated into lesser societies, members of that great body, many religious assemblies for Divine worship, on which the face of Christianity should appear, and in which the interests of it should be supported and advanced. 4. That these should be accounted the seed of Jacob and Israel, ver. 23; that on them, though Gentiles, the blessing of Abraham might come, Gal. iii. 14; and to them might pertain the adoption, the glory, the covenant, and the service of God, as much as ever it did to Israel according to the flesh, Rom. ix. 4; Heb. viii. 10. The Gospel church is called the Israel of God, Gal. vi. 6.

Secondly. That God should be greatly honoured and glorified in him by that church. His Father's glory was that which he had in his eye throughout his whole undertaking, Jno. xvii. 4, particularly in his sufferings, which he entered upon with this solemn request, "Father, glorify thy name," Jno. xii. 27, 28. He foresees with pleasure,

1. That God would be glorified by the church that should be gathered to him; and for that end they should be called and gathered in, that they might be unto of a lost poem, in which "the hind of the dawn" was spoken of, called so after the same manner as was the elegy of David over Jonathan "the bow," because Jonathan's bow was celebrated in it. The expression, "hind of the dawn," was familiar to the Hebrews, to designate the first light of the morning.

xxii. 12. The oxen of Bashan were a wild and powerful race of cattle, and, as it would seem, very formidable when excited.

xxii. 16. The last clause of this verse is rendered in the Greek, as in the English, "they pierced my hands and my feet;" or, to be very exact, "they dug my hands and my feet." So the Latin, the Syriac, the Ethiopic, and the Arabic. The Chaldee paraphrases the words, "gnawing like a lion my hands and my feet." There are two readings of the Hebrew, one of which is, "as a lion, my hands and my feet;" and the other, "they dug my hands and my feet." The Chaldee manifestly seeks to combine the two. Of modern critics, those who reject the Messianic character of this psalm say we should trans-

God for a name and a praise. Christ by his ministers will declare God's name to his brethren, as God's mouth to them: and then by them, as the mouth of the congregation to God, will God's name be praised. All that fear the Lord will praise him, ver. 23, even every Israelite indeed: see Ps. cxviii. 2—4; cxxxv. 19, 20. The business of Christians, particularly in their solemn religious assemblies, is to praise and glorify God, with a holy awe and reverence of his majesty; and therefore they that are here called upon to praise God are called upon to fear him.

2. That God would be glorified in the Redeemer, and in his undertaking. Therefore Christ is said to praise God in the church, not only because he is the Master of the assemblies in which God is praised, and the Mediator of all the praises that are offered up to God, but because he is the matter of the church's praise: see Eph. iii. 21. All our praises must centre in the work of redemption, and a great deal of reason we have to be thankful, 1st. That Jesus Christ was owned by his Father in his undertaking, notwithstanding the apprehension he was sometimes under that his Father had forsaken him; ver. 24, "For he hath not despised nor abhorred the affliction of the afflicted" one, that is, of the suffering Redeemer; but has graciously accepted it as a full satisfaction for sin, and a valuable consideration on which to ground the grant of eternal life to all believers. Though it was offered to us poor sinners, he did not despise or abhor it for our sakes, nor did he turn his face from him that offered it, as Saul was angry with his own son, because he interceded for David, whom he looked upon as his enemy. But when he cried unto him, when his blood cried for peace and pardon for us, he heard him. This, as it is the matter of our rejoicing, ought to be the matter of our thanksgiving. Those who have thought their prayers slighted and unheard, yet, if they continue to pray and wait, will find they have not sought in vain. 2nd. That he himself will go on with his undertaking and complete it. Christ saith, "I will pay my vows," ver. 25. Having engaged to bring many sons to glory, he will perform his engagement to the utmost, and will lose none.

Thirdly. That all humble gracious souls should have a full satisfaction and happiness in him, ver. 26. It comforted the Lord Jesus in his sufferings, that in and through him all true believers should have everlasting consolation. 1. The poor in spirit shall be rich in blessings, spiritual blessings; the hungry shall be filled with good things. Christ's sacrifice being accepted, the saints shall feast upon the sacrifice, as under the law upon the peace offerings, and so partake of the altar. "The meek shall eat and be satisfied," eat of the bread of life, feed with an appetite upon the doctrine of Christ's mediation; which is meat and drink to the soul that knows its own nature and case. They that hunger and thirst after righteousness in Christ shall have all they can desire to satisfy them, and make them easy, and shall not labour as they have done for that which satisfieth not. 2. They that are much in praying shall be much in thanksgiving. "They shall praise the Lord that seek him," because through Christ they are sure of finding him; in the hopes of which they have reason to praise him, even while they are seeking him. And the more earnest they are in seeking him, the more will their hearts be enlarged in his praises when they have found him. 3. The souls that are devoted to him shall be for ever happy with him; "Your heart shall live for ever." Yours that are meek, that are satisfied in Christ, that continue to seek God, whatever becomes of your bodies, your hearts shall live for ever; the graces and comforts you have shall be perfected in everlasting life. Christ has said, "Because I live, you shall live also," Jno. xiv. 19; and therefore that life shall be as sure and as long as his.

Fourthly. That the church of Christ, and with it the kingdom of God among men, should extend itself to all corners of the earth, and should take in all sorts of people.

1. That it should reach far, ver. 27, 28. That whereas the Jews had long been the only professing people of God, now "all the ends of the world should" come into the church, and, the partition wall being taken down, the Gentiles should be taken in. It is here prophesied, 1st. That they should be converted; They shall "remember and turn to the Lord." Note, Serious reflection is the first step, and a good step it is, towards true conversion. We must consider and turn. The prodigal came first to himself, and then to his father. 2nd. That then they should be admitted into communion with God, and with the assemblies that serve him; "They shall worship before thee," for "in every place incense shall be offered to God," Mal. i. 11; Isa. lxvi. 23. Those that turn to God will make conscience of worshipping before him. And good reason there is why all the kindreds of the nations should do homage to God, for, ver. 28, "The kingdom is the Lord's;" his, and his only, is the universal monarchy. First. The kingdom of nature is the Lord Jehovah's, and his providence rules among the nations, and upon that account we are bound to worship him; so that the design of the Christian religion is to revive natural religion, and the principles and laws of it. Christ died to bring us to God, the God that made us, from whom we had revolted, and reduce us to our native allegiance. Secondly. The kingdom of grace is the Lord Christ's, and he, as Mediator, is appointed governor among the nations; head over all things to his church. Let every tongue therefore confess that he is Lord.

2. That it should include many of different ranks, ver. 29; high and low, rich and poor, bond and free, meet in Christ. 1st. Christ shall have the homage of many of the great ones. "They that be fat upon earth," that live in pomp and power, they "shall eat and worship;" even they that fare deliciously, when they have eaten and are full, shall bless the Lord their God for their plenty and prosperity. 2nd. The poor also shall receive his Gospel. Those that go down to the dust, that sit in the dust, Ps. cxiii. 7, that can scarce keep life and soul together, they shall bow before the Lord Jesus, who reckons it his honour to be the poor man's King, Ps. lxxii. 12; and whose protection doth in a special manner draw their allegiance. Or this may be understood in general of dying men, whether poor or rich. See then what is our condition: we are going down to the dust, to which we are sentenced, and where shortly we must make our bed; nor can we keep alive our own souls, we cannot secure our own natural life long; nor can we be the authors of our own spiritual and eternal life. It is, therefore, our great interest, as well as duty, to bow before the Lord Jesus, to give up ourselves to him to be his subjects, and worshippers; for this is the only way, and it is a sure way, to secure our happiness, when we go down to the dust. Seeing we cannot keep alive our own souls, it is our wisdom by an obedient faith to commit our souls to Jesus Christ, who is able to save them, and keep them alive for ever.

Fifthly. That the church of Christ, and with it the kingdom of God among men, shall continue to the end through all the ages of time. Mankind is kept up in a succession of generations; so that there is always a generation passing away, and a generation coming up. Now, as Christ shall have honour from that which is passing away, and leaving the world, ver. 29, they that go down to the dust shall bow before him; and it is good to die bowing before Christ. Blessed are the dead who thus die in the Lord; so he shall have honour from that which is rising up and setting out in the world, ver. 30. Observe,

1. Their application to Christ; "A seed shall serve him," that is, shall keep up the solemn worship of him, and profess and practise obedience to him as their Master and Lord. Note, God will have a church in the world to the end of time; and, in order to that, there shall be a succession of professing Christians, and Gospel ministers, from generation to generation. "A seed shall serve him," that is, there shall be a remnant more or less to whom shall pertain the service of God, and to whom God will give grace to serve him. Perhaps not the seed of the same persons, for grace doth not run in a blood; he doth not say their seed, but a seed. Perhaps but few, yet enough to preserve the entail.

2. Christ's acknowledgment of them; "They shall be accounted to him for a generation," that is, he will be the same to them that he was to those who went before them. His kindness to his friends shall not die with them, but shall be drawn out to their heirs and successors: and instead of the fathers shall be the children, whom all shall acknowledge to be "a seed that the Lord hath blessed," Isa. lxi. 9; lxv. 23. The generation of the righteous God will graciously own as his treasure, his children.

3. Their agency for him; ver. 31, "They shall come," shall rise up in their day, not only to keep up the virtue of the generation that is past, and to do the work of their own generation; but to serve the honour of Christ, and the welfare of souls in the generations to come. They shall transmit to them the Gospel of Christ (that sacred depositum) pure and entire even "to a people that shall be born" hereafter; to them they shall declare two things: 1st. That there is an everlasting righteousness, which Jesus Christ hath brought in. This righteousness of his, and not any of our own, they shall declare to be the foundation of all our hopes, and the fountain of all our joys: see Rom. i. 16, 17. 2nd. That the work of our redemption by Christ is the Lord's own doing, Ps. cxviii. 23; and no contrivance of ours. This we must declare to our children, "that God has done this." It is his wisdom in a mystery, it is his arm revealed.

In singing this, we must triumph in the name of Christ, as above every name: must give him honour ourselves; rejoice in the honours others do him, and in the assurance we have that there shall be a people praising him on earth when we are praising him in heaven.

PSALM XXIII.

Many of David's psalms are full of complaints, but this is full of comforts, and the expressions of delight in God's great goodness and dependence upon him. It is a psalm which has been sung by good Christians, and will be while the world stands, with a great deal of pleasure and satisfaction. I. The psalmist here claims relation to God as his shepherd, ver. 1. II. He recounts his experience of the kind things God had done for him, as his shepherd, ver. 2, 3, 5. III. From hence he infers, that he should want no good, ver. 1; that he needed to fear no evil, ver. 4; that he would never leave or forsake him in a way of mercy, and therefore he resolves never to leave or forsake God in the way of duty, ver. 6; and in this certainly he has an eye, not only to the blessings of God's providence, which made his outward condition prosperous, but to the communications of God's grace, received by a lively faith, and returned in a warm devotion, which fills his soul with joy unspeakable; and, as in the foregoing psalm he represented Christ dying for his sheep, so here he represents Christians receiving the benefit of all the care and tenderness of that great and good Shepherd.

A Psalm of David.

THE LORD is my shepherd;
I shall not want
2 He maketh me to lie down in green pastures:
He leadeth me beside the still waters
3 He restoreth my soul: [name's sake.
He leadeth me in the paths of righteousness for his 4 Yea, though I walk through the valley of the shadow of
I will fear no evil: for thou art with me; [death,
Thy rod and thy staff they comfort me
5 Thou preparest a table before me in the presence of mine
Thou anointest my head with oil; [enemies:
My cup runneth over.
6 Surely goodness and mercy shall follow me all the days of my life:
And I will dwell in the house of the LORD for ever.

From three very comfortable premises, David in this psalm draws three very comfortable conclusions, and teaches us to do so too. We are saved by hope, and therefore that hope will not make us ashamed, because it is well grounded. It is the duty of Christians to encourage themselves in the Lord their God; and we are here directed to take that encouragement, both from the relation wherein he stands to us, and from the experience we have had of his goodness according to that relation.

First. From God's being his Shepherd he infers that he shall not want any thing that is good for him, ver. 1. See here,

1. The great care that God takes of believers. He is their Shepherd, and they may call him so. Time was when David was himself a shepherd, he was taken from following the ewes great with young, Ps. lxxviii. 70; and so he knew by experience the cares and tender affections of a good shepherd towards his flock; he remembered what need they had of a shepherd, and what a kindness it was to them to have one that was skilful and faithful: he once ventured his life to rescue a lamb. By this, therefore, he illustrates God's care of his people; and to this our Saviour seems to refer, when he saith, "I am the Shepherd of the sheep; the good Shepherd," Jno. x. 11. He that is the Shepherd of Israel, that is, of the whole church in general, Ps. lxxx. 1, is the Shepherd of every particular believer; the meanest is not below his cognizance, Isa. xl. 11. He takes them into his fold, and then takes care of them; protects them, and provides for them with more care and constancy than a shepherd can, that makes it his business to keep the flock. If God be as a Shepherd to us, we must be as sheep, inoffensive, meek and quiet, silent before the shearers, nay, and before the butcher too, useful and sociable; we must know the Shepherd's voice, and follow him.

2. The great confidence which believers have in God. If "the Lord is my Shepherd," my feeder, I may conclude, "I shall not want" any thing that is really necessary and good for me. If David penned this psalm before his coming to the crown, though destined to it, he had as much reason to fear wanting as any man. Once he sent his men a begging for him to Nabal, and another time went himself a begging to Ahimelech; and yet, when he considers that God is his Shepherd, he can boldly say, "I shall not want." Let not those fear starving that are at God's finding, and have him for their feeder. More is late, "as a lion my hands and my feet." Others affirm that this gives no sense, and that the other reading, represented by all the ancient versions, is correct. Even if the actual letters of ordinary copies be retained, it is alleged that the words may be rendered with the context, "The assembly of the wicked enclosed me, piercers of my hands and feet." Bythner says the Jews read the passage so as to render it "like a lion," that they may not be forced to own this prophecy to have been fulfilled in Christ and in no other.

xxii. 21. "Horns of the unicorns" should be "horns of wild oxen," which are the animals meant, and not rhinoceroses, as some fancy.

xxii. 29. For "all they that be fat upon earth" translate, "all the fat ones of the land," or, throwing aside the figure, "all the prosperous of the land." The verse means that men in prosperity will eat of the sacrifices and worship; even men about to die or in deep affliction will also worship before him: for none can save his own soul, or rather, perhaps, none can save himself.

implied than is expressed; not only "I shall not want," but I shall be supplied with whatever I need; and if I have not every thing I desire, I may conclude it is either not fit for me, or not good for me, or I shall have it in due time.

Secondly. From his performing the office of a good Shepherd to him, he infers that he needs not fear any evil in the greatest dangers and difficulties he could be in, ver. 2—4. He experienceth the benefit of God's presence with him, and care of him now, and therefore expects the benefit of them when he most needs it. See here,

1. The comforts of a living saint. God is his Shepherd, and he is to him a God all-sufficient to all intents and purposes; David found him so, and so have we. See the happiness of the saints as the sheep of God's pasture.

1st. They are well placed, well laid: "He maketh me to lie down in green pastures." We have the supports and comforts of this life from God's good hand; our daily bread from him as our Father. The greatest abundance is but a dry pasture to a wicked man, who relisheth that only in it which pleaseth the senses; but to a godly man, who tasteth the goodness of God in all his enjoyments, and by faith relisheth that, though he has but little of the world, it is to him a green pasture, Ps. xxxvii. 16; Pr. xv. 16, 17. God's ordinances are the green pastures, in which food is provided for all believers; the word of life is the nourishment of the new man. It is milk for babes, pasture for the sheep; never barren, never eaten bare, never parched, but always a green pasture for faith to feed in. God makes his saints to lie down, that is, he gives them quiet and contentment in their own minds, whatever their lot is; their souls dwell at ease in him, and that makes every pasture green. Are we blessed with the green pastures of the ordinances, let us not think it enough to pass through them, but let us lie down in them, abide in them; This is my rest for ever. It is by a constancy of the means of grace that the soul is fed.

2nd. They are well guided, well led. The Shepherd of Israel guideth Joseph like a flock; and every believer is under the same conduct: "He leadeth me beside the still waters." Those that feed on God's goodness, must follow his direction: he leads them by his providence, by his Word, by his Spirit, disposeth their affairs for the best according to his counsel; disposeth their affections and actions according to his command; directs their eye, their way, and their heart into his love. The still waters by which he leads them yield them not only a pleasant prospect, but many a cooling draught, many a reviving cordial, when they are thirsty and weary. God provides for his people, not only food and rest, but refreshment also and pleasure. The consolations of God, the joys of the Holy Ghost, are these still waters by which the saints are led; streams which flow from the fountain of living waters, and make glad the city of our God. God leads his people, not to the standing waters which corrupt and gather filth, not to the troubled sea, nor to the rapid, rolling floods, but to the silent, purling waters; for the still but running waters agree best with those spirits that flow out towards God, and yet do it silently. This Divine conduct they are under is stripped of its metaphor; ver. 3, "He leadeth me in the paths of righteousness," that is, in the way of my duty, in that he instructs me by his word, and directs me by conscience and providence. These are the paths in which all the saints desire to be led and kept, and never to turn aside out of them; and those only are led by the still waters of comfort that walk in the paths of righteousness. The way of duty is the truly pleasant way; it is the work of righteousness that is peace. In these paths we cannot walk, unless God both lead us into them and lead us in them.

3rd. They are well helped when any thing ails them; "He restoreth my soul," that is, First. He reduceth me when I wander. No creature will lose itself sooner than a sheep, so apt it is to go astray, and then so unapt to find the way back. The best saints are sensible of their proneness to "go astray like lost sheep;" Ps. cxix. 176. They miss their way, and turn aside into bypaths; but when God shews them their error, gives them repentance, and brings them back to their duty again, he restoreth the soul; and if he did not do so they would wander endlessly, and be undone. When after one sin David's heart smote him, and after another Nathan was sent to tell him, "Thou art the man," God restored his soul. Though God may suffer his people to fall into sin, he will not suffer them to lie still in it. Secondly. He recovereth me when I am sick, and revives me when I am faint; and so restores the soul which was ready to depart. He is the Lord our God that healeth us, Ex. xv. 26; many a time we had fainted unless we had believed; and it was the good Shepherd that kept us from fainting.

2. See here the courage of a dying saint, ver. 4. Having had such experience of God's goodness to me all my days, in six troubles and in seven, I will never distrust him, no, not in the last extremity. The rather, because all he has done for me hitherto was not for any merit or desert of mine, but purely for his name's sake; in pursuance of his word, in performance of his promise, and for the glory of his own attributes, and relations to his people. That name, therefore, shall still be my strong tower, and shall assure me that he that has led me and fed me all my life long will not leave me at last. Here is,

1st. Imminent danger supposed; "Though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death;" that is, though I am in peril of death, though in the midst of dangers, deep as a valley, dark as a shadow, and dreadful as death itself,—or, rather, though I am under the arrests of death, have received the sentence of death within myself, and have all the reason in the world to look upon myself as a dying man,—yet I am easy. Those that are sick, those that are old, have reason to look upon themselves as "in the valley of the shadow of death." Here is one word indeed which sounds terrible,—it is death; which we must all count upon,—there is no discharge in that war. But even in the supposition of the distress, there are four words which lessen the terror. It is death indeed that is before us; but, First. It is but the shadow of death, there is no substantial evil in it; the shadow of a serpent will not sting, nor the shadow of a sword kill. Secondly. It is the valley of the shadow, deep indeed, and dark, and dirty, but the valleys are fruitful; and so is death itself fruitful of comforts to God's people. Thirdly. It is but a walk in this valley, a gentle, pleasant walk. The wicked are chased out of the world, and their souls are required; but the saints take a walk to another world as cheerfully as they take their leave of this. Fourthly. It is a walk through it; they shall not be lost in this valley, but get safe to the mountain of spices on the other side it.

2nd. This danger made light of and triumphed over upon good grounds. Death is a king of terrors, but not to the sheep of Christ; they tremble at it no more than sheep do that "are appointed for the slaughter." Even in "the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil," none of these things move me. Note, A child of God may meet the messengers of death, and receive its summons with a holy security and serenity of mind. The sucking child may play upon the hole of this asp; and the weaned child, that through grace is weaned from this world, may put his hand upon this cockatrice's den, bidding a holy defiance to death, as Paul, "O death, where is thy sting?" And there is ground enough for this confidence, First. Because there is no evil in it to a child of God. Death cannot separate us from the love of God, and therefore it can do us no real harm; it kills the body, but cannot touch the soul. And what need it be dreadful, when there is nothing in it hurtful? Secondly. Because the saints have God's gracious presence with them in their dying moments. He is then at their right hand, and therefore what need they be moved? The good Shepherd will not only conduct, but convey his sheep through this valley, where they are in danger of being set upon by the beasts of prey, the evening wolves; he will not only convey them, but comfort them then when they most need comfort. His presence shall comfort them, "Thou art with me;" his Word and Spirit shall comfort them; his rod and staff, alluding to the shepherd's crook, or the rod under which the sheep passed when they were counted, Lev. xxvii. 32; or the staff with which the shepherds drove away the dogs that would scatter or worry the sheep. It is a comfort to the saints when they come to die that God takes cognizance of them, he knows them that are his; that he will rebuke the enemy; that he will guide them with his rod, and sustain them with his staff. The Gospel is called the rod of Christ's strength, Ps. cx. 2; and there is enough in that to comfort the saints when they come to die, and underneath them are the everlasting arms.

Thirdly. From the good gifts of God's bounty to him now he infers the constancy and perpetuity of his mercy, ver. 5, 6. Where we may observe,

1. How highly he magnifies God's gracious vouchsafements to him; ver. 5, "Thou hast prepared a table before me;" thou hast provided for me all things pertaining both to life and godliness; all things requisite both for body and soul, for time and eternity. Such a bountiful benefactor is God to all his people; and it becomes them abundantly to utter his great goodness, as David here, who acknowledgeth, 1st. That he had food convenient, a table spread, a cup filled, meat for his hunger, drink for his thirst. 2nd. That he had it carefully and readily provided for him. His table was not spread with any thing that came next to hand, but prepared, and prepared before him. 3rd. That he was not stinted, was not straitened, but had abundance; "My cup runs over;" enough for myself and my friends too. 4th. That he had not only for necessity, but for ornament and delight. "Thou anointest my head with oil." Samuel anointed him king, which was a certain pledge of farther favour; but this is rather an instance of the plenty with which God had blessed him; or an allusion to the extraordinary entertainment of special friends, whose heads they anointed with oil, Lu. vii. 46. Nay, some think, he still looks upon himself as a sheep, but such a one as the poor man's ewe lamb, 2 Sam. xii. 3, that did "eat of his own meat, and drank of his own cup, and lay in his bosom." Not only thus nobly, but thus tenderly, are the children of God looked after. Plentiful provision is made for their bodies, for their souls, for the life that now is, and for that which is to come. If Providence do not bestow upon us thus plentifully for our natural life, it is our own fault if it be not made up to us in spiritual blessings.

2. How confidently he counts upon the continuance of God's favours, ver. 6. He had said, ver. 1, "I shall not want," but now he speaks more positively, more comprehensively: "Surely goodness and mercy shall follow me all the days of my life." His hope riseth, and his faith is strengthened by being acted. Observe, 1st. What he promiseth himself. "Goodness and mercy;" that is, all the streams of it flowing from the fountain; pardoning mercy, protecting mercy, sustaining, supplying mercy. 2nd. The manner of the conveyance of it. It "shall follow me," as the water out of the rock followed the camp of Israel through the wilderness; it shall follow them into all places and all conditions, shall be always ready to them. 3rd. The continuance of it. It shall follow me all my life long, even to the last; for whom God loves he loves to the end. 4th. The constancy of it. "All the days of my life," as duly as the day comes; it shall be new every morning, Lam. iii. 22, 23; like the manna that was given to the Israelites daily. 5th. The certainty of it. "Surely" it shall. It is as sure as the promise of the God of truth can make it; and we know whom we have believed. 6th. Here is a prospect of the perfection of bliss in the future state, so some take the latter clause. Goodness and mercy having followed me all the days of my life on this earth, when that is ended, I shall remove to a better world, to "dwell in the house of the Lord for ever," in our Father's house above, where there are many mansions. 'With what I have, I am pleased much; with what I hope for, more.' All this, and heaven too! Then we serve a good Master.

3. How resolutely he determines to cleave to God and to his duty. We read the last clause as David's covenant with God; "I will dwell in the house of the Lord for ever," that is, as long as I live, and I will praise him while I have any being. We must dwell in his house as servants that desire to have their ears bored to his door-post, to serve him for ever. If God's goodness to us be like the morning light, which shines more and more to the perfect day, let not ours to him be like the morning cloud and the early dew that passeth away. Those that would be satisfied with the fatness of God's house must keep close to the duties of it.

PSALM XXIV.

This psalm is concerning the kingdom of Jesus Christ. I. His providential kingdom, by which he rules the world, 1, 2. II. The kingdom of grace, by which he rules in his church. 1. Concerning the subjects of that kingdom; their character, ver. 3, 4, 6; their charter, ver. 5. 2. Concerning the king of that kingdom, and a summons to all to give him admission, ver. 7—10. It is supposed that the psalm was penned upon occasion of David's bringing up the ark to the place prepared for it; and that the intention of it was to lead the people above the pomp of external ceremonies to a holy life and faith in Christ, of whom the ark was a type.

A Psalm of David.

THE earth is the LORD's, and the fulness thereof;
The world, and they that dwell therein
2 For he hath founded it upon the seas,
And established it upon the floods.

Here is, First. God's absolute propriety in this part of the creation, where our lot is cast, ver. 1. We are not to think that "the heavens, even the heavens" only, "are the Lord's," and the numerous and bright inhabitants of the upper world; and that this earth, being so small and inconsiderable a part of the creation, and at such a distance from the royal palace above, is neglected, and that he claims no interest in it. No, even the earth is his, and this lower world; and though he has prepared the throne of his glory in the heavens, yet his kingdom ruleth over all; and even the worms of this earth are not below his cognizance, nor from under his dominion.

1. When God gave the earth to the children of men, he still reserved to himself the property, and only let it out to them as tenants or usufructuaries. "The earth is the Lord's, and the fulness thereof;" the mines that are lodged in the bowels of it, even the richest; the fruits it produceth; all the beasts of the forest, and the cattle upon a thousand hills; our lands and houses, and all the improvements that are made of this earth by the skill and industry of man; they are all his. These indeed, in the kingdom of grace, are justly looked upon as emptiness, for they are vanity of vanities, nothing to a soul; but in the kingdom of providence they are fulness. "The earth is full of God's riches, so is the great and wide sea also." All the parts and regions of the earth are the Lord's, all under his eye, all in his hand, so that wherever a child of God goes he may comfort himself with this, that he doth not go off his Father's ground

xxiv. Title. There is an addition to this title in the Greek version, which reads, "A Psalm of David, on the first day of the week." The most ready way of accounting for this is that the words were introduced by a Christian copyist, to denote that the psalm was one for the Lord's day. The Syriac title, which is also of Christian origin, is, "Of David; concerning the first day, whereon God began to form the creatures." The Arabic understands the psalm of the "calling of the Gentiles, and of the incarnation." Lowth thinks the occasion of the psalm was David's bringing the ark of God to Mount Zion. The structure of the psalm is elaborate, and manifestly intended for responsive singing. After verses 1 and 2, probably a single voice repeats verse 3, to which the answer is in verses 4 and 5. Then follow verses 6 and 7. The first line of verse 8 seems given to the same as verse 3. The response goes on to verse 10, which contains a repetition of the question from verse 8, and a reply to it. According to some, the divisions are even more numerous

That which falls to our share of the earth and its products is but lent to us; it is the Lord's; what is our own against all the world is not so against his claims. That which is most remote from us, as that which passeth through the paths of the sea, or is hid in the bottom of it, is the Lord's; and he knows where to find it.

2. The habitable part of this earth is his in a special manner; Pr. viii. 31, "The world, and they that dwell therein." We ourselves are not our own,—our bodies, our souls, are not: "All souls are mine," saith God; for he is the former of our bodies, and the father of our spirits. Our tongues are not our own; they are to be at his service. Even those of the children of men are his that know him not, nor own their relation to him. Now this comes in here to shew that, though God is graciously pleased to accept the devotions and services of his peculiar chosen people, ver. 3—5, it is not because he needs them, or can be benefited by them, for the earth is his, and all in it, Ex. xix. 5; Ps. l. 12. It is likewise to be applied to the dominion Christ hath as Mediator over the utmost parts of the earth, which are given him for his possession. "The Father loveth the Son, and hath given all things into his hand,—power over all flesh." The apostle quotes this scripture twice together, in his discourse about things offered to idols, 1 Cor. x. 26, 28. If it be sold in the shambles, eat it, and ask no questions, "for the earth is the Lord's;" it is God's good creature, and you have a right to it; but if one tell you, it was offered to an idol, forbear, "for the earth is the Lord's," and there is enough beside. This is a good reason why we should be content with our allotment in this world, and not envy others theirs; "the earth is the Lord's," and may he not do what he will with his own, and give to some more of it, to others less, as it pleaseth him?

Secondly. The ground of this propriety. The earth is his by an indisputable title; "for he hath founded it upon the seas, and established it upon the floods," ver. 2. It is his; for, 1. He made it, formed it, founded it, and fitted it for the use of man. The matter his; for he made it out of nothing. The form his; for he made it according to the eternal counsels and ideas of his own mind. He made it himself; he made it for himself; so that he is sole, entire, and absolute owner; and none can let us a title to any part of it but by, from, and under him: see Ps. lxxxix. 11, 12. 2. He made it so as no one else could. It is the creature of Omnipotence; for it is founded upon the seas, upon the floods; a weak and unstable foundation, one would think, to build the earth upon; and yet, if Almighty Power pleaseth, it shall serve to bear the weight of this earth. The waters which at first covered the earth, and rendered it unfit to be a habitation for man, were ordered under it, that the dry land might appear, and so they are as a foundation to it: see Ps. civ. 8, 9. 3. He continues it; he hath established it, fixed it, so that, though one generation passeth and another cometh, the earth abideth, Eccl. i. 4; and his providence is a continued creation, Ps. cxix. 90. The founding of the earth upon the floods should mind us how slippery and uncertain all earthly things are. Their foundation is not only sand, but water; it is therefore our folly to build upon them.

3 Who shall ascend into the hill of the LORD?
Or who shall stand in his holy place?
4 He that hath clean hands, and a pure heart;
Who hath not lifted up his soul unto vanity, nor sworn deceitfully
5 He shall receive the blessing from the LORD,
And righteousness from the God of his salvation
6 This is the generation of them that seek him,
That seek thy face, O Jacob. Selah

From this world, and the fulness thereof, the psalmist's meditations rise of a sudden to the great things of another world, the foundation of which is not on the seas, nor on the floods. The things of this world God hath given to the children of men, and we are much indebted to his providence for them; but they will not make a portion for us. And, therefore,

First. Here is an inquiry after better things, ver. 3. This earth is God's footstool; but, if we had never so much of it, we must be here but a while, must shortly go hence, and "Who then shall ascend into the hill of the Lord?" Who shall go to heaven hereafter, and, as an earnest of that, shall have communion with God in holy ordinances now? A soul that knows and considers its own nature, original, and immortality, when it has viewed the earth and the fulness thereof, will sit down unsatisfied. There is not found among all the creatures a help meet for man, and therefore it will think of ascending towards God, towards heaven; will ask, What shall I do to rise to that high place, that hill where the Lord dwells, and manifests himself, that I may be acquainted with him; and to abide in that happy, holy place where he meets his people, and makes them holy and happy? What shall I do that I may be of those whom God owns for his peculiar people, and who are his in another manner than the earth is his and its fulness? This question is much the same with that Ps. xv. 1. The hill of Zion, on which the temple was built, typified the church both visible and invisible. When the people attended the ark to its holy place, David puts them in mind that these were but patterns of heavenly things, and therefore by them they should be led to consider the heavenly things themselves.

Secondly. An answer to this inquiry. In which we have,

1. The property of God's peculiar people, who shall have communion with him in grace and glory.

1st. They are such as keep themselves from all the gross acts of sin. They have clean hands; not spotted with the pollutions of the world and the flesh. None that were ceremonially unclean might enter into the mountain of the temple, which signified that cleanness of conversation which is required in all those that have fellowship with God. The hands lifted up in prayer must be pure hands; no blot of unjust gain cleaving to them, nor any thing else that defiles the man, and is offensive to the holy God.

2nd. They are such as make conscience of being really, that is, of being inwardly, as good as they seem to be outwardly. They have pure hearts. And we make nothing of our religion if we do not make heart-work of it. It is not that our hands be clean before men, but we must also wash our hearts from wickedness, and not allow ourselves in any secret heart-impurities, which are open before the eye of God. Yet in vain do those pretend to have pure and good hearts whose hands are defiled with the acts of sin. That is a pure heart which is sincere and without guile in covenanting with God; which is carefully guarded, that the wicked one, the unclean spirit, touch it not; which is purified by faith, and conformed to the image and will of God: see Mat. v. 8.

3rd. They are such as do not set their affections upon the things of this world; that do not lift up their souls unto vanity; whose hearts are not carried out inordinately towards the wealth of the world, the praise of men, or the delights of sense; who do not choose these things for their portion, nor reach forth after them, because they believe them to be vanity, uncertain, and unsatisfying.

4th. They are such as deal honestly both with God and man. In their covenant with God, and their contracts with men, they have not sworn deceitfully, not broken their promises, violated their engagements, or taken any false oath. Those that have no regard to the obligations of truth, or the honour of God's name, are unfit for a place in God's holy hill.

5th. They are a praying people; ver. 6, "This is the generation of them that seek him." In every age there is a remnant of such as these, men of this character, that are "accounted to the Lord for a generation," Ps. xxii. 30; and they are such as "seek God, that seek thy face, O Jacob!" First. They join themselves to God to seek him; not only in earnest prayer, but in serious endeavour to obtain his favour, and keep themselves in his love; that having made it the top of their happiness, make it the top of their ambition, to be accepted of him, and therefore take care and take pains to approve themselves to him. It is to the hill of the Lord that we must ascend; and, the way being uphill, we have need to put forth ourselves to the utmost as those that seek diligently. Secondly. They join themselves to the people of God, to seek God with them. Being brought into communion with God, they come into the communion of saints; conforming to the patterns of the saints that are gone before, so some understand this. They seek God's face as Jacob, so some, who was therefore sirnamed Israel, because he wrestled with God and prevailed. sought him and found him. And associating with the saints of their own day, they shall court the favour of God's church, Rev. iii. 9; shall be glad of an acquaintance with God's people, Zec. viii. 23; shall incorporate themselves with them; and, when they "subscribe with their hand to the Lord," shall "call themselves by the name of Jacob," Isa. xliv. 5. As soon as ever Paul was converted, he joined himself to the disciples, Acts ix. 26. They shall seek God's face in Jacob, (so some,) that is, in the assemblies of his people; 'Thy face, O God of Jacob,' so our margin supplies it, and makes it easy. As all believers are the spiritual seed of Abraham, so all that strive in prayer are the spiritual seed of Jacob; to whom God never said, Seek ye me in vain.

2. The privileges of God's peculiar people, ver. 5. They shall be made truly and for ever happy. 1st. They shall be blessed. They "shall receive the blessing from the Lord," all the fruits and gifts of God's favour according to his promise; and those whom God blesseth they are blessed indeed; for it is his prerogative to command the blessing. 2nd. They shall be justified and sanctified. These are the spiritual blessings in heavenly things, which they shall receive, even righteousness, the very thing they hunger and thirst after, Mat. v. 6. Righteousness is blessedness, and it is from God only that we must expect it; for we have no righteousness of our own. They shall receive the reward of their righteousness, so some; "the crown of righteousness, which the righteous Judge shall give," 2 Tim. iv. 8. 3rd. They shall be saved; for God himself will be the God of their salvation. Note, Where God gives righteousness, he certainly designs salvation. Those that are made meet for heaven shall be brought safe to heaven, and then they will find what they have been seeking to their endless satisfaction.

7 Lift up your heads, O ye gates;
And be ye lift up, ye everlasting doors;
And the King of glory shall come in.
8 Who is this King of glory?
The LORD strong and mighty,
The LORD mighty in battle
9 Lift up your heads, O ye gates;
Even lift them up, ye everlasting doors,
And the King of glory shall come in.
10 Who is this King of glory?
The LORD of hosts, he is the King of glory. Selah.

What is spoken once is spoken a second time in these verses; such repetitions are usual in songs, and have a great deal of beauty in them. Here is, 1. Entrance once and again demanded for the King of glory. The doors and gates are to be thrown open, thrown wide open, to give him admission; for, behold, he stands at the door and knocks, ready to come in. 2. Inquiry once and again made concerning this mighty Prince, in whose name entrance is demanded; "Who is this King of glory?" as when any knock at our door it is common to ask, Who is there? 3. Satisfaction once and again given concerning the royal person that makes the demand. It is "the Lord strong and mighty, the Lord mighty in battle, the Lord of hosts," ver. 8, 10. Now,

First. This splendid entry here described, it is probable, refers to the solemn bringing in of the ark into the tent David pitched for it, or the temple Solomon built for it; for when David prepared materials for the building of it it was proper enough for him to prepare a psalm for the dedication of it. The porters are called upon to open the doors, and they are called everlasting doors, because much more durable than the door of the tabernacle, which was but a curtain. They are taught to ask, "Who is this King of glory?" and they that bare the ark thus to answer, and very fitly, because the ark was the symbol or token of God's presence, Jos. iii. 11. Or it may be taken as a poetical figure, designed to represent the thing the more affectingly. God in his word and ordinances is thus to be welcomed by us, 1. With great readiness. The doors and gates must be thrown open to him. Let the word of the Lord come into the innermost and uppermost place in our souls; and if we had six hundred necks we should bow them all to the authority of it. 2. With all reverence; remembering how great a God he is with whom we have to do, in all our approaches to him.

Secondly. Doubtless it points at Christ, of whom the ark with the mercy-seat was a type.

1. We may apply it to the ascension of Christ into heaven, and the welcome given to him there. When he had finished his work on earth, he ascended in the clouds of heaven, Dan. vii. 13, 14. The gates of heaven must then be opened to him; those doors that may be truly called everlasting, which had been shut against us to keep the way of the tree of life, Gen. iii. 24. Our Redeemer found them shut; but, having by his blood made atonement for sin, and gained a title to enter into the holy place, Heb. ix. 12, as one having authority he demanded entrance, not for himself only, but for us; for as the forerunner he is for us entered, and opened the kingdom of heaven to all believers. The keys, not only of hell and death, but of heaven and life, must be put into his hand. His approach being very magnificent, the angels are brought in asking, "Who is this King of glory?" for angels keep the gates of the new Jerusalem, Rev. xxi. 12. When the first begotten was brought into the upper world, the angels were to worship him, Heb. i. 6; and, accordingly, they here ask with wonder, Who he is? this that cometh with dyed garments from Bozrah, xxiv. 4. Lifting up the soul to vanity is by various interpreters understood of worshipping idols. There is no doubt that "lifting up the soul" to God is an act of adoration, and it is equally clear that the word "vanity" is an appellation of an idol. In the same verse, for "nor sworn deceitfully," or so as to deceive, another reading is represented by some ancient versions, as the Latin: "nor hath sworn in deceit unto his neighbour."

xxiv. 6. For "generation," some translate "habitation." The Hebrew word has both senses. In the latter clause there are also found the variations, "that seek thy face, O God of Jacob," and "that seek the face of the God of Jacob." The reading followed by our translators is sometimes explained, "Those that seek thy face are Jacob." The Syriac, Arabic, Greek, and Latin all have the phrase. "God of Jacob," which must have been in their copies.

xxiv. 7—10. Although primarily referring to the entrance of the ark into the Tabernacle, and representing the ark as the symbol of

Isa. lxiii. 1—3; for he appears in that world as a Lamb that had been slain. It is answered, That he is strong and mighty; mighty in battle to save his people, and subdue his and their enemies.

2. We may apply it to Christ's entrance into the souls of men by his Word and Spirit, that they may be his temples. Christ's presence in them is like that of the ark in the temple, it sanctifies them; Behold, he stands at the door, and knocks, Rev. iii. 20. It is required that the gates and doors of the heart be opened to him; not only as admission is given to a guest, but as possession is delivered to the rightful owner, after the title has been contested. This is the Gospel call and demand, that we let Jesus Christ, the King of glory, come into our souls, and welcome him with hosannas, "Blessed is he that cometh." That we may do this aright, we are concerned to ask, "Who this King of glory is?" to acquaint ourselves with him, whom we are to believe in, and to love above all. And the answer is ready: he is Jehovah, and will be Jehovah our righteousness, an all-sufficient Saviour to us, if we give him entrance and entertainment. He is strong and mighty, and the Lord of hosts; and therefore it is at our peril if we deny him entrance, for he is able to avenge the affront; he can force his way, and can break those in pieces with his iron rod that will not submit to his golden sceptre.

In singing this, let our hearts cheerfully answer to this call, as it is in the first words of the next psalm, "Unto thee, O Lord, do I lift up my soul."

PSALM XXV.

This psalm is full of devout affection to God; the outgoings of holy desires towards his favour and grace, and the lively actings of faith in his promises. We may learn out of it, I. What it is to pray, ver. 1, 15. II. What we must pray for: the pardon of sin, ver. 6, 7, 18; direction in the way of duty, ver. 4, 5; the favour of God, ver. 16; deliverance out of our troubles, ver. 17, 18; preservation from our enemies, ver. 20, 21; and the salvation of the church of God, ver. 22. III. What we may plead in prayer: our confidence in God, ver. 2, 3, 5, 20, 21; our distress, and the malice of our enemies, ver. 17, 19; our sincerity, ver. 21. IV. What precious promises we have to encourage us in prayer: of guidance and instruction, ver. 8, 9, 12; the benefit of the covenant, ver. 10; and the pleasure of communion with God, ver. 13, 14. It is easy to apply the several passages of this psalm to ourselves in the singing of it; for we have often troubles, and always sins, to complain of at the throne of grace.

A Psalm of David.

UNTO thee, O LORD, do I lift up my soul
2 O my God, I trust in thee:
Let me not be ashamed,
Let not mine enemies triumph over me.
3 Yea, let none that wait on thee be ashamed:
Let them be ashamed which transgress without cause.
4 Shew me thy ways, O LORD;
Teach me thy paths
5 Lead me in thy truth, and teach me:
For thou art the God of my salvation;
On thee do I wait all the day
6 Remember, O LORD, thy tender mercies and thy loving-
For they have been ever of old. [kindnesses;
7 Remember not the sins of my youth, nor my transgres-
According to thy mercy remember thou me [sions:
For thy goodness' sake, O LORD.

Here is, First. David's professions of desire towards God, and dependence on him. He often begins his psalms with such professions; not to move God, but to move himself, and to engage himself to answer those professions.

1. He professeth his desire towards God; "Unto thee, O Lord, do I lift up my soul," ver. 1. In the foregoing psalm, ver. 4, it was made the character of a good man, that he has not lifted up his soul to vanity; and a call was given to the everlasting gates to lift up their heads for the King of glory to come in, ver. 1. To which character, to which call, David here answers, Lord, I lift up my soul; not to vanity, but to thee. Note, In worshipping God, we must lift up our souls to him. Prayer is the ascent of the soul to God; God must be eyed, and the soul employed; sursum corda,—'up with your hearts,' was anciently used as a call to devotion. With a holy contempt of the world, and the things of it, by a fixed thought, and active faith, we must set God before us, and let out our desires towards him as the fountain of our happiness.

2. He professeth his dependence upon God; and begs for the benefit and comfort of that dependence, ver. 2, "O my God, I trust in thee." His conscience witnessed for him, that he had no confidence in himself, or in any creature; and that he had no diffidence of God, or of his power or promise. He pleaseth himself with this profession of faith in God; having put his trust in God, he is easy, is well satisfied, and quiet from the fear of evil. And he pleads it with God, whose honour it is to help those that honour him, by trusting in him. What men put a confidence in is either their joy or their shame, according as it proves. Now David here, under the direction of faith, prays earnestly, 1st. That shame might not be his lot. Let me not be ashamed of my confidence in thee; let me not be shaken from it by any prevailing fears, and let me not be in the issue disappointed of what I depend upon thee for; but, Lord, keep what I have committed unto thee. Note, If we make our confidence in God our stay, it shall not be our shame; and if we triumph in him, our enemies shall not triumph over us, as they would if we should now sink under our fears, or should in the issue come short of our hopes. 2nd. That it might not be the lot of any other that trusted in God. All the saints have obtained a like precious faith; and, therefore, doubtless, it will be alike successful in the issue. And thus the communion of saints is kept up, even by their praying one for another. True saints will make supplication for all saints. It is certain, none that by a believing attendance wait on God, and by a believing hope wait for him, shall be made ashamed of it. 3rd. That it might be the lot of the transgressors; "Let them be ashamed that transgress without cause," or vainly, as the word is. First. Upon no provocation. They revolt from God and their duty, from David and his government, so some, without any occasion given them; not being able to pretend any iniquity they have found in God, or that in any thing he hath wearied them. The weaker the temptation is by which men are drawn to sin, the stronger the corruption is by which they are driven to it. Those are the worst transgressors that sin for sinning sake. Secondly. To no purpose. They know their attempts against God are fruitless; they imagine a vain thing, and therefore they will soon be ashamed of them.

3. He begs direction from God in the way of his duty, ver. 4, 5. Once again he here prays to God to teach him. He was a knowing man himself, but the most intelligent, the most observant, both need and desire to be taught of God; from him we must be ever learning. Observe, 1st. What he desired to learn; "Teach me," not fine words or fine notions, but "teach me thy ways, thy paths, thy truth." The ways in which thou walkest towards me, which are all mercy and truth, ver. 10; and the ways in which thou wouldst have me to walk towards thee. Those are best learned who understand their duty, and know the good things they should do, Eccl. ii. 3. Thy paths and thy truth are the same; Divine laws are all founded upon Divine truths. The way of God's precepts is the way of truth, Ps. cxix. 30; Christ is both the way and the truth, and therefore we must learn Christ. 2nd. What he desires of God in order to this. First. That he would enlighten his understanding concerning his duty; Shew me thy way, and so teach me. In doubtful cases we should pray earnestly that God would make it plain to us what he would have us to do. Secondly. That he would incline his will to it, and strengthen him in it; Lead me, and so teach me. Not only as we lead one that is dimsighted, to keep him from missing his way, but as we lead one that is sick, and feeble, and faint, to help him forward in the way, and to keep him from fainting and falling. We go no farther in the way to heaven than God is pleased to lead us, and to hold us up. 3rd. What he pleads, First. His great expectation from God; "Thou art the God of my salvation." Note, Those that choose the salvation of God as their end, and make him the God of their salvation, may come boldly to him for direction in the way that leads to that end; if God save us, he will teach us, and lead us. He that gives salvation will give instruction. Secondly. His constant attendance on God; "On thee do I wait all the day." Whence should a servant expect direction what to do but from his own master, on whom he waits all the day? If we sincerely desire to know our duty, with a resolution to do it, we need not question but that God will direct us in it.

4. He appeals to God's infinite mercy, and casts himself upon that, not pretending to any merit of his own; ver. 6, "Remember, O Lord, thy tender mercies," and for the sake of those mercies lead me and teach me, "for they have been ever of old;" that is, 1st. Thou always wast a merciful God; it is thy name, it is thy nature and property to shew mercy. 2nd. Thy counsels and designs of mercy were from everlasting; the vessels of mercy were before all worlds ordained to glory. 3rd. The instances of thy mercy to the church in general, and to me in particular, were early and ancient, and constant hitherto; they began of old, and never ceased. Thou hast taught me from my youth up, teach me now.

5. He is in a special manner earnest for the pardon of his sins; ver. 7, Oh "remember not the sins of my youth." Lord, remember thy mercies, ver. 6; which speak for me, and not my sins which speak against me. Here is, 1st. An implicit confession of sin; he instanceth particularly in the sins of his youth. Note, Our youthful faults and follies should be matter of our repentance and humiliation long after; because time doth not wear out the guilt of sin. Old people should mourn for the sinful mirth, and be in pain for the sinful pleasures of their youth. He aggravates his sins, calling them his transgressions; and the more holy, just, and good the law is, which sin is the transgression of, the more exceeding sinful it ought to appear to us. 2nd. An express petition for mercy. First. That he might be acquitted from guilt; "Remember not the sins of my youth," that is, remember them not against me; lay them not to my charge, enter not into judgment with me for them. When God pardons sin, he is said to remember it no more, which notes a plenary remission; he forgives, and forgets Secondly. That he might be accepted in God's sight; "Remember thou me;" think on me for good, and come in seasonably for my succour. We need desire no more to make us happy than for God to remember us with favour; his plea is, "according to thy mercy, and for thy goodness' sake." Note, It is God's goodness and not ours, his mercy and not our own merit, that must be our plea for the pardon of sin, and all the good we stand in need of. This plea we must always rely upon, as those that are sensible of our poverty and unworthiness, and as those that are satisfied of the riches of God's mercy and grace.

8 Good and upright is the LORD:
Therefore will he teach sinners in the way.
9 The meek will he guide in judgment:
And the meek will he teach his way.
10 All the paths of the LORD are mercy and truth
Unto such as keep his covenant and his testimonies 11 For thy name's sake, O LORD, pardon mine iniquity,
For it is great.
12 What man is he that feareth the LORD?
Him shall he teach in the way that he shall choose.
13 His soul shall dwell at ease;
And his seed shall inherit the earth.
14 The secret of the LORD is with them that fear him;
And he will shew them his covenant.

God's promises are here mixed with David's prayers. Many petitions there were in the former part of the psalm, and many in the latter; and here, in the middle of the psalm, he meditates upon the promises, and by a lively faith sucks and is satisfied from these breasts of consolation; for the promises of God are not only the best foundation of prayer, telling us what to pray for, and encouraging our faith and hope in prayer, but they are a present answer to prayer. Let the prayer be made according to the promise, and then the promise may be read as a return to the prayer; and we are to believe the prayer is heard, because the promise will be performed. But in the midst of the promises we find one petition which seems to come in somewhat abruptly, and should have followed upon ver. 7; it is that, ver. 11, "Pardon my iniquity." But prayers for the pardon of sin are never impertinent; we mingle sin with all our actions, and therefore should mingle such prayers with all our devotions. He enforces this petition with a double plea. The former is very natural; "For thy name's sake, pardon mine iniquity," because thou hast proclaimed thy name gracious and merciful, pardoning iniquity; for thy glory's sake, for thy promise's sake, for thine own sake, Isa. xliii. 25. But the latter is very surprising: "Pardon mine the Divine presence, the Church early saw a far higher sense in these verses. By some they were applied to the Saviour's entrance on the world of spirits, after the crucifixion. Others applied the words to the Advent, others to the Ascension, and others to the final triumph of Christ in his kingdom.

XXV. Title. This psalm is ascribed to David, and may be his. It is an alphabetical psalm, and, in Hebrew, should make forty-four lines, in twenty-two pairs, the first of each pair or couplet commencing with a different letter, beginning with Aleph, and ending with Tau. The arrangement is nearly complete; there are, however, a few irregularities, which it is impossible now to account for. The reason for this alphabetical or acrostic form is uncertain; it may have been, as Lowth thought, to assist the memory.

XXV. 7. Speaking of the follies and sins of youth, Cicero says, "They who think we ought to forgive the sins of youth are deceived." And again, in one of his epistles: "The errors of my time have iniquity, for it is great;" and the greater it is, the more will Divine mercy be magnified in the forgiveness of it. It is the glory of a great God to forgive great sins, to forgive iniquity, transgression and sin, Ex. xxxiv. 7. It is great; and therefore I am undone, for ever undone, if infinite mercy do not interpose for the pardon of it. It is great, that is, I see it so. The more we see of the heinousness of our sins, the better qualified we are to find mercy with God. When we confess sin, we must aggravate it. Let us now take a view of the great and precious promises which we have in these verses, and observe,

First. To whom these promises do belong, and who may expect the benefit of them. We are all sinners; and can we hope for any advantage by them? Yes; ver. 8, He will teach sinners, though they be sinners; for Christ came into the world to save sinners, and in order to that to teach sinners, to call sinners to repentance. These promises are sure to those who, though they have been sinners, have gone astray, yet now keep God's word. To such, 1. As "keep his covenant and his testimonies," ver. 10; that is, that take his precepts for their rule, and his promises for their portion; that, having taken God to be to them a God, live upon that, and, having given up themselves to be to him a people, live up to that. Though through the infirmity of the flesh they sometimes break the command, yet by a sincere repentance, when at any time they do amiss, and a constant adherence by faith to God as their God, they keep the covenant, and do not break that. 2. To such as fear him, ver. 12; and again, ver. 14; that stand in awe of his majesty, and worship him with reverence, submit to his authority, and obey him with cheerfulness, dread his wrath, and are afraid of offending him.

Secondly. Upon what these promises are grounded, and what encouragement we have to build upon them. Here are two things which ratify and confirm all the promises:

1. The perfections of God's nature. We value the promise by the character of him that makes it. We may therefore depend upon God's promises, for "good and upright is the Lord," and therefore he will be as good as his word; so kind, that he cannot deceive us, so true, that he cannot break his promise; "Faithful is he that hath promised, who also will do it." He was good in making the promise, and therefore will be upright in performing it.

2. The agreeableness of all he saith and doth with the perfections of his nature; ver. 10, "All the paths of the Lord," that is, all his promises and all his providences, "are mercy and truth;" that is, they are like himself, good and upright. All God's dealings with his people are according to the mercy of his purposes, and the truth of his promises. All he doth comes from love, covenant love; and they may see in it his mercy displayed, and his word fulfilled. What a mighty satisfaction may this be to good people, that, whatever afflictions they are exercised with, "all the paths of the Lord are mercy and truth;" and so it will appear when they come to their journey's end.

Thirdly. What these promises are.

1. That God will instruct and direct them in the way of their duty. This is most insisted upon, because it is an answer to David's prayers, ver. 4, 5, "Shew me thy ways, and lead me." We should fix our thoughts, and act our faith, most on those promises which suit our present case. 1st. "He will teach sinners in the way," because they are sinners, and therefore need teaching. When they see themselves sinners, and desire teaching, then he will teach them the way of reconciliation to God, the way to a well-grounded peace of conscience, and the way to eternal life. He doth by his Gospel make known this way to all; and by his Spirit open the understanding, and guide penitent sinners that inquire after it. The devil leads men blindfold to hell; but God enlightens men's eyes, sets things before them in a true light, and so leads them to heaven. 2nd. "The meek will he guide, the meek will he teach," that is, those that are humble and low in their own eyes, that are distrustful of themselves, desirous to be taught, and honestly resolved to follow the Divine conduct; "Speak, Lord, for thy servant hears." These he will guide in judgment, that is, by the rule of the written word. He will guide them in that which is practical, which relates to sin and duty, so as that they may keep conscience void of offence; and he will do it judiciously, so some, that is, he will suit his conduct to their case. He will teach sinners with wisdom, tenderness, and compassion, and as they are able to bear. He will teach them his way. All good people make God's way their way, and desire to be taught that; and those that do so shall be taught and led in that way. 3rd. "Him that feareth the Lord he will teach in the way that he shall choose," either in the way that God shall choose, or that the good man shall choose. It comes all to one, for he that fears the Lord chooseth the things that please him. If we choose the right way, he that directed our choice will direct our steps, and will lead us in it. If we choose wisely, God will give us grace to walk wisely.

2. That God will make them easy; ver. 13, "His soul shall dwell at ease;" 'shall lodge in goodness,' marg. Those that devote themselves to the fear of God, and give up themselves to be taught of God, it is their own fault if they be not easy. The soul that is sanctified by the grace of God, and much more that is comforted by the peace of God, dwells at ease. Even when the body is sick and lies in pain, yet the soul may dwell at ease in God, may return to him and repose in him as its rest. Many things occur to make us uneasy; but there is enough in the covenant of grace to balance them all, and to make us easy.

3. That he will give to them and theirs as much of this world as is good for them. "His seed shall inherit the earth." Next to our care concerning our souls is our care concerning our seed, and God has a blessing in store for the generation of the upright. They that fear God shall inherit the earth, shall have a competency in it, and the comfort of it; and their children shall fare the better for their prayers, when they are gone.

4. That God will admit them into the secret of communion with himself; ver. 14, "The secret of the Lord is with them that fear him." They understand his word; for "if any man will do his will, he shall know of the doctrine whether it be of God," Jno. vii. 17. They that receive the truth in the love of it, and experience the power of it, best understand the mystery of it. They know the meaning of his providence, and what God is doing with them better than others. "Shall I hide from Abraham the things that I do?" Gen. xviii. 17. He calls them not servants, but friends, as he called Abraham. They know by experience the blessings of the covenant, and the pleasure of that fellowship which gracious souls have "with the Father, and with his Son Jesus Christ." This honour have all his saints.

15 Mine eyes are ever toward the LORD;
For he shall pluck my feet out of the net.
16 Turn thee unto me, and have mercy upon me;
For I am desolate and afflicted.
17 The troubles of my heart are enlarged:
O bring thou me out of my distresses.
18 Look upon mine affliction and my pain;
And forgive all my sins.
19 Consider mine enemies; for they are many;
And they hate me with cruel hatred.
20 O keep my soul, and deliver me:
Let me not be ashamed; for I put my trust in thee.
21 Let integrity and uprightness preserve me;
For I wait on thee.
22 Redeem Israel, O God, out of all his troubles.

David, encouraged by the promises he had been meditating upon, here renews his addresses to God, and concludes the psalm as he began, with the professions of dependence upon God, and desire towards him.

First. He lays open before God the calamitous condition he was in. His feet were in the net, held fast, and entangled, so that he could not extricate himself out of his difficulties, ver. 15; he was desolate and afflicted, ver. 16; and it is common for those that are afflicted to be desolate. Their friends desert them then, and they are themselves disposed to sit alone, and keep silence, Lam. iii. 26. David calls himself desolate and solitary, because he depended not upon his servants and soldiers, but relied as entirely upon God as if he had no prospect at all of help and succour from any creature. Being in distress, in many distresses, the troubles of his heart were enlarged, ver. 17, that is, he grew more and more melancholy, and troubled in mind. Sense of sin afflicted him more than any thing else: that was it that broke and wounded his spirit, and made his outward trouble lie heavy upon him. He was in affliction and pain, ver. 18. His enemies that persecuted him were many and malicious (they hated him) and very barbarous; it was with a cruel hatred that they hated him, ver. 19. Such were Christ's enemies, and the persecutors of his church.

Secondly. He expresseth the dependence he had upon God in these distresses; ver. 15, "Mine eyes are ever towards the Lord." Idolaters were for gods that they could see with their bodily eyes; and they had their eyes ever towards their idols, Isa. xvii. 7, 8; but it is an eye of faith that we must have towards God who is a spirit, Zec. ix. 1. Our meditation of him must be sweet, and we must always set him before us. In all our ways we must acknowledge him, and do all to his glory. Thus we must live a life of communion with God, not only in ordinances, but in providences, not only in the acts of devotion, but in the whole course of our conversation. David had the comfort of this in his affliction; for, because his eyes were ever toward the Lord, he doubted not but he would pluck his feet out of the net, that he would deliver him from the corruptions of his own heart, so some; from the designs of his enemies against him, so others. Those that have their eye ever towards God shall not have their feet long in the net. He repeats his profession of dependence upon God, ver. 20, "Let me not be ashamed, for I put my trust in thee;" and of expectation from him, "I wait on thee," ver. 21; and, "it is good" thus "to hope, and quietly to wait for the salvation of the Lord."

Thirdly. He prays earnestly to God for relief and succour.

1. For himself. See how he begs, 1st. For the remission of sin; ver. 18, "Forgive all my sins." Those were his heaviest burthens, and which brought upon him all his other burthens. He had begged, ver. 7, for the pardon of the sins of his youth, and, ver. 11, for the pardon of some one particular iniquity that was remarkably great, which some think was his sin in the matter of Uriah; but here he prays, Lord, forgive all, take away all iniquity. It is observable that, as to his affliction, he asks for no more than God's regard to it, "Look upon my affliction and my pain," and do with it as thou pleasest; but, as to his sin, he asks for no less than a pardon, "Forgive all my sins." When at any time we are in trouble, we should be more concerned about our sins to get them pardoned, than about our afflictions to get them removed. Yet he prays, 2nd. For the redress of his grievances. His mind was troubled for God's withdrawings from him, and under the sense he had of his displeasure against him for his sin; and therefore he prays, ver. 16, "Turn thee unto me;" and if God turn to us no matter who turns from us. His condition was troubled, and in reference to that he prays, "O bring thou me out of my distresses." I see no way of deliverance open; but thou canst either find one or make one. His enemies were spiteful; and in reference to that he prays, O keep my soul from falling into their hands, or else deliver me out of their hands.

Four things he mentions by way of plea to enforce these petitions; and refers himself and them to God's consideration: 1. He pleads God's mercy; "Have mercy upon me." Men of the greatest merits were undone, if they had not to do with a God of infinite mercies. 2. He pleads his own misery, the distress he was in, his affliction and pain, especially the troubles of his heart; all which made him the proper object of Divine mercy. 3. He pleads the iniquity of his enemies: Lord, consider them, how cruel they are, and deliver me out of their hands. 4. He pleads his own integrity, ver. 21. Though he had owned himself guilty before God, and had confessed his sins against him, yet, as to his enemies, he had the testimony of his conscience that he had done them no wrong, which was his comfort when they hated him with cruel hatred; and he prays that this might preserve him. This intimates that he did not expect to be safe any longer than he continued in his integrity and uprightness; and that while he did continue in it, he did not doubt of being safe. Sincerity will be our best security in the worst of times. Integrity and uprightness will be a man's preservation more than the wealth and honour of the world can be. This will preserve us to the heavenly kingdom. We should therefore pray to God to preserve us in our integrity, and then be assured that that will preserve us.

2. For the church of God; ver. 22, "Redeem Israel, O God, out of all his troubles." David was now in trouble himself, but he thinks it not strange, since trouble is the lot of all God's Israel, and why should any one member fare better than the whole body? David's troubles were enlarged, and very earnest he was with God to deliver him, yet he forgets not the distresses of God's church; for when we have never so much business of our own at the throne of grace we must still remember to pray for the public. Good men have little comfort in their own safety, while the church is in distress and danger. This prayer is a prophecy that God would at length give David rest, and therewith give Israel rest from all their enemies round about. It is a prophecy of the sending of the Messiah in due time to redeem Israel from his iniquities, Ps. cxxx. 8; and so to redeem them from their troubles; and of the happiness of the future state. In heaven, and in heaven only, will God's Israel be perfectly redeemed from all troubles.

PSALM XXVI.

Holy David is in this psalm putting himself upon a solemn trial, not by God and his country, but by God and his own conscience, to both which he appeals touching his integrity, ver. 1, 2. And for the proof of it he allegeth, I. His constant regard to God and his grace, ver. 3. II. His rooted antipathy to sin and sinners, ver. 4, 5. III. His brought me so much grief and pain, that not only does my mind abhor the deeds, but my ears abhor the remembrance of them." It is the opinion of some that by "my youth" the psalmist means the young men of his time; but this is very doubtful, and the natural sense is preferable.

xxv. 11. The words "pardon mine iniquity," here, and the similar prayer in verse 18, have been paraphrased "the sin of my people," because it has been thought that the Messiah is the suppliant.

xxv. 14. "The secret of the Lord" has been explained in divers ways. The Douay translation of the Latin is, "Our Lord is a firmament to them that fear him," the sense being that the Lord is a support to them. Fürst explains it, "the counsel of the Lord," &c., and herein agrees with the Syriac. Others understand it to mean that the Lord is the intimate or familiar friend of his people, to whom he makes known his thoughts.

xxv. 17. The first clause of this verse may be otherwise translated sincere affection to the ordinances of God, and his care about them, ver. 6—8. Having thus proved his integrity, 1. He deprecates the doom of the wicked, ver. 9, 10. 2. He casts himself upon the mercy and grace of God, with a resolution to hold fast his integrity, and his hope in God, ver. 11, 12. In singing this psalm, we must teach and admonish ourselves and one another, what we must be and do that we may have the favour of God, and comfort in our own consciences, and comfort ourselves with it as David doth, if we can say that in any measure we have through grace answered these characters. The learned Amyraldus, in his argument of this psalm, suggests that David is here by the spirit of prophecy carried out to speak of himself as a type of Christ, of whom what he here saith of his spotless innocency was fully and eminently true, and of him only, and to him we may apply it in singing this psalm. "We are complete in him.'

A Psalm of David.

JUDGE me, O LORD;
For I have walked in mine integrity: [slide.
I have trusted also in the LORD; therefore I shall not
2 Examine me, O LORD, and prove me;
Try my reins and my heart.
3 For thy lovingkindness is before mine eyes:
And I have walked in thy truth.
4 I have not sat with vain persons,
Neither will I go in with dissemblers.
5 I have hated the congregation of evil doers;
And will not sit with the wicked

It is probable that David penned this psalm when he was persecuted by Saul and his party, who, to give some colour to their unjust rage, represented him as a very ill man, and falsely accused him of many high crimes and misdemeanours; dressed him up in the skins of wild beasts, that they might bait him. Innocency itself is no fence to the name, though it is to the bosom, against the darts of calumny. Herein he was a type of Christ, who was made a reproach of men, and foretold to his followers that they also must have all manner of evil said against them falsely. Now see what David doth in this case.

First. He appeals to God's righteous sentence; ver. 1, "Judge me, O God;" that is, be thou judge between me and my accusers, between the persecutor and the poor prisoner, bring me off with honour and put them to shame that belie me. Saul, who was himself supreme judge in Israel, was his adversary; so that in a controversy with him he could appeal to no other but God himself. As to his offences against God, he prays, "Lord, enter not into judgment with me," Ps. cxliii. 2; "Remember not my transgressions," Ps. xxv. 7. There he appeals to God's mercy; but as to his offences against Saul, he appeals to God's justice, and begs of him to judge for him, as Ps. xliii. 1. Or thus: he cannot justify himself against the charge of sin, he owns his iniquity is great, and he is undone if God in his infinite mercy do not forgive him; but he can justify himself against the charge of hypocrisy, and has reason to hope that, according to the tenor of the covenant of grace, he is one of those that may expect to find favour with God. Thus holy Job often owns he has sinned, and yet he holds fast his integrity. Note, It is a comfort to those who are falsely accused that there is a righteous God, who, sooner or later, will clear up their innocency; and a comfort to all that are sincere in religion that God himself is a witness to his sincerity.

Secondly. He submits to his unerring search; ver. 2, "Examine me, O Lord, and prove me," as gold is proved whether it be standard. God knows every man's true character, for he knows the thoughts and intents of the heart, and sees through every disguise. David prays, Lord, examine me, which speaks him greatly well-pleased that God did know him; and truly desirous that he would discover him to himself, and discover him to all the world. So sincere was he in his devotion to his God, and his loyalty to his prince, (in both which he was suspected to be a pretender,) that he wished he had a window in his bosom, that who would might look into his heart.

Thirdly. He solemnly protests his sincerity; ver. 1, "I have walked in mine integrity," that is, my conversation has agreed with my profession, and one part of it has been of a piece with another. It is in vain to boast of our integrity, unless we can make it out that by the grace of God we have walked in our integrity, and that our conversation in the world has been in simplicity and godly sincerity. He produceth here several proofs of his integrity, which encouraged him to trust in the Lord, as his righteous judge, who would patronize and plead his righteous cause, with an assurance that he should come off with reputation, "therefore I shall not slide;" that they should not prevail who consulted to cast him down from his excellency, to shake his faith, blemish his name, and prevent his coming to the crown, Ps. lxii. 4. They that are sincere in religion may trust in God that they shall not slide, that is, that they shall not apostatise from their religion.

1. He had a constant regard to God and to his grace, ver. 3. 1st. He aimed at God's favour as his end, and chief good. First. "Thy lovingkindness is before mine eyes." This will be a good evidence of our sincerity, if what we do in religion, we do from a principle of love to God, and good thoughts of him as the best of beings, and the best of friends and benefactors; and from a grateful sense of God's goodness to us in particular, which we have had experience of all our days. If we set God's lovingkindness before us as our pattern, to which we endeavour to conform ourselves, being followers of him that is good in his goodness, 1 Pet. iii. 13; if we set it before us as our great engagement and encouragement to our duty, and are afraid of doing any thing to forfeit God's favour, and in care by all means to keep ourselves in his love; this will not only be a good evidence of our integrity, but will have a great influence upon our perseverance in it. Secondly. He governed himself by the word of God as his rule. "I have walked in thy truth;" that is, according to thy law, for thy law is truth. Note, Those only may expect the benefit of God's lovingkindness that live up to his truths, and his laws that are grounded upon them. Some understand it of his conforming himself to God's example in truth and faithfulness, as well as in goodness and lovingkindness. Those certainly walk well that are followers of God as dear children.

2. He had no fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness, nor with the workers of those works, ver. 4, 5. By this it appeared he was truly loyal to his prince, that he never associated with those that were disaffected to his government, with any of those sons of Belial that despised him, 1 Sam. x. 27. He was in none of their cabals, nor joined with them in any of their intrigues; he cursed not the king, no, not in his heart. And this also was an evidence of his faithfulness to his God, that he never associated with those that he had any reason to think were disaffected to religion, or were open enemies or false friends to its interests. Note, Great care to avoid bad company is both a good evidence of our integrity, and a good means to preserve us in it. Now observe here, 1st. That this part of his protestation looks both backward upon the care he had hitherto taken in this matter, and forward upon the care he would still take; I have not sat with them, and I will not go in with them. Note, Our good practices hitherto are then evidences of our integrity when they are accompanied with resolutions, in God's strength, to persevere in them to the end, and not to draw back; and our good resolutions for the future we may then take the comfort of when they are the continuation of our good practices hitherto. 2nd. That David shunned the company not only of wicked persons, but of vain persons, that were wholly addicted to mirth and gaiety, and had nothing solid or serious in them. The company of such may perhaps be the more pernicious of the two to a good man, because he will not be so ready to stand upon his guard against the contagion of vanity as against that of downright wickedness. 3rd. That the company of dissemblers is as dangerous company as any other, and as much to be shunned in prudence as well as piety. Evil-doers pretend friendship to those whom they would decoy into their snares; but they dissemble: when they speak fair, believe them not. 4th. Though sometimes he could not avoid being in the company of bad people, yet he would not go in with them; that is, he would not choose such for his companions, nor seek an opportunity of acquaintance and converse with them. He might fall in with them, but he would not by appointment and assignation go in with them, or, if he happened to be with them, he would not sit with them; that is, he would not continue with them; he would be in their company no longer than his business made it necessary; he would not concur with them, not say as they said, nor do as they did, as they that sit in the seat of the scornful, Ps. i. 1. He would not sit in counsel with them upon ways and means to do mischief; not sit in judgment with them to condemn the generation of the righteous. 5th. We must not only in our practice avoid bad company, but in our principles and affections we must have an aversion to it. David here saith, Not only I have shunned it, but I have hated it, Ps. cxxxix. 21. 6th. The congregation of evil-doers, the club, the confederacy of them, is in a special manner hateful to good people. 'I have hated the church of the malignant,'—ecclesiam malignantium, so the Vulgar Latin reads it. As good men in consort make one another better, and are enabled to do so much the more good, so bad men in combination make one another worse and do so much the more mischief. In all this David was both a type of Christ,—who, though he received sinners, and ate with them, to instruct them, and do them good, yet otherwise was "holy, harmless, undefiled, and separate from sinners," particularly from the Pharisees, those dissemblers,—and an example to Christians, when they join themselves to Christ, to save themselves from this untoward generation, Acts ii. 40.

6 I will wash mine hands in innocency:
So will I compass thine altar, O LORD:
7 That I may publish with the voice of thanksgiving,
And tell of all thy wondrous works.
8 LORD. I have loved the habitation of thy house,
And the place where thine honour dwelleth.
9 Gather not my soul with sinners,
Nor my life with bloody men:
10 In whose hands is mischief,
And their right hand is full of bribes.
11 But as for me, I will walk in mine integrity:
Redeem me, and be merciful unto me.
12 My foot standeth in an even place:
In the congregations will I bless the LORD.

In these verses,

First. David produceth a farther evidence of his integrity, which was the sincere affection he had to the ordinances of God, and the constant care he took about them, and the pleasure he took in them. Hypocrites and dissemblers may indeed be found attending on God's ordinances,—the proud Pharisee went up to the temple to pray with the penitent publican,—but it is a good sign of sincerity if we attend upon them as David here tells us he did, ver. 6—8.

1. He was very careful and conscientious in his preparation for holy ordinances: "I will wash mine hands in innocency." He not only refrained from the society of sinners, but kept himself clean from the pollutions of sin, and this with an eye to the place he had among those that compassed God's altar. I will wash, and so will I compass the altar, knowing that otherwise I shall not be welcome. This is like that, 1 Cor. xi. 28, "Let a man examine himself, and so let him eat," so prepared. This notes, 1st. Habitual preparation. "I will wash my hands in innocency;" that is, I will carefully watch against all sin, and keep my conscience pure from those dead works which defile it, and forbid my drawing nigh to God: see Ps. xxiv. 3, 4. 2nd. Actual preparation. It alludes to the ceremony of the priests washing when they went in to minister, Ex. xxx. 20, 21. Though David was no priest, yet, as every worshipper ought, he would look to the substance of that which the priests were enjoined the shadow of. In our preparations for solemn ordinances, we must not only be able to clear ourselves from the charge of reigning infidelity and hypocrisy, and to protest our innocency of that, (which was signified by washing the hands, Deu. xxi. 6,) but we must take pains to cleanse ourselves from the spots of remaining iniquity, by renewing our repentance, and making a fresh application of the blood of Christ to our consciences, for the purifying and pacifying of them. He that is washed, that is in a justified state, has need thus to wash his feet, Jno. xiii. 10, to wash his hands, to wash them in innocency. He that is penitent, is pene innocens,—'almost innocent,' and he that is pardoned is so far innocent that his sins shall not be mentioned against him.

2. He was very diligent and serious in his attendance upon them: "I will compass thine altar," alluding to the custom of the priests, who, while the sacrifice was in offering, walked round the altar; and probably the offerers likewise did so at some distance, noting a diligent regard to what was done, and a dutiful attendance on the service. I will compass it; that is, I will be among the crowds that do compass it, among the thickest of them. David, a man of honour, a man of business, a man of war, yet thought it not below him to attend with the multitude on God's altars, and could find time for that attendance. Note, 1st. All God's people will be sure to wait on God's altar, in obedience to his commands, and in pursuance of his favour. Christ is our altar, not as the altar in the Jewish church, which was fed by them, but an altar that we eat of, and live upon, Heb. xiii. 10. 2nd. It is a pleasant sight to see God's altar compassed, and to see ourselves among them that compass it.

3. In all his attendance on God's ordinances he aimed at the glory of God, and was much in the thankful praise and adoration of him. He had an eye to the thus: "Relieve the sorrows of my heart." Mason Good has, "The sorrows of my heart are increasing," which is a mere variation of the authorised version. Rosenmüller says the words must be translated, "Sorrows have enlarged my heart," but notes that a very slight various reading will give what is probably the true sense, "Enlarge the sorrows of my heart," i.e., "Set my heart free from its sorrows."

xxvi. 1. The strict meaning of "integrity" must not be urged, and we shall nearly convey the idea by the word "consistency."

xxvi. 6. Some of the wiser heathen recognised the principle here involved. Thus, Cicero: "Approach the gods in purity; cherish pious sentiments towards them. If any doth otherwise, the deity will avenge himself." This is from the ancient laws, and is understood by the speaker to refer to purity of mind. He says: "The pollution of the body may indeed be removed by a few ablutions of water, or in a few days; but the stains upon the conscience cannot be obliterated by any lapse of time, and all the rivers in the world place of worship as the place where God's honour dwelt, ver. 8, and therefore made it his business there to honour God, and to give him the glory due to his name, to "publish with the voice of thanksgiving all God's wondrous works." God's gracious works, which call for our thanksgiving, are all wondrous works, which call for our admiration. We ought to publish them, and tell of them for his glory, and the excitement of others to praise him; and we ought to do it "with the voice of thanksgiving," as those that are sensible of our obligations, by all ways possible to acknowledge with gratitude the favours we have received from God.

4. He did this with delight, and from a principle of true affection to God and his institutions. Touching this, he appeals to God, "Lord," thou knowest how dearly "I have loved the habitation of thy house," ver. 8; that is, the tabernacle where thou art pleased to manifest thy residence among thy people, and receive their homage; "the place where thine honour dwells." David was sometimes forced by persecution into the countries of idolaters, and was hindered from attending God's altars, which perhaps his persecutors that laid him under that restraint did themselves upbraid him with as his crime: see 1 Sam. xx. 27. But, Lord, saith he, though I cannot come to the habitation of thine house, I love it; my heart is there, and it is my greatest trouble that I am not there. Note, All that truly love God truly love the ordinances of God, and therefore love them, because in them he manifests his honour, and they have an opportunity of honouring him. Our Lord Jesus loved his Father's honour, and made it his business to glorify him. He loved the habitation of his house, that is, his church among men; loved it, and gave himself for it, that he might build and consecrate it. And those who love communion with God, and delight in approaching to him, as the thing itself is a constant pleasure, so it is to them a comfortable evidence of their integrity, and a comfortable earnest of their endless felicity.

Secondly. David, having given proofs of his integrity, doth, with an humble confidence towards God, (such as they have whose hearts condemn them not,) earnestly pray that he might not fall under the doom of the wicked; ver. 9, 10, "Gather not my soul with sinners." Here, 1. David describes these sinners, whom he looked upon to be in a miserable condition, so miserable that he could not wish the worst enemy he had in the world to be in a worse. They are bloody men, that thirst after blood, and lie under a great deal of the guilt of blood. They do mischief, and mischief is always in their hands. Though they get by their wickedness, for their right hand is full of bribes, which they have taken to pervert justice, yet that will make their case never the better; for "what is a man profited if he gain the world and lose his soul?" 2. He dreads having his lot with them. He never loved them, nor associated with them in this world, and therefore could in faith pray that he might not have his lot with them in the other world. Our souls must shortly be gathered to return to God that gave them and will call for them again: see Job xxxiv. 14. It concerns us to consider whether our souls will then be gathered with saints or with sinners; whether bound in the bundle of life with the Lord for ever, as the souls of the faithful are, 1 Sam. xxv. 29, or bound in the bundle of tares for the fire, Mat. xiii. 30. Death gathers us to our people; those that are our people while we live, whom we choose to associate with, and with whom we cast in our lot, to those death will gather us, and with them we must take our lot to eternity. Balaam desired to die the death of the righteous, David dreaded dying the death of the wicked; so that both sides are of that mind, which, if we be of, and will live up to it, we are happy for ever. Those that will not be companions with sinners in their mirth, nor eat of their dainties, may in faith pray not to be companions with them in their misery, nor to drink of their cup, their cup of trembling.

Thirdly. David, with a holy, humble confidence, commits himself to the grace of God, ver. 11, 12. 1. He promiseth that, by the grace of God, he would persevere in his duty; "As for me," whatever others do, "I will walk in mine integrity." Note, When the testimony of our consciences for us, that we have walked in our integrity, is comfortable to us, that should confirm our resolutions to continue therein. 2. He prays for the Divine grace both to enable him to do so and to give him the comfort of it. Redeem me out of the hands of my enemies and be merciful to me, living and dying. Be we never so confident of our integrity, yet still we must rely upon God's mercy, and the great redemption Christ has wrought out, and pray for the benefit of them. 3. He pleaseth himself with his steadiness. "My foot stands in an even place," where I shall not stumble, and whence I shall not fall. This he speaks as one that found his resolutions fixed for God and godliness, not to be shaken by the temptations of the world; and his comforts firm in God and his grace, not to be disturbed by the crosses and troubles of the world. 4. He promiseth himself that he should yet have occasion to praise the Lord; that he should be furnished with matter for praise; that he should have a heart for praises; and that, though he was now perhaps banished from public ordinances, yet he should again have an opportunity of blessing God in the congregation of his people. Those that hate the congregation of evil-doers shall be joined to the congregation of the righteous, and join with them in praising God, and it is pleasant doing that in good company; the more the better: it is the likeı to heaven.

PSALM XXVII.

Some think David penned this psalm before his coming to the throne, when he was in the midst of his troubles, and perhaps upon occasion of the death of his parents; but the Jews think he penned it when he was old, upon occasion of that wonderful deliverance he had from the sword of the giant, when Abishai succoured him, 2 Sam. xxi. 16, 17; and his people thereupon resolved he should never venture his life again in battle, lest he "should quench the light of Israel." Perhaps it was not penned upon any particular occasion, but it is very expressive of the pious and devout affections with which gracious souls are carried out towards God at all times, especially in times of trouble. Here is, I. The courage and holy bravery of his faith, ver. 1—3. II. The complacency he took in communion with God, and the benefit he experienced by it, ver. 4—6. III. His desire towards God, and his favour and grace, ver. 7—9, 11, 12. IV. His expectations from God, and the encouragement he gives to others to hope in him, ver. 10, 13, 14; and let our hearts be thus affected in singing this psalm.

A Psalm of David.

THE LORD is my light and my salvation;
Whom shall I fear?
The LORD is the strength of my life;
Of whom shall I be afraid?

2 When the wicked, even mine enemies and my foes, came upon me to eat up my flesh,
They stumbled and fell.

3 Though an host should encamp against me,
My heart shall not fear;
Though war should rise against me,
In this will I be confident.

4 One thing have I desired of the LORD,
That will I seek after; [of my life,
That I may dwell in the house of the LORD all the days
To behold the beauty of the LORD,
And to enquire in his temple. [pavilion:

5 For in the time of trouble he shall hide me in his
In the secret of his tabernacle shall he hide me;
He shall set me up upon a rock.

6 And now shall mine head be lifted up above mine enemies round about me:
Therefore will I offer in his tabernacle sacrifices of joy;
I will sing, yea, I will sing praises unto the LORD.

We may observe here,

First. With what a lively faith David triumphs in God, glories in his holy name, and in the interest he had in him. 1. "The Lord is my light." David's subjects called him "the light of Israel," 2 Sam. xxi. 17, and he was indeed a burning and a shining light; but he owns that he shone as the moon doth with a borrowed light: what light God darted upon him, reflected upon them; "The Lord is my light." God is a true light to his people to shew them the way when they are in doubt; to comfort and rejoice their hearts when they are in sorrow. It is in his light that they now walk on in their way, and in his light they hope to see light for ever. 2. He is "my salvation," in whom I am safe, and by whom I shall be saved. 3. He is "the strength of my life;" not only the protector of my exposed life, who keeps me from being slain, but the strength of my frail, weak life, who keeps me from fainting, sinking, and dying away. God, that is a believer's life, is the strength of his life, not only by whom, but in whom, he lives and moves. In God therefore let us strengthen ourselves.

Secondly. With what an undaunted courage he triumphs over his enemies. No fortitude like that of faith. If God be for him, who can be against him? "Whom shall I fear? Of whom shall I be afraid?" If Omnipotence be his guard, he has no cause to fear; if he knows it to be so, he has no disposition to fear. If God be his light, he fears no shades; if God be his salvation, he fears no colours. He triumphs over his enemies that were already routed; ver. 2, his enemies came upon him to eat up his flesh, aiming at no less, and assured of that; but they fell: not, he smote them, and they fell, but they stumbled and fell; they were so confounded and weakened that they could not go on with their enterprise Thus they that came to take Christ, with a word's speaking were made to stagger and fall to the ground, Jno. xviii. 6. The ruin of some of the enemies of God's people is an earnest of the complete conquest of them all; and therefore, these being fallen, he is fearless of the rest. Though they be numerous, a host of them; though they be daring, and their attempts threatning; though they encamp against me, an army against one man; though they wage war upon me, yet my heart shall not fear. Hosts cannot hurt us if the Lord of hosts protect us; nay, in this assurance that God is for me, "I will be confident." Two things he will be confident of: 1. That he shall be safe. If God is my salvation, "in the time of trouble he shall hide me;" that is, he shall set me out of danger, and above the fear of it. God will not only find out a shelter for his people in distress, as he did, Jer. xxxvi. 26, but he will himself be their hiding-place, Ps. xxxii. 7. His providence shall, it may be, keep them safe; however, his grace shall make them easy. His name is the strong tower into which by faith they run, Pr. xviii. 10; "he shall hide me," not in the strongholds of En-gedi, 1 Sam. xxiii. 29, but "in the secret of his tabernacle." The gracious presence of God with him, his power, his promise, his readiness to hear prayer, the witness of his Spirit in the hearts of his people, these are the secrets of his tabernacle; and in these the saints find cause for that holy security and serenity of mind in which they dwell at ease. This sets them upon a rock which will not sink under them, but on which they find firm footing for their hopes; nay, it sets them up upon a rock on high, where the raging, threatening billows of a stormy sea cannot touch them. It is a rock that is higher than we, Ps. lxi. 2. 2. That he shall be victorious; ver. 6, "Now shall my head be lifted up above mine enemies," not only so as that they cannot reach it with their darts, but so as that I shall be exalted to bear rule over them. David here by faith in the promise of God triumphs before the victory, and is as sure not only of the laurel, but of the crown, as if it were already upon his head.

Thirdly. With what a gracious earnestness he prays for a constant communion with God in holy ordinances, ver. 4. It greatly encouraged his confidence in God, that he was conscious to himself of an entire affection to God and to his ordinances, and that he was in his element when in the way of his duty, and in the way of increasing his acquaintance with him. If our hearts can witness for us that we delight in God above any creature, that may encourage us to depend upon him; for it is a sign we are of those whom he protects as his own. Or it may be taken thus: he desired to dwell in the house of the Lord, that there he might be safe from the enemies that surrounded him. Finding himself surrounded by threatening hosts, he doth not say, "One thing have I desired" in order to my safety, that I may have my army augmented to such a number, or that I may be master of such a city, or such a castle; but "that I may dwell in the house of the Lord," and then I am well. Observe,

1. What it is he desires: To "dwell in the house of the Lord." In the courts of God's house the priests had their lodgings, and David wished he had been one of them. As disdainfully as some look upon God's ministers, one of the greatest and best of kings that ever was would gladly have taken his lot, have taken his lodging, among them. Or rather, he desires that he might duly and constantly attend on the public service of God, with other faithful Israelites, according as the duty of every day required. And therefore he longed to see an end of the wars in which he was now engaged; not that he might live at ease in his own palace, but that he might have leisure and liberty for that constant attendance in God's courts. Thus Hezekiah, a genuine son of David, wished for the recovery of his health; not that he might go up to the thrones of judgment, but that he might go up to the house of the Lord, Isa. xxxviii. 22. Note, All God's children desire to dwell in God's house; where should they dwell else? not to sojourn there as a wayfaring man that turns aside to tarry but for a night, or to dwell there for a time only, as the servant that abideth not in the house for ever, but to dwell there all the days of their life; for there the Son abideth ever. Do we hope that raisin cannot wash them out."—De Legibus, ii. 8—10. It is doubtful whether such sentiments were common in Cicero's time.

xxvi. 8. The latter clause is in Hebrew "the place of the dwelling of thy glory," and the allusion seems to be to the glory of the Shekinah manifested in the sanctuary. The words may be rendered "thy glorious dwelling-place." Whether the psalm was written before or after the foundation of the Temple cannot be determined by such phrases.

xxvii. Title. This psalm is ascribed to David, and, according to the Greek, was written "before the anointing," i.e., before he was anointed. This cannot refer to the first anointing by Samuel, but to a later one (2 Sam. v. 3). The real occasion of the composition is unknown, but it was a time of grateful remembrance of past difficulties and deliverance, of active trust in God, and of earnest desire to honour him in all things.

xxvii. 8. The words "when thou saidst" are not in the Hebrew.

God will be the blessedness of our eternity? surely then we ought to make it the business of our time.

2. How earnestly he covets this: This is the "one thing I have desired of the Lord," and which "I will seek after." If he were to ask but one thing of God, this should be it; for this he had at heart more than any thing. He desired it as a good thing; he desired it of the Lord as his gift, and a token of his favour. And, having fixed his desire upon this as the one thing needful, he sought after it, that is he continued to pray for it, and contrived his affairs so as that he might have this liberty and opportunity. Note, They that truly desire communion with God will set themselves with all diligence to seek after it, Pr. xviii. 1.

3. What he had in his eye in it: He would dwell in God's house; not for the plenty of good entertainment that was there in the feasts upon the sacrifices,—not for the music and good singing that was there,—but "to behold the beauty of the Lord, and to inquire in his temple." He desired to attend in God's courts, 1st. That he might have the pleasure of meditating upon God. He knew something of the beauty of the Lord; the infinite and transcendent amiableness of the Divine Being and perfections: his holiness is his beauty, Ps. cx. 3; his goodness is his beauty, Zec. ix. 17; the harmony of all his attributes is the beauty of his nature. With an eye of faith and holy love we with pleasure behold this beauty, and observe more and more in it that is amiable, that is admirable. When, with fixedness of thought and a holy flame of devout affections, we contemplate God's glorious excellences, and entertain ourselves with the tokens of his peculiar favour to us, this is that view of the beauty of the Lord which David here covets; and it is to be had in his ordinances, for there he manifests himself. 2nd. That he might have the satisfaction of being instructed in his duty; for concerning this he would inquire in God's temple, "Lord, what wilt thou have me to do?" For the sake of these two things he desired that one thing, "to dwell in the house of the Lord all the days of his life;" for blessed are they that do so, they will be still praising him, Ps. lxxxiv. 4, both in speaking to him and in hearing from him. Mary's sitting at Christ's feet to hear his word, Christ calls the one thing needful and the good part.

4. What advantage he promised himself by it, could he but have a place in God's house: 1st. There he should be quiet and easy; there troubles would not find him, for he should be hid in secret; there troubles would not reach him, for he should be set on high, ver. 5. Joash, one of David's seed, was hid in the house of the Lord six years, and there not only preserved from the sword, but reserved to the crown, 2 Kin. xi. 3. The temple was thought a safe place for Nehemiah to abscond in, Neh. vi. 10; but the safety of believers is not in the walls of the temple, but in the God of the temple, and their comfort in communion with him. 2nd. There he should be pleasant and merry; there he would offer sacrifices of joy, ver. 6; for God's work is its own wages. There he would sing, yea, he would sing praises to the Lord. Note, Whatever is the matter of our joy ought to be the matter of our praise; and when we attend upon God in holy ordinances we ought to be much in joy and praise. It is for the glory of our God that we should sing in his ways; and whenever God lifts us up above our enemies, we ought to exalt him in our praises. "Thanks be to God, who always causeth us to triumph," 2 Cor. ii. 14.

7 Hear, O LORD, when I cry with my voice:
Have mercy also upon me, and answer me.
8 When thou saidst, Seek ye my face;
My heart said unto thee, Thy face, LORD, will I seek.
9 Hide not thy face far from me;
Put not thy servant away in anger:
Thou hast been my help; leave me not,
Neither forsake me, O God of my salvation
10 When my father and my mother forsake me,
Then the LORD will take me up.
11 Teach me thy way, O LORD,
And lead me in a plain path, because of mine enemies.
12 Deliver me not over unto the will of mine enemies:
For false witnesses are risen up against me,
And such as breathe out cruelty
13 I had fainted, unless I had believed to see the goodness of the LORD
14 In the land of the living. Wait on the LORD:
Be of good courage, and he shall strengthen thine heart:
Wait, I say, on the LORD.

David in these verses expresses,

First. His desire towards God in many petitions. If he cannot now go up to the house of the Lord, yet, wherever he is, he can find a way to the throne of grace by prayer.

1. He humbly bespeaks, because he firmly believes he shall have, a gracious audience; "Hear, O Lord, when I cry," not only with my heart, but as one in earnest, "with my voice" too; and an answer of peace, which he expects, not from his own merit, but God's goodness. "Have mercy upon me, and answer me," ver. 7. If we pray and believe, God will graciously hear and answer.

2. He takes hold of the kind invitation God had given him to this duty, ver. 8. It is presumption for us to come into the presence of the King of kings uncalled, nor can we draw near with any assurance unless he hold forth to us the golden sceptre. David therefore, going to pray, doth in his thoughts fasten upon the call God had given him to the throne of his grace, and doth as it were reverently touch the top of the golden sceptre, which was thereby held out to him. 'My heart said unto thee,' so it begins in the original, or, 'of thee, seek ye my face.' He first revolved that, and preached that over again, to himself, (and that is the best preaching, it is hearing twice what God speaks once,) 'Thou saidst, (so it may be supplied,) seek ye my face; and then he returns what he had so meditated upon in this pious resolution, "Thy face, Lord, will I seek." Observe here, 1st. The true nature of religious worship. It is seeking the face of God; this it is in God's precept, "Seek ye my face." He would have us seek him for himself, and make his favour our chief good. And this it is in the saint's purpose and desire, "Thy face, Lord, will I seek," and nothing else will I take up with. The opening of his hand will satisfy the desire of other living things, Ps. cxlv. 16, but it is only the shining of his face that will satisfy the desire of a living soul, Ps. iv. 6, 7. 2nd. The kind invitation of a gracious God to this duty; "Thou saidst, seek ye my face." It is not only a permission, but a precept; and his commanding us to seek implies a promise of finding; for he is too kind to say, Seek ye me in vain. God calls us to seek his face in our conversion to him, and in our converse with him. He calls us by the whispers of his Spirit, to and with our spirits, to seek his face; calls us by his Word,—by the stated returns of opportunities for his worship, and by special providences, merciful and afflictive. When we are foolishly making our court to lying vanities, God is in love to us calling us in him to seek our own mercies. 3rd. The ready compliance of a gracious soul with this invitation. The call is presently returned; "My heart answered, Thy face, Lord, will I seek." The call was general, "Seek ye my face;" but, like David, we must apply it to ourselves, I will seek it. The word doth us no good when we transfer it to others, and do not ourselves accept the exhortation. The call was, "Seek ye my face;" the answer is express, "Thy face, Lord, will I seek;" like that, Jer. iii. 22, "Behold we come unto thee." A gracious heart readily echoes to the call of a gracious God, being made willing in the day of his power.

3. He is very particular in his requests.

1st. For the favour of God, that he might not be shut out from that: ver. 9, "Thy face, Lord, will I seek," in obedience to thy command, therefore "hide not thy face from me," that is, let me never want the reviving sense of thy favour. Love me, and let me know that thou lovest me; "Put not thy servant away in anger." He owns he had deserved God's displeasure, but begs that, however God might correct him, he would not cast him away from his presence; for what is hell but that?

2nd. For the continuance of his presence with him; "Thou hast been my help," formerly, and "Thou art the God of my salvation," and therefore, whither shall I go but to thee? O "leave me not, neither forsake me;" withdraw not the operations of thy power from me, for then I am helpless; withdraw not the tokens of thy good-will to me, for then I am comfortless.

3rd. For the benefit of a Divine conduct; ver. 11, "Teach me thy way, O Lord," that is, give me to understand the meaning of thy providences towards me, and make them plain to me; and give me to know my duty in every doubtful case, that I may not mistake it, but may walk rightly, and that I may not do it with hesitation, but may walk surely. It is not policy but plainness, that is, downright honesty, that will direct us into, and keep us in, the way of our duty. He begs to be guided in a plain path, because of his enemies; or, as the margin reads it, his observers. His enemies watched for his halting, that they might find occasion against him. Saul eyed David, 1 Sam. xviii. 9; this quickened him to pray, "Lord, lead me in a plain path," that they may have nothing ill, or nothing that looks ill, to lay to my charge.

4th. For the benefit of a Divine protection; ver. 12, "Deliver me not over to the will of mine enemies." Lord, let them not gain their point, for it aims at my life, and no less; and in such a way as that I have no fence against them but thy power over their consciences; "for false witnesses are risen up against me," that aim farther than to take away my reputation or estate, for they breathe out cruelty; it is the blood, the precious blood, they thirst after. Herein David was a type of Christ; for false witnesses rose up against him, and such as breathed out cruelty; but, though he was delivered into their wicked hands, he was not delivered over to their will, for they could not prevent his exaltation.

Secondly. He expresseth his dependence upon God,

1. That he would help and succour him, when all other helps and succours failed him; ver. 10, "When my father and my mother forsake me," that is, the nearest and dearest friends I have in the world, from whom I may expect most relief, and with most reason, when they either die or are at a distance from me, or are disabled to help me in the time of need, or are unkind to me, or unmindful of me, and will not help me; when I am as helpless as ever poor orphan was, that was left fatherless and motherless, then I know "the Lord will take me up," as a poor wandering sheep is taken up and saved from perishing. His time to help those that trust in him is when all other helpers fail,—when it is most for his honour and their comfort; with him the fatherless find mercy. This promise has often been fulfilled in the letter of it. Forsaken orphans have been taken under the special care of the Divine providence, which has raised up relief and friends for them, that way that one would not have expected it. God is a surer and better friend than our earthly parents are or can be.

2. That in due time he should see the displays of his goodness, ver. 13. He believed he should "see the goodness of the Lord in the land of the living," and if he had not done so he should have fainted under his afflictions. Even the best saints are subject to faint when their troubles become grievous and tedious. Their spirits are overwhelmed, and their flesh and heart fail; but then faith is a sovereign cordial. It keeps them from desponding under their burthen, and despairing of relief, keeps them hoping, and praying, and waiting, and keeps up in them good thoughts of God, and the comfortable enjoyment of themselves. But what was it the belief of which kept David from fainting? "That he should see the goodness of the Lord," which now seemed at a distance. They that walk by faith in the goodness of the Lord, shall in due time walk in the sight of that goodness. This he hopes to see "in the land of the living," that is, 1st. In this world, that he should outlive his troubles, and not perish under them. It is his comfort, not so much that he shall see the land of the living, as that he shall see the goodness of God in it; for that is the comfort of all creature comforts to a gracious soul. 2nd. In the land of Canaan, and in Jerusalem, where the lively oracles were, in comparison with the heathen, that were dead in sin, the land of Israel might fitly be called the land of the living,—there God was known, and there David hoped to see his goodness: see 2 Sam. xv. 25, 26. Or, 3rd. In heaven. It is that land alone that may truly be called the land of the living, where there is no more death; this earth is the land of the dying. Nothing like the believing hope of eternal life, the foresights of that glory, and foretastes of those pleasures, to keep us from fainting under all the calamities of this present time.

3. That in the meantime he should be strengthened to bear up under his burthens, ver. 14. Whether he saith it to himself or to his friends, it comes all to one, this is that which encourageth him. "He shall strengthen thy heart," shall sustain the spirit, and then the spirit shall sustain the infirmity. In that strength, 1st. Keep close to God, and to your duty; "Wait on the Lord," by faith and prayer, and an humble resignation to his will, "wait, I say, on the Lord;" whatever you do, grow not remiss in your attendance upon God. 2nd. Keep up your spirits in the midst of the greatest dangers and difficulties; "Be of good courage." Let your hearts be fixed, trusting in God, and your minds stayed upon him, and then let none of these things move you. They that wait upon the Lord have reason to be of good courage.

PSALM XXVIII.

The former part of this psalm is the prayer of a saint militant, and now in distress, 1—3; to which is added the doom of God's implacable enemies, ver. 4, 5. The latter part of the psalm is the thanksgiving of a saint triumphant, and delivered out of his distresses, ver. 6—8; to which is added a prophetical prayer for all God's faithful, loyal of which very different versions have been given. The Alexandrian Greek is, "My heart said unto thee, I have sought thy face; thy face, Lord, will I seek." Another Greek rendering is, "My heart said unto thee, I will seek the Lord; my face hath sought thee; thy face, Lord, will I seek." The Latin Vulgate is the same as the last, save that it omits the words, "I will seek the Lord." The Syriac is, "My heart speaketh unto thee, and my face seeketh thy face." The Hebrew, as it now stands, runs in this order: "My heart saith (or speaketh) unto thee: Seek ye my face; thy face, Lord, will I seek." If the present text is to be retained, we must suppose the psalmist introducing as a quotation the Divine precept, "Seek ye my face." This is nearly the idea of the Prayer-Book version: "My heart hath talked of thee, Seek ye my face; thy face, Lord, will I seek."

xxvii. 13. Here also the words "I had fainted" are not in the Hebrew. The Syriac renders, "But I believe I shall see the good things of the Lord in the land of the living." The Latin Vulgate is subjects, ver. 9; so that it is hard to say which of these two conditions David was in when he penned it. Some think he was now in trouble seeking God, but at the same time preparing to praise him for his deliverance, and by faith giving him thanks for it, before it was wrought. Others think he was now in triumph, but remembered and recorded, for his own and others' benefit, the prayers he made when he was in affliction, that the mercy might relish the better, when it appeared to be an answer to them.

A Psalm of David.

UNTO thee will I cry, O LORD my rock; be not silent to me:
Lest, if thou be silent to me, I become like them that go down into the pit
2 Hear the voice of my supplications, when I cry unto thee,
When I lift up my hands toward thy holy oracle.
3 Draw me not away with the wicked, and with the workers
Which speak peace to their neighbours, [of iniquity,
But mischief is in their hearts.
4 Give them according to their deeds,
And according to the wickedness of their endeavours:
Give them after the work of their hands;
Render to them their desert.
5 Because they regard not the works of the LORD,
Nor the operation of his hands,
He shall destroy them, and not build them up.

In these verses David is very earnest in prayer.

First. He prays that God would graciously hear and answer him now that, in his distress, he called upon him, ver. 1, 2. Observe his faith in prayer; "O Lord my rock;" noting his belief of God's power, He is a rock; and his dependence upon that power, He is my rock, on whom I build my hope. Observe his fervency in prayer, "To thee will I cry," as one in earnest, being ready to sink unless thou come in with seasonable succour. And observe how solicitous he is to obtain an answer, "Be not silent to me," as one angry at my prayers, Ps. lxxx. 4; Lord, speak to me, answer me with good words, and comfortable words, Zec. i. 13. Though the thing I pray for be not given in, yet let God speak to me joy and gladness, and make me to hear it. Lord, speak for me, in answer to my prayers; plead my cause, command deliverances for me, and thus hear and answer the voice of my supplications. Two things he pleads: 1. The sad despair he should be in if God slighted him. "If thou be silent to me," and I have not the tokens of thy favour, "I am like them that go down into the pit," that is, I am a dead man, lost and undone; if God be not my friend, appear not to me, and appear not for me, my hope and my help is perished. Nothing can be so cutting, so killing, to a gracious soul, as the want of God's favour, and the sense of his displeasure. 'I shall be like them that go down to hell,' so some understand it; for what is the misery of the damned but this, that God is for ever silent to them, and deaf to their cry? Those are in some measure qualified for God's favour, and may expect it, who are thus possessed with a dread of his wrath, and to whom his frowns are worse than death. 2. The good hopes he had that God would favour him, "I lift up my hands towards thy holy oracle;" which notes, not only an earnest desire, but an earnest expectation, from thence to receive an answer of peace. The most holy place, within the veil, is here, as elsewhere, called the oracle; there the ark and the mercy-seat were, there God was said to dwell between the cherubims, and thence he spake to his people, Num. vii. 89. That was a type of Christ; and it is to him that we must lift up our eyes and hands, for through him all good comes from God to us. It was also a figure of heaven, Heb. ix. 24. And from God, as our Father in heaven, we are taught to expect an answer to our prayers. The Scriptures are called the oracles of God, and to them we must have an eye in our prayers and expectations. There is the word on which God hath caused and encouraged us to hope.

Secondly. He deprecates the doom of wicked people, as before, Ps. xxvi. 9, "Gather not my soul with sinners." Lord, I attend thy holy oracle, "draw me not away from that with the wicked, and with the workers of iniquity," ver. 3; that is, 1. Save me from being entangled in the snares they have laid for me. They flatter and cajole me, and speak peace to me, but they have a design upon me, for mischief is in their heart; they aim to disturb me, nay, to destroy me; Lord, suffer me not to be drawn away and ruined by their cursed plots: for they have, can have, no power, no success against me, except it be given them from above. 2. Save me from being infected with their sins, and from doing as they do; let me not be drawn away by their fallacious arguments, or their allurements, from thy holy oracle, where I desire to dwell all the days of my life, to practise any wicked works: see Ps. cxli. 4. Lord, never leave me to myself to use such arts of deceit and treachery for my safety as they use for my ruin. Let no event of providence be an invincible temptation to me, to draw me either to the imitation or into the interest of wicked people. Good men dread the way of sinners; the best are sensible of the danger they are in of being drawn aside into it; and therefore we should all pray earnestly to God for his grace to keep us in our integrity. 3. Save me from being involved in their doom; let not me be led forth with the workers of iniquity, for I am none of them that speak peace while war is in their hearts. Note, Those that are careful not to partake with sinners in their sins have reason to hope that they shall not partake with them in their plagues, Rev. xviii. 4.

Thirdly. He imprecates the just judgments of God upon the workers of iniquity; ver. 4, "Give them according to their deeds." This is not the language of passion or revenge; nor is it inconsistent with the duty of praying for our enemies. But, 1. Thus he would shew how far he was from complying with the workers of iniquity, and with what good reason he had begged not to be drawn away with them, because he was convinced that they could not be made more miserable than to be dealt with according to their deeds. 2. Thus he would express his zeal for the honour of God's justice in governing the world: Lord, they think all well they do, and justify themselves in their wicked practices; Lord, "give them after the work of their hands," and so undeceive those about them, who think there is no harm in what they do because it goes unpunished, Ps. xciv. 1, 2. 3. This prayer is a prophecy that God will, sooner or later, render to all impenitent sinners according to their deserts. If what has been done amiss be not undone by repentance, there will certainly come a reckoning day, when God will render to every man who persists in his evil deeds according to them. It is a prophecy particularly of the destruction of destroyers. They speak peace to their neighbour, but mischief is in their hearts; Lord, give them according to their deeds, let the spoilers be spoiled, and let them be treacherously dealt with, who have thus dealt treacherously: see Isa. xxxiii. 1; Rev. xviii. 4; xiii. 10. Observe, He foretells that God will reward them, not only according to their deeds, but "according to the wickedness of their endeavours;" for sinners shall be reckoned with, not only for the mischief they have done, but for the mischief they would have done, which they designed, and did what they could to effect. And if God go by this rule in dealing with the wicked, sure he will do so in dealing with the righteous, and will reward them, not only for the good they have done, but for the good they have endeavoured to do, though they could not compass it.

Fourthly. He foretells their destruction for their contempt of God, and his hand; ver. 5, "Because they regard not the works of the Lord, and the operations of his hands," by which he manifests himself, and speaks to the children of men, he shall destroy them in this world and in the other, and not build them up. Note, A stupid regardlessness of the works of God is the cause of the sin of sinners, and so becomes the cause of their ruin. Why do men question the being or attributes of God, but because they do not duly regard his handyworks which declare his glory, and in which the invisible things of him are clearly seen? Why do men forget God, and live without him, nay, affront God, and live in rebellion against him, but because they consider not the instances of that wrath of his, which is "revealed from heaven against all ungodliness and unrighteousness of men?" Why do the enemies of God's people hate and persecute them, and devise mischief against them, but because they regard not the works God has wrought for his church, by which he has made it appear how dear it is to him? see Isa. v. 12.

In singing this we must arm ourselves against all temptations to join with the workers of iniquity; and animate ourselves against all the troubles we may be threatened with by the workers of iniquity.

6 Blessed be the LORD,
Because he hath heard the voice of my supplications.
7 The LORD is my strength and my shield;
My heart trusted in him, and I am helped:
Therefore my heart greatly rejoiceth;
And with my song will I praise him.
8 The LORD is their strength,
And he is the saving strength of his anointed.
9 Save thy people, and bless thine inheritance:
Feed them also, and lift them up for ever.

In these verses,

First. David gives God thanks for the audience of his prayers, as affectionately as a few verses before he had begged it; ver. 6, "Blessed be the Lord." How soon are the saints' sorrows turned into songs; and their prayers into praises! It was in faith that David prayed, ver. 2, "Hear the voice of my supplications;" and by the same faith he gives thanks, ver. 6, that God had heard the voice of his supplications. Note, 1. They that pray in faith may rejoice in hope. He hath heard me, that is, graciously accepted me, and I am as sure of a real answer as if I had it already. 2. What we win by prayer we must wear with praise. Hath God heard our supplications? let us then bless his name.

Secondly. He encourageth himself to hope in God for the perfecting of every thing that concerned him. Having given to God the glory of his grace, ver. 6, he is humbly bold to take the comfort of it, ver. 7. This is the method of attaining peace, let it begin with praise that it is attainable. Let us first bless God, and then bless ourselves. Observe, 1. His dependence upon God. "The Lord is my strength" to support me, and carry me on through all my services and sufferings. He is "my shield" to protect me from all the malicious designs of my enemies against me. I have chosen him to be so, I have always found him so, and I expect he will still be so. 2. His experience of the benefit of that dependence. "My heart trusted in him," and in his power and promise, and it has not been in vain to do so, for I am helped, I have been helped many a time; not only God has given in to me in his due time the help I trusted to him for, but my very trusting in him has helped me in the meantime, and kept me from fainting, Ps. xxvii. 13. The very actings of faith are present aids to a drooping spirit, and help it many a time at a dead lift. 3. His improvement of this experience. He had the pleasure of it, "therefore my heart greatly rejoiceth." The joy of a believer is seated in the heart, while in the laughter of the fool the heart is sorrowful. It is great joy, joy unspeakable and full of glory. The heart that truly believes shall in due time greatly rejoice; it is joy and peace in believing that we are to expect. God shall have the praise of it; when "my heart greatly rejoiceth, with my song will I praise him." Thus must we express our gratitude; it is the least we can do, and others will hereby be invited and encouraged to trust in him too.

Thirdly. He pleaseth himself with the interest which all good people through Christ have in God; ver. 8, "The Lord is their strength;" not mine only, but the strength of every believer. Note, The saints rejoice in their friends' comforts as well as their own; for, as we have not the less benefit by the light of the sun, so neither by the light of God's countenance, for others sharing therein; for we are sure there is enough for all, and enough for each. This is our communion with all saints, that God is their strength and ours; Christ, their Lord and ours, 1 Cor. i. 2. He is their strength, the strength of all Israel, because "he is the saving strength of his Anointed;" that is, 1. Of David in the type. God, in strengthening him that was their king and fought their battles, strengthened the whole kingdom. He calls himself God's anointed, because it was the unction he had received that exposed him to the envy of his enemies, and therefore entitled him to the Divine protection. 2. Of Christ, his Anointed, his Messiah, in the antitype. God was his saving strength, qualified him for his undertaking, and carried him through it: see Ps. lxxxix. 21; Isa. xlix. 5; l. 7, 9; and so he becomes their strength, the strength of all the saints. He strengthened him that is the church's head, and from him diffuseth strength to all the members; has commanded his strength, and so strengthens what he has wrought for us, Ps. lxviii. 28: see Ps. lxxx. 17, 18.

Fourthly. He concludes with a short but comprehensive prayer for the church of God, ver. 9. He prays for Israel, not as his people, Save my people, and bless mine inheritance, though they were so, but thine. God's interest in them lay nearer his heart than his own; We are thy people, is a good plea, Isa. lxiv. 9; lxiii. 19, "I am thine, save me." God's people are his inheritance, dear to him, and precious in his eyes; what little glory he has from this world he has it from them: "The Lord's portion is his people." That which he begs of God for them is, 1. That he would save them from their enemies, and the dangers they were exposed to. 2. That he would bless them with all good flowing from his similar, so is the Greek. There is an ellipse, which may or may not be supplied: "If I had not believed that I should see the goodness of the Lord in the land of the living." Dr. Hammond compares this abrupt expression with a speech which Virgil gives to Neptune in the "Æneid," and regards it as a beautiful expression of intense feeling.

xxviii. 1. For "be not silent" we must understand "be not deaf," as many do, or "fail not to answer me," which we prefer.

xxviii. 3. "Draw me not away," probably as a criminal to execution; but the Syriac is, "Number me not with the wicked." The Greek is, "Draw not away my soul with sinners, and destroy me not with those that work iniquity, who speak peace with their neighbours, but evil is in their hearts." The Latin is almost the same, and was very likely based upon it.

xxviii. 4. The Syriac for this verse only has, "Reward them according to their deeds, and according to their badness."

xxviii. 7. The Syriac here is, "The Lord is my helper and my favour, in performance of his promise, and amounting to a happiness for them 3. That he would feed them: bless them with plenty, and especially the plenty of his ordinances, which are food to the soul: 'rule them,' so the margin; direct their counsels and actions aright, and overrule their affairs for good. Feed them and rule them; that is, set pastors, set rulers over them, that shall do their office with wisdom and understanding. 4. That he would lift them up for ever; lift them up out of their troubles and distresses; and do this not only for those of that age, but for his people in every age to come, even to the end. Lift them up into thy glorious kingdom, lift them up as high as heaven. There, and there only, will the saints be lifted up for ever, never more to sink or be depressed. Observe, Those, and those only, whom God feeds and rules, that are willing to be taught, and guided, and governed by him, shall be saved, and blessed, and lifted up for ever.

PSALM XXIX.

It is the probable conjecture of some very good interpreters that David penned this psalm upon occasion, and just at the time, of a great storm of thunder, lightning, and rain; as the 8th psalm was his meditation in a moonshine night, and the 19th in a sunshine morning. It is good to take occasion from the sensible operations of God's power in the kingdom of nature to give glory to him. So composed was David, and so cheerful, even in a dreadful tempest, when others trembled, that then he penned this psalm; for, "though the earth be removed, yet will we not fear." I. He calls upon the great ones of the world to give glory to God, ver. 1, 2. II. To convince them of the greatness of that God whom they were to adore, he takes notice of his power and terror in the thunder and lightning, and thunder-showers, ver. 3—9; his sovereign dominion over the world, ver. 10; and his special favour to his church, ver. 11. Great and high thoughts of God should fill us in singing this psalm.

A Psalm of David.

GIVE unto the LORD, O ye mighty,
Give unto the LORD glory and strength.
2 Give unto the LORD the glory due unto his name;
Worship the LORD in the beauty of holiness.
3 The voice of the LORD is upon the waters:
The God of glory thundereth:
The LORD is upon many waters.
4 The voice of the LORD is powerful;
The voice of the LORD is full of majesty.
5 The voice of the LORD breaketh the cedars;
Yea, the LORD breaketh the cedars of Lebanon.
6 He maketh them also to skip like a calf;
Lebanon and Sirion like a young unicorn.

LEBANON, FROM THE SEA.

7 The voice of the LORD divideth the flames of fire.
8 The voice of the LORD shaketh the wilderness;
The LORD shaketh the wilderness of Kadesh.
9 The voice of the LORD maketh the hinds to calve,
And discovereth the forests:
And in his temple doth every one speak of his glory.
10 The LORD sitteth upon the flood;
Yea, the LORD sitteth King for ever.
11 The LORD will give strength unto his people;
The LORD will bless his people with peace.

In this psalm we have,

First. A demand of the homage of the great men of the earth to be paid to the great God. Every clap of thunder David interpreted as a call to himself and other princes to give glory to the great God. Observe, 1. Who they are that are called to this duty: "O ye mighty," ver. 1. Ye sons of the mighty; that have power, and on whom that power is devolved by succession and inheritance that have royal blood running in your veins. It is much for the honour of the great God that the great men of this world should pay their homage to him; and they are bound to do it, not only because as high as they are He is infinitely above them, and therefore they must vail to him, but because they have their power from him, and are to use it for him, and this tribute of acknowledgment they owe to him for it. 2. How often this call is repeated: "Give unto the Lord," and again, and a third time, "Give unto the Lord." This intimates that the mighty men are backward to this duty, and are hardly persuaded to it; but that it is of great consequence to the interests of God's kingdom among men that princes should heartily espouse them. Jerusalem flourishes when the kings of the earth bring their glory and honour into it, Rev. xxi. 24. 3. What they are called to: To give unto the Lord; not as if he needed any thing, or could be benefited by any gifts of ours, or as if we had any thing to give him that is not his own already, "Who hath first given to him?" but the recognition of his glory, and of his dominion over us, he is pleased to interpret as a gift to him. "Give unto the Lord," your own selves in the first place, and then your services. "Give unto the Lord glory and strength;" that is, acknowledge his glory and strength, and give praise to him as a God of infinite majesty and irresistible power; and what glory and strength he has by his providence intrusted you with, offer it to him, to be used for his honour in his service. Give him your crowns, let them be laid at his feet; give him your sceptres, your swords, your keys, put all into his hand, that you in the use of them may be to him for a name and a praise. Princes value themselves by their glory and strength; these they must ascribe to God, owning him to be infinitely more glorious and powerful than they.

This demand of homage from the mighty may be looked upon as directed either to the grandees of David's own kingdom, the peers of the realm, the princes of the tribes,—and it is to excite them to a more diligent and constant attendance at God's altars, in which he had observed them very remiss,—or to the neighbouring kings whom he by his sword had made tributaries to Israel, and now would persuade to become tributaries to the God of Israel. Crowned heads must bow before the King of kings. What is here said to the mighty is said to all, Worship God; it is the sum and substance of the everlasting Gospel, Rev. xiv. 6, 7. Now we have here, 1. The nature of religious worship; it is giving "to the Lord the glory due to his name," ver. 2. God's name is that whereby he has made himself known. There is a glory due to his name. It is impossible we should give him all the glory due to his name; when we have said and done our best for the honour of God's name, still we come infinitely short of the merit of the subject. But when we answer that revelation which he has made of himself, with suitable affections and adorations, then we give him some of that glory which is due to his name. If we would, in hearing, and praying, and other acts of devotion, receive grace from God, we must make it our business to give glory to God. 2. The rule of the performance of religious exercises; "worship the Lord in the beauty of holiness." Which speaks, 1st. The object of our worship. The glorious majesty of God is called "the beauty of holiness," 2 Chr. xx. 21. In the worship of God we must have an eye to his beauty, and adore him not only as infinitely awful, and therefore to be feared above all, but as infinitely amiable, and therefore to be loved and delighted in above all; especially we must have an eye to the beauty of his holiness; this the angels fasten upon in their praises, Rev. iv. 8. Or, 2nd. The place of worship. The sanctuary then was the beauty of holiness, Ps. xlviii. 1, 2; Jer. xvii. 12. The beauty of the sanctuary was the exact agreeableness of the worship there performed with the Divine appointment; the pattern in the mount. Now, under the Gospel, solemn assemblies of Christians (which purity is the beauty of) are the places where God is to be worshipped. Or, 3. The manner of worship. We must be holy in all our religious performances; that is, devoted to God, and to his will and glory. There is a beauty in holiness, and it is that that puts an acceptable beauty upon all the acts of worship.

Secondly. Good reason given for this demand. We shall see ourselves bound to give glory to God if we consider, 1. His sufficiency in himself, intimated in his name Jehovah, "I am that I am," which is repeated here no less than eighteen times in this short psalm, twice in every verse but three, and once in two of those three; I think there is not the like in all the book of Psalms. Let the mighty ones of the earth know him by this name, and give him the glory due to it. 2. His sovereignty over all things. Let those that rule over men know there is a God that rules over them, that rules over all. The psalmist here sets forth God's dominion,

1. In the kingdom of nature. In the wonderful effects of natural causes, and the operations of the powers of nature, we ought to take notice of God's glory and strength, which we are called upon to ascribe to him. In the thunder, and lightning, and rain, we may see,

1st. His glory. It is the God of glory that thundereth, ver. 3. It is God that thunders; it is the noise of his voice, Job xxxvii. 2, and it speaks him a God of glory; so awful is the sound of the thunder, and so bright the flash of its companion the lightning. To the hearing and to the sight nothing more affecting than these, as if by those two learning senses God would give such proofs of his glory to the minds of men as should leave the most stupid inexcusable. And some observe, that there were then some particular reasons why thunder should be called the voice of the Lord, not only because it comes from above, is not under the direction or foresight of any man, speaks loud, and reaches far; but because God often spake in thunder, particularly at mount Sinai, and by thunder discomfited the enemies of Israel. To speak it the voice of the God of glory, it is here said to be upon the waters, upon many waters, ver. 3; it reacheth over the vast ocean, the waters under the firmament; it rattles among the thick clouds, the waters that are above the firmament. Every one that hears the thunder, his ears being made to tingle with it, will own that "the voice of the Lord is full of majesty," ver. 4, enough to make the highest humble, for none "can thunder with a voice like him;" and the proudest tremble, for, if his voice be so terrible, what is his arm? Every time we hear it thunder, let our hearts be thereby filled with great, and high, and honourable thoughts of God, in the holy adoring and admirings of whom the power of godliness doth so much consist. "O Lord our God, thou art very great."

2nd. His power; ver. 4, "The voice of the Lord is powerful," as appears by the effects of it; for it works wonders. They that write natural histories relate the prodigious effects of thunder and lightning, even out of the ordinary course of natural causes, which must be resolved into the omnipotence of the God of nature. First. Trees have been rent and split by thunderbolts; ver. 5. 6, "The voice of the Lord" in the thunder often "broke the cedars," even those of Lebanon, the strongest, the stateliest. Some understand it of the violent winds, which shook the cedars, and sometimes tore off their aspiring tops. Earthquakes also shook the ground itself on which the trees grew, and made Lebanon and Sirion to dance; the wilderness of Kadesh also was in like manner shaken, ver. 8, the trees by winds, the ground by earthquakes, and both by thunders, of which I incline rather to understand it. The learned Dr. Hammond understands it of the consternation and conquest of the neighbour kingdoms that warred with Israel and opposed David; as the Syrians, whose country lay near the forest of Lebanon, the Amorites, that bordered on mount Hebron, and the Moabites and Ammonites, that lay about the wilderness of Kadesh. Secondly. Fires have been kindled by lightnings, and houses and churches thereby consumed; hence we read of hot thunderbolts, Ps. lxxviii. 48. Accordingly, the voice of the Lord in the thunder is here said to divide the flames, ver. 7; that is, to scatter them upon the earth, as God sees fit to direct them, and do execution by them. Thirdly. The terror of thunder "makes the hinds to calve," sooner, and some think easier, than otherwise they would. The supporter, upon whom my heart relies and my flesh flourishes; and with a song will I praise him." The Greek and Latin are similar, and the latter is thus given in the Douay version: "Our Lord is my helper and my protector; in him my heart hath hoped, and I was holpen; and my flesh flourished again, and with my will I will confess to him."

xxix. 1. It is generally thought that David wrote this psalm after some great thunder-storm of exceptional terror. The extraordinary vigour of the language, and the bold yet truthful character of the imagery, have been much admired. The first verse has been very differently rendered. The Greek and Latin are, "Bring unto the Lord, oh, sons of God, bring unto the Lord young rams." This is followed in the old Prayer-Book version. The opening words are certainly vague, but our translation is as probable as any. If any change is to be introduced, it might be that recommended in the margin: "ye sons of the mighty." Coleman's rendering is very hind is a timorous creature, and much affected with the noise of thunder; and no marvel, when sometimes proud and stout men have been made to tremble at it. The emperor Caligula would hide himself under his bed when it thundered. Horace the poet owns that he was reclaimed from atheism by the terror of thunder and lightning, which he describes somewhat like this here, Lib. i. Ode 34. The thunder is said here to discover the forests; that is, it so terrifies the wild beasts of the forest that they quit the dens and thickets in which they hid themselves, and so are discovered. Or, it throws down the trees, and so discovers the ground that was shaded by them. Whenever it thunders, let us think of this psalm; and whenever we sing this psalm let us think of the dreadful thunderclaps we have sometimes heard, and thus bring God's word and his works together, that by both we may be directed and quickened to give unto him the glory due unto his name; and let us bless him that there is another voice of his besides this dreadful one, by which God now speaks to us, even the still small voice of his Gospel, the terror of which shall not make us afraid.

2. In the kingdom of providence. God is to be praised as the governor of the world of mankind. He "sits upon the flood, he sits king for ever," ver. 10. He not only sits at rest in the enjoyment of himself, but he sits as king in the throne which he has prepared in the heavens, Ps. ciii. 17, where he takes cognizance of, and gives orders about, all the affairs of the children of men, and doth all according to his will, according to the counsel of his will. Observe, 1st. The power of his kingdom: He sits upon the flood. As he has founded the earth, so he hath founded his own throne, upon the floods, Ps. xxiv. 2. The ebbings and flowings of this lower world, and the tosses and revolutions of the affairs in it, give not the least shake to the repose, or to the counsels, of the Eternal Mind. The opposition of his enemies is compared to the floods, Ps. xciii. 3, 4; but the Lord sits upon it; that is, he crusheth it, conquers it, and completes his own purposes in despite of all the devices that are in men's hearts. The word here translated "the flood," is never used but concerning Noah's flood; and therefore some think that is it that is here spoken of. God did sit upon that flood, as a judge executing the sentence of his justice upon the world of the ungodly that was swept away by it. And he still sits upon the flood, restrains the waters of Noah, that they turn not again to cover the earth, according to his promise never to destroy the earth any more by a flood, Gen. ix. 11; Isa. liv. 9. 2nd. The perpetuity of his kingdom: He sits king for ever; no period can or shall be put to his government. The administration of his kingdom is consonant to his counsels from eternity, and pursuant to his designs for eternity.

3. In the kingdom of grace. Here his glory shines brightest, 1st. In the adorations he receives from the subjects of that kingdom, ver. 9. "In his temple," where his people attend his discoveries of himself and his mind, and attend him with their praises, there doth "every one speak of his glory." In the world every man sees it, or at least, may behold it afar off, Job xxxvi. 25; but it is only in the temple, in the church, that it is spoken of to his honour. "All his works do praise him;" that is, they minister matter for praise, but his saints only do bless him and speak of his glory in his works, Ps. cxlv. 10. 2nd. In the favours he bestows upon the subjects of that kingdom, ver. 11. First. He will enable them for his service. "He will give strength to his people," to fortify them against every evil work, and to furnish them for every good work; out of weakness they shall be made strong; nay, he will perfect strength in weakness. Secondly. He will encourage them in his service. "He will bless his people with peace." Peace is a blessing of inestimable value, which God designs for all his people. "The work of righteousness is peace: great peace have they that love thy law;" but much more the crown of righteousness. The end of the righteous is peace, it is endless peace. When the thunder of God's wrath shall make sinners tremble, the saints shall lift up their heads with joy.

PSALM XXX.

This is a psalm of thanksgiving for the great deliverances which God had wrought for David, penned upon occasion of the dedicating of his house of cedar, and sung in that pious solemnity, though there is not any thing in it that has particular reference to that occasion. Some collect from divers passages in the psalm itself, that it was penned upon his recovery from a dangerous fit of sickness, which might happen to be about the time of the dedication of his house. I. He here praiseth God for the deliverances he had wrought for him, ver. 1—3. II. He calls upon others to praise him too, and encourageth them to trust in him, ver. 4, 5. III. He blames himself for his former security, ver. 6, 7. IV. He recollects the prayers and complaints he had made in his distress, ver. 8—10; and with them stirs up himself to be very thankful to God for the present comfortable change, ver. 11, 12. In singing this psalm, we ought to remember with thankfulness any like deliverances wrought for us; for which we must stir up ourselves to praise him, and by which we must be engaged to depend upon him.

A Psalm and Song at the dedication of the house of David.

I WILL extol thee, O LORD; for thou hast lifted me up,
And hast not made my foes to rejoice over me
2 O LORD my God, I cried unto thee,
And thou hast healed me.
3 O LORD, thou hast brought up my soul from the grave:
Thou hast kept me alive, that I should not go down to 4 Sing unto the LORD, O ye saints of his, [the pit.
And give thanks at the remembrance of his holiness
5 For his anger endureth but a moment;
In his favour is life:
Weeping may endure for a night,
But joy cometh in the morning

It was the laudable practice of the pious Jews, and though not expressly appointed yet allowed and accepted, when they had built a new house, to dedicate it to God, Deu. xx. 5. David did so, when his house was built, and he took possession of it, 2 Sam. v. 11; for royal palaces do as much need God's protection, and are as much bound to be at his service, as ordinary houses. Note, The houses we dwell in should, at our first entrance upon them, be dedicated to God as little sanctuaries. We must solemnly commit ourselves and our families, and all our family affairs, to God's conduct and care; must pray for his presence and blessing, must devote ourselves and all ours to his glory, and must resolve both that we will put away iniquity far from our tabernacles and that we and our houses will serve the Lord, both in the duties of family worship, and in all instances of Gospel obedience. Some conjecture that this psalm was sung at the rededication of David's house, after he had been driven out of it by Absalom, who had defiled it with his incest, and that it is a thanksgiving for the crushing of that dangerous rebellion. In these verses,

First. David doth himself give God thanks for the great deliverances he had wrought for him; ver. 1. "I will extol thee, O Lord;" that is, I will exalt thy name, will praise thee as one high and lifted up; I will do what I can to advance the interests of thy kingdom among men. "I will extol thee, for thou hast lifted me up," not only up out of the pit in which I was sinking, but up to the throne of Israel. He raiseth up the poor out of the dust. In consideration of the great things God has done to exalt us, both by his providence and by his grace, we are bound in gratitude to do all we can to extol his name, though the most we can do is but little. Three things magnify David's deliverance: 1. That it was the defeat of his enemies. They were not suffered to triumph over him, as they would have done (though it is a barbarous thing) if he had died of this sickness, or perished in this distress: see Ps. xli. 11. 2. That it was an answer to his prayers; ver. 2, "I cried unto thee." All the expressions of the sense we have of our troubles should be directed to God, and every cry be a cry to him; and giving way in this manner to our grief will ease a burthened spirit. "I cried to thee," and thou hast not only heard me, but healed me, healed the distempered body, healed the disturbed and disquieted mind, healed the disordered, distracted affairs of the kingdom. It is what God glories in; "I am the Lord that healeth thee," Ex. xv. 26, and we must give him the glory of it. 3. That it was the saving of his life; for he was brought to the last extremity, dropping into the grave, and ready to go down into the pit, and yet rescued and kept alive, ver. 3. The more imminent our dangers have been, the more eminent our deliverances have been, the more comfortable to ourselves, and the more illustrious proofs of the power and goodness of God. A life from the dead ought to be spent in extolling the God of our life.

Secondly. He calls upon others to join with him in praise, not only for the particular favours God had bestowed upon him, but for the general tokens of his goodwill to all his saints; ver. 4, "Sing unto the Lord, O ye saints of his." All that are truly saints he owns for his; there is a remnant of such in this world, and from them it is expected that they sing unto him; for they are created and sanctified, made, and made saints, that they be to him for a name and a praise. His saints in heaven sing to him; why should not those on earth be doing the same work, as well as they can, in concert with them?

1. They believe him to be a God of unspotted purity; and therefore let them sing to him. Let them "give thanks at the remembrance of his holiness;" that is, let them praise his holy name, for holiness is his memorial throughout all generations. God is a holy God; his holiness is his glory; that is the attribute which the holy angels in their praises fasten most upon, Isa. vi. 3; Rev. iv. 8. We ought to be much in the mention and remembrance of God's holiness; and holy souls can give thanks at the mention of God's holiness. It is matter of joy to the saints that God is a holy God; for then they hope he will make them holy, more holy. No one of all God's perfections carries in it more terror to the wicked, nor more comfort to the godly, than his holiness. It is a good sign we are in some measure partakers of his holiness, if we can heartily rejoice and give thanks at the remembrance of it.

2. They have experienced him to be a God gracious and merciful; and therefore let them sing to him. 1st. We have found his frowns very short. Though we have deserved they should have been everlasting, and that he should have been angry with us till he had consumed us, and should never have been reconciled, yet "his anger endureth but for a moment," ver. 5. When we offend him he is angry; but, as he is slow to anger, and not soon provoked, so, when he is angry, upon our repentance and humiliation, his anger is soon turned away, and he is willing to be at peace with us. If he hide his face from his own children, and suspend the wonted tokens of his favour, it is but in a little wrath, and for a small moment; but he will gather them with everlasting kindness, Isa. liv. 7, 8. If weeping endure for a night, and it be a wearisome night; yet, as sure as the light of the morning returns after the darkness of the night, so sure will joy and comfort return in a short time, in due time, to the people of God; for the covenant of grace is as firm as the covenant of the day. This word has often been fulfilled to us in the letter, weeping has endured for a night; but the grief has been soon over, and the grievance gone. Observe, As long as God's anger continues, so long the saints' weeping continues; but if that be but for a moment, the affliction is but for a moment; and when the light of God's countenance is restored the affliction is easily made nothing of. 2nd. We have found his smiles very sweet. "In his favour is life," that is, all good. The return of his favour to an afflicted soul is as life from the dead; nothing can be more reviving. Our happiness is bound up in God's favour; if we have that we have enough, whatever else we want. It is the life of the soul, it is spiritual life, the earnest of life eternal.

6 And in my prosperity I said,
I shall never be moved. [stand strong:
7 LORD, by thy favour thou hast made my mountain to Thou didst hide thy face, and I was troubled.

And unto the LORD I made supplication. [pit?

objectionable: "Ascribe unto Jehovah, oh, ye worshippers of false gods." The Jewish Kimchi thinks the angelic hosts are meant, and other Hebrew writers suppose the stars are intended. There is no need to adopt such far-fetched opinions.

xxix. 6. Sirion is Hermon (Deut. iii. 9). By the word rendered "unicorn" a kind of wild ox or buffalo is usually understood.

xxix. 9. "Maketh the hinds to calve" is by some rejected as a translation, and it has been proposed to substitute "maketh the oaks to tremble;" but the only change we should adopt is the one indicated in the margin, "maketh the hinds to be in pain." It is said that thunder brings premature pangs of labour upon certain animals.

xxx. Title. It is impossible to determine whether this inscription is correct, but it is not at all improbable that it is. Some explain it, "A Psalm of David, a song for the dedication of a house." The natural sense given by our translators is best, but the precise occasion is uncertain.

Shall the dust praise thee? shall it declare thy truth?
10 Hear, O LORD, and have mercy upon me:
LORD, be thou my helper
11 Thou hast turned for me my mourning into dancing:
Thou hast put off my sackcloth, and girded me with gladness;
12 To the end that my glory may sing praise to thee, and not be silent.
O LORD my God, I will give thanks unto thee for ever.

We have in these verses an account of three several states that David was in successively, and of the workings of his heart toward God in each of those states, what he said and did, and how his heart stood affected; in the first of which we may see what we are too apt to be, and in the other two what we should be.

First. He had long enjoyed prosperity, and then he grew secure, and over confident of the continuance of it; ver. 6, 7, "In my prosperity," when I was in health of body, and God had given me rest from all mine enemies, "I said, I shall never be moved;" that is, I never thought either of having my body distempered or my government disturbed, nor had any apprehensions of danger upon any account. Such complete victories had he obtained over those that opposed him, and such a confirmed interest had he in the hearts of his people, such a firmness of mind, and such a strong constitution of body, that he thought his prosperity fixed like a mountain; yet this he ascribes not to his own wisdom or fortitude, but to the Divine goodness; "Thou, through thy favour, hast made my mountain to stand strong," ver. 7. He doth not look upon it as his heaven, (as worldly people do, who make their prosperity their felicity,) only his mountain; it is earth still, only raised a little higher than the common level. This he thought, by the favour of God, would be perpetuated to him; imagining perhaps that, having had so many troubles in the beginning of his days, he had had his whole share, and should have none in his latter end. Or, that God, who had given him such tokens of his favour, would never frown upon him. Note, 1. We are very apt to dream, when things are well with us, that they will always be so, and never otherwise; "To-morrow shall be as this day;" as if we should think when the weather is once fair, that it will be ever fair; whereas nothing is more certain than that it will change. 2. When we see ourselves deceived in our expectation, it becomes us to reflect with shame upon our security as our folly, as David doth here, that we may be wiser another time, and may rejoice in our prosperity as though we rejoiced not, because the fashion of it passeth away.

Secondly. On a sudden he fell into trouble, and then he prayed to God, and pleaded earnestly for relief and succour. 1. His mountain was shaken, and he with it; it proved when he grew secure he was least safe; "Thou didst hide thy face, and I was troubled," in mind, body, or estate. In every change of his condition he still kept his eye upon God; and, as he ascribed his prosperity to God's favour, so in his adversity he observed the hiding of God's face to be the cause of it. If God hide his face, a good man is certainly troubled, though no other calamity befal him. When the sun sets, night certainly follows; and the moon and all the stars cannot make day. 2. When his mountain was shaken, he lifted up his eyes above the hills. Prayer is a salve for every sore: he made use of it accordingly. "Is any afflicted?" Is any troubled? "Let him pray." Though God hid his face from him, yet he prayed. If God in wisdom and justice turn from us, yet it will be in us the greatest folly and injustice imaginable if we turn from him. No, let us learn to pray in the dark; ver. 8, "I cried to thee, O Lord." It seems God's withdrawings made his prayers the more vehement. We are here told, (for it seems he kept account of it,) First. What he pleaded, ver. 9. That God would be no gainer by his death; "What profit is there in my blood?" implying, that he would willingly die if he could thereby do any real service to God or his country, Phil. ii. 17; but he saw not what good could he done by his dying in the bed of sickness, as might be if he had died in the bed of honour. Lord, saith he, wilt thou sell one of thine own people for nought, and not increase thy wealth by the price? Ps. xliv. 12. Nay, that in his honour God would seem to be a loser by his death. "Shall the dust praise thee?" The sanctified spirit which returns to God shall praise him, shall be still praising him; but the dust which returns to the earth shall not praise him, nor declare his truth. The services of God's house cannot be performed by the dust; it cannot praise him. There is none of that device or working in the grave, for it is the land of silence. The promises of God's covenant cannot be performed to the dust. Lord, saith David, if I die now, what will become of the promise made to me, who shall declare the truth of that? The best pleas in prayer are those that are taken from God's honour, and then we ask aright for life, when we have that in view, that we may live and praise him. Secondly. What he prayed for, ver. 10. He prayed for mercy to pardon, "Have mercy upon me;" and for grace to help in time of need, "Lord, be thou my helper." And on these two errands we also may come boldly to the throne of grace, Heb. iv. 16.

Thirdly. In due time God delivered him out of his troubles, and restored him to his former prosperity. His prayers were answered, and his mourning was turned into dancing, ver. 11. God's anger now endured but for a moment, and David's weeping but for a night. The sackcloth, with which in an humble compliance with the Divine providence he had clad himself, was loosed, his griefs were balanced, his fears were silenced, his comforts returned, and he was girded with gladness; joy was made his ornament; was made his strength, and seemed to cleave to him as "the girdle cleaveth to the loins of a man." As David's plunge into trouble from the height of prosperity, and then when he least expected it, teacheth us to rejoice as though we rejoiced not, because we know not how near trouble may be, so his sudden return to a prosperous condition, teacheth us to weep as though we wept not, because we know not how soon the storm may become a calm, and the formidable blast may become a favourable gale.

But what temper of mind was he in upon this happy change of the face of his affairs? What doth he say now? He tell us, ver. 12, 1. His complaints were turned into praises. He looked upon it that therefore God girded him with gladness, to the end that he might be the sweet psalmist of Israel, 2 Sam. xxiii. 1. That his glory might sing praise to God; that is, his tongue; for our tongue is our glory, and never more so than when it is employed in praising God. Or, his soul; for that is our glory above the beasts: that must be employed in blessing the Lord, and with that we must make melody to him in singing psalms. They that are kept from being silent in the pit must not be silent in the land of the living, but fervent, and constant, and public, in praising God. 2. These praises were likely to be everlasting. "I will give thanks unto thee for ever." This speaks a gracious resolution, that he would persevere to the end in praising God, and a gracious hope that he should never want fresh matter for praise, and that he should shortly be there where this would be the everlasting work. Blessed are they that dwell in God's house, they will be still praising him. Thus must we learn to accommodate ourselves to the various providences of God that are concerning us: to want and to abound, to sing of mercy and judgment, and to sing unto God for both.

PSALM XXXI.

It is probable that David penned this psalm when he was persecuted by Saul; and some passages in it agree particularly to the fair escape he had at Keilah, 1 Sam. xxiii. 13; and then in the wilderness at Maon, when Saul marched on one side of the hill and he on the other; and soon after in the cave in the wilderness of En-gedi; but that it was penned upon any of those occasions we are not told. It is a mixture of prayers, and praises, and professions of confidence in God; all which do well together, and are helpful to one another. I. David professeth his cheerful confidence in God, and in that confidence prays for deliverance out of his present troubles, ver. 1—8. II. He complains of the very deplorable condition he was in, and in the sense of his calamities still prays that God would graciously appear for him against his persecutors, ver. 9—18. III. He concludes the psalm with praise and triumph, giving glory to God, and encouraging himself and others to trust in him, ver. 19—24.

To the chief Musician, A Psalm of David.

IN thee, O LORD, do I put my trust;
Let me never be ashamed:
Deliver me in thy righteousness.
2 Bow down thine ear to me;
Deliver me speedily: be thou my strong rock,
For an house of defence to save me.
3 For thou art my rock and my fortress;
Therefore for thy name's sake lead me, and guide me.
4 Pull me out of the net that they have laid privily for me:
For thou art my strength.
5 Into thine hand I commit my spirit:
Thou hast redeemed me, O LORD God of truth.
6 I have hated them that regard lying vanities:
But I trust in the LORD.
7 I will be glad and rejoice in thy mercy:
For thou hast considered my trouble;
Thou hast known my soul in adversities;
8 And hast not shut me up into the hand of the enemy:
Thou hast set my feet in a large room.

Faith and prayer must go together. He that believes let him pray; "I believe, therefore have I spoken." And he that prays let him believe; for the prayer of faith is the prevailing prayer. We have both here.

First. David in distress is very earnest with God in prayer for succour and relief. This easeth a burthened spirit, fetcheth in promised mercies, and wonderfully supports and comforts the soul in the expectation of them. He prays, 1. That God would deliver him, ver. 1; that his life might be preserved from the malice of his enemies, and that an end might be put to their prosecutions of him; that God, not only in mercy but in righteousness, would deliver him, as a righteous judge betwixt him and his unrighteous persecutors; that he would bow down his ear to his petitions, to his appeals, and deliver him, ver. 2, (it is condescension in God to take cognizance of the case of the greatest and best of men,—he humbleth himself to do it;) and that he would deliver him speedily, lest, if the deliverance were long deferred, his faith should fail. 2. That if he did not presently deliver him out of his troubles, yet he would protect and shelter him in his troubles: "Be thou my strong rock," immoveable, impregnable, as a fastness framed by nature, and my house of defence, a fortress framed by art, and all "to save me." Thus may we pray that God's providence would secure to us our lives and comforts, and that by his grace we may be enabled to think ourselves safe in him, Pr. xviii. 10. 3. That his case, having much in it of difficulty, both in respect of duty and in respect of prudence, he might be under a Divine conduct: "Lord, lead me, and guide me," ver. 3. So order my steps, so order my spirit, that I may never do any thing unlawful and unjustifiable, against my conscience; or unwise and indiscreet, against my interest. They that resolve to follow God's direction may in faith pray for it. 4. That his enemies being very crafty as well as very spiteful, God would frustrate and baffle their designs against him; ver. 4, "Pull me out of the net that they have laid privily for me," and keep me from the sin, the trouble, the death, they aim to entrap me in.

Secondly. In this prayer he gives glory to God by a repeated profession of his confidence in him and dependence on him. This encouraged his prayers, and qualified him for the mercies he prayed for; ver. 1, "In thee, O Lord, do I put my trust," and not in myself, or any sufficiency of my own, or in any creature; "let me never be ashamed," that is, let me not be disappointed of any of that good which thou hast promised me, and which therefore I have promised myself in thee.

1. He had chosen God for his protector, and God had, by his promise, undertaken to be so; ver. 3, "Thou art my rock and my fortress," by thy covenant with me, and my believing consent to that covenant; therefore, be my strong rock, ver. 2. They that have in sincerity avouched the Lord for theirs may expect the benefit of his being so, for God's relations to us carry with them both name and thing. "Thou art my strength," ver. 4. If God be our strength, we may hope that he will both put his strength in us and put forth his strength for us.

2. He gave up his soul in a special manner to him; ver. 5, "Into thine hand I commit my spirit." 1st. If David here looks upon himself as a dying man, by these words he resigns his departing soul to God who gave it, and to whom at death the spirit returns. Men can but kill the body; but I trust in God to "redeem my soul from the power of the grave," Ps. xlix. 15. He is willing to die if God will have it so; but let my soul fall into the hands of the Lord, for his mercies are great. With these words our Lord Jesus yielded up the ghost upon the cross, and made his soul an offering, a freewill offering for sin, voluntarily laying down his life a ransom. By Stephen's example we are taught, in our dying moments, to eye Christ at God's right hand, and to commit our spirits to him, "Lord Jesus, receive my spirit." But, 2nd. David is here to be looked upon as a man in distress and trouble. And, First. His great care

xxx. 5. The Syriac has, "Rebuke is in his anger, and life in his favour." The Latin and Greek also have, "There is wrath in his anger." They followed a slightly various reading.

xxx. 7. The versions often differ here from the actual Hebrew text. The Douay, following the Greek and Latin, has, "O Lord, in thy will thou hast given strength to my beauty." The Syriac is, "O Lord, by thy good will thou hast set power over my glory," i.e., hast firmly established my glory. When David says "my mountain," he may mean his position or condition, and may not refer to Mount Zion, as some have fancied.

xxx. 12. The first clause is literally, "That glory may praise thee, and not be silent." The Greek and Latin, as given in the revised version of the Romanists, is, "To the end that my glory may sing to thee, and I may not regret." The Syriac is, "Therefore will I sing glory unto thee, and not be silent." "Glory" may be understood of the tongue or of the soul, as hinted in the margin.

is about his soul, his spirit, his better part. Note, Our outward afflictions should increase our concern for our souls. Many think while they are perplexed about their worldly affairs, and Providence multiplies their cares about them, they may be excused if they neglect their souls; whereas, the greater hazard our lives and secular interests lie at, the more we are concerned to look to our souls, that, though the outward man perish, the inward man may suffer no damage, 2 Cor. iv. 16; and that we may keep possession of our souls when we can keep possession of nothing else, Lu. xxi. 19. Secondly. He thinks the best he can do for his soul is to commit it into the hand of God, and lodge that great trust with him. He had prayed, ver. 4, to be plucked out of the net of outward trouble; but as not insisting upon that, God's will be done, he presently lets fall that petition, and commits the spirit, the inward man, into God's hand: Lord, however it goes with me as to my body, let it go well with my soul. Note, It is the wisdom and duty of every one of us solemnly to commit our spirits into the hands of God, to be sanctified by his grace, devoted to his honour, employed in his service, and fitted for his kingdom. That which encourageth us to commit our spirits into the hand of God is, that he hath not only created, but redeemed them; the particular redemptions of the Old Testament church, and the Old Testament saints, were typical of our redemption by Jesus Christ, Gen. xlviii. 16. The redemption of the soul is so precious that it must have ceased for ever if Christ had not undertaken it; but by redeeming our souls he has not only acquired an additional right and title to them, which obligeth us to commit them to him as his own, but hath shewed the extraordinary kindness and concern he hath for them, which encourageth us to commit them to him to be preserved to his heavenly kingdom, 2 Tim. i. 12. "Thou hast redeemed it, O Lord God of truth:" redeemed it according to a promise which thou wilt be true to.

3. He disclaimed all confederacy with those that made an arm of flesh their confidence; ver. 6, "I have hated them that regard lying vanities." Idolaters, (so some,) who expect aid from false gods, which are vanity and a lie; astrologers, and those that give heed to them, (so others.) David abhorred the use of enchantments and divinations; consulted not, nor ever took notice of the flight of birds, or entrails of beasts. Good omens or bad omens, they are lying vanities; and he not only did not regard them himself, but hated the wickedness of those that did. He trusted in God only, and not in any creature; his interest in the court or country, his retreats or strongholds, even Goliath's sword itself, these were lying vanities, which he could not depend upon, but trusted in the Lord only: see Ps. xl. 4; Jer. xvii. 5.

4. He comforted himself with his hope in God, and made himself not only easy, but cheerful with it, ver. 7. Having relied on God's mercy, he will be glad and rejoice in it. And those know not how to value their hope in God who cannot find joy enough in that hope to balance their grievances, and silence their griefs.

5. He encouraged himself in this hope with the experiences he had had of late and formerly of God's goodness to him, which he mentions to the glory of God. He that has delivered, doth and will. 1st. God had taken notice of his afflictions, and all the circumstances of them. "Thou hast considered my trouble," with wisdom to suit relief to it; with condescension and compassion, regarding the low estate of thy servant. 2nd. He had observed the temper of his spirit, and the workings of his heart under his afflictions; "Thou hast known my soul in adversities," with a tender concern and care for it. God's eye is upon our souls when we are in trouble, to see whether they be humbled for sin, submissive to the will of God, and bettered by the affliction. If the soul, when cast down under affliction has been lifted up to him in true devotion, he knows it. 3rd. He had rescued him out of the hands of Saul, when he had him safe enough in Keilah; 1 Sam. xxxiii. 7, "Thou hast not shut me up into the hand of the enemy," but set me at liberty, in a large room, where I may shift for my own safety, ver. 8. Christ's using these words, ver. 5, upon the cross, may warrant us to apply all this to Christ, who trusted in his Father, and was supported and delivered by him, and, because he humbled himself, highly exalted; which it is proper to think of when we sing these verses, as also therein to acknowledge the experience we have had of God's gracious presence with us in our troubles, and to encourage ourselves to trust in him for the future.

9 Have mercy upon me, O LORD, for I am in trouble:
Mine eye is consumed with grief,
Yea, my soul and my belly.
10 For my life is spent with grief,
And my years with sighing:
My strength faileth because of mine iniquity,
And my bones are consumed.
11 I was a reproach among all mine enemies,
But especially among my neighbours,
And a fear to mine acquaintance:
They that did see me without fled from me.
12 I am forgotten as a dead man out of mind:
I am like a broken vessel.
13 For I have heard the slander of many:
Fear was on every side:
While they took counsel together against me,
They devised to take away my life
14 But I trusted in thee, O LORD:
I said, Thou art my God.
15 My times are in thy hand:
Deliver me from the hand of mine enemies,
And from them that persecute me.
16 Make thy face to shine upon thy servant:
Save me for thy mercies' sake.
17 Let me not be ashamed, O LORD; for I have called upon [thee:
Let the wicked be ashamed,
And let them be silent in the grave

18 Let the lying lips be put to silence;
Which speak grievous things proudly
And contemptuously against the righteous

In the foregoing verses David had appealed to God's righteousness, and pleaded his relation to him and dependence on him; here he appeals to his mercy, and pleads the greatness of his misery, which made his case the proper object of that mercy. Observe,

First. The complaint he makes of his trouble and distress; ver. 9, "Have mercy upon me, O Lord, for I am in trouble," and need thy mercy. The remembrance he makes of his condition is not much unlike some even of Job's complaints.

1. His troubles had fixed a very deep impression upon his mind, and made him a man of sorrows. So great was his grief, that his very soul was consumed with it, and his life spent with it, and he was continually sighing, ver. 9, 10. Herein he was a type of Christ, who was intimately acquainted with grief, and often in tears. We may guess by David's complexion, which was ruddy and sanguine, by his genius for music, and by his daring enterprises in his early days, that his natural temper was both cheerful and stout, that he was apt enough to be merry, and not at all to lay trouble to his heart; and yet here we see what he is brought to: he has almost wept out his eyes, and sighed away his breath. Let those that are airy and gay take heed of running into extremes, and never set sorrow at defiance; God can find out ways to make them melancholy if they will not otherwise learn to be serious.

2. His body was affected with the sorrows of his mind; ver. 10, "My strength fails, my bones are consumed," and all "because of mine iniquity." As to Saul, and the quarrel he had with him, he could confidently insist upon his righteousness; but, as it was an affliction God laid upon him, he owns he had deserved it, and freely confesseth his iniquity to have been the procuring cause of all his trouble; and the sense of sin touched him to the quick, and wasted him more than all his calamities.

3. His friends were unkind, and became shy of him. He was a fear to his acquaintance; when they saw him they fled from him, ver. 11. They durst not harbour him, not give him any assistance, not shew him any countenance, not so much as be seen in his company, for fear of being brought into trouble by it, now Saul had proclaimed him traitor, and outlawed him. They saw how dear Ahimelech the priest had paid for aiding and abetting him, though ignorantly; and therefore, though they could not but own he had a great deal of wrong done him, yet they had not the courage to appear for him. He was forgotten by them as a dead man out of mind, ver. 12, and looked upon with contempt as a broken vessel. They that shewed him all possible respects when he was in honour at court, now he was fallen into disgrace, though unjustly, were strange to him. Such swallow friends the world is full of, that are gone in winter. Let those that fall on the losing side not think it strange if they be thus deserted, but make sure a Friend in heaven that will not fail them, and make use of him.

4. His enemies were unjust in their censures of him. They would not have persecuted him as they did, if they had not first represented him as an ill man; he was a reproach among all his enemies, but especially among his neighbours, ver. 11. Those that had been the witnesses of his integrity, and could not but be convinced in their consciences that he was an honest man, yet were the most forward to represent him quite otherwise, that they might curry favour with Saul. Thus he heard the slander of many; every one had a stone to throw at him, because fear was on every side; that is, they durst not do otherwise, for he that would not join with his neighbours to abuse David was looked upon as disaffected to Saul. Thus the best of men have been put under the worst characters by those that resolved to give them the worst treatment.

5. His life was aimed at, and he went in continual peril of it. That fear was on every side, and he knew that, whatever counsel his enemies took against him, the design was not to take away his liberty, but to take away his life, ver. 13; a life so valuable, so useful, to the good services of which all Israel owed so much, and which was never forfeited. Thus in all the plots of the Pharisees and Herodians against Christ, still the design was to take away his life, such is the enmity and cruelty of the serpent's seed.

Secondly. His confidence in God in the midst of these troubles. Every thing looked black and dismal round about him, and threatened to drive him to despair; "But I trusted in thee, O Lord," ver. 14, and that kept me from sinking. His enemies robbed him of his reputation among men, but they could not rob him of his comfort in God, because they could not drive him from his confidence in God. Two things he comforted himself with in his straits, and he went to God and pleaded them with him: 1. "Thou art my God;" that is, I have chosen thee for mine, and thou hast promised to be mine. And if he be ours, and we can by faith call him so, it is enough, when we can call nothing else ours. "Thou art my God," and therefore to whom shall I go for relief but to thee? They need not be straitened in their prayers who can plead this; for if God undertake to be our God he will do that for us which will answer the compass and vast extent of that engagement. 2. "My times are in thy hand." Join this with the former, and it makes the comfort complete. If God have our times in his hand, he can help us; and if he be our God, he will help us, and then what can discourage us? It is a great support to those who have God for their God, that their times are in his hand, and he will be sure to order and dispose of them for the best, to all those who commit their spirits also into his hand, to suit them to their times, as David here, ver. 5. The time of life is in God's hands, to lengthen or shorten, embitter or sweeten, as he pleaseth, according to the counsel of his will. Our times, that is, all events that are concerning us, and the timing of them, these are at God's dispose. They are not in our own hands; for the way of man is not in himself, not in our friends' hands, nor in our enemies' hands, but in God's, every man's judgment proceedeth from him. David doth not in his prayers prescribe to God, but subscribe to him, "Lord, my times are in thy hand," and I am well pleased that they are so, they could not be in a better hand. "Thy will be done."

Thirdly. His petitions to God. In this faith and confidence,

1. He prays that God would deliver him out of the hand of his enemies, ver. 15, and save him, ver. 16, and this for his mercies' sake, and not for any merit of his own. Our opportunities are in God's hand, (so some read it,) and therefore he knows how to choose the best and fittest time for our deliverance, and we must be willing to wait that time. When David had Saul at his mercy in the cave, those about him said, This is the time in which God will deliver thee, 1 Sam. xxiv. 4. No, saith David, the time is not come for my deliverance, till it can be wrought without sin, and I will wait for that time; or it is God's time, and that is the best time.

2. That God would give him the comfort of his favour in the meantime; ver. 16, "Make thy face to shine upon thy servant." Let me have the comfortable tokens and evidences of thy favour to me, and that shall put gladness in my heart in the midst of all my griefs.

3. That his prayers to God might be answered, and his hopes in God accomplished; ver. 17, "Let me not be ashamed" of my hopes and prayers, "for I xxxi. 1. The first verse of this psalm is appended to the Te Deum, which consists partly of a general confession of faith and partly of a collection of Scripture phrases very much borrowed from the psalms.

xxxi. 3. For the second clause the Syriac has, "For thy name's sake, O Lord, comfort me." The Latin is, "For thy name's sake thou wilt lead me and nourish me." So the Greek. The ordinary version is better.

xxxi. 6. The Syriac is, "Thou hast hated them that observe false objects of worship," or, as Oliver renders it, "Thou hatest all them that regard vain superstitions," which is less literal. The Greek and Latin are, "Thou hatest them that vainly observe vanities." The Chaldee is the only ancient authority for the present Hebrew text in the first person, "I have hated."

xxxi. 7. The expression, "I will be glad," is one of many which have been misunderstood and misapplied. There is no emphasis upon the "will," which is in truth only an antiquated representative of have called upon thee," who never saidst to thy people, Seek in vain, and hope in vain.

4. That shame and silence might be the portion of wicked people, and particularly of his enemies. They were confident of their success against David, and that they should run him down and ruin him. Lord, saith he, "let them be made ashamed" of that confidence by the disappointment of their expectations; as those that opposed the building of the wall about Jerusalem, when it was finished, were much cast down in their own eyes, Neh. vi. 16. "Let them be silent in the grave." Note, Death will silence the rage and clamour of cruel persecutors whom reason would not silence. In the grave "the wicked cease from troubling." Particularly he prays for, that is, he prophesies, the silencing of those that reproach and calumniate the people of God; ver. 18, "Let lying lips be put to silence, that speak grievous things proudly and contemptuously against the righteous." This is a very good prayer, 1st. Which we have often occasion to put up to God; for they that set their mouth against the heavens, commonly fall foul on the heirs of heaven. Religion, and the strict and serious professors of it, are every where spoken against, First. With a great deal of malice. They speak grievous things, on purpose to vex them, and hoping with what they say to do them a real mischief. They speak hard things, (so the word is,) which bear hard upon them, and by which they hope to fasten indelible characters of infamy upon them. Secondly. With a great deal of falsehood. They are lying lips, taught by the father of lies, and serving his interest. Thirdly. With a great deal of scorn and disdain. They speak "proudly and contemptuously," as if the righteous, whom God has honoured, were the most despicable people in the world, and not worthy to be set with the dogs of their flock. One would think they thought it no sin to tell a deliberate lie, if it may but serve to expose a good man either to hatred or contempt. "Hear, O our God, for we are despised." 2nd. We may pray it in faith; for these lying lips shall be put to silence. God has many ways of doing it. Sometimes he convinceth the consciences of those that reproach his people, and turns their hearts; sometimes by his providence he visibly confutes their calumnies, and brings forth the righteousness of his people as the light. However, there is a day coming when God will convince ungodly sinners of the falsehood of all the hard speeches they have spoken against his people, and will execute judgment upon them, Jude 14, 15. Then shall this prayer be fully answered, and to that day we should have an eye in the singing of it; engaging ourselves likewise by well-doing, if possible, to silence the ignorance of foolish men, 1 Pet. ii. 15.

19 Oh how great is thy goodness,
Which thou hast laid up for them that fear thee;
Which thou hast wrought for them that trust in thee before the sons of men!
20 Thou shalt hide them in the secret of thy presence
From the pride of man:
Thou shalt keep them secretly in a pavilion
From the strife of tongues.
21 Blessed be the LORD:
For he hath shewed me his marvellous kindness
In a strong city.
22 For I said in my haste,
I am cut off from before thine eyes:
Nevertheless thou heardest the voice of my supplications
When I cried unto thee.
23 O love the LORD, all ye his saints:
For the LORD preserveth the faithful,
And plentifully rewardeth the proud doer.
24 Be of good courage, and he shall strengthen your heart,
All ye that hope in the LORD.

We have three things in these verses:

First. The believing acknowledgment which David makes of God's goodness to his people in general, ver. 19, 20.

1. God is good to all, but he is in a special manner good to Israel. His goodness to them is wonderful, and will be to eternity matter of admiration. "O how great is thy goodness!" How profound are the counsels of it; how rich are the treasures of it; how free and extensive are the communications of it! Those very persons whom men load with slanders God loads with benefits and honours. Those who are interested in this goodness are described to be such as fear God, and trust in him, that stand in awe of his greatness, and rely on his grace. This goodness is said to be laid up for them, and wrought for them. 1st. There is goodness laid up for them in the other world, an inheritance reserved in heaven, 1 Pet. i. 4; and there is a goodness wrought for them in this world, goodness wrought in them. There is enough in God's goodness both for the portion and inheritance of all his children, when they come to their full age, and for their maintenance and education during their minority. There is enough in bank, and enough in hand. 2nd. This goodness is laid up in his promise for all that fear God, to whom assurance is given that they shall want no good thing. But it is wrought in the actual performance of the promise for those that trust in him, that is, that by faith take hold of the promise, put it in suit, and draw out to themselves the benefit and comfort of it. If what is laid up for us in the treasures of the everlasting covenant be not wrought for us, it is our own fault, because we do not believe. But those that trust in God, as they have the comfort of his goodness in their own bosoms, so they have the credit of it, (and the credit of an estate goes far with some;) it is wrought for them before the sons of men. God's goodness to them puts an honour upon them, and rolls away their reproach; "for all that see them shall acknowledge them, that they are the seed which the Lord hath blessed," Isa. lxi. 9.

2. God preserveth man and beast; but he is in a special manner the protector of his own people, ver. 20. "Thou shalt hide them." As his goodness is hid and reserved for them, so they are hid and preserved for it. The saints are God's hidden ones. See here, 1st. The danger they are in, which ariseth from the pride of man, and from the strife of tongues. Proud men insult over them, and would trample on them, and tread them down; contentious men pick quarrels with them; and when tongues are at strife good people oftentimes go by the worst. The pride of man endangers their liberty. The strife of tongues in perverse disputings endangers truth. But, 2nd. See the defence they are under; "Thou shalt hide them in the secret of thy presence; in a pavilion. God's providence shall keep them safe from the malice of their enemies. He has many ways of sheltering them. When Baruch and Jeremiah were sought for, the Lord hid them, Jer. xxxvi. 26. God's grace shall keep them safe from the evil of the judgments that are abroad; to them they have no sting: they shall be hid in the day of the Lord's anger, for there is no anger at them. His comforts shall keep them easy and cheerful; and his sanctuary, where they have communion with him, shelters them from the fiery darts of terror and temptation; and the mansions in his house above shall be shortly, shall be eternally, their hiding-place from all danger and fear.

Secondly. The thankful returns which David makes for God's goodness to him in particular, ver. 21, 22. Having admired God's goodness to all the saints, he here owns how good he had found him.

1. "Without were fightings;" but God had wonderfully preserved his life. "He hath shewed me his marvellous lovingkindness;" that is, he hath given me an instance of his care of me, and favour to me, beyond what I could have expected. God's lovingkindness to his people, all things considered, is wonderful; but some instances of it, even in this world, are in a special manner marvellous in their eyes; as this here, when God preserved David from the sword of Saul in caves and woods, as safe as if he had been in a strong city. In Keilah, that strong city, God shewed him great mercy, both in making him an instrument to rescue the inhabitants out of the hands of the Philistines, and then in rescuing him from the same men who would have ungratefully delivered him up into the hand of Saul, 1 Sam. xxiii. 5, 12. This was marvellous lovingkindness indeed, upon which he writes with wonder and thankfulness, "Blessed be the Lord." Special preservations call for particular thanksgivings.

2. "Within were fears;" but God was better to him than his fears, ver. 22. He here keeps an account, 1st. Of his own folly in distrusting God, which he acknowledgeth to his shame, that though he had express promises to build upon, and great experience of God's care concerning him in many straits, yet he had entertained this hard and jealous thought of God, and could not forbear telling it him to his face, "I am cut off from before thine eyes;" that is, thou hast quite forsaken me, and I must not expect to be looked upon or regarded by thee any more. "I shall one day perish by the hand of Saul," and so be cut off before thine eyes, be ruined while thou lookest on, 1 Sam. xxvii. 1. This he said 'in his flight,' (so some read it,) which notes the distress of his affairs. Saul was just at his back, and ready to seize him, which made the temptation strong. "In his haste," (so we read it,) which notes the disturbance and discomposure of his mind, which made the temptation surprising, so that it found him off his guard. Note, It is a common thing to speak amiss when we speak in haste, and without consideration; but what we speak amiss in haste we must repent of at leisure, particularly that which we have spoken distrustfully of God. 2nd. Of God's wonderful goodness to him notwithstanding. Though his faith failed, God's promise did not: "Thou heardest the voice of my supplication" for all this. He mentions his own unbelief as a foil to God's fidelity, serving to make his lovingkindness the more marvellous, the more illustrious. When we have thus distrusted God, he might justly have taken us at our word, and brought our fears upon us, as he did on Israel, Num. xiv. 28; Isa. lxvi. 4. But he has pitied and pardoned us, and our unbelief has not made his promise and grace of none effect; for he knows our frame.

Thirdly. The exhortation and encouragement which he hereupon gives to all the saints, ver. 23, 24.

1. He would have them set their love on God; ver. 23, "O love the Lord, all ye his saints." Those that have their own hearts full of love to God cannot but desire that others also may be in love with him; for in his favour there is no need to fear a rival. It is the character of the saints that they do love God; and yet they must be still called upon to love him, to love him more, and love him better, and give proofs of their love. We must love him not only for his goodness, because he "preserveth the faithful," but for his justice, because he "plentifully rewardeth the proud doer" (who would ruin those whom he preserves) according to their pride. Some take it in a good sense; 'He plentifully rewardeth the magnificent' (or excellent) 'doer,' that is daringly good, whose heart, like Jehoshaphat's, is "lifted up in the ways of the Lord." He rewardeth him that doth well, but plentifully rewardeth him that doth excellently well.

2. He would have them set their hope in God; ver. 24, "Be of good courage," have a good heart on it, whatever difficulties or dangers you may meet with; the God you trust in shall by that trust strengthen your heart. They that hope in God have reason to be of good courage, and let their hearts be strong, for as nothing truly evil can befall them, so nothing truly good for them shall be wanting to them.

In singing this, we should animate ourselves and one another to proceed and persevere in our Christian course, whatever threatens us, and whoever frowns upon us.

PSALM XXXII.

This psalm, though it speak not of Christ, as many of the psalms hitherto we have met with have done, yet it has a great deal of gospel in it. The apostle tells us, that David in this psalm "describes the blessedness of the man unto whom God imputeth righteousness without works," Rom. iv. 6. We have here a summary, I. Of gospel grace in the pardon of sin, ver. 1, 2; in Divine protection, ver. 7; and Divine conduct, ver. 8. II. Of gospel duty; to confess sin, ver. 3—5; to pray, ver. 6; to govern ourselves well, ver. 9, 10; and to rejoice in God, ver. 11. And the way to obtain these privileges is to make conscience of these duties, which we ought to think of,—of the former for our comfort, of the latter for our quickening,—when we sing this psalm. Grotius thinks it was designed to be sung on the day of atonement.

A Psalm of David, Maschil.

BLESSED is he whose transgression is forgiven,
Whose sin is covered. [iniquity,
2 Blessed is the man unto whom the LORD imputeth not
And in whose spirit there is no guile.
3 When I kept silence, my bones waxed old
Through my roaring all the day long.
4 For day and night thy hand was heavy upon me:
My moisture is turned into the drought of summer. Selah.
5 I acknowledged my sin unto thee,
And mine iniquity have I not hid
I said I will confess my transgressions unto the LORD;

"shall." The psalmist does not say he wills it, but that it will so be, according to the ordinary principle of the future tense in grammar.

xxxi. 8. For "set my feet in a large room," say "in a wide place;" i.e., God gave him free space for movement.

xxxi. 9. The psalmist speaks of his eye, his soul, and his belly as consumed with grief. The reason is evident: grief makes the countenance sad, the soul depressed, and the heart sore. The word "belly" is here used to denote what we should call the heart, or it may stand generally for the whole body, which soon shows as well as feels the effects of grief.

xxxi. 10. For "iniquity" some read "affliction," which is to be preferred.

xxxi. 17. The Douay translates with customary severity: "Let the impious be ashamed and brought down into hell." The Greek and Latin are almost as ruthless, though sheol, hades, and infernum never mean a place of torment as such.

And thou forgavest the iniquity of my sin. Selah.
6 For this shall every one that is godly pray unto thee
In a time when thou mayest be found:
Surely in the floods of great waters
They shall not come nigh unto him

This psalm is entitled Maschil, which some take to be only the name of the tune to which it was set and was to be sung. But others think it is significant. Our margin reads it, 'A psalm of David giving instruction.' And there is nothing in which we have more need of instruction than in the nature of true blessedness, wherein it consists, and the way that leads to it—what we must do that we may be happy. There are divers things in which these verses instruct us. In general, we are here taught that our happiness consists in the favour and grace of God, and not in the wealth of this world; in spiritual blessings, and not the good things of this world. When David saith, Ps. i. 1, "Blessed is the man that walketh not in the counsel of the ungodly;" and, Ps. cxix. 1, "Blessed are the undefiled in the way," the meaning is, this is the character of the blessed man, and he that has not this character cannot expect to be happy; but when it is here said, "Blessed is the man whose iniquity is forgiven," the meaning is, this is the ground of his blessedness, this is that fundamental privilege from which all the other ingredients of his blessedness flow. In particular, we are here instructed,

First. Concerning the nature of the pardon of sin. This is that we all need, and are undone without, and we are therefore concerned to be very solicitous and inquisitive about it. 1. It is the forgiving of transgression. Sin is the transgression of the law: upon our repentance the transgression is forgiven; that is, the obligation to punishment, which we lay under by virtue of the sentence of the law, is vacated and cancelled; it is lifted off, (so some read it,) that by the pardon of it we may be eased of a burthen, a heavy burthen, like a load on the back that makes us stoop, or a load on the stomach that makes us sick, or a load on the spirits that makes us sink. The remission of sins gives rest and relief to those that were weary and heavy laden, Mat. xi. 28. 2. It is the covering of sin, as nakedness is covered, that it may not appear to our shame, Rev. iii. 18. One of the first symptoms of guilt in our first parents was blushing at their own nakedness. Sin makes us loathsome in the sight of God, and utterly unfit for communion with him, and when conscience is awakened it makes us loathsome to ourselves too; but when it is pardoned, it is covered with the robe of Christ's righteousness, like the coats of skins wherewith God clothed Adam and Eve, (an emblem of the remission of sins,) so that God is no longer displeased with us, but perfectly reconciled. They are not covered from us; no, "my sin is ever before me;" nor covered from God's omniscience, but from his vindictive justice. When he pardons sin he remembers it no more, he casts it behind his back; it shall be sought for, and not found. And the sinner, being thus reconciled to God, begins to be reconciled to himself. 3. It is the not imputing of iniquity, not laying it to the sinner's charge, not proceeding against him for it, according to the strictness of the law, not dealing with him as he deserves. The righteousness of Christ being imputed to us, and we made the righteousness of God in him, our iniquity is not imputed, God having laid upon him the iniquity of us all, and made him sin for us. Observe, It is God's act not to impute iniquity; for he is the Judge. "It is God that justifieth."

Secondly. Concerning the character of those whose sins are pardoned: "in whose spirit there is no guile." He doth not say there is no guilt, (for who is there that lives and sins not?) but no guile; that doth not dissemble with God in his professions of repentance and faith, and in his prayers for peace or pardon; but in all these is sincere, and means as he saith; that doth not repent with a purpose to sin again, and then sin with a purpose to repent again, as a learned interpreter glosseth upon it. Those that design honestly, that are really what they profess to be, those are the Israelites indeed, in whom is no guile.

Thirdly. Concerning the happiness of a justified state: "Blessednesses are to the man whose iniquity is forgiven," all manner of blessings, sufficient to make him completely blessed. That is taken away which incurred the curse, and obstructed the blessing, and then God will pour out blessings till there be no room to receive them. The forgiveness of sin is that article of the covenant which is the reason and ground of all the rest: "for I will be merciful to their unrighteousness," Heb. viii. 12.

Fourthly. Concerning the uncomfortable condition of an unhumbled sinner, that sees his guilt, but is not yet brought to make a penitent confession of it. This David describes very pathetically from his own sad experience; ver. 3, 4, "While I kept silence, my bones waxed old." Those may be said to keep silence that stifle their convictions, that when they cannot but see the evil of sin, and their danger by reason of it, ease themselves by not thinking of it and diverting their minds to something else, as Cain to the building of a city; that cry not when God binds them; that will not unburthen their consciences by a penitent confession, nor seek for peace, as they ought, by faithful and fervent prayer; and that choose rather to pine away in their iniquities, than to take the method which God has appointed of finding rest for their souls. Let such expect that their smothered convictions will be a fire in their bones, and the wounds of sin not opened will fester and grow intolerably painful. If conscience be seared, the case is so much the more dangerous; but if it be startled and awake, it will be heard; the hand of Divine wrath will be felt lying heavy upon the soul, and the anguish of the spirit will affect the body. To that degree David experienced it, so that when he was young his bones waxed old, and even his silence made him roar all the day long, as if he had been under some grievous pain and distemper of body; when really the cause of all his uneasiness was the struggle he felt in his own bosom between his convictions and his corruptions. Note, "He that covers his sins shall not prosper." Some inward trouble is required in repentance, but there is much worse in impenitency.

Fifthly. Concerning the true and only way to peace of conscience. We are here taught to confess our sins, that they may be forgiven; to declare, that we may be justified. This course David took: "I acknowledged my sin unto thee," and no longer hide mine iniquity, ver. 5. Note, Those that would have the comfort of the pardon of their sins, must take shame to themselves by a penitent confession of them. We must confess the fact of sin, and be particular in it,—thus and thus have I done; confess the fault of sin, aggravate it, and lay load upon ourselves for it,—I have done very wickedly; confess the justice of the punishment we have been under for it,—"The Lord is just in all that is brought upon us;" and that we deserve much worse,—"I am no more worthy to be called thy son." We must confess sin with shame and holy blushing, with fear and holy trembling.

Sixthly. Concerning God's readiness to pardon sin to those who truly repent of it. "I said, I will confess;" that is, I sincerely resolved upon it, hesitated no longer, but came to a point, that I would make a free and ingenuous confession of my sins, and immediately "thou forgavest the iniquity of my sin," and gavest me the comfort of the pardon in mine own conscience; presently I found rest to my soul. Note, God is more ready to pardon sin, upon our repentance, than we are to repent in order to the obtaining of pardon. It was with much ado that David was here brought to confess his sins: he was put to the rack before he was brought to it, ver. 3, 4; he held out long, and would not surrender till it came to the last extremity; but when he did offer to surrender, see how quickly, how easily, he obtained good terms! I did but say, I will confess, and thou forgavest. Thus the father of the prodigal saw his returning son "when he was yet afar off," and ran to meet him with the kiss that sealed his pardon. What an encouragement is this to poor penitents, and what an assurance doth it give us, that "if we confess our sins," we shall find God not only "faithful and just," but gracious and kind, "to forgive us our sins!"

Seventhly. Concerning the good use that we are to make of the experience David had had of God's readiness to forgive his sins; ver. 6, "For this shall every one that is godly pray unto thee." Note, 1. All godly people are praying people. As soon as ever Paul was converted, "behold he prays," Acts ix. 11. You may as soon find a living man without breath, as a living Christian without prayer. 2. The instructions given us concerning the happiness of those whose sins are pardoned, and the easiness of obtaining the pardon, should engage and encourage us to pray, and particularly to pray, "God be merciful to us sinners." For this shall every one that is well inclined be earnest with God in prayer, and come boldly to the throne of grace, with hopes to obtain mercy, Heb. iv. 16. 3. Those that would speed in prayer, must seek the Lord in a time when he will be found. When he doth by his providence call them to seek him, and by his Spirit stir them up to seek him, they must go speedily to seek the Lord, Zec. viii. 21, and lose no time, lest death cut them off, and then it will be too late to seek him, Isa. lv. 6. "Behold, now is the accepted time," 2 Cor. vi. 2. 4. Those that are sincere and abundant in prayer will find the benefit of it when they are in trouble. "Surely in the floods of great waters," which are very threatening, "they shall not come nigh them" to terrify them, or create them any uneasiness, much less shall they overwhelm them. Those that have God "nigh unto them in all that which they call upon him for," as all upright, penitent, praying people have, are so guarded, so advanced, that no waters, no, not great waters, no, not floods of them, can come nigh them to hurt them. As the temptations of the wicked one touch them not, 1 Jno. v. 18, so neither do the troubles of this evil world; these fiery darts of both kinds drop short of them.

7 Thou art my hiding place;
Thou shalt preserve me from trouble; [Selah
Thou shalt compass me about with songs of deliverance
8 I will instruct thee and teach thee in the way which thou
I will guide thee with mine eye [shalt go
9 Be ye not as the horse,
Or as the mule, which have no understanding:
Whose mouth must be held in with bit and bridle,
Lest they come near unto thee.
10 Many sorrows shall be to the wicked:
But he that trusteth in the LORD, mercy shall compass him about.
11 Be glad in the LORD, and rejoice, ye righteous:
And shout for joy, all ye that are upright in heart

David is here improving the experience he had had of the comfort of pardoning mercy.

First. He speaks to God, and professeth his confidence in him and expectation from him, ver. 7; having tasted the sweetness of Divine grace to a penitent sinner, he cannot doubt of the continuance of that grace to a praying saint; and that in that grace he should find both safety and joy. 1. Safety. "Thou art my hiding place;" when by faith I have recourse to thee, I see all the reason in the world to be easy, and to think myself out of the reach of any real evil. "Thou shalt preserve me from trouble," from the sting of it, and from the strokes of it, as far as is good for me. Thou shalt preserve me from such trouble as I was in while I kept silence, ver. 3. When God has pardoned our sins, if he leave us to ourselves, we shall soon run as far in debt again as ever, and plunge ourselves again into the same gulf; and, therefore, when we have received the comfort of our remission, we must fly to the grace of God to be preserved from returning to folly again, and having our hearts again hardened through the deceitfulness of sin. God keeps his people from trouble by keeping them from sin. 2. Joy. "Thou shalt" not only deliver me, but "compass me about with songs of deliverance;" which way soever I look I shall see occasion to rejoice and to praise God, and my friends also shall compass me about in the great congregation, to join with me in songs of praise: they shall join their songs of deliverance with me. As every one that is godly shall pray with me, so they shall give thanks with me.

Secondly. He turns his speech to the children of men; being himself converted, he doth what he can to strengthen his brethren, Lu. xxii. 32; ver. 8, "I will instruct thee," whoever thou art that desirest instruction, "and teach thee in the way which thou shalt go." Thus, in another of his penitential psalms, he resolves that, when God had restored to him the joy of his salvation, he would teach transgressors his ways, and do what he could to convert sinners to God, as well as to comfort those that were converted, Ps. li. 12, 13; when Solomon became a penitent, he presently became a preacher, Eccl. i. 1. Those are best able to teach others the grace of God who have themselves had the experience of it; and those who are themselves taught of God ought to tell others what he has done for their souls, Ps. lxvi. 16, and so teach them. "I will guide thee with mine eye." Some apply it to God's conduct and direction. He teacheth us by his word, and guides us with his eye; that is, by the secret intimations of his will in the hints and turns of providence, which he enables his people to understand and take direction from; as a master makes a servant know his mind by a wink of his eye. When Christ turned and looked upon Peter, he guided him with his eye. But it is rather to be taken as David's promise to those who sat under his instruction, his own children and family especially. 'I will counsel thee, mine eye shall be upon thee,' so the margin reads it. I will give thee the best counsel I can, and then observe whether thou takest it or no. Those that are taught in the word should be under the constant inspection of those that teach them. Spiritual guides must be overseers.

In this application of the foregoing doctrine concerning the blessedness of those whose sins are pardoned, here is a word to sinners, and a word to saints; and this is rightly dividing the word of truth, and giving to each their portion.

1. Here is a word of caution to sinners, and a good reason given for it. 1st xxxi. 20. "The secret of thy presence," i.e., the secret place or sanctuary where thy presence is revealed. The first and third clauses of the verse are parallel, and mean much the same thing.

xxxi. 23. For "preserveth the faithful," the Hebrew may be rendered "who keepeth truth," or faithfulness; so "proud doer" may be translated "doer of pride." The sense will in the end accord with that of the common version.

xxxii. Title. "Maschil" is usually explained "instructive" or "didactic." The psalm has been supposed to have been written after the affair of David with Uriah.

xxxii. 3. The sense is, "When I kept silence my bones were consumed, through my groaning all the day." While he refrained from speaking, his inward griefs and audible groans took away his strength.

xxxii. 9. The Syriac is, "Be not like a horse, and like a mule, which do not understand, which must be restrained with a bridle from their youth, and do not come near unto him." This is obscure in

The caution is, not to be unruly and ungovernable; ver. 9, "Be ye not as the horse, or the mule, which have no understanding." When the psalmist would reproach himself for the sins he repented of, he compared himself to a beast before God, "So foolish have I been, and ignorant," Ps. lxxiii. 23; and therefore warns others not to be so. It is our honour and happiness that we have understanding, that we are capable of being governed by reason, and of reasoning with ourselves. Let us, therefore, use the faculties we have, and act rationally. The horse and mule must be managed with bit and bridle, lest they come near to us to do us a mischief; or, as some read it, that they may come near to us, to do us service, that they may obey us, Jas. iii. 3. Let us not be like them; that is, let us not be hurried by appetite and passion at any time, to go contrary to the dictates of right reason, and to our true interest. If sinners would be governed and determined by these, they would soon become saints, and would not go a step farther in their sinful courses. Where there is renewing grace, there is no need of the bit and bridle of restraining grace. 2nd. The reason for this caution is, because the way of sin, which we would persuade you to forsake, will certainly end in sorrow; ver. 10, "Many sorrows shall be to the wicked," which will not only spoil their vain and carnal mirth, and put an end to it, but will make them pay dear for it. Sin will have sorrow, if not repented of, everlasting sorrow. It was part of the sentence, "I will greatly multiply thy sorrows." Be wise for yourselves, therefore, and turn from your wickedness, that you may prevent those sorrows, those many sorrows.

2. Here is a word of comfort to saints, and a good reason given for that too. 1st. They are assured that if they will but trust in the Lord, and keep close to him, mercy shall compass them about on every side, ver. 10, so that they shall not depart from God, for that mercy shall keep them in, nor shall any real evil break in upon them, for that mercy shall keep it out. 2nd. They are, therefore, commanded to be glad in the Lord, and to rejoice in him, to that degree, as even to shout for joy, ver. 11. Let them be so transported with this holy joy as not to be able to contain themselves, and let them affect others with it, that they also may see that a life of communion with God is the most pleasant and comfortable life we can live in this world. This is that present bliss which the upright in heart, and they only, are entitled to and qualified for.

PSALM XXXIII.

This is a psalm of praise; it is probable David was the penman of it, but we are not told so, because God would have us look above the penmen of sacred writ, to that blessed Spirit that moved and guided them. The psalmist in this psalm, I. Calls upon the righteous to praise God, ver. 1—3. II. Furnisheth us with matter for praise. We must praise God, 1. For his justice, goodness, and truth, appearing in his word, and in all his works, ver. 4, 5. 2. For his power appearing in the work of creation, ver. 6—9. 3. For the sovereignty of his providence in the government of the world, ver. 10, 11; and again, ver. 13—17. 4. For the peculiar favour which he bears to his own chosen people, which encourageth them to trust in him, ver. 13; and again, ver. 18—22. We need not be far to seek for proper thoughts in singing this psalm, which so naturally speaks the pious affections of a devout soul towards God.

REJOICE in the LORD, O ye righteous:
For praise is comely for the upright.
2 Praise the LORD with harp:
Sing unto him with the psaltery and an instrument of ten strings.
3 Sing unto him a new song;
Play skilfully with a loud noise.
4 For the word of the LORD is right;
And all his works are done in truth.
5 He loveth righteousness and judgment:
The earth is full of the goodness of the LORD.
6 By the word of the LORD were the heavens made;
And all the host of them by the breath of his mouth
7 He gathereth the waters of the sea together as an heap:
He layeth up the depth in storehouses.
8 Let all the earth fear the LORD:
Let all the inhabitants of the world stand in awe of him.
9 For he spake, and it was done;
He commanded, and it stood fast.
10 The LORD bringeth the counsel of the heathen to nought:
He maketh the devices of the people of none effect.
11 The counsel of the LORD standeth for ever,
The thoughts of his heart to all generations.

Four things the psalmist expresseth in these verses:

First. The great desire he had that God might be praised. He did not think he did it so well himself, but that he wished others also might be employed in this work; the more the better in this concert, it is the liker to heaven. 1. Holy joy is the heart and soul of praise, and that is here pressed upon all good people; ver. 1, "Rejoice in the Lord, ye righteous," so the foregoing psalm concluded, and so this begins; for all our religious exercises should both begin and end with a holy complacency and triumph in God as the best of beings and best of friends. 2. Thankful praise is the breath and language of holy joy; and that also is here required of us, ver. 2, "Praise the Lord." Speak well of him, and give him the glory due to his name. 3. Religious songs are the proper expressions of thankful praise. Those are here required; ver. 3, "Sing unto him a new song," the best you have, not that which by frequent use is worn threadbare; but that which, being new, is most likely to move the affections. A new song for new mercies, and upon every new occasion, for those compassions which are new every morning. Music was then used by the appointment of David, with the temple songs, that they might be the better sung; and this also is here called for, ver. 2, "Sing unto him with the psaltery." Here is, 1st. A good rule for this duty; Do it "skilfully, and with a loud noise;" let it have the best both of head and heart; let it be done intelligently, and with a clear head; affectionately, and with a warm heart. 2nd. A good reason for this duty; "for praise is comely for the upright." It is greatly well-pleasing to God. The garments of praise add much to the comeliness which God puts upon his people; and it is an excellent ornament to our profession. It becomes the upright, whom God has put so much honour upon, to give honour to him. The upright praise God in a comely manner, for they praise him with their hearts; that is praising him with their glory. Whereas the praises of hypocrites are awkward and uncomely, like a parable in the mouth of fools, Pr. xxvi. 7.

Secondly. The high thoughts he had of God and of his infinite perfections, ver. 4, 5. God makes himself known to us, 1. In his Word; here put for all Divine revelation, all that which God at sundry times and in divers manners spake to the children of men; and that is all right; there is nothing amiss in it. His commands exactly agree with the rules of equity, and the eternal reasons of good and evil. His promises are all wise and good, and inviolably sure, and there is no iniquity in his threatenings, but even those are designed for our good, by deterring us from evil. God's word is right, and therefore all our deviations from it are wrong, and we are then in the right when we agree with it. 2. In his works; and those are all done in truth, all according to his counsels, which are called the scriptures of truth, Dan. x. 21. The copy in all God's works agrees exactly with the great original, the plan laid in the Eternal Mind, and varies not in the least jot. God has made it to appear in his works, 1st. That he is a God of inflexible justice. He loveth righteousness and judgment. There is nothing but righteousness in the sentence he passeth, and judgment in the execution of it. He never did or can do wrong to any of his creatures, but is always ready to right those that are wronged, and doth it with delight. He takes pleasure in those that are righteous. He is himself "the righteous Lord," and therefore "loveth righteousness." 2nd. That he is a God of inexhaustible bounty. "The earth is full of his goodness," that is, of the proofs and instances of it. The benign influences which the earth receives from above, and the fruits it is thereby enabled to produce, the provision that is made both for man and beast, and the common blessings with which all the nations of the earth are blessed, plainly speak that "the earth is full of his goodness;" the darkest, the coldest, the hottest, and the most dry and desert part of it not excepted. What pity is it that this earth, which is so full of God's goodness, should be so empty of his praises; and that, of the multitudes that live upon his bounty, there are so few that live to his glory!

Thirdly. The conviction he was under of the almighty power of God, evidenced in the creation of the world. We believe in God, and therefore we praise him as 'the Father almighty, maker of heaven and earth;' so we are here taught to praise him.

Observe, 1. How God made the world, and brought all things into being. 1st. How easily. All things were made by the word of the Lord, and by the breath of his mouth; Christ is the Word, the Spirit is the breath, so that God the Father made the world, as he rules it and redeems it, by his Son and Spirit. "He spake and he commanded," ver. 9, and that was enough, there needed no more. With men, saying and doing are two things; but it is not so with God: by the word and Spirit of God is the world was made, so was man, that little world. God said, "Let us make man; and he breathed into him the breath of life." By the word and Spirit the church is built, that new world, and grace wrought in the soul, that new man, that new creation. What cannot that power do which with a word made a world! 2nd. How effectually it was done, "and it stood fast." What God doth, he doth to purpose; he doth it, and it stands fast, ver. 9. Whatsoever God doth, it shall be for ever, Eccl. iii. 14. It is by virtue of that command to stand fast that they continue to this day according to God's ordinance, Ps. cxix. 91.

2. What he made. He made all things; but notice is here taken, 1st. Of the heavens, and the host of them, ver. 6. The visible heavens, and the sun, moon, and stars, their hosts; the highest heavens, and the angels their hosts. 2nd. Of the waters, and the treasures of them, ver. 7. The earth was at first covered with the water, and being heavier must of course subside and sink under it; but to shew from the very first that the God of nature is not tied to the ordinary method of nature, and the usual operations of his powers, with a word's speaking he "gathered the waters together on a heap," that the dry land might appear, yet left them not to continue on a heap, but "laid up the depth in storehouses;" not only in the flats where the seas make their beds, and in which they are locked up by the sand on the shore as in storehouses, but in secret subterraneous caverns, where they are hid from the eyes of all living, but were reserved as in a storehouse for that day when those fountains of the great deep were to be broken up; and they are still laid up there in store, for what use the great Master of the house knows best.

3. What use is to be made of this; ver. 8, "Let all the earth fear the Lord, and stand in awe of him;" that is, let all the children of men worship him, and give glory to him, Ps. xcv. 5, 6. The everlasting Gospel gives this as the reason why we must worship God, because he made the heaven, and the earth, and the sea, Rev. xiv. 6, 7. Let us all fear him; that is, dread his wrath and displeasure, and be afraid of having him our enemy, and standing it out against him. Let us not dare to offend him who, having this power, no doubt has all power in his hand. It is dangerous being at war with him who has the hosts of heaven for his armies, and the depths of the sea for his magazines; and therefore it is wisdom to desire conditions of peace: see Jer. v. 22.

Fourthly. The satisfaction he had in God's sovereignty and dominion, ver. 10, 11. He overrules all the counsels of men, and makes them, contrary to their intention, serviceable to his counsels. Come and see, with an eye of faith, God in the throne, 1. Frustrating the devices of his enemies. "He bringeth the counsel of the heathen to nought," so that what they imagine against him and his kingdom proves a vain thing, Ps. ii. 1; the counsel of Ahithophel is turned into foolishness, Haman's plot baffled. Though the design be laid never so deep, and the hopes raised upon it never so high, yet, if God saith, It shall not stand, neither shall it come to pass, it is all to no purpose. 2. Fulfilling his own decrees. "The counsel of the Lord standeth for ever." It is immutable in itself, for he is in one mind, and who can turn him? The execution of it may be opposed, but cannot in the least be obstructed by any created power. Through all the revolutions of time God never changeth his measures, but in every event, even that which to us is most surprising, the eternal counsel of God is fulfilled; nor can any thing prevent its being accomplished in its time. With what pleasure to ourselves may we, in singing this, give praise to God! How easy may this thought make us at all times, that God governs the world, that he did it in infinite wisdom before we were born, and will do it when we are silent in the dust!

12 Blessed is the nation whose God is the LORD;
And the people whom he hath chosen for his own inheritance.
13 The LORD looketh from heaven;
He beholdeth all the sons of men.
14 From the place of his habitation
He looketh upon all the inhabitants of the earth.

part. The Latin of the second clause is, "With a bit and bridle restrain the jaws of those who do not come near unto thee." The reference is to the fact that men should render willing and reasonable service, and not require compulsion.

xxiii. 2. The harp was a kind of lyre or guitar. The words rendered "with the psaltery and an instrument of ten strings" may be rendered simply "with a ten-stringed harp." Though some think two instruments are meant, it seems more probable that only one is intended in the second clause, and this explanation is favoured by the Syriac, the Latin, and the Greek.

xxxiii. 7. The Latin Vulgate is, "Gathering together the waters of the sea as in a bottle; laying up the deeps in storehouses." The Greek and the Syriac convey a similar idea, as also do the other ancient versions. It is most likely that the word we have rendered "heap" in our version was represented by a very similar Hebrew term, signifying a bottle.

15 He fashioneth their hearts alike;
He considereth all their works.
16 There is no king saved by the multitude of an host:
A mighty man is not delivered by much strength.
17 An horse is a vain thing for safety:
Neither shall he deliver any by his great strength.
18 Behold, the eye of the LORD is upon them that fear him,
Upon them that hope in his mercy;
19 To deliver their soul from death,
And to keep them alive in famine.
20 Our soul waiteth for the LORD:
He is our help and our shield.
21 For our heart shall rejoice in him,
Because we have trusted in his holy name.
22 Let thy mercy, O LORD, be upon us,
According as we hope in thee.

We are here taught to give God the glory,

First. Of his common providence towards all the children of men. Though he has endued man with understanding and freedom of will, yet he reserves to himself the government of him, and even of those very faculties by which he is qualified to govern himself.

1. The children of men are all under his eye, even their hearts are so; and all the motions and operations of their souls, which none know but they themselves, he knows better than they themselves, ver. 13, 14. Though the residence of God's glory is in the highest heavens, yet from thence he not only has a prospect of all the earth, but a particular inspection of all the inhabitants of the earth. He not only beholdeth them, but he looks upon them, he looks narrowly upon them; so the word here used is sometimes rendered; so narrowly that not the least thought can escape his observation. Atheists think that, because he dwells above in heaven, he cannot, or will not, take notice of what is done here in this lower world; but from thence, as high as it is, he sees us all, and all persons and things are naked and open before him.

2. Their hearts as well as their times are all in his hand. "He fashioneth their hearts." He made them at first, formed the spirit of each man within him, then when he brought him into being. Hence he is called the Father of spirits. And this is a good argument to prove that he perfectly knows them. The artist that made the clock can account for the motions of every wheel. David useth this argument, with application to himself, Ps. cxxxix. 1, 14. He still moulds the hearts of men, turns them as the rivers of water which way soever he pleaseth, to serve his own purposes; darkens or enlightens men's understandings, stiffens or bows their wills, according as he is pleased to make use of them. He that fashions men's hearts fashions them alike. It is in hearts as in faces; though there is a great difference, and such a variety as that no two faces are exactly of the same features, nor any two hearts exactly of the same temper, yet there is such a similitude, as that in some things all faces and all hearts agree, "as in water face answers to face," Pr. xxvii. 19. 'He fashions them together;' (so some read it;) as the wheels of a watch, though of different shapes, sizes, and motions, yet are all put together to serve one and the same purpose, so the hearts of men and their dispositions, however varying from each other, and seeming to contradict one another, yet are all overruled to serve the Divine purpose, which is one.

3. They, and all they do, are obnoxious to his judgment; for he "considereth all their works;" not only knows them, but weighs them, that he may "render to every man according to his works," in the day, in the world, of retribution, in the judgment, and to eternity.

4. All the powers of the creature have a dependence upon him, and are of no account, of no avail at all, without him, ver. 16, 17. It is much for the honour of God, that not only no force can prevail in opposition to him, but that no force can act but in dependence on him, and by a power derived from him. 1st. The strength of a king is nothing without God. No king is sacred by his royal prerogatives, or the authority with which he is invested; for the powers of that kind that be are ordained of God, and are what he makes them, and no more. David was a king, and a man of war, from his youth, and yet acknowledged God only to be his protector and saviour. 2nd. The strength of an army is nothing without God. "The multitude of an host" cannot secure those under whose command they act, unless God make them a security to them. A great army cannot be sure of victory, for when God pleaseth one shall chase a thousand. 3rd. The strength of a giant is nothing without God. "A mighty man," such as Goliath was, "is not delivered by his much strength," when his day comes to fall; neither the firmness nor activity of his body, neither the stoutness nor resolution of his mind, will stand him any stead, any farther than God is pleased to give him success. Let not the strong man, then, glory in his strength, but let us all strengthen ourselves in the Lord our God; go forth and go on in his strength. 4th. The strength of a horse is nothing without God; ver. 17, "A horse is a vain thing for safety." In war horses were then so highly accounted of, and so much depended on, that God forbade the kings of Israel to multiply horses, Deu. xvii. 16, lest they should be tempted to trust to them, and their confidence should thereby be taken off from God. David houghed the horses of the Syrians, 2 Sam. viii. 4; here he houghs all the horses in the world, by pronouncing a horse a vain thing for safety in the day of battle. If the war-horse be unruly and ill-managed, he may hurry his rider into danger, instead of carrying him out of danger. If he be killed under him, he may be his death, instead of saving his life. It is, therefore, our interest to make sure God's favour towards us, and then we may be sure of his power engaged for us, and need not fear whatever is against us.

Secondly. We are to give God the glory of his special grace. In the midst of his acknowledgments of God's providence, he pronounceth those blessed that have Jehovah for their God, who governs the world, and has wherewithal to help them in every time of need, while they were miserable who had this and the other Baal for their God, which was so far from being able to hear and help them, that it was itself senseless and helpless; ver. 12, "Blessed is the nation whose God is the Lord," even Israel, who had the knowledge of the true God, and were taken into covenant with him, and all others who own God for theirs, and are owned by him; for they also, whatever nation they are of, are of the spiritual seed of Abraham. 1. It is their wisdom that they take the Lord for their God, that they direct their homage and adoration there where it is due, and where the payment of it will not be in vain. 2. It is their happiness that they are the people whom God hath chosen for his own inheritance, whom he is pleased with, and honoured in, and whom he protects and takes care of; whom he cultivates and improves, as a man doth his inheritance, Deu. xxxii. 9. Now let us observe here, to the honour of Divine grace,

1st. The regard which God has to his people, ver. 18, 19. God beholds all the sons of men with an eye of observation, but his eye of favour and complacency is upon them that fear him; he looks upon them with delight, as the father on his children, as the bridegroom on his spouse, Isa. lxii. 5. While those that depend on arms and armies, on chariots and horses, perish in the disappointment of their expectations, God's people under his protection are safe, for "he shall deliver their soul from death," when there seems to be but a step between them and it. If he do not deliver the body from temporal death, yet he will deliver the soul from spiritual and eternal death; their souls, whatever happens, shall live and praise him, either in this world or in a better. From his bounty they shall be supplied with all necessaries: "he shall keep them alive in famine;" when others die for want, they shall live, which makes it a distinguishing mercy; when visible means fail, God will find out some way or other to supply them. He doth not say he will give them abundance, they have no reason either to desire it or to expect it, but he will keep them alive, they shall not starve; and when destroying judgments are abroad it ought to be reckoned a great favour, for it is a very sensible one, and very obliging, to have our lives given us for a prey. They that have the Lord for their God shall find him their help and their shield, ver. 20. In their difficulties he will assist them, they shall be helped over them, helped through them; in their dangers he will secure them, so that they shall not receive any real damage.

2nd. The regard which God's people have to him, and which we all ought to have in consideration of this. First. We must wait for God. We must attend the motions of his providence, and accommodate ourselves to them, and patiently expect the issue of them. Our souls must wait for him, ver. 20. We must not only in word and tongue profess a believing regard to God, but it must be inward and sincere, a secret and silent attendance on him. Secondly. We must rely on God, "hope in his mercy," in the goodness of his nature, though we have not an express promise to depend upon. They that fear God and his wrath, must hope in God and his mercy; for there is no flying from God, but by flying to him. These pious dispositions will not only consist together, but befriend each other; a holy fear of God, and yet at the same time a hope in his mercy. This is trusting in his holy name, ver. 21, in all that whereby he has made known himself to us for our encouragement to serve him. Thirdly. We must rejoice in God, ver. 21. And those do not truly rest on God, or do not know the unspeakable advantage they have by so doing, who do not rejoice in him at all times; because they that hope in God hope for an eternal fulness of joy in his presence. Fourthly. We must seek to him for that mercy which we hope in, ver. 22. Our expectations from God are not to supersede, but to quicken and encourage our applications to him; he will be sought unto for that which he has promised, and therefore the psalm concludes with a short but comprehensive prayer, "Let thy mercy, O Lord, be upon us;" let us always have the comfort and benefit of it, not according as we merit from thee, but "according as we hope in thee," that is, according to the promise which thou hast in thy Word given to us, and according to the faith which thou hast by thy Spirit and grace wrought in us. If in singing these verses we put forth a dependence upon God, and let out our desires towards him, we make melody with our hearts to the Lord.

PSALM XXXIV.

This psalm was penned upon a particular occasion, as appears by the title; and yet there is little in it peculiar to that occasion, but that which is general, both by way of thanksgiving to God and instruction to us. I. He praiseth God for the experience which he and others had had of his goodness, ver. 1—6. II. He encourageth all good people to trust in God, and to seek to him, ver. 7—10. III. He gives good counsel to us all as unto children, to take heed of sin, and to make conscience of our duty both to God and man, ver. 11—14. IV. To enforce this good counsel he shews God's favour to the righteous, and his displeasure against the wicked; in which he sets before us good and evil, the blessing and the curse, ver. 15—22. So that, in singing this psalm, we are both to give glory to God, and to teach and admonish ourselves and one another.

A Psalm of David, when he changed his behaviour before Abimelech; who drove him away, and he departed.

I WILL bless the LORD at all times:
His praise shall continually be in my mouth.
2 My soul shall make her boast in the LORD:
The humble shall hear thereof, and be glad.
3 O magnify the LORD with me,
And let us exalt his name together.
4 I sought the LORD, and he heard me,
And delivered me from all my fears.
5 They looked unto him, and were lightened:
And their faces were not ashamed.
6 This poor man cried, and the LORD heard him,
And saved him out of all his troubles.
7 The angel of the LORD encampeth round about them
And delivereth them. [that fear him,
8 O taste and see that the LORD is good:
Blessed is the man that trusteth in him.
9 O fear the LORD, ye his saints:
For there is no want to them that fear him.
10 The young lions do lack, and suffer hunger: [thing
But they that seek the LORD shall not want any good

The title of this psalm tells us both who penned it and upon what occasion it was penned. David being forced to run his country, which was made too hot for him by the rage of Saul, sought for shelter as near it as he could in the land of the Philistines; there it was soon discovered who he was, and he was brought before the king, who in the story is called Achish, his proper name, here Abimelech, his title. And for fear he should be treated as a spy, or one xxxiii. 10. The Greek adds to this verse, "and he setteth at nought the counsels of princes or of rulers." The Latin is similar.

xxxiii. 15. The words, "He fashioneth their hearts alike," must be understood to mean that God is the common author of human nature, the Creator of all alike, the framer of one as well as another, without exception. For "He considereth all their works," we may substitute "He understandeth," i.e., is acquainted with all their doings.

xxxiii. 17. Where our translators supply the word "any," the Syriac has "his rider," which is an appropriate expression. The Latin and Greek refer it to the deliverance of the horse itself.

xxxiv. Title. The Hebrew title refers the composition of this psalm to the crisis in David's history set forth in 1 Sam. xxi. 10, &c. The Latin and Greek give the same heading, almost verbatim. The king of Gath is called Achish in Samuel, not Abimelech. It has been said by Basil and other ancient writers, that Abimelech was the common title of the kings of Gath, and Achish the proper name of the one that came thither upon design, he feigned himself to be a mad man, (such there have been in every age, that even by idiots men might be taught to give God thanks for the use of their reason,) that Achish might dismiss him as a contemptible man, rather than take cognizance of him as a dangerous man. And it had the effect he desired; by this stratagem he escaped the hand that otherwise would have handled him roughly. Now, 1. We cannot justify David in this dissimulation; it ill became an honest man to feign himself to be what he was not, and a man of honour to feign himself to be a fool and a madman. If in sport we mimic those who have not so good an understanding as we think we have, we forget that God might have made their case ours. 2. Yet we cannot but admire at the composedness of his spirit, and how far he was from any change of that when he changed his behaviour. Even when he was in that fright, or rather in that danger only, his heart was so fixed, trusting in God, that even then he penned this excellent psalm, which hath as much in it of the marks of a calm, sedate spirit as any psalm in all the book; and there is something very nice too in the composure, for every verse begins with a several letter of the Hebrew alphabet in order. Happy they who can thus keep their temper, and keep their graces in exercise, even when they are tempted to change their behaviour. In this former part of the psalm,

First. David engageth and exciteth himself to praise God. Though it was his fault that he changed his behaviour, yet it was God's mercy that he escaped; and the mercy was so much the greater in that God did not deal with him according to the desert of his dissimulation; and we must in every thing give thanks. He resolves, 1. That he will praise God constantly; "I will bless the Lord at all times," upon all occasions. He resolves to keep up stated times for this duty; to lay hold on all opportunities for it, and to renew his praises upon every fresh occurrence that furnisheth him with matter. If we hope to spend our eternity in praising God, it is fit we should spend as much as may be of our time in this work. 2. That he will praise him openly; "His praise shall continually be in my mouth." Thus he would shew how forward he was to own his obligations to the mercy of God, and how desirous to make others also sensible of theirs. 3. That he will praise him heartily; "My soul shall make her boast in the Lord," in my relation to him, my interest in him, and expectations from him. This is not vainglory to glory in the Lord.

Secondly. He calls upon others to join with him herein. He expects they will; ver. 2, "The humble shall hear thereof," both of my deliverance and of my thankfulness, "and be glad," that a good man has so much favour shewed him, and a good God so much honour done him. Those have much comfort in God's mercies, both to others and to themselves, that are humble, and have the least confidence in their own merit and sufficiency. It pleased David to think that God's favours to him would rejoice the heart of every Israelite. Three things he would have us all to concur with him in:

1. In great and high thoughts of God, which we should express in magnifying him, and exalting his name, ver. 3. We cannot make God greater or higher than he is, but if we adore him as infinitely great, and higher than the highest, he is pleased to reckon this magnifying and exalting him. This we must do together. God's praises sound best in concert, for so we praise him as the angels do in heaven. They that share in God's favour, as all the saints do, should concur in his praises; and we should be as desirous of the assistance of our friends in returning thanks for mercies as in praying for them. We have reason to join in thanksgiving to God,

1st. For his readiness to hear prayer, which all the saints have had the comfort of; for he never said to any of them, Seek ye me in vain. First. David for his part will give it under his hand that he has found him a prayer-hearing God; ver. 4, "I sought the Lord" in my distress, intreated his favour, begged his help, "and he heard me;" answered my request presently, "and delivered me from all my fears," both from the death I feared and from the disquietment and disturbance I was put into by my fear of it. The former he doth by his providence working for us; the latter by his grace working in us to silence our fears, and still the tumult of the spirits. And this is the greater mercy of the two, because the thing we fear is our trouble only, but our unbelieving, distrustful fear of it is our sin; nay, and many times it is more our torment too than the thing itself would be, which perhaps would only touch the bone and the flesh, while the fear would prey upon the spirits, and put us out of the possession of our own soul. David's prayers helped to silence his fears; having sought the Lord, and left his case with him, he could with a great deal of ease expect the event. But David was a great and eminent man: we may not expect to be favoured as he was; have any others ever experienced the like benefit by prayer? Yes; Secondly. Many besides him have looked unto God by faith and prayer, and have been lightened by it, ver. 5. It has wonderfully revived and comforted them, witness Hannah, who, when she had prayed, "went her way and did eat, and her countenance was no more sad." When we look to the world we are darkened, are perplexed and at a loss; but when we look unto God, from him we have the light both of direction and joy, and our way is made both plain and pleasant. These here spoken of, that looked unto God, had their expectations raised, and the event did not frustrate them; their faces were not ashamed of their confidence. But perhaps these also were persons of great eminency, like David himself, and upon that account were highly favoured; or their numbers made them considerable. Nay, Thirdly, "This poor man cried;" a single person, mean and inconsiderable, whom no man looked upon with any respect, or looked after with any concern, yet he was as welcome to the throne of grace as David or any of his worthies. "The Lord heard him," took cognizance of his case and of his prayers, "and saved him out of all his troubles," ver. 6. God will regard the prayer of the destitute, Ps. cii. 17: see Isa. lvii. 15.

2nd. For the ministration of the good angels about us; ver. 7, "The angel of the Lord," that is, a guard of angels, so some, but so unanimous in their service as if they were but one, or a guardian angel, "encampeth round about them that fear God," as the life-guard about the prince, "and delivereth them." God makes use of the attendance of the good spirits for the protection of his people from the malice and power of evil spirits; and more good offices the holy angels do us every day than we are aware of. Though in dignity and capacity of nature they are very much superior to us, though they retain their primitive rectitude, which we have lost, though they have constant employment in the upper world to praise God, and are entitled to a constant rest and bliss there, yet in obedience to their Maker, and in love to those that bear his image, they condescend to minister to the saints, and stand up for them against the powers of darkness. They not only visit them, but encamp round about them, acting for their good as really, though not as sensibly, as for Jacob's, Gen. xxxii. 1; and Elisha's, 2 Kin. vi. 17. All the glory be to the God of the angels.

2. He would have us to join with him in kind and good thoughts of God; ver. 8, "O taste and see that the Lord is good." The goodness of God includes both the beauty and amiableness of his being, and the bounty and beneficence of his providence and grace; and, accordingly, 1st. We must taste that he is a bountiful benefactor, relish the goodness of God in all his gifts to us, and reckon that the savour and sweetness of them; let God's goodness be rolled under the tongue as a sweet morsel. 2nd. We must see that he is a beautiful being, and delight in the contemplation of his infinite perfections. By taste and sight we both make discoveries and take comp'acency. Taste and see God's goodness, that is, take notice of it, and take the comfort of it, 1 Pet. ii. 3. He is good, for he makes all those truly blessed that trust in him; let us, therefore, be so convinced of his goodness as thereby to be encouraged in the worst of times to trust in him.

3. He would have us join with him in a resolution to seek God and serve him, and continue in his fear; ver. 9, "O fear the Lord, ye his saints:" when we taste and see that he is good, we must not forget that "he is great, and greatly to be feared:" nay, even his goodness is the proper object of a filial reverence and awe; "They shall fear the Lord and his goodness," Hos. iii. 5. "Fear the Lord;" that is, worship him, and make conscience of your duty to him in every thing; not fear him and shun him, but fear him and seek him, ver. 10; as a people seek unto their God: apply yourselves to him, and portion yourselves in him. To encourage us to fear God and seek him, it is here promised that those that do so, even in this wanting world, shall want no good thing; Heb., 'They shall not want all good things,' that is, they shall so have all good things as that they shall have no reason to complain of the want of any. As to the things of the other world, they shall have grace sufficient for the support of the spiritual life, 2 Cor. xii. 9; Ps. lxxxiv. 11; and, as to this life, they shall have what is necessary to the support of it from the hand of God. As a Father, he will feed them with food convenient. What farther comforts they desire they shall have, as far as Infinite Wisdom sees good; and what they want in one thing, shall be made up in another. What God denies them, he will give them grace to be content without, and then they do not want it, Deu. iii. 26; Paul had all and abounded, because he was content, Phil. iv 11—18. Those that live by faith in God's all-sufficiency want nothing, for in him they have enough; however it goes with the young lions, they shall lack and suffer hunger. They that live upon common providence, as the lions do, shall want that satisfaction which they have that live by faith in the promise. They that trust to themselves, and think their own hands sufficient for them, shall want; for bread is not always to the wise, but verily they shall be fed that trust in God, and desire to be at his finding. They that are ravenous and prey upon all about them shall want; but "the meek shall inherit the earth." They shall not want that with quietness work and mind their own business. Plainhearted Jacob has pottage enough, when Esau the cunning hunter is ready to perish for hunger.

11 Come, ye children, hearken unto me:
I will teach you the fear of the LORD.
12 What man is he that desireth life,
And loveth many days, that he may see good?
13 Keep thy tongue from evil,
And thy lips from speaking guile.
14 Depart from evil, and do good;
Seek peace, and pursue it.
15 The eyes of the LORD are upon the righteous,
And his ears are open unto their cry.
16 The face of the LORD is against them that do evil.
To cut off the remembrance of them from the earth
17 The righteous cry, and the LORD heareth,
And delivereth them out of all their troubles.
18 The LORD is nigh unto them that are of a broken heart;
And saveth such as be of a contrite spirit.
19 Many are the afflictions of the righteous:
But the LORD delivereth him out of them all.
20 He keepeth all his bones:
Not one of them is broken.
21 Evil shall slay the wicked:
And they that hate the righteous shall be desolate.
22 The LORD redeemeth the soul of his servants:
And none of them that trust in him shall be desolate

David, in this latter part of the psalm, undertakes to teach children; though a man of war, and anointed to be king, he did not think it below him. Though now he had his head so full of cares, and his hands of business, yet he could find heart and time to give good counsel to young people from his own experience. It doth not appear that he had now any children of his own, at least none that were grown up to a capacity of being taught, but by Divine inspiration he instructs the children of his people. Those that were in years would not be taught by him, though he had offered them his service, Ps. xxxii. 8; but he has hopes that the tender branches will be more easily bent, and that children and young people will be more tractable, and therefore he calls together a congregation of them; ver. 10, "Come, ye children," that are now in your learning age, and are now to lay up a stock of knowledge which you must live upon all your days; ye children that are foolish and ignorant, and need to be taught. Perhaps he intends especially those children whose parents neglected to instruct and catechise them; and it is as great a piece of charity to put those children to school, whose parents are not in a capacity to teach them, as to feed those children whose parents have not bread for them. Observe, 1. What he expects from them; "Hearken unto me," leave your play, lay by your toys, and hear what I have to say to you; not only give me the hearing, but observe and obey me. 2. What he undertakes to teach them; "the fear of the Lord," inclusive of all the duties of religion. David was a famous musician, a statesman, a soldier, but he doth not say to the children, I will teach you to play on the harp, or to handle the sword or spear, or draw the bow, or I will teach you the maxims of state policy, but, "I will teach you the fear of the Lord;" which is better than all arts and sciences, better than all burntofferings and sacrifices. That is it which we should be solicitous both to learn ourselves and to teach our children.

First. He supposeth that we all aim to be happy; ver. 12, "What man is he that desireth life," that is, as it follows, not only to see many days, but to see good, comfortable days. Non est vivere, sed valere vita,—'it is not being, but well-being, that constitutes life.' It is asked, Who wisheth to live a long and pleasant life? and it is easily answered, Who doth not? Surely this must look farther than time, and this present world; for man's life on earth at best consists but of few days, and those full of trouble. What man is he that would with whom David sojourned. This psalm is alphabetical in the Hebrew.

xxxiv. 7. The word "angel" here appears to be used collectively for "angels," though some have thought that "angel of the Lord" is always a designation of the Son of God, and therefore he is referred to here. We think the first view preferable, and consequently reject the notion of a guardian angel. The angels are ministering spirits, but it is an error to fancy that every person has at his birth allotted to him one or more angels who shall incite him to good or evil, according as they are holy or wicked. The Douay says it is "the proper guardian angel of every one."

xxxiv. 11. This verse contains an invitation, the opening words of which may either be translated, "Come, oh, children," or "Come, oh, sons;" in either case it is an appeal and a promise. The lessons which are implied by the phrase "the fear of the Lord," i.e., the principles of piety, are set out in the remaining verses of the psalm.

be eternally happy? that would see many days, as many as the days of heaven; that would see good in that world where all bliss is in perfection, without the least alloy; who would see that good before him now by faith and hope, and enjoy it shortly? Who would? alas, very few have that in their thoughts. Most ask, "Who will shew us any good?" but few ask, "What shall we do to inherit eternal life?" This question implies there are some such.

Secondly. He prescribes the true and only way to happiness, both in this world and that to come, ver. 13, 14. Would we pass comfortably through the world, and out of the world, our constant care must be to keep a good conscience. And in order to that, 1. We must learn to bridle our tongues, and be careful what we say; that we never speak amiss to God's dishonour, or our neighbour's prejudice: "Keep thy tongue from evil" speaking, lying, and slandering. So great a way doth this go in religion, that "if any offend not in word, the same is a perfect man;" and so little a way doth religion go without this, that he that "bridles not his tongue, his religion is vain." 2. We must be upright and sincere in every thing we say, and not double-tongued; our words must be the indications of our minds, our lips must be kept from speaking guile, either to God or man. 3. We must leave all our sins, and resolve we will have no more to do with them. "Depart from evil," from evil works, and evil workers; from the sins others commit, and which we have formerly allowed ourselves in. 4. It is not enough not to do hurt in the world, but we must study to be useful, and live to some purpose. We must not only "depart from evil," but we must "do good;" good for ourselves, especially for our own souls, employing them well, furnishing them with a good treasure, and fitting them for another world; and as we have ability and opportunity we must do good to others also. 5. Because nothing is more contrary to that love which never fails, which is the summary both of law and gospel, both of grace and glory, than strife and contention, which brings confusion and every evil work, we must "seek peace and pursue it." Have a peaceable disposition; study "the things that make for peace;" do nothing to break the peace, and to make mischief. If peace seem to flee from us, we must pursue it; "follow peace with all men;" stick at no pains, no expense, to preserve and recover peace; be willing to deny ourselves a great deal both in honour and interest for peace sake. These excellent directions in the way to life and good, are transcribed into the New Testament, and made part of our gospel duty, 1 Pet iii. 10, 11; and, perhaps, David in warning us that we speak no guile, reflects upon his own sin in changing his behaviour. They that truly repent of what they have done amiss will warn others to take heed of doing likewise.

Thirdly. He enforceth these directions by setting before us the happiness of the godly in the love and favour of God, and the miserable state of the wicked under his displeasure. Here is life and death, good and evil, the blessing and the curse, plainly stated before us, that we may choose life, and live: see Isa. iii. 10, 11.

1. "Woe to the wicked, it shall be ill with them;" however they may bless themselves in their own way.

1st. God is against them, and then they cannot but be miserable. Sad is the case of that man who by sin has made his Maker his enemy, his destroyer. "The face of the Lord is against them that do evil," ver. 16. Sometimes God is said to turn his face from them, Jer. xviii. 17, because they have forsaken him; here he is said to set his face against them, because they have fought against him. And for certain, God is able to outface the most proud and daring sinners, and can frown them into hell.

2nd. Ruin is before them. This will follow of course, if God be against them, for he is able both to kill and to cast into hell. First. The land of the living shall be no place for them or theirs. When God sets his face against them, he shall not only cut them off, but "cut off the remembrance of them;" shall when they are alive bury them in obscurity, when they are dead shall bury them in oblivion. He shall root out their posterity, by whom they should be remembered; he shall pour disgrace upon their achievements, which they gloried in, and for which they thought they should have been remembered. It is certain there is no lasting honour but that which comes from God. Secondly. There shall be a sting in their death; "Evil shall slay the wicked," ver. 21. Their death shall be miserable; and so it will certainly be, though they die in a bed of down, or in the bed of honour. Death to them has a curse in it, and is the king of terrors; to them it is an evil, an only evil. It is very well observed by Dr. Hammond, that the evil here which slays the wicked, is the same word in the singular number that is used, ver. 19, for the afflictions of the righteous, to intimate that godly people have many troubles, and yet they do them no hurt; but are made to work for good to them, for God will deliver them out of them all; whereas wicked people have fewer troubles, fewer evils befall them, perhaps but one, and yet that one may prove their utter ruin. One trouble with a curse in it kills and slays, and doth execution; but many, with a blessing in them, are harmless, nay, gainful. Thirdly. Desolation will be their everlasting portion. They that are wicked themselves oftentimes hate the righteous, name and thing, have an implacable enmity to them and their righteousness; but they shall be desolate, shall be condemned as guilty, and laid waste for ever, shall be for ever forsaken and abandoned of God and all good angels and men, and those that are so are desolate indeed.

2. Yet, "Say to the righteous, it shall be well with them;" all good people are under God's special favour and protection. We are here assured of that, under a great variety of instances and expressions.

1st. God takes special notice of good people, and takes notice who have their eyes ever to him, and who make conscience of their duty to him. "The eyes of the Lord are upon the righteous," ver. 15; to direct and guide them, to protect and keep them. Parents that are very fond of a child, will not let it be out of their sight; none of God's children are ever from under his eye, but on them he looks with a singular complacency, as well as with a watchful and tender concern.

2nd. They are sure of an answer of peace to their prayers. All God's people are a praying people, and they cry in prayer, which notes great importunity; but is it to any purpose? Yes; First. God takes notice of what we say; ver. 17, they "cry, and the Lord heareth them," and hears them so as to make it appear he has a regard to them. "His ears are open to their prayers;" to receive them all, and to receive them readily, and with delight. Though he has been a God hearing prayer ever since men began to call upon the name of the Lord, yet his ear is not heavy. There is no rhetoric, nothing charming, in a cry, yet God's ears are open to it, as the tender mother's to the cry of her sucking child, which another would take no notice of. "The righteous cry, and the Lord heareth," ver. 17. This intimates that it is the constant practice of good people, when they are in distress, to cry unto God; and it is their constant comfort that God hears them. Secondly. He not only takes notice of what we say, but is ready to us for our relief, ver. 18; he "is nigh to them that are of a broken heart, and saveth them." Note, 1*st.* It is the character of the righteous, whose prayers God will hear, that they are of a broken heart and a contrite spirit, that is, humbled for sin, and emptied of self; they are low in their own eyes, and have no confidence in their own merit and sufficiency, but in God only. 2*nd.* Those who are so have God nigh unto them to comfort and support them; that the spirit may not be broken more than is meet, lest it should fail before him: see Isa. lvii. 15. Though God is high, and dwells on high, yet he is near to those who, being of a contrite spirit, know how to value his favour, and will save them from sinking under their burthens; he is near them to good purpose.

3. They are taken under the special protection of the Divine government; ver. 20, "He keepeth all his bones,"—not only his soul but his body; not only his body in general, but every bone in it,—"not one of them is broken." He that has a broken heart shall not have a broken bone; for David himself had found that when he had a contrite heart the broken bones were made to rejoice, Ps. li. 8, 17. One would not expect to meet with anything of Christ here, and yet this scripture is said to be fulfilled in him, Jno. xix. 36, when the soldiers broke the legs of the two thieves that were crucified with him, but did not break his, they being under the protection of this promise as well as the type, even the paschal lamb, "a bone of him shall not be broken;" the promises being made good to Christ, through him are sure to all the seed. It doth not follow but that a good man may have a broken bone, but many a time, by the watchful providence of God concerning him, it is wonderfully prevented, and the preservation of his bones is the effect of this promise; and if he have a broken bone, sooner or later it shall be made whole; at farthest at the resurrection, when that which is sown in weakness shall be raised in power.

4. They are, and shall be, delivered out of their troubles. 1st. It is supposed that they have their share of crosses in this world, perhaps a greater share than others. In the world they must have tribulation, that they may be conformed both to the will of God and to the example of Christ; ver. 19, "Many are the afflictions of the righteous;" witness David and his afflictions, Ps. cxxxii. 1. There are those that hate them, ver. 21, and they are continually aiming to do them a mischief. Their God loves them, and therefore corrects them; so that, between the mercy of Heaven and the malice of hell, the afflictions of the righteous must needs be many. 2nd. God has engaged for their deliverance and salvation: "He delivereth them out of all their troubles," ver. 17; and again, ver. 19; he saveth them, ver. 18, so that though they may fall into trouble it shall not be their ruin. This promise of their deliverance is explained, ver. 22; whatever troubles befall them, First. They shall not hurt their better part; "The Lord redeemeth the soul of his servants," from the power of the grave, Ps. xlix. 15, and from the sting of every affliction. He keeps them from sinning in their troubles, which is the only thing that would do them a mischief, and keeps them from despair, and from being put out of the possession of their own souls. Secondly. They shall not hinder their everlasting bliss; "none of them that trust in him shall be desolate," that is, they shall not be comfortless, for they shall not be cut off from their communion with God. No man is desolate but he whom God has forsaken, nor is any man undone till he is in hell. Those that are God's faithful servants,—that make it their care to please him, and their business to honour him, and in doing so trust him to protect and reward them,—and with good thoughts of him refer themselves to him, have reason to be easy, whatever befalls them, for they are safe, and shall be happy.

In singing these verses let us be confirmed in the choice we have made of the ways of God; let us be quickened in his service, and greatly encouraged by the assurances he has given of the particular care he takes of all those that faithfully adhere to him.

PSALM XXXV.

David in this psalm appeals to the righteous Judge of heaven and earth, against his enemies that hated and persecuted him; it is supposed that Saul and his party are the persons he means, for with them he had the greatest struggles. I. He complains to God of the injuries they did him; they strove with him, fought against him, ver. 1; persecuted him, ver. 3; sought his ruin, ver. 4, 7; accused him falsely, ver. 11; abused him basely, ver. 15, 16; and all his friends, ver. 20; and triumphed over him, ver. 21, 25, 26. II. He pleads his own innocency, that he never gave them any provocation, ver. 7, 19; but, on the contrary, had studied to oblige them, ver. 12—14. III. He prays to God to protect and deliver him, and appear for him, ver. 1, 2; to comfort him, ver. 3; to be nigh to him, and rescue him, ver. 17, 22; to plead his cause, ver. 23, 24; to defeat all the designs of his enemies against him, ver. 3, 4; and to disappoint their expectations of his fall, ver. 19, 25, 26; and, lastly, to countenance all his friends, and encourage them, ver. 27. IV. He prophesies the destruction of his persecutors, ver. 4—6, 8. V. He promiseth himself that he shall yet see better days, ver. 9, 10; and promiseth God that he will then attend him with his praises, ver. 18, 28. In singing this psalm, and praying over it, we must take heed of applying it to any little peevish quarrels and enmities of our own; and of expressing by it any uncharitable, revengeful resentments of injuries done to us; for Christ has taught us to forgive our enemies, and not to pray against them, but to pray for them, as he did; but, 1. We may comfort ourselves with the testimony of our consciences concerning our innocency, with reference to those that are any way injurious to us, and with hopes that God will in his own way and time right us, and in the mean time support us. 2. We ought to apply it to the public enemies of Christ and his kingdom, typified by David and his kingdom, to resent the indignities done to Christ's honour; to pray to God to plead the just and injured cause of Christianity and serious godliness, and to believe that God will in due time glorify his own name in the ruin of all the irreconcilable enemies of his church, that will not repent to give him glory.

A Psalm of David.

PLEAD my cause, O LORD, with them that strive with me:
Fight against them that fight against me.
2 Take hold of shield and buckler,
And stand up for mine help.
3 Draw out also the spear,
And stop the way against them that persecute me:
Say unto my soul, I am thy salvation.
4 Let them be confounded and put to shame
That seek after my soul:
Let them be turned back and brought to confusion
That devise my hurt.
5 Let them be as chaff before the wind:
And let the angel of the LORD chase them.
6 Let their way be dark and slippery:
And let the angel of the LORD persecute them.
7 For without cause have they hid for me their net in a pit,
Which without cause they have digged for my soul.

xxxiv. 17. The words "the righteous" are here supplied from verse 15; in which our translators are supported by the authority of the Chaldee, the Greek, and Syriac. Although temporal advantages are not excluded by the principles of the Gospel, it is manifest that they occupied a much more prominent position under the law. Now the order is reversed, and we are to "seek first the kingdom of God and his righteousness."

xxxiv. 21. The Douay translates, "The death of sinners is very ill," which in modern editions is, "The death of sinners is very evil." The Greek, on which these are eventually based, may be rendered, "The death of sinners is evil," which may really mean the same as the Hebrew followed by our translators.

xxxv. Title. Here, as in the majority of cases, the Syriac has a special title, which may be rendered "of David: literally, when he was pursuing after the Edomites, and the conflict of the righteous." Some say it is a psalm which David composed on account of his flight from 8 Let destruction come upon him at unawares;

And let his net that he hath hid catch himself:
Into that very destruction let him fall.
9 And my soul shall be joyful in the LORD:
It shall rejoice in his salvation
10 All my bones shall say,
LORD, who is like unto thee, [for him,
Which deliverest the poor from him that is too strong Yea, the poor and the needy from him that spoileth him?

In these verses we have,

First. David's representation of his case to God, setting forth the restless rage and malice of his persecutors. He was God's servant, expressly appointed by him to be what he was, followed his conduct, and aimed at his glory in the way of duty, had "lived," as St. Paul speaks, "in all good conscience before God unto this day;" and yet there were those that strove with him, that did their utmost to oppose his advancement, and made all the interest they could against him; they fought against him, ver. 1; not only undermined him closely and secretly, but openly avowed their opposition to him, and set themselves to do him all the mischief they could. They persecuted him with an unwearied enmity, sought after his soul, ver. 4, that is, his life, no less would satisfy their bloody minds; they aimed to disquiet his spirit, and put that into disorder. Nor was it a sudden passion against him that they harboured, but an inveterate malice; they devised his hurt, laid their heads together, and set their wits on work, not only to do him a mischief, but to find out ways and means to ruin him. They treated him, who was the greatest blessing of his country, as if he had been the curse and plague of it; hunted him as a dangerous beast of prey; they digged a pit for him, and laid a net in it, that they might have him at their mercy, ver. 7. They took a great deal of pains in persecuting him, for they digged a pit, Ps. vii. 15, and very close and crafty they were in carrying on their designs; the old serpent taught them subtlety; they hid their net from David and his friends, but in vain, for they could not hide it from God. And, lastly, He found himself an unequal match for them. His enemy, especially Saul, was too strong for him, ver. 10; for he had the army at his command, and assumed to himself the sole power of making laws, and giving judgment, attainted and condemned whom he pleased, carried not a sceptre, but a javelin in his hand, to cast at any man that stood in his way; such was the manner of the king, and all about him must do as he bade them, right or wrong. The king's word is a law, and every thing must be carried with a high hand; he has fields, and vineyards, and preferments, at his dispose, 1 Sam. xxii. 7; but David is poor and needy, has nothing to make friends with, and therefore has none to take his part, but men (as we say) of broken fortunes, 1 Sam. xxii. 2, and therefore no marvel that Saul spoiled him of what little he had got, and the interest he had made. If the kings of the earth set themselves against the Lord and his anointed, who can contend with them? Note, It is no new thing for the most righteous men, and the most righteous cause, to meet with many mighty and malicious enemies; Christ himself is striven with, and fought against, and war made upon the holy seed; and we are not to marvel at the matter, it is a fruit of the old enmity in the seed of the serpent against the seed of the woman.

Secondly. His appeal to God concerning his integrity, and the justice of his cause. If a fellow subject had wronged him, he might have appealed to his prince, as St. Paul did to Cæsar; but, when his prince wronged him, he appealed to his God, who is Prince and Judge of the kings of the earth. "Plead my cause, O Lord," ver. 1. Note, A righteous cause may with the greatest satisfaction imaginable be laid before a righteous God, and referred to him to give judgment upon it; for he perfectly knows the merits of it, holds the balance exactly even; and with him there is no respect of persons. God knew that they were without cause his enemies, and that they had without cause digged pits for him, ver. 7. Note, It will be a comfort to us, when men do us wrong, if our consciences can witness for us that we have never done them any. It was so to St. Paul, Acts xxv. 10, "To the Jews have I done no wrong." We are apt to justify our uneasiness at the injuries men do us, that we never gave them any cause to use us so; whereas this should, more than any thing, make us easy, for then we may the more securely expect that God will plead our cause.

Thirdly. His prayer to God, to manifest himself both for him and to him in trial. 1. For him. He prays that God would fight against his enemies, so as to disable them to hurt him, and defeat their designs against him, ver. 1. That he would take hold of shield and buckler, for the Lord is a man of war, Ex. xv. 3; and that he would stand up for his help, ver. 2, for he had few that would stand up for him; and, if he had never so many, they would stand him in no stead without God. That God would stop their way, that they might not undertake him when he fled from them; this prayer we may put up against our persecutors that God would restrain them, and stop their way. 2. To him. "Say unto my soul, I am thy salvation," that is, Let me have inward comfort under all these outward troubles, to support my soul, which they strike at. Let God be my salvation, not only my Saviour out of my present troubles, but my everlasting bliss; let me have that salvation not only which he is the author of, but which consists in his favour; and let me know it, let me have the comfortable assurance of it, in my own breast. If God by his Spirit witness to our spirits that he is our salvation, we have enough, we need desire no more to make us happy; and this is a powerful support when men persecute us. If God be our friend, no matter who is our enemy.

Fourthly. His prospect of the destruction of his enemies, which he prays for, —not in malice or revenge. We find how patiently he bore Shimei's curses: "So let him curse, for the Lord has bidden him;" and we cannot suppose that he that was so meek in his conversation should give vent to any intemperate heat or passion in his devotion; but by the spirit of prophecy he foretells the just judgments of God that would come upon them for their great wickedness, their malice, cruelty, and perfidiousness, and especially their enmity to the counsels of God, the interests of religion, and that reformation which they knew David, if ever he had power in his hand, would be an instrument of. They seemed to be hardened in their sins, and to be of the number of those who have sinned unto death, and are not to be prayed for, Jer. vii. 16; xi. 14; xiv. 11; 1 Jno. v. 16. As for Saul himself, it is probable David knew that God had rejected him, and had forbidden Samuel to mourn for him, 1 Sam. xvi. 1. And these predictions look farther, and read the doom of the enemies of Christ and his kingdom, as appears by comparing, Rom. xi. 9, 10.

He here prays, 1. Against his many enemies; ver. 4—6, "Let them be confounded," &c. Or, as Dr. Hammond reads it, 'They shall be confounded, they shall be turned back.' This may be taken as a prayer for their repentance, for all penitents are put to shame for their sins, and turned back from them; or, if they were not brought to repentance, that they might be defeated and disappointed if their designs against him, and so put to shame. But though they should in some degree prevail, yet he foresees that it would be to their own ruin at last; they shall be as chaff before the wind, so unable will wicked men be to stand before the judgments of God, and so certainly will they be driven away by them, Ps. i. 4. Their way shall be dark and slippery, 'darkness and slipperiness,' (so the margin reads it;) the way of sinners is so, for they walk in darkness, and in continual danger of falling into sin, into hell; it will prove so at last, for "their foot shall slide in due time," Deu. xxxii. 35. But this is not the worst of it; even chaff before the wind may perhaps be stopped and find a place of rest, and though the way be dark and slippery it is possible a man may keep footing; but it is here foretold that the angel of the Lord shall chase them, ver. 5, so that they shall find no rest; shall persecute them, ver. 6, so that they cannot possibly escape the pit of destruction. As God's angels encamp about them that fear him, so they encamp against them that fight against him. They are the ministers of his justice as well as of his mercy. Those that make God their enemy make all the holy angels their enemies. 2. He prays against his one mighty enemy; ver. 8, "Let destruction come upon him." It is probable he means Saul, who laid snares for him, and aimed at his destruction. David vowed his hand should not be upon him, he would not be judge in his own cause; but at the same time foretold that the Lord would smite him, 1 Sam. xxvi. 10; and here, that the net he had hid should catch himself, and into that very destruction he should fall, which was remarkably fulfilled in the ruin of Saul, for he had laid a plot to make David fall by the hand of the Philistines, 1 Sam. xviii. 25; that was the net which he hid for him, under pretence of doing him honour; and in that very net was he himself taken, for he fell by the hand of the Philistines, when his day came to fall.

Fifthly. His prospect of his own deliverance, which, having committed his cause to God, he did not doubt of, ver. 9, 10. 1. He hoped that he should have the comfort of it; "My soul shall be joyful," not in mine own ease and safety, but "in the Lord," and in his favour; in his promise and in his salvation, according to the promise. Joy in God, and in his salvation, is the only true, solid, satisfying joy. They whose souls are sorrowful in the Lord, that sow in tears, and sorrow after a godly sort, need not question but that in due time their souls shall be joyful in the Lord, for gladness is sown for them, and they shall at last enter into the joy of their Lord. 2. He promised that then God should have the glory of it; ver. 10, "All my bones shall say, Lord, who is like unto thee?" 1st. He will praise God with the whole man, with all that is within him, and with all the strength and vigour of his soul, intimated by his bones, which are within the body, and are the strength of it. 2nd. He will praise him as one of peerless and unparalleled perfection; we cannot express how great and good God is, and therefore must praise him, by acknowledging him a nonsuch; "Lord, who is like unto thee?" No such patron of oppressed innocency, no such punisher of triumphant tyranny. The formation of our bones so wonderfully, so curiously, Eccl. xi. 5, Ps. cxxxix. 16, the serviceableness of our bones, and the preservation of them, and especially the life which at the resurrection shall be breathed upon the dry bones, and make them flourish as an herb, oblige every bone in our bodies, if it could speak, to say, "Lord, who is like unto thee?" and willingly to undergo any services or sufferings for him.

11 False witnesses did rise up;
They laid to my charge things that I knew not.
12 They rewarded me evil for good
To the spoiling of my soul.
13 But as for me,
When they were sick, my clothing was sackcloth
I humbled my soul with fasting;
And my prayer returned into mine own bosom.
14 I behaved myself as though he had been my friend or brother:
I bowed down heavily, as one that mourneth for his mother. [selves together:
15 But in mine adversity they rejoiced, and gathered them-
Yea, the abjects gathered themselves together against me, and I knew it not;
They did tear me, and ceased not:
16 With hypocritical mockers in feasts,
They gnashed upon me with their teeth.

Two very ill things David here lays to the charge of his enemies, to make good his appeal to God against them—perjury and ingratitude.

First. Perjury, ver. 11. When Saul would have David attainted of treason, in order to his being outlawed, perhaps he did it with the formalities of a legal prosecution, produced witnesses which swore some treasonable words or overt acts against him, and he being not present to clear himself,—or if he had, it had been all one,—Saul adjudged him a traitor; this he complains of here as the highest piece of injustice imaginable. "False witnesses did rise up," who would swear anything; "they laid to my charge things that I knew not," nor ever thought of. See how much the honours, estates, liberties, and lives, even of the best men, lie at the mercy of the worst, against whose false oaths innocency itself is no fence; and what reason we have to acknowledge with thankfulness the hold God has of the consciences even of bad men, to which it is owing that there is not more mischief done that way than is. This instance of the wrong done to David was typical, and had its accomplishment in the Son of David, against whom false witnesses did arise, Mat. xxvi. 60; and if we be at any time charged with what we are innocent of, let us not think it strange, as though some new thing happened to us; so persecuted they the prophets, even the great Prophet.

Secondly. Ingratitude. Call a man ungrateful and you can call him no worse. This was the character of David's enemies, ver. 12, "They rewarded me evil for good." A great deal of good service he had done to his king,—witness his harp, witness Goliath's sword, witness the foreskins of the Philistines,—and yet his king vowed his death, and his country is made too hot for him. This is to the spoiling of his soul; that is, this base unkind usage robs him of his comfort, and cuts him to the heart more than anything else. Now, he had not only deserved well of the public, but of those particular persons that were now most bitter against him. Probably it was then well known who he meant; it may be Saul himself for one, whom he was sent for to attend upon when he was melancholy and ill, and to whom he was serviceable to drive away the evil spirit, not with his harp, but with his prayers; to others of the courtiers it is likely he had Saul and his enemies of Saul's party. Others ascribe it to a later period, and connect it with the troublous times in which Shimei, Ahithophel, Mephibosheth, and Absalom's party caused so many anxieties. Others again, like some of the fathers, understand David to speak here as a figure of Christ, which is very doubtful.

xxxv. 7. The reasons for which the psalmist asks the Divine judgments are the devices of his enemies against him. The common translation of this verse is different from some others founded upon the Greek and Latin. Thus the Douay: "Because they have hid the destruction of their snare for me without cause; in vain have they upbraided my soul." The Syriac is: "Because they have hidden snares for me; and have spread out a net for my soul." The fact of these variations is noticeable, but it is not easy to explain all the reasons for them.

xxxv. 13. This verse is literally, "And I, in their sickness, my clothing was sackcloth," &c. The sense is pretty well expressed by showed this respect while he lived at court, who now were of all others most abusive to him. Herein he was a type of Christ, to whom this wicked world was very ungrateful; Jno. x. 32, "Many good works have I shewed you from my Father, for which of those do you stone me?" David here shews,

1. How tenderly, and with what a cordial affection he had carried it towards them in their afflictions; ver. 13, 14, "they were sick." Note, Even the palaces and courts of princes are not exempt from the jurisdiction of death, and the visitation of sickness. Now when these people were sick, 1st. David mourned for them, and sympathised with them in their grief. They were nothing akin to him, he was under no obligations to them, would lose nothing by their death, but perhaps be a gainer by it, and yet he behaved himself as though they had been his nearest relations, purely from a principle of compassion and humanity. David was a man of war, and of a bold, stout spirit, and yet was thus susceptible of the impressions of sympathy, forgot the bravery of the hero, and seemed wholly made up of love and pity. It was a rare composition of hardiness and tenderness, courage and compassion, in the same breast. Observe, He took on as for a brother or mother, which intimates that it is our duty, and well becomes us, to lay to heart the sickness, and sorrow, and death of our near relations. Those that do not are justly stigmatized as without natural affection. 2nd. He prayed for them. He discovered not only the tender affection of a man, but the pious affection of a saint. He was concerned for their precious souls; and, since he could not otherwise be helpful to them, he helped them with his prayers to God for mercy and grace; and the prayers of one who had so great an interest in heaven were of more value than perhaps they knew and considered. With his prayers he joined humiliation and self-affliction, both in his diet—he fasted, at least from pleasant bread, and in his dress—he clothed himself with sackcloth, thus expressing his grief, not only for their affliction, but for their sin; for this was the guise and practice of a penitent. We ought to mourn for the sins of those that do not mourn for them themselves. His fasting also put an edge upon his praying, and was an expression of the ardency of it; he was so intent in his devotions that he had no appetite to meat, nor would allow himself time for eating. "My prayer returned into mine own bosom;" that is, I had the comfort of having done my duty, and of having approved myself a loving neighbour, though I could not thereby win upon them, nor make them my friends. We shall not lose by the good offices we have done to any, how ungrateful soever they are, for our rejoicing will be this, the testimony of our conscience.

2. How basely and insolently, and with what a brutish enmity, and worse than brutish, they had carried it towards him; ver. 15, 16, "In mine adversity they rejoiced." When he fell under the frowns of Saul, was banished the court, and persecuted as a criminal, they were pleased, were glad at his calamities, and got together in their drunken clubs to make themselves and one another merry with the disgrace of this great favourite. Well might he call them abjects, for nothing could be more vile and sordid than to triumph in the fall of a man of such unstained honour and consummate virtue. But this was not all, 1st. They tore him, rent his good name without mercy, said all the ill they could of him, and fastened upon him all the reproach their cursed wit and malice could reach to. 2nd. They gnashed upon him with their teeth; that is, they never spoke of him but with the greatest indignation imaginable, as those that would have eaten him up, if they could. David was the fool in the play, and his disappointment all the table-talk of the hypocritical mockers at feasts; it was the song of the drunkards; the comedians, who may fitly be called hypocritical mockers, (for what doth a hypocrite signify but a stage-player?) and whose comedies it is likely were acted at feasts and balls, chose David for their subject, bantered and abused him, while the auditory, in token of their agreement with the plot, hummed, and gnashed upon him with their teeth. Such has often been the hard fate of the best of men. The apostles were made a spectacle to the world. David was looked upon with ill-will for no other reason but because he was caressed by the people. It is a vexation of spirit which attends even a right work, that for this a man is envied of his neighbour, Eccl. iv. 4; and "who can stand before envy?" Pr. xxvii. 4.

17 Lord, how long wilt thou look on?
Rescue my soul from their destructions,
My darling from the lions.
18 I will give thee thanks in the great congregation:
I will praise thee among much people.
19 Let not them that are mine enemies wrongfully rejoice over me: [out a cause.
Neither let them wink with the eye that hate me with-20 For they speak not peace:
But they devise deceitful matters against them that are quiet in the land.
21 Yea, they opened their mouth wide against me,
And said, Aha, aha, our eye hath seen it
22 This thou hast seen, O LORD:
Keep not silence: O Lord, be not far from me.
23 Stir up thyself, and awake to my judgment,
Even unto my cause, my God and my Lord.
24 Judge me, O LORD my God, according to thy righteousness;
And let them not rejoice over me
25 Let them not say in their hearts, Ah, so would we have it:
Let them not say, We have swallowed him up.
26 Let them be ashamed and brought to confusion together
That rejoice at mine hurt:
Let them be clothed with shame and dishonour
That magnify themselves against me.
27 Let them shout for joy, and be glad,
That favour my righteous cause:
Yea, let them say continually, Let the LORD be magnified,
Which hath pleasure in the prosperity of his servant.
28 And my tongue shall speak of thy righteousness
And of thy praise all the day long.

In these verses, as before,

First. David describes the great injustice, malice, and insolence of his persecutors, pleading this with God as a reason why he should protect him from them, and appear against them. 1. They were very unrighteous. They were his enemies wrongfully, for he never gave them any provocation; they hated him without a cause; nay, for that for which they ought rather to have loved and honoured him. This is quoted with application to Christ, and is said to be fulfilled in him, Jno. xv. 25, "They hated me without cause." 2. They were very rude. They could not find it in their hearts to shew him common civility; "they speak not peace;" if they meet him, they had not the good manners to give him the time of day, like Joseph's brethren, that could not speak peaceably to him, Gen. xxxvii. 4. 3. They were very proud and scornful; ver. 21, "They opened their mouth wide against me;" that is, they shouted and huzzaed when they saw his fall; they bawled after him when he was forced to quit the court, "Aha, aha," this is the day we longed to see. 4. They were very barbarous and base; for they trampled upon him when he was down, rejoiced at his hurt, and magnified themselves against him, ver. 26. Turba Remi sequitur fortunam, ut semper, et odit damnatos,—'The Roman crowd, varying their opinions with every turn of fortune, are sure to execrate the fallen.' Thus, when the Son of David was run upon by the rulers, the people cried, "Crucify him, crucify him." 5. They set themselves against all the sober good people that adhered to David; ver. 20, "They devise deceitful matters" to trepan and ruin "them that are quiet in the land." Note, 1st. It is the character of the godly in the land, that they are the quiet in the land; that they live in all dutiful subjection to government and governors, in the Lord, and endeavour as much as in them lies to live peaceably with all men, however they have been misrepresented as enemies to Cæsar, and hurtful to kings and provinces. "I am for peace." Ps. cxx. 7. 2nd. Though the people of God are and study to be a quiet people, yet it has been the common practice of their enemies to devise deceitful matters against them. All the hellish arts of malice and falsehood are made use of to render them odious or despicable, their words and actions misconstrued, even that which they abhor fathered upon them, laws made to ensnare them, Dan. vi. 4, and all to ruin them and root them out. They that hated David thought scorn, like Haman, to lay hands on him alone, but contrived to involve all the religious people of the land in the same ruin with him.

Secondly. He appeals to God against them, the God to whom vengeance belongs. Appeals to his knowledge; ver. 22, "This thou hast seen." They had falsely accused him, but God, that knows all things, knew that he did not falsely accuse them, nor make them worse than really they were. They had carried on their plots against him with a great deal of secrecy; ver. 15, I knew it not till long after, when they themselves gloried in it; but thine eye was upon them in their close cabals, and thou art a witness of all they have said and done against me and thy people. He appeals to God's justice. "Awake to my judgment, even to my cause," and let it have a hearing at thy bar, ver. 23. "Judge me, O Lord my God;" that is, pass sentence upon this appeal, "according to the r ghteousness" of thy nature and government: see this explained by Solomon, 1 Kin. viii. 31, 32; When thou art appealed to, "hear in heaven, and judge, by condemning the wicked, and justifying the righteous."

Thirdly. He prays earnestly to God to appear graciously for him and his friends against his and their enemies, that by his providence the struggle might issue to the honour and comfort of David, and to the conviction and confusion of his prosecutors.

1. He prays that God would act for him, and not stand by as a spectator; ver. 17, "Lord, how long wilt thou look on?" how long wilt thou connive at the wickedness of the wicked? Rescue my soul from the destructions they are plotting against it; rescue my darling, my only one, from the lions. My soul is my only one, and therefore the greater is the shame if I neglect it, and the greater the loss if I lose it; it is my only one, and therefore ought to be my darling, ought to be carefully protected and provided for. It is my soul that is in danger, Lord, rescue it; it doth in a peculiar manner belong to the Father of spirits, therefore claim thine own; it is thine, save it. "Lord, keep not silence!" as if thou didst consent to what is done against me, "Lord, be not far from me!" ver. 22, as if I were a stranger that thou art not concerned for; let not me be beheld afar off, as the proud are.

2. He prays that his enemies might not have cause to rejoice; ver. 19, "Let them not rejoice over me," and again, ver. 24; not so much because it would be a mortification to him to be trampled upon by the abjects, but because it would turn to the dishonour of God, and the reproach of his confidence in God; it would harden the hearts of his enemies in their wickedness, and confirm them in their enmity to him, and would be a great discouragement to all the pious Jews that were friends to his righteous cause. He prays that he might never be in such imminent danger as that they should "say in their hearts, Ah, so would we have it," ver. 25, much more that he might not be reduced to such extremity as that they should say, "We have swallowed him up," for then they will reflect upon God himself. But, on the contrary, that they might be "ashamed and brought to confusion together," ver. 26, as before, ver. 4; he desires his innocency might be so cleared, as that they might be ashamed of the calumnies with which they had loaded him, that his interest might be so confirmed as that they might be ashamed of their designs against him and their expectations of his ruin, that they might either be brought to that shame which would be a step towards their reformation, or that that might be their portion which would be their everlasting misery.

3. He prays that his friends might have cause to rejoice and give glory to God, ver. 27. Notwithstanding the arts that were used to blacken David and make him odious, and to frighten people from owning him, there were some that favoured his righteous cause, that knew he was wronged, and bore a good affection to him; and he prays for them, 1st. That they might rejoice with him in his joys. It is a great pleasure to all that are good to see an honest man and an honest cause prevail and prosper; and those that heartily espouse the interests of God's people, and are willing to take their lot with them, even when they are run down and trampled upon, shall in due time shout for joy and be glad, for the righteous cause will at length be a victorious cause. 2nd. That they might join with him in his praises. "Let them say continually, The Lord be magnified," by us and others, "who hath pleasure in the prosperity of his servant." Note, First. The great God hath pleasure in the prosperity of good people, not only of his family, the church, in general, but of every particular servant in his family; he hath pleasure in the prosperity both of their temporal and of their spiritual affairs, and delights not in their griefs; for he doth not afflict willingly, and we ought therefore to have pleasure in their prosperity, and not to envy it. Secondly. When God in his providence shews his good-will to the prosperity of his servants, and the pleasure he takes in it, we ought to acknowledge it with thankfulness to his praise, and to say, "The Lord be magnified."

Lastly. The mercy he hoped to win by prayer he promiseth to wear with praise; "I will give thee thanks," as the author of my deliverance, ver. 18, and "my tongue shall speak of thy righteousness," the justice of thy judgments, and the common version, with which Montanus and Pagninus agree. The Greek and Latin give it another turn, as the Douay, "But I, when they were troublesome to me, did put on cloth of hair." There is no need to depart from our translation as Coleman has done: "But as for me, on account of their sin, sackcloth was my clothing," &c. The words "on account of their sin" are a mere perversion of the Hebrew for the support of a theory.

xxxv. 14. The latter clause, "I bowed down heavily, as one that mourneth for his mother," is much more correct than the alteration proposed by Adam Clarke, who takes the last words "as a mourning mother," which must be wrong. The ancient Greek, Latin, and Syriac omit the word "mother;" the two former are, "as mourning and sorrowful; so was I humbled;" and the latter is, "as he who sitteth in mourning, I lamented."

xxxv. 15. For "but in mine adversity they rejoiced," translate "when I halted they rejoiced;" or, "at my halting they rejoiced."

the equity of all thy dispensations; and this, 1. Publicly, as one that took a pleasure in owning his obligations to his God. So far was he from being ashamed of them, he will do it in the great congregation, and among much people, that God might be honoured, and many edified. 2. Constantly. He will speak God's praise every day, (so it may be read,) and all the day long; for it is a subject that will never be exhausted, no, not by the endless praises of saints and angels.

PSALM XXXVI.

It is uncertain when, and upon what occasion, David penned this psalm; probably when he was struck at either by Saul or by Absalom, for in it he complains of the malice of his enemies against him, but triumphs in the goodness of God to him. We are here led to consider, and it will do us good to consider seriously, I. The sinfulness of sin, and how mischievous it is, ver. 1—4. II. The goodness of God, and how gracious he is: 1. To all his creatures in general, ver. 5, 6; 2. To his own people in a special manner, ver. 7—9; with which the psalmist is encouraged to pray for all the saints, ver. 10: for himself in particular, and his own preservation, ver. 11; and to triumph in the certain fall of his enemies, ver. 12. If in singing this psalm our hearts be duly affected with the hatred of sin, and satisfaction in God's lovingkindness, we sing it with grace and understanding.

To the chief Musician, A Psalm of David the servant of the LORD.

THE transgression of the wicked saith within my heart,
That there is no fear of God before his eyes.
2 For he flattereth himself in his own eyes,
Until his iniquity be found to be hateful.
3 The words of his mouth are iniquity and deceit:
He hath left off to be wise, and to do good
4 He deviseth mischief upon his bed;
He setteth himself in a way that is not good;
He abhorreth not evil.

David in the title of this psalm is styled the servant of the Lord; why in this, and not in any other, except in Psalm xviii., title, no reason can be given; but so he was, not only as every good man is God's servant, but as a king, as a prophet, as one employed in serving the interests of God's kingdom among men, more immediately and more eminently than any other in his day. He glories in it, Ps. cxvi. 16. It is no disparagement, but an honour to the greatest of men to be the servants of the great God; it is the highest preferment a man is capable of in this world. David in these verses describes the wickedness of the wicked; whether he means his persecutors in particular, or all notorious gross sinners in general, is not certain. But we have here sin in its causes, and sin in its colours; in its root, and in its branches.

First. Here is the root of bitterness from which all the wickedness of the wicked comes. It takes rise,

1. From their contempt of God, and the want of a due regard to him; ver. 1, "The transgression of the wicked" (as it is described afterwards, ver. 3, 4,) "saith within my heart," that is, makes me to conclude within myself, that "there is no fear of God before his eyes," for if there were he would not talk and act so extravagantly as he doth; he would not, he durst not, break the laws of God, and violate his covenants with him, if he had any awe of his majesty, or dread of his wrath. Fitly therefore is it brought into the form of indictments by our law, that the criminal, not having the fear of God before his eyes, did so and so. The wicked did not openly renounce the fear of God, but their transgression whispered it secretly into the minds of all those that knew any thing of the nature of piety and impiety. David concluded concerning those who lived at large, that they lived without God in the world.

2. From their conceit of themselves, and a cheat they wilfully put upon their own souls; ver. 2, "He flattereth himself in his own eyes," that is, while he goes on in sin he thinks he doth wisely and well for himself, and either doth not see, or will not own, the evil and danger of his wicked practices. He "calls evil good, and good evil;" his licentiousness he pretends to be but his just liberty; his fraud passeth for his prudence and policy, and his persecuting the people of God he suggests to himself is a piece of necessary justice. If his own conscience threaten him for what he doth, he saith, "God will not require it, I shall have peace though I go on." Note, Sinners are self-destroyers by being self-flatterers. Satan could not deceive them if they did not deceive themselves. But will the cheat last always? No; the day is coming when the sinner will be undeceived, when his iniquity shall be found to be hateful. Iniquity is a hateful thing; it is that abominable thing which the Lord hates, and which his pure and jealous eye cannot endure to look upon. It is hurtful to the sinner himself, and therefore ought to be hateful; but it is not so, he rolls it under his tongue as a sweet morsel, because of the secular profit and sensual pleasure which perhaps attends it; yet "the meat in his bowels will be turned, it will be the gall of asps," Job xx. 13, 14. When their consciences are convinced, and sin appears in its true colours, and makes them a terror to themselves; when the cup of trembling is put into their hands, and they are made to drink the dregs of it, then their iniquity will be found hateful, and their self-flattery their unspeakable folly, and an aggravation of their condemnation.

Secondly. Here are the cursed branches which spring from this root of bitterness. The sinner defies God, and even deifies himself, and then what can be expected but that he should go all to nought? These two were the first inlets of sin. Men do not fear God, and therefore they flatter themselves, and then,

1. They make no conscience of what they say; true or false, right or wrong; ver. 3, "The words of his mouth are iniquity and deceit;" contrived to do wrong, and yet to cover it with specious and plausible pretences. It is no marvel if those that deceive themselves contrive how to deceive all mankind; for who will they be true to that are false to their own souls?

2. What little good there has been in them is gone. The sparks of virtue extinguished, their convictions baffled, their good beginnings come to nothing; "they have left off to be wise and to do good." They seemed to have been under the direction of wisdom, and the government of religion, but they have broken these bonds in sunder; they have shaken off their religion, and therewith their wisdom. Note, They that leave off to do good leave off to be wise.

3. Having left off to do good, they contrive to do hurt, and to be vexatious to those about them that are good, and do good; ver. 4, "He deviseth mischief upon his bed." Note, 1st. Omissions make way for commissions. When men leave off doing good, leave off praying, leave off their attendance on God's ordinances, and their duty to him, the devil easily makes them his agents, his instruments to draw those that will be drawn into sin, and those that will not, to draw them into trouble. Those that leave off to do good begin to do evil; the devil being an apostate from his innocency, soon became a tempter to Eve, and a persecutor of righteous Abel. 2nd. It is bad to do mischief, but it is worse to devise it; to do it deliberately and with resolution, to set the wits a work to contrive to do it most effectually, to do it with plot and management; with the subtlety as well as the malice of the old serpent. To devise it upon the bed, where we should be meditating upon God and his word, Mic. ii. 1, this argues the sinner's heart fully set in him to do evil.

4. Having entered into the way of sin, that way that is not good, that neither has good in it, nor good at the end of it, they persist, and resolve to persevere in that way. He sets himself to execute the mischief he has devised, and nothing shall be withholden from him which he has purposed to do, though it be never so contrary both to his duty and to his true interest. If sinners did not steel their hearts, and brazen their faces with obstinacy and impudence, they could not go on in their evil ways, in such a direct opposition to all that is just and good.

5. Doing evil themselves, they have no dislike at all of it in others. "He abhorreth not evil," but on the contrary takes pleasure in it, and is glad to see others as bad as himself. Or this may speak his impenitency in sin. They that have done evil, if God give them repentance, abhor the evil they have done, and themselves because of it; it is bitter in the reflection, however sweet it was in the commission: but these hardened sinners have such seared, stupified consciences, that they never reflect upon their sins afterwards with any regret or remorse, but stand to what they have done, as if they could justify it before God himself.

Some think David in all this particularly means Saul, who had cast off the fear of God, and left off all goodness; who pretended kindness to him, when he gave him his daughter to wife, but at the same time was devising mischief against him. But we are under no necessity of limiting ourselves so in the exposition of it; there are too many among us to whom the description agrees, which is to be greatly lamented.

5 Thy mercy, O LORD, is in the heavens;
And thy faithfulness reacheth unto the clouds.
6 Thy righteousness is like the great mountains;
Thy judgments are a great deep:
O LORD, thou preservest man and beast.
7 How excellent is thy lovingkindness, O God!
Therefore the children of men put their trust under the shadow of thy wings.
8 They shall be abundantly satisfied
With the fatness of thy house;
And thou shalt make them drink
Of the river of thy pleasures.
9 For with thee is the fountain of life:
In thy light shall we see light.
10 O continue thy lovingkindness unto them that know thee;
And thy righteousness to the upright in heart.
11 Let not the foot of pride come against me,
And let not the hand of the wicked remove me.
12 There are the workers of iniquity fallen:
They are cast down, and shall not be able to rise.

David, having looked round with grief upon the wickedness of the wicked, here looks up with comfort upon the goodness of God; a subject as delightful as the former was distasteful, and very proper to be set in the balance against it. Observe,

First. His meditations upon the grace of God. He sees the world polluted, himself endangered, and God dishonoured by the transgressions of the wicked; but of a sudden he turns his eye, and heart, and speech to God; However it be, yet thou art good. He here acknowledgeth,

1. The transcendent perfections of the Divine nature. Among men we have often reason to complain there is no truth nor mercy, Hos. iv. 1, no judgment nor justice, Isa. v. 7; but all these may be found in God without the least alloy. Whatever is missing or amiss in the world, we are sure there is nothing missing, nothing amiss, in him that governs it.

1st. He is a God of inexhaustible goodness; "Thy mercy, O Lord, is in the heavens." If men shut up the bowels of their compassion, yet with God, at the throne of his grace, we shall find mercy. When men are devising mischief against us, God's thoughts concerning us, if we cleave closely to him, are thoughts of good. On earth we meet with little content, but a great deal of disquiet and disappointment; but in the heavens, where the mercy of God reigns in perfection, and to eternity, there is all satisfaction. There, therefore, if we would be easy, let us have our conversation, and there let us long to be. How bad soever the world is, let us never think the worse of God, or of his government; but from the abundance of wickedness that is among men let us take occasion, instead of reflecting upon God's purity, as if he countenanced sin, to admire his patience, that he bears so much with those that so impudently provoke him; nay, and causeth his sun to shine, and his rain to fall, upon them. If God's mercy were not in the heavens, that is, infinitely above the mercies of any creature, he would long ere this have drowned the world again: see Isa. lv. 8, 9; Hos. xi. 9.

2nd. He is a God of inviolable truth; "Thy faithfulness reacheth unto the clouds." Though God suffers wicked people to do a great deal of mischief, yet he is, and will be, faithful to his threatenings against sin, and there will come a day when he will reckon with them; he is faithful also to his covenant with his people, which cannot be broken, not one jot or tittle of the promises of it defeated, by all the malice of earth and hell. This is matter of great comfort to all good people, that, though men are false, God is faithful; men speak vanity, but the words of the Lord are pure words. God's faithfulness reacheth so high that it doth not change with the weather, as men's doth, for it reacheth to the skies, so it should be read (as some think), above the clouds, and all the changes of the lower region.

3rd. He is a God of incontestable justice and equity; "Thy righteousness is like the great mountains," so immovable and inflexible itself, and so conspicuous and evident to all the world; for no truth is more certain or more plain than this, that the Lord is righteous in all his ways, and that he never did, nor ever will, do any wrong to any of his creatures. Even when clouds and darkness are round about him, yet judgment and justice are the habitation of his throne, Ps. xcvii. 2.

"The abjects" is explained "fools," or "godless," by Fürst. Gesenius, however, thinks the word means "smiters," or "railers." Some of the ancients understood the term to mean "smitings" or "scourges." We prefer the explanation of Gesenius, whose opinion is favoured by the rendering of the Chaldee Targum.

xxiv. 16. The first clause may be rendered, "with hypocritical mockers of perverseness," i.e., perverse and hypocritical mockers.

xxv. 17. "My darling" is literally "my only one," or "my only beloved;" but the word acquired the sense given it by our translators because an only child was apt to be the object of extreme affection. The Douay editors call this a prophecy of Christ's resurrection. Compare Psa. xxii. 20, where the word "darling" is used for the same Hebrew term, and means "the soul," as in this place.

xxv. 20. The Greek and Latin omit "not," and read, "Because indeed they spoke peaceably to me, and speaking on the wrath of the land they devised deceits." The Syriac resembles our common transla-

4th. He is a God of unsearchable wisdom and design; "Thy judgments are a great deep," not to be fathomed with the line and plummet of any finite understanding. As his power is sovereign, which he owes not any account of to us, so his method is singular and mysterious, which cannot be accounted for by us. "His way is in the sea, and his path in the great waters." We know he doth all wisely and well, but what he doth we know not now; it is time enough to know hereafter.

2. The extensive care and beneficence of the Divine providence; "Thou preservest man and beast," not only protectest them from mischief, but suppliest them with that which is needful for the support of life. The beasts, though not capable of knowing and praising God, yet are graciously provided for; their eyes wait on him, and he giveth them their meat in due season. Let us not wonder that God gives food to bad men, for he feeds the brute creatures; and let us not fear but that he will provide well for good men. He that feeds the young lions will not starve his own children.

3. The peculiar favour of God to the saints. Observe,

1st. Their character, ver. 7. They are such as are allured by the excellency of God's lovingkindness, to put their trust under the shadow of his wings. First. God's lovingkindness is precious to them; they relish it, they taste a transcendent sweetness in it, they admire God's beauty and benignity above any thing in this world; nothing so amiable, so desirable. Those know not God that do not admire his lovingkindness, and those know not themselves that do not earnestly covet it. Secondly. They therefore repose an entire confidence in him; they have recourse to him, put themselves under his protection, and then think themselves safe, and find themselves easy, as the chickens under the wings of the hen, Mat. xxiii. 37. It was the character of proselytes that they came "to trust under the wings of the God of Israel," Ru. ii. 12. And what more proper to gather proselytes than the excellency of his lovingkindness? What more powerful to engage our complacency to him and on him? Those that are thus drawn by love will cleave to him.

2nd. Their privilege. Happy, thrice happy, the people whose God is the Lord, for in him they have, or may have, or shall have, a complete happiness.

First. Their desires shall be answered; ver. 8, "They shall be abundantly satisfied with the fatness of thy house;" their wants supplied, their cravings gratified, and their capacities filled. In God All-sufficient they shall have enough; all that which an enlightened, enlarged soul can desire or receive. The gains of the world, and the delights of sense, will surfeit, but never satisfy, Isa. lv. 2; but the communications of Divine favour and grace will satisfy, but never surfeit. A gracious soul, though still desiring more of God, never desires more than God. The gifts of providence so far satisfy them that they are content with such things as they have; "I have all, and abound," Phil. iv. 18. The benefit of holy ordinances is the fatness of God's house, sweet to a sanctified soul, and strengthening to the spiritual and Divine life; with this they are abundantly satisfied; they desire nothing more in this world than to live a life of communion with God; and to have the comfort of the promises. But the full, the abundant satisfaction, is reserved for the future state, the house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens. Every vessel will be full there.

Secondly. Their joys shall be constant; "Thou shalt make them drink of the river of thy pleasures." There are pleasures that are truly Divine; they are thy pleasures; not only which come from thee as the giver of them, but which terminate in thee as the matter and centre of them, which being purely spiritual are of the same nature with those of the glorious inhabitants of the upper world, and bear some analogy even to the delights of the Eternal Mind. There is a river of these pleasures, always full, always fresh, always flowing. There is enough for all, enough for each: see Ps. xlvi. 4. The pleasures of sense are stinking puddle water; those of faith are pure and pleasant, clear as crystal, Rev. xxii. 1. God has not only provided this river of pleasures for his people, but he makes them to drink of it; works in them a gracious appetite to these pleasures, and by his Spirit fills their souls with joy and peace in believing. In heaven they shall be for ever drinking of those pleasures that are at God's right hand, satiated with a fulness of joy, Ps. xvi. 11.

Thirdly. Life and light shall be their everlasting bliss and portion, ver. 9, having God himself for their felicity. 1*st*. In him they have a fountain of life, from which those rivers of pleasure flow, ver. 8. The God of nature is the fountain of natural life, in him we live and move and have our being; the God of grace is the fountain of spiritual life. All the strength and comfort of a sanctified soul, all its gracious principles, powers, and performances, are from God; all its sensations of Divine things, and all its motions towards them, he is the spring and author of them all; he "quickeneth whom he will," and whosoever will may come and take from him of the waters of life freely. He is the fountain of eternal life. The happiness of glorified saints consists in the vision and fruition of him, and in the immediate communications of his love without interruption or fear of cessation. 2*nd*. In him they have light in perfection, wisdom, and knowledge, and joy, all included in this light. "In thy light we shall see light," that is, 1. In the knowledge of thee in grace, and the vision of thee in glory, we shall have that which will abundantly suit and satisfy our understandings. That Divine light which shines in the Scripture, and especially in the face of Christ, the light of the world, has all truth in it. When we come to see God face to face within the veil, we shall see light in perfection, we shall know enough then, 1 Cor. xiii. 12; 1 Jno. iii. 2. 2. In communion with thee now. By the communications of thy grace to us, and the return of our devout affections to thee, and in the fruition of thee shortly in heaven, we shall have a complete felicity and satisfaction. In thy favour we have all the good we can desire. This is a dark world, we see little comfort in it, but in the heavenly light there is true light, and no false light, light that is lasting and never wastes. In this world we see God, and enjoy him by creatures and means, but in heaven God himself shall be with us, Rev. xxi. 3; and we shall see and enjoy him immediately.

Secondly. We have here David's prayers, intercessions, and holy triumphs, grounded upon these meditations.

1. He intercedes for all saints, begging that they may always experience the benefit and comfort of God's favour and grace, ver. 10. 1st. The persons he prays for are those that know God, that are acquainted with him, acknowledge him, and avouch him for theirs; and the upright in heart, that are sincere in their profession of religion, and faithful both to God and man. Those that are not upright with God do not know him as they should. 2nd. The blessing he begs for them is God's lovingkindness, (that is, the tokens of his favour towards them,) and his righteousness, (that is, the workings of his grace in them,) or his lovingkindness and righteousness is his goodness according to promise; it is mercy and truth. 3rd. The manner in which he desires this blessing may be conveyed is, O continue it, draw it out, as the mother draws out her breasts to the child, and then the child draws out the milk from the breasts. Let it be drawn out to a length equal to the line of eternity itself. The happiness of the saints in heaven will be in perfection, and yet in continual progression, as some think; for the fountain there will be always full, and the streams always flowing. In these is continuance, Isa. lxiv. 5.

2. He prays for himself, that he might be preserved in his integrity and comfort; ver. 11, "Let not the foot of pride come against me," to trip up my heels, or trample upon me; and "let not the hand of the wicked," which is stretched out against me, prevail to "remove me," either from my purity and integrity by any temptation, or from my peace and comfort by any trouble. Let not those that fight against God triumph over those who desire to cleave to him. They that have experienced the pleasure of communion with God cannot but desire that nothing may ever remove them from him.

3. He rejoiceth in hope of the downfal of all his enemies in due time, ver. 12. There where they thought to have gained the point against me, they are themselves fallen, taken in that snare which they laid for me. There, in the other world, so some, there where the saints stand in the judgment, and have a place in God's house, the workers of iniquity are cast in the judgment, are cast down into hell, into the bottomless pit, out of which for certain they shall never be able to rise from under the insupportable weight of God's wrath and curse. It is true we are not to rejoice when any particular enemy of ours falls; but the final overthrow of all the workers of iniquity will be the everlasting triumph of glorified saints.

PSALM XXXVII.

This psalm is a sermon, and an excellent, useful sermon it is, calculated not, as most of the psalms, for our devotion, but for our conversation. There is nothing in it of prayer or praise, but it is all instruction; it is Maschil, a teaching psalm; it is an exposition of some of the hardest chapters in the book of Providence, the advancement of the wicked, and the disgrace of the righteous, a solution of the difficulties that arise thereupon, and an exhortation to carry ourselves as becomes us under such dark dispensations. The work of the prophets (and David was one) was to explain the law. Now the law of Moses had promised temporal blessings to the obedient, and denounced temporal miseries against the disobedient, which principally referred to the body of the people, the nation as a nation; for, when they came to be applied to particular persons, many instances occurred of sinners in prosperity, and saints in adversity: to reconcile those instances with the word that God had spoken, is the scope of the prophet in this psalm, in which, I. He forbids us to fret at the prosperity of the wicked in their wicked ways, ver. 1, 7, 8. II. He gives very good reasons why we should not fret at it: 1. Because of the scandalous character of the wicked, ver. 12, 14, 21, 32, notwithstanding their prosperity, and the honourable character of the righteous, ver. 21, 26, 30, 31; 2. Because of the destruction and ruin which the wicked are nigh to, ver. 2, 9, 10, 20, 35, 36, 38, and the salvation and protection which the righteous are sure of from all the malicious designs of the wicked, ver. 13, 15, 17, 28, 33, 39, 40; 3. Because of the particular mercy God has in store for all good people, and the favour he shews them, ver. 11, 16, 18, 19, 22—25, 28, 29, 37. III. He prescribes very good remedies against this sin of envying the prosperity of the wicked, and great encouragement to use those remedies, ver. 3—6, 27, 34. In singing this psalm, we must teach and admonish one another rightly to understand the providences of God, and to accommodate ourselves to them; at all times carefully to do our duty, and then patiently to leave the event with God, and to believe that, how black soever things may look for the present, it shall be well with them that fear God, that fear before him.

A Psalm of David.

FRET not thyself because of evildoers,
Neither be thou envious against the workers of iniquity.
2 For they shall soon be cut down like the grass,
And wither as the green herb.
3 Trust in the LORD, and do good; [fed.
So shalt thou dwell in the land, and verily thou shalt be 4 Delight thyself also in the LORD;
And he shall give thee the desires of thine heart.
5 Commit thy way unto the LORD;
Trust also in him; and he shall bring it to pass.
6 And he shall bring forth thy righteousness as the light,
And thy judgment as the noonday.

The instructions here given are very plain, much need not be said for the exposition of them; but there is a deal to be done for the reducing of them to practice, and there they will look best.

First. We are here cautioned against discontent at the prosperity and success of evil-doers; ver. 1, 2, "Fret not thyself, neither be thou envious." We may suppose that David speaks this to himself first, and preaches it to his own heart, in his communing with that upon his bed, for the suppressing of those corrupt passions which he found working there, and then leaves it in writing, for instruction to others that might be in the like temptation. That is preached best, and with most probability of success to others, which is first preached to ourselves. Now, 1. When we look abroad, we see the world full of evil-doers, and workers of iniquity, that flourish and prosper, that have what they will, and do what they will, that live in ease and pomp themselves, and have power in their hands to do mischief to those about them. So it was in David's time, and therefore, if it is so still, let us not marvel at the matter, as though it were some new or strange thing. 2. When we look within, we find ourselves in temptation to fret at this, and to be envious against these scandals and burthens, these blemishes and common nuisances of this earth. We are apt to fret at God, as if he were unkind to the world, and unkind to his church, in permitting such men to live and prosper, and prevail as they do. We are apt to fret ourselves with vexation at their success in their evil projects; we are apt to envy them the liberty they take in getting wealth, and perhaps by unlawful means, and in the indulgence of their lusts, and to wish that we could shake off the restraints of conscience, and do so too. We are tempted to think them the only happy people, and to incline to imitate them, and to join ourselves with them, that we may share in their gains, and eat of their dainties; and this is that which we are warned against: "Fret not thyself, neither be thou envious." Fretfulness and envy are sins that are their own punishments, they are the uneasiness of the spirit, and the rottenness of the bones; it is therefore in kindness to ourselves that we are warned against it. Yet that is not all; for, 3. When we look forward with an eye of faith, we shall see no reason to envy wicked people their prosperity, for their ruin is at the door, and they are ripening apace for it, ver. 2. They flourish but as the grass, and as the green herb, which nobody envies or frets at. The flourishing of a godly man is like that of a fruitful tree, Ps. i. 3; but that of the wicked man like grass and herbs, which are very short-lived. 1st. They will soon wither of themselves. Outward prosperity is a fading thing, and so is the life itself, to which it is confined. 2nd. They will sooner be cut down by the judgments of God. Their triumphing is short, but their weeping and wailing will be everlasting.

Secondly. We are here counselled to live a life of confidence and complacency in God, and that will keep us from fretting at the prosperity of evil-doers. If we do well for our own souls, we shall see little reason to envy those that do tion in the main: "And they speak not peace, and against the humble of the land they devise deceit." The "quiet in the land" are probably the godly, and such as our Lord means when he says, "Blessed are the peacemakers."

xxxvi. Title. It cannot be supposed that this title was added by the composer of the psalm. The occasion of the composition is doubtful. The Syriac says David wrote it when Saul was persecuting him.

xxxvi. 1. The Syriac renders the first verse, "The wicked thinketh evil in his heart, because there is no fear of God before his eyes." The Douay, after the Latin, is, "The unjust hath said within himself, that he would sin; there is no fear of God before his eyes." So the Greek, and it must be noted that one or two Hebrew manuscripts read, "within his heart." Very many ingenious interpretations of the words have been proposed; and perhaps the best is this, "The oracle of wickedness to the wicked is in his own heart;" i.e., his inclinations are his supreme law.

so ill for theirs. Here are three excellent precepts which we are to be ruled by, and to enforce them three precious promises which we may rely upon.

1. We must make God our hope in the way of duty, and then we shall have a comfortable subsistence in this world, ver. 3. 1st. It is required that we "trust in the Lord, and do good;" that we confide in God, and conform to him. The life of religion lies much in a believing reliance on God, his favour, his providence, his promise, his grace, and a diligent care to serve him and our generation according to his will. We must not think to trust in God, and then live as we list; no, it is not trusting God, but tempting him, if we do not make conscience of our duty to him; nor must we think to do good, and then to trust to ourselves and our own righteousness and strength; no, we must both trust in the Lord, and do good. And then, 2nd. It is promised that we shall be well provided for in this world; "So shalt thou dwell in the land, and verily thou shalt be fed." He doth not say, so shalt thou get preferment, dwell in a palace and be feasted—what needs that? a man's life consists not in the abundance of these things—but thou shalt have a place to live in, and that "in the land," in Canaan, the valley of vision; and thou shalt have food convenient for thee. This is more than we deserve; it is as much as a good man will indent for, Gen. xxviii. 20; and it is enough for one that is going to heaven. Thou shalt have a settlement, a quiet settlement, and a maintenance, a comfortable maintenance: "Verily thou shalt be fed." Some read it, 'Thou shalt be fed by faith,' as the just are said to live by faith; and it is good living, good feeding upon the promises. "Verily thou shalt be fed," as Elijah in the famine, with what is needful for thee. God himself is a shepherd, a feeder to all those that trust in him, Ps. xxiii. 1.

2. We must make God our heart's delight, and then we shall have our heart's desire, ver. 4. We must not only depend upon God, but solace ourselves in him. We must be well pleased that there is a God, that he is such a one as he has revealed himself to be, and that he is our God in covenant. We must delight ourselves in his beauty, bounty, and benignity; our souls must return to him, and repose in him as their rest, and their portion for ever. Being satisfied of his lovingkindness, we must be satisfied with it, and make that our exceeding joy, Ps. xliii. 4. We were commanded, ver. 3, to do good; and then follows this command, to delight in God, which is as much a privilege as a duty. If we make conscience of obedience to God, we may then take the comfort of a complacency in him; and even this pleasant duty of delighting in God has a promise annexed to it, which is very full and precious, enough to recompense the hardest services; "He shall give thee the desires of thy heart." He has not promised to gratify all the appetites of the body, and the humours of the fancy, but to grant all the desires of the heart, all the cravings of the renewed sanctified soul. What is the desire of the heart of a good man? It is this, to know, and love, and live to God, to please him, and to be pleased in him.

3. We must make God our guide, and submit in every thing to his conduct and dispose; and then all our affairs, even those that seem most intricate and perplexed, shall be made to issue well, and to our satisfaction, ver. 5, 6.

1st. The duty is very easy, and if we do it aright it will make us easy. "Commit thy way unto the Lord;" 'roll thy way upon the Lord,' so the margin reads it, Pr. xvi. 3; Ps. lv. 22, "Cast thy burthen upon the Lord," that is, the burthen of thy care, 1 Pet. v. 7. We must roll it off ourselves, so as not to afflict and perplex ourselves with thoughts about future events, Mat. vi. 25; not to cumber and trouble ourselves either with contrivance of the means or with expectation of the end; but refer it to God, leave it to him by his wise and good providence to order and dispose of all our concerns as he pleaseth. 'Reveal thy way unto the Lord,' (so the Seventy;) that is, by prayer spread thy case and all thy cares about it before the Lord, as "Jephthah uttered all his words before the Lord in Mizpeh," Jud. xi. 11; and then trust in him to bring it to a good issue, with a full satisfaction that all is well that God doth. We must do our duty, that must be our care, and then leave the event with God; "Sit still, and see how the matter will fall," Ru. iii. 18. We must follow providence, and not force it; subscribe to Infinite Wisdom, and not prescribe.

2nd. The promise is very sweet. First. In general, he shall bring that to pass, whatever it is, which thou hast committed to him, if not to thy contrivance, yet to thy content. He will find means to extricate thee out of thy straits, to prevent thy fears, and bring about thy purposes to thy satisfaction. Secondly. In particular, he will take care of thy reputation, and bring thee out of thy difficulties, not only with comfort, but with credit and honour. "He shall bring forth thy righteousness as the light, and thy judgment as the noonday," ver. 6, that is, he shall make it to appear that thou art an honest man, and that is honour enough. 1*st.* It is implied that the righteousness and judgment of good people may for a time be clouded and eclipsed, either by remarkable rebukes of Providence, (Job's great afflictions darkened his righteousness,) or by the malicious censures and reproaches of men, who put them under ill characters, which they no way deserve, and lay to their charge things which they know not. 2*nd.* It is promised that God will in due time roll away the reproach they are under, clear up their innocency, and bring forth their righteousness to their honour; perhaps in this world, at farthest in the great day, Mat. xiii. 43. Note, If we take care to keep a good conscience, we may leave it to God to take care of our good name.

7 Rest in the LORD, and wait patiently for him:
Fret not thyself because of him who prospereth in his way,
Because of the man who bringeth wicked devices to pass.
8 Cease from anger, and forsake wrath:
Fret not thyself in any wise to do evil.
9 For evildoers shall be cut off: [the earth.
But those that wait upon the LORD, they shall inherit 10 For yet a little while, and the wicked shall not be:
Yea, thou shalt diligently consider his place, and it shall 11 But the meek shall inherit the earth; [not be.
And shall delight themselves in the abundance of peace.
The wicked plotteth against the just,
And gnasheth upon him with his teeth.
The LORD shall laugh at him:
For he seeth that his day is coming. [their bow,
14 The wicked have drawn out the sword, and have bent
To cast down the poor and needy,
And to slay such as be of upright conversation.
15 Their sword shall enter into their own heart.
And their bows shall be broken.
16 A little that a righteous man hath
Is better than the riches of many wicked.
17 For the arms of the wicked shall be broken:
But the LORD upholdeth the righteous.
18 The LORD knoweth the days of the upright:
And their inheritance shall be for ever.
19 They shall not be ashamed in the evil time:
And in the days of famine they shall be satisfied.
20 But the wicked shall perish, [lambs:
And the enemies of the LORD shall be as the fat of
They shall consume; into smoke shall they consume away.

In these verses we have,

First. The foregoing precepts inculcated, for we are so apt to disquiet ourselves with needless, fruitless discontents and distrusts, that it is necessary there should be precept upon precept, and line upon line, to suppress them, and arm us against them.

1. Let us compose ourselves by believing in God: "Rest in the Lord, and wait patiently for him," ver. 7; that is, be well reconciled to all he doth, and acquiesce in it, for that is best that is, because it is what God has appointed; and be well satisfied that he will still make all to work for good to us, though we know not how or which way. 'Be silent to the Lord,' so the word is; not with a sullen, but a submissive silence. A patient bearing what is laid upon us, and a patient expectation of what is farther appointed for us, is as much our interest as it is our duty; for it will make us always easy, and there is a great deal of reason for it; for it is making a virtue of necessity.

2. Let us not discompose ourselves at what we see in this world: "Fret not thyself because of him who prospers in his" wicked "way;" that, though he is an ill man, yet thrives, and grows rich and great in the world. No, nor because of him who doth mischief with his power and wealth, and "brings wicked devices to pass," against those that are virtuous and good; who seems to have gained his point, and to have run them down. If thy heart begins to rise at it, stroke down thy folly, and cease from anger, ver. 8; check the first stirrings of discontent and envy, and do not harbour any hard thoughts of God and his providence upon this account; be not angry at any thing that God doth, but forsake that wrath; it is the worst kind of wrath that can be. "Fret not thyself in any wise to do evil;" that is, do not envy them their prosperity, lest thou be tempted to fall in with them, and to take the same evil course that they take to enrich and advance themselves, or some desperate course to avoid them and their power. Note, A fretful, discontented spirit lies open to many temptations, and those that indulge it are in danger of doing evil.

Secondly. The foregoing reasons taken from the approaching ruin of the wicked, notwithstanding their prosperity, and the real happiness of the righteous, notwithstanding their troubles, are here much enlarged upon, and the same things repeated in a pleasing variety of expression. We were cautioned, ver. 7, not to envy the wicked, either their worldly prosperity, or the success of their plots against the righteous; and the reasons here given respect these two temptations severally.

1. Good people have no reason to envy the worldly prosperity of wicked people, nor to grieve or be uneasy at it.

1st. Because the prosperity of the wicked will soon be at an end; ver. 9, "Evildoers shall be cut off," by some sudden stroke of Divine justice, in the midst of their prosperity. What they have got by sin will not only flow away from them, Job xx. 28, but they shall be carried away with it. See the end of these men, Ps. lxxiii. 17; how dear their ill-got gain will cost them, and you will be far from envying them, or from being willing to espouse their lot for better, for worse. Their ruin is sure, and it is very near; ver. 10, "Yet a little while and the wicked shall not be" what they now are; "they are brought into desolation in a moment," Ps. lxxiii. 19. Have a little patience, for "the Judge stands before the door," Jas. v. 8, 9. Moderate your passion, "for the Lord is at hand," Phil. iv. 5. And when it comes it will be an utter ruin, he and his shall be extirpated; the day that comes shall leave him neither root nor branch, Mal. iv. 1. "Thou shalt diligently consider his place," where but the other day he made a mighty figure, "but it shall not be;" you will not find it, he shall leave nothing valuable, nothing honourable behind him. To the same purpose, ver. 20, "The wicked shall perish;" their death is their perdition, because it is the period of all their joy, and a passage to endless misery. "Blessed are the dead that die in the Lord;" but undone, for ever undone, are the dead that die in their sins. The wicked are the enemies of the Lord; so they make themselves who will not have him to reign over them, and as such he will reckon with them; "they shall consume as the fat of lambs, they shall consume into smoke." Their prosperity, which gratifies their sensuality, is like the fat of lambs; not solid or substantial, but loose and washy; and when their ruin comes they shall fall as sacrifices to the justice of God, and be consumed as the fat of the sacrifices was upon the altar, whence it ascended in smoke. The day of God's vengeance on the wicked is represented as a "sacrifice of the fat of the kidneys of rams," Isa. xxxiv. 6; for he will be honoured by the ruin of his enemies, as he was by the sacrifices. Damned sinners are sacrifices, Mar. ix. 49. This is a good reason why we should not envy them their prosperity; while they are fed to the full, they are but in the fattening for the day of sacrifice, "like a lamb in a large place," Hos. iv. 16; and the more they prosper the more will God be glorified in their ruin.

2nd. Because the condition of the righteous even in this life is every way better and more desirable than that of the wicked, ver. 16. In general, "a little that a righteous man has" of the honour, wealth, and pleasure of this world, "is better than the riches of many wicked." Observe, (1.) The wealth of the world is so dispensed by the Divine providence, that it is often the lot of good people to have but a little of it, and of wicked people to have abundance of it; for thus God would shew us that the things of this world are not the best things, for if they were those would have most that are best and dearest to God. (2.) That a godly man's little is really better than a wicked man's much: see Pr. xv. 16, 17; xvi. 8; xxviii. 6. A godly man's estate, though never so little, is better than a wicked man's estate, though never so much, for it comes from a better hand; from a hand of special love, and not merely from a hand of common providence; it is enjoyed by a better title, God gives it to them by promise, Gal. iii. 18; it is theirs by virtue of their relation to Christ, who is the heir of all things: and it is put to a better use: it is sanctified to them by the blessing of God; "unto the pure all things are pure," Tit. i. 15. A little, wherewith God is served and honoured, is better than a xxxvi. 2. This is an obscure verse, at least in the latter part of it. "He flattereth himself in his own eyes, until his iniquity be found to be hateful;" i.e., he flatters and deceives himself in a matter of the greatest moment; he ought to detect his own sins, and to see their abominable character, but he fails to do it.

xxxvii. Title. It is unknown when this psalm was written; but it is one of those called alphabetical or acrostic. As usual, there are a few irregularities in the composition; it should consist of twenty-two portions of four lines each, but there are single lines wanting at verses 7, 20, and 34. These and a few other anomalies appear in all copies.

xxxvii. 3. Other renderings have been proposed for the latter clause — e.g., Montanus, "dwell in the land, and feed on truth;" Munster has, "dwell in the land, and thou shalt feed on truth;" Jerome, "feed upon faith;" the Latin Vulgate, "thou shalt feed on its riches" (or, "shalt be fed with its riches"); the Syriac, "dwell in the land, and seek after truth." Most of these variations are easily great deal prepared for Baal, or for a base lust. The promises here made to the righteous secure them such a happiness as that they need not envy the prosperity of evil-doers. Let them know to their comfort,

First. That they shall inherit the earth; that is, as much of it as Infinite Wisdom sees good for them; they have the promises of the life that now is, 1 Tim. iv. 8. If all the earth were necessary to make them happy, they should have it. All is theirs, even the world, and things present, as well as things to come, 1 Cor. iii. 21, 22. They have it by inheritance, a safe and honourable title, not by permission only, and connivance. When evil-doers are cut off, the righteous sometimes inherit what they gathered; "The wealth of the sinner is laid up for the just," Job xxvii. 17. This promise is here made, 1*st.* To those that live a life of faith; ver. 9, "Those that wait upon the Lord" as dependants on him, expectants from him, and supplicants to him, "they shall inherit the earth," as a token of his present favour to them, and an earnest of better things intended for them in the other world. God is a good master, that provides plentifully and well, not only for his working servants, but for his waiting servants. 2*nd.* To those that live a quiet and peaceable life; ver. 11, "The meek shall inherit the earth." They are in least danger of being injured and disturbed in the possession of what they have; and they have most satisfaction in themselves, and consequently the sweetest relish of their creature comforts. Our Saviour has made this a Gospel promise, and a confirmation of the blessing he pronounced on the meek, Mat. v. 5.

Secondly. That they shall "delight themselves in the abundance of peace," ver. 11. Perhaps they have not abundance of wealth to delight in, but they have that which is better,—abundance of peace, inward peace and tranquillity of mind. Peace with God, and then peace in God; that great peace which they have that love God's law, whom nothing shall offend, Ps. cxix. 165; that abundance of peace which is in the kingdom of Christ, Ps. lxxii. 7; that peace which the world cannot give, Jno. xiv. 27; and which the wicked cannot have, Isa. lvii. 21. This they shall delight themselves in, and in it they shall have a continual feast, while they that have abundance of wealth do but cumber and perplex themselves with it, and have little delight in it.

Thirdly. That God knows their days, ver. 18. He takes particular notice of them, of all they do, and of all that happens to them. He keeps account of the days of their service, and not one day's work shall go unrewarded; and of the days of their suffering, that for those also they may receive a recompence. He knows their fair days, and hath pleasure in their prosperity; he knows their cloudy and dark days, the days of their affliction, and "as the day is so shall the strength be."

Fourthly. That "their inheritance shall be for ever." Their time on earth is reckoned by days, which will be soon numbered; God takes cognizance of them, and gives them the blessings of every day in its day, but it was never intended that their inheritance should be confined within the limits of those days; no, that must be the portion of an immortal soul, and therefore must last as long as that lasts, and will run parallel with the longest line of eternity itself: "their inheritance shall be for ever;" not their inheritance in the earth, but that incorruptible, indefeasible one, which is laid up for them in heaven. They that are sure of an everlasting inheritance in the other world have no reason to envy the wicked their transitory possessions and pleasures in this world.

Fifthly. That in the worst of times it shall go well with them; ver. 19, "They shall not be ashamed" of their hope and confidence in God, nor of the profession they have made of religion; for the comfort of that will stand them in stead, and be a real support to them in evil times. When others droop, they shall lift up their heads with joy and confidence: even "in the days of famine," when others are dying for hunger round about them, "they shall be satisfied," as Elijah was. Some way or other, God will provide food convenient for them, or give them hearts to be satisfied and content without it; so that, if they should be "hardly bestead and hungry," they shall not (as the wicked do) "fret themselves, and curse their king, and their God," Isa. viii. 21; but rejoice in God as the God of their salvation, even when the fig-tree doth not blossom, Hab. iii. 17, 18.

2. Good people have no reason to fret at the success of the designs of the wicked against the just in some measure and degree. Suppose they do bring some of their wicked devices to pass, which makes us fear they will gain their point, and bring them all to pass; yet let us cease from anger, and not fret ourselves, so as to think of giving up the cause. For,

1st. Their plots will be their shame, ver. 12, 13. It is true "the wicked plotteth against the just;" there is a rooted enmity in the seed of the wicked one against the righteous seed. Their aim is, if they can, to destroy their righteousness, if that fail, then to destroy them. To this end, they have acted with a great deal both of cursed policy and contrivance. they plot, they practise against the just; and of cursed zeal and fury, "they gnash upon them with their teeth:" so desirous are they, if they could get it into their power, to eat them up; and so full of rage and indignation are they, because it is not in their power. But by all this they do but make themselves ridiculous; "The Lord shall laugh at them," Ps. ii. 4, 5. They are proud and insolent; but God shall pour contempt upon them. He is not only displeased with them, but he despiseth them and all their attempts as vain and ineffectual, and their malice as impotent, and in a chain, for "he sees that his day is coming;" that is, First. The day of God's reckoning, the day of the revelation of his righteousness, which now seems clouded and eclipsed. Men have their day now, "This is your hour," Lu. xxii. 53; but God will have his day shortly; a day of recompences, a day which will set all to rights, and render that ridiculous which now passeth for glorious. "It is a small thing to be judged of men's judgment," 1 Cor. iv. 3. God's day will give a decisive judgment. Secondly. The day of their ruin, the wicked man's day, the day set for his fall; that day is coming,—which notes delay, it is not yet come, but certainly it will come. The believing prospect of that day will enable the virgin the daughter of Zion to despise the rage of her enemies, and laugh them to scorn, Isa. xxxvii. 22.

2nd. Their attempts will be their destruction, ver. 14, 15. See here, First. How barbarous they are in their designs against good people. They prepare instruments of death, the sword and the bow, no less will serve; they hunt for the precious life; that which they design is to cast down and slay, it is the blood of the saints they thirst after. They carry on the design very far, and it is near to be put in execution, they have drawn the sword and bent the bow; and all these military preparations are made against the helpless, the poor and needy, which speaks them very cowardly; and against the guiltless, such as be of upright conversation, that never gave them any provocation, nor offered injury to them or any other person, which speaks them very wicked. Uprightness itself will be no fence against their malice. But, Secondly. How justly their malice recoils upon themselves; "Their sword shall turn into their own heart," which implies the preservation of the righteous from their malice, and the filling up of the measure of their own iniquity by it. Sometimes that very thing proves to be their own destruction which they projected against their harmless neighbours. However, God's sword, which their provocations have drawn against themselves, will give them their death's wound.

3rd. Those that are not suddenly cut off, yet shall be so disabled to do any farther mischief that the interests of the church shall be effectually secured. "Their bows shall be broken," ver. 15; the instruments of their cruelty shall fail them, and they shall lose those whom they had made tools of to serve their bloody purposes with; nay, "their arms shall be broken," so that they shall not be able to go on with their enterprises. "But the Lord upholdeth the righteous:" so that they neither sink under the weight of their afflictions nor are run down by the violence of their enemies. He upholdeth them both in their integrity and in their prosperity; and they that are so upheld by the Rock of ages have no reason to envy the wicked the support of their broken reeds.

21 The wicked borroweth, and payeth not again:
But the righteous sheweth mercy, and giveth.
22 For such as be blessed of him shall inherit the earth;
And they that be cursed of him shall be cut off.
23 The steps of a good man are ordered by the LORD:
And he delighteth in his way.
24 Though he fall, he shall not be utterly cast down:
For the LORD upholdeth him with his hand.
25 I have been young, and now am old;
Yet have I not seen the righteous forsaken,
Nor his seed begging bread.
26 He is ever merciful, and lendeth;
And his seed is blessed.
27 Depart from evil, and do good;
And dwell for evermore.
28 For the LORD loveth judgment,
And forsaketh not his saints;
They are preserved for ever:
But the seed of the wicked shall be cut off.
29 The righteous shall inherit the land,
And dwell therein for ever.
30 The mouth of the righteous speaketh wisdom,
And his tongue talketh of judgment.
31 The law of his God is in his heart;
None of his steps shall slide.
32 The wicked watcheth the righteous,
And seeketh to slay him.
33 The LORD will not leave him in his hand,
Nor condemn him when he is judged.

These verses are much to the same purpose with the foregoing verses of this psalm; for it is a subject worthy to be dwelt upon. Observe here,

First. What is required of us as the way to our happiness; which we may learn both from the characters here laid down and the directions here given. If we would be blessed of God,

1. We must make conscience of giving every body their own; for "the wicked borroweth, and payeth not again," ver. 21. It is the first thing which the Lord our God requires of us, that we do justly, and render to all their due. It is not only a shameful, paltry thing, but a sinful, wicked thing, not to repay what we have borrowed. Some make this an instance not so much of the wickedness of the wicked as of the misery and poverty to which they are reduced by the just judgment of God; that they shall be necessitated to borrow for their supply, and then be in no capacity to repay again, and so lie at the mercy of their creditors. And, whatever some men seem to think of it, as it is a great sin for those that are able to deny the payment of their just debts, so it is a great misery not to be able to pay them.

2. We must be ready to all acts of charity and beneficence. For, as it is an instance of God's goodness to the righteous, that he puts it into the power of his hand to be kind and to do good, (and so some understand it, God's blessing increaseth his little to that degree that he has abundance to spare for the relief of others,) so it is an instance of the goodness of the righteous man, that he has a heart proportionable to his estate; he "sheweth mercy, and giveth," ver. 21. "He is ever merciful," or every day, or all the day, merciful, "and lendeth;" and sometimes there is as true charity in lending as in giving; and giving and lending are then acceptable to God, when they come from a merciful disposition in the heart, which, if it be sincere, will be constant, and will keep us from being weary of well-doing. He that is truly merciful will be ever merciful.

3. We must leave our sins, and engage in the practice of serious godliness; ver. 27, "Depart from evil and do good;" cease to do evil, and abhor it; learn to do well, and cleave to it. This is true religion.

4. We must abound in good discourse, and with our tongues must glorify God and edify others. That is part of the character of a righteous man, ver. 30, that his mouth speaketh wisdom; not only he speaks wisely, but he speaks wisdom, like Solomon himself, for the instruction of those about him; his tongue talketh not of things idle and impertinent, but of judgment, that is, of the word and providence of God, and the rules of wisdom for the right ordering of the conversation. Out of the abundance of a good heart will the mouth speak that which is good, and to the use of edifying.

5. We must have our wills brought into an entire subjection to the will and word of God; ver. 31, "The law of God," of his God, "is in his heart;" and in vain do we pretend that God is our God, if we do not receive his law into our hearts, and resign ourselves to the government of it. It is but a jest and a mockery to speak wisdom, and to talk of judgment, ver. 30, unless we have the law in our hearts, and we think as we speak. The law of God must be a commanding, ruling principle in the heart; it must be a light there, a spring there, and then the conversation will be regular and uniform; none of his steps will slide; it will effectually prevent backsliding into sin, and the uneasiness that follows from it.

Secondly. What is assured to us as instances of our happiness and comfort, upon these conditions.

1. That we shall have the blessing of God, and that blessing shall be the spring, and sweetness, and security of all our temporal comforts and enjoyments; ver. 22, "Such as be blessed of God," as all the righteous are, with accounted for. The natural translation of the Hebrew is, "dwell in the land, and feed confidently." "The earth is the Lord's, and the fulness thereof;" why should the Lord's servant be oppressed with worldly cares?

xxxvii. 7. For "rest in the Lord, and wait patiently for him," the Greek has, "be subject to the Lord, and supplicate him;" the Syriac has, "seek from the Lord, and pray before him." Our version very well represents the Hebrew text, though it is somewhat paraphrastic.

xxxvii. 12, 13. These two verses must be connected together, and should therefore not be separated by a full stop.

xxxvii. 20. The words "the enemies of the Lord shall be as the fat of lambs" are open to question. It was long since suggested that the Hebrew meant costly or valuable lambs, and this opinion is held by some recent critics of eminence. The Syriac is, "For the wicked perish; and the fattened enemies of the Lord are consumed, and come to an end like smoke." Gesenius suggests that for "as the fat of a Father's blessing, by virtue of that "shall inherit the earth," or the land, for so the same word is translated, ver. 29; the land of Canaan, that glory of all lands. Our creature comforts are then comforts indeed to us, when we see them flowing from the blessing of God, from his favour, his promise, and his covenant with us; and if we are sure of the blessing of God we are sure not to want any thing that is good for us in this world. The earth shall yield us her increase, if God, as our own God, give us his blessing, Ps. lxvii. 6. And as those whom God blesseth are thus blessed indeed, for they shall inherit the land, so those whom he curseth are cursed indeed, and they shall be cut off and rooted out. And their extirpation by the Divine curse will set off the establishment of the righteous by the Divine blessing, and be a foil to it.

4. That God will direct and dispose of our actions and affairs, so as may be most for his glory; ver. 23, "The steps of a good man are ordered by the Lord." By his grace and Holy Spirit he directs the thoughts, affections, and designs of good men; he has all hearts in his hand, but theirs by their own consent; by his providence he overrules the events that are concerning them, so as to make their way plain before them, both what they should do and what they may expect. Observe, God orders the steps of a good man; not only his way in general, by his written word, but his particular steps by the whispers of conscience, saying, "This is the way, walk in it." He doth not always shew him his way at a distance, but leads him step by step, as children are led, and so keeps him in a continual dependence upon his conduct. And this, 1st. Because he delighteth in his way, and is well pleased with the paths of righteousness wherein he walks. "The Lord knows the way of the righteous," Ps. i. 6; knows it with favour, and therefore directs it. 2nd. That he may delight in his way. Because God orders his way according to his own will, therefore he delights in it; for, as he loves his own image upon us, so he is well pleased with what we do under his conduct.

3. That God will keep us from being ruined by our falls, either into sin or into trouble; ver. 24, "Though he fall, he shall not be utterly cast down." 1st. It is possible a good man may be overtaken in a fault, but the grace of God shall recover him to repentance, so that "he shall not be utterly cast down." Though he may for a time lose the joys of God's salvation, yet they shall be restored to him; for God shall uphold him with his hand, uphold him with his free Spirit. The root shall be kept alive, though the leaf wither; and there will come a spring after the winter. 2nd. It is possible a good man may be in distress, his affairs embarrassed, his spirits sunk, but "he shall not be utterly cast down;" God will be the strength of his heart, when his flesh and heart fail, and will uphold him with his comforts, so that the spirit he has made shall not fail before him.

4. That we shall not want the necessary supports of this life; ver. 25, "I have been young, and now am old;" and of all the changes I have seen in men's outward condition, and the observations I have made upon them, "I never saw the righteous forsaken" of God and man, as I have sometimes seen wicked people abandoned both by heaven and earth; nor do I ever remember to have seen the seed of the righteous reduced to that extremity as to beg their bread. David had himself begged his bread of Ahimelech the priest, but it was when Saul hunted him; and our Saviour has taught us to except the case of persecution for righteousness' sake out of all the temporal promises, Mar. x. 30, because that has such peculiar honours and comforts attending it, as make it rather a gift (as the apostle reckons it, Phil. i. 29,) than a loss or grievance. But there are very few instances of good men, or their families, that are reduced to such extreme poverty as many wicked people bring themselves to by their wickedness. He had not seen the righteous forsaken, nor his seed begging their bread forsaken, so some expound it. If they do want, God will raise them up friends to supply them, without a scandalous exposing of themselves to the reproach of common beggars; or if they go from door to door for meat, it shall not be with despair, as the wicked man "that wanders abroad for bread, saying, Where is it?" Job xv. 23. Nor shall he be denied, as the prodigal, that "would fain have filled his belly, but no man gave unto him," Lu. xv. 16. Nor shall he grudge if he be not satisfied, as David's enemies, when they wandered up and down for meat, Ps. lix. 15. Some make this promise relate especially to those that are charitable and liberal to the poor, and to intimate that David never observed any that brought themselves to poverty by their charity, but it is withholding more than is meet that tendeth to poverty, Pr. xi. 24.

5. That God will not desert us, but graciously protect us in our difficulties and straits; ver. 28, "The Lord loveth judgment," that is, he delights in doing justice himself, and he delights in those that do justice, and therefore "he forsaketh not his saints" in affliction, when others make themselves strange to them, and become shy of them; but he takes care that they be preserved for ever, that is, that the saints in every age be taken under his protection, that the succession be preserved to the end of time, and that particular saints be preserved from all the temptations, and through all the trials, of this present time, to that happiness which shall be for ever. He will preserve them to his heavenly kingdom, that is a preservation for ever, 2 Tim. iv. 18; Ps. xii. 7.

6. That we shall have a comfortable settlement in this world, and in a better when we leave this. That we shall dwell for evermore, ver. 27, and not be cut off, as the seed of the wicked, ver. 28. That we shall inherit the land which the Lord our God gives us, and dwell therein for ever, ver. 29. They shall not be tossed that make God their rest, and are at home in him. But on this earth there is no dwelling for ever, no continuing city; it is in heaven only, that city which hath foundations, that the righteous shall dwell for ever; that will be their everlasting habitation.

7. That we shall not become a prey to our adversaries that seek our ruin, ver. 32, 33. There is an adversary that takes all opportunities to do us a mischief; a wicked one that watcheth the righteous, as a roaring lion watcheth his prey, and seeketh to slay him. There are wicked men that do so, that are very subtle; they watch the righteous, that they may have an opportunity to do them a mischief effectually, and may have a pretence wherewith to justify themselves in the doing of it, and very spiteful, for they seek to slay him; but it may very well be applied to the wicked one, the devil, that old serpent, who has his wiles to entrap the righteous,—his devices, which we should not be ignorant of; that great red dragon that seeks to slay them; that roaring lion that goes about continually, restless and raging, and seeking whom he may devour. But it is here promised that he shall not prevail, neither Satan nor his instruments. 1st. He shall not prevail as a field adversary. "The Lord will not leave him in his hand;" he will not permit Satan to do what he would, nor will he withdraw his strength and grace from his people, but will enable them to resist and overcome him, and their faith shall not fail, Lu. xxii. 31, 32. A good man may fall into the hands of a messenger of Satan, and be sorely buffeted, but God will not leave him in his hands, 1 Cor. x. 13. 2nd. He shall not prevail as a law adversary. "God will not condemn him when he is judged," though urged to do it by the accuser of the brethren, that "accuseth them before our God day and night." His false accusations will be thrown out, as those exhibited against Joshua, Zec. iii. 1, 2, "The Lord rebuke thee, O Satan." "It is God that justifieth;" and then, "who shall lay any thing to the charge of God's elect?"

34 Wait on the LORD, and keep his way,
And he shall exalt thee to inherit the land:
When the wicked are cut off, thou shalt see it.
35 I have seen the wicked in great power,
And spreading himself like a green bay tree.
36 Yet he passed away, and, lo, he was not:
Yea, I sought him, but he could not be found 37 Mark the perfect man, and behold the upright:
For the end of that man is peace.
38 But the transgressors shall be destroyed together:
The end of the wicked shall be cut off.
39 But the salvation of the righteous is of the LORD:
He is their strength in the time of trouble.
40 And the LORD shall help them, and deliver them:
He shall deliver them from the wicked,
And save them, because they trust in them.

The psalmist's conclusion of this sermon (for that is the nature of this poem) is of the same purport with the whole, and inculcates the same things.

First. The duty here pressed upon us is still the same; ver. 34, "Wait on the Lord, and keep his way;" that is, duty is ours, and we must mind it, and make conscience of it; keep God's way, and never turn out of it, nor loiter in it; keep close, keep going. But events are God's, and we must refer ourselves to him for the disposal of them; we must wait on the Lord, attend the motions of his providence, carefully observe them, and conscientiously accommodate ourselves to them. If we make conscience of keeping God's way, we may with cheerfulness wait on him, and commit to him our way; and we shall find him a good master, both to his working servants and to his waiting servants.

Secondly. The reasons to enforce this duty are much the same too; taken from the certain destruction of the wicked and the certain salvation of the righteous. This good man being tempted to envy the prosperity of the wicked that he might fortify himself against the temptation, goes into the sanctuary of God, and leads us thither, Ps. lxxiii. 17; there he understands their end, and thence gives us to understand it, and by comparing that with the end of the righteous baffles the temptation, and puts it to silence. Observe,

1. The misery of the wicked at last, however they may prosper awhile. "The end of the wicked shall be cut off," ver. 38; and that cannot be well that will undoubtedly end so ill. The wicked in their end will be cut off from all good, and all hopes of it; a final period will be put to all their joys, and they will be for ever separated from the fountain of life to all evil. 1st. Some instances of the remarkable ruin of wicked people David had himself observed in this world: that the pomp and prosperity of sinners would not secure them from the judgments of God, when their day was come to fall; ver. 35, 36, "I have seen a wicked man," (the word is singular,) suppose Saul, or Ahithophel, (for David was an old man when he penned this psalm,) "in great power," "formidable,' so some render it, "the terror of the mighty in the land of the living," carrying all before him with a high hand, and seeming to be firmly fixed, and finely flourishing; "spreading himself like a green bay tree," which produceth all leaves and no fruit; like a native, home-born Israelite, (so Dr. Hammond,) likely to take root. But what became of him? Eliphaz long before had learned when he saw the foolish taking root to curse his habitation, Job v. 3; and David saw cause for it, for this bay-tree is withered away as soon as the fig-tree Christ cursed; "He passed away as a dream, as a shadow; such was he and all the pomp and power he was so proud of. He was gone in an instant; "He was not: I sought him" with wonder, "but he could not be found." He had acted his part, and then quitted the stage; and there was no miss of him. 2nd. The total and final ruin of sinners, of all sinners, will shortly be made as much a spectacle to the saints as they are now sometimes made a spectacle to the world; ver. 34, "When the wicked are cut off," and cut off they certainly will be, "thou shalt see it," with awful adorations of the Divine justice. "The transgressors shall be destroyed together," ver. 28. In this world God singles out here one sinner, and there another, out of many, to be made an example, in terrorem, but in the day of judgment there will be a general destruction of all the transgressors, and not one shall escape. Thay that have sinned together shall be damned together; "Bind them in bundles to burn them."

2. The blessedness of the righteous at last. Let us see what will be the end of God's poor despised people.

1st. Preferment. There have been times, the iniquity of which has been such that men's piety has baulked their preferment in this world, and put them quite out of the way of raising estates; but those that keep God's way may be assured that in due time he will exalt them to inherit the land, ver. 34; he will advance them to a place in the heavenly mansions, to dignity, and honour, and true wealth in the new Jerusalem; to inherit that good land, that land of promise, of which Canaan was a type. He will exalt them above all contempt and danger.

2nd. Peace; ver. 37, Let all people "mark the perfect man, and behold the upright;" take notice of him to admire him, and imitate him; keep your eye upon him to observe what comes of him, and you will find that "the end of that man is peace." Sometimes the latter end of his days proves more comfortable to him than the beginning was; the storms blow over, and he is comforted again after the time that he was afflicted. However, if all his days continue dark and cloudy, perhaps his dying day may prove comfortable to him, and his sun may set bright; or, if it should set under a cloud, yet his future state will be peace, everlasting peace. They that walk in their uprightness while they live shall enter into peace when they die, Isa. lvii. 2. A peaceful death has concluded the troublesome life of many a good man; and all is well that thus ends everlastingly well. Balaam himself wished that his death and his last end might be like that of the righteous, Num. xxiii. 10.

3rd. Salvation; ver. 39, 40, "The salvation of the righteous," (which may be applied to the great salvation of which the prophets inquired and searched diligently, 1 Pet. i. 10,) that "is of the Lord." It will be the Lord's doing. The eternal salvation, that salvation of God which those shall see that order their conversation aright, Ps. l. 23, that is of the Lord too. And he that intends Christ and heaven for them, will be a God all-sufficient to them. "He is their strength in time of trouble," to support them under it, and carry them through it. "He shall help them, and deliver them;" help them to do their duties, to bear their burthens, and to maintain their spiritual conflicts; help them to bear their troubles well, and get good by them, and in due time shall deliver them out of their troubles. "He shall deliver them from the wicked" that would run them down, and swallow them up; shall secure them there where "the wicked lambs" we should understand "like the beauty of the pastures," or herbage. This is a very probable explanation, because the same word is applied both to the pasture and to the lambs grazing upon it, as is shown by Psa. lxv. 13, where it is translated "pastures," and Isa. xxxiv. 6, where it is "lambs."

xxxvii. 22. For "blessed of him," and "cursed of him," the Greek translators render "such as bless him," and "such as curse him." There is no need to alter the present Hebrew pointing.

xxxvii. 35. "A green bay tree;" this is a mistranslation, and we should put for it "a green growing tree," or a flourishing green tree, the Hebrew suggesting that the tree grows in its own native soil, and is not transplanted, but making no reference to the bay tree. This is the view of Jerome, and it has been adopted by the best authorities. The Greek is wrong, "like the cedars of Lebanon."

cease from troubling." "He shall save them;" not only keep them safe, but make them happy, "because they trust in him;" not because they have merited it from him, but because they have committed themselves to him, and reposed a confidence in him, and have thereby honoured him.

PSALM XXXVIII.

This is one of the penitential psalms. It is full of grief and complaint from the beginning to the end. David's sins and his afflictions are the cause of his grief, and the matter of his complaint. It should seem he was now sick and in pain, which minded him of his sins, and helped to humble him for them; he was at the same time deserted by his friends, and persecuted by his enemies, so that this psalm is calculated for the depth of distress, and a complication of calamities. He complains, I. Of God's displeasure, and of his own sin, which provoked God against him, ver. 1—5. II. Of his bodily sickness, ver. 6—10. III. Of the unkindness of his friends, ver. 11. IV. Of the injuries which his enemies did him, pleading his good carriage towards them, yet confessing his sins against God, ver. 12—20. Lastly. He concludes the psalm with earnest prayers to God for his gracious presence and help, ver. 21, 22. In singing this psalm we ought to be much affected with the malignity of sin; and if we have not such troubles as here are described, we know not how soon we may have, and therefore must sing of them by way of preparation; and we know that others have them, and therefore we must sing of them by way of sympathy.

A Psalm of David, to bring to remembrance.

O LORD, rebuke me not in thy wrath:
Neither chasten me in thy hot displeasure.
2 For thine arrows stick fast in me,
And thy hand presseth me sore.
3 There is no soundness in my flesh [bones
Because of thine anger; neither is there any rest in my
Because of my sin.
4 For mine iniquities are gone over mine head:
As an heavy burden they are too heavy for me.
5 My wounds stink and are corrupt
Because of my foolishness.
6 I am troubled; I am bowed down greatly;
I go mourning all the day long.
7 For my loins are filled with a loathsome disease:
And there is no soundness in my flesh.
8 I am feeble and sore broken:
I have roared by reason of the disquietness of my heart.
9 Lord, all my desire is before thee;
And my groaning is not hid from thee.
10 My heart panteth, my strength faileth me:
As for the light of mine eyes, it also is gone from me.
11 My lovers and my friends stand aloof from my sore;
And my kinsmen stand afar off.

The title of this psalm is very observable. It is a psalm "to bring to remembrance." The 70th psalm, which was likewise penned in a day of affliction, is so entitled. It is designed, 1. To bring to his own remembrance. We will suppose it penned when he was sick, and in pain, and then it teacheth us that times of sickness are times to bring to remembrance; to bring the sin to remembrance for which God contendeth with us; to awaken our consciences to deal faithfully and plainly with us, and set our sins in order before us for our humiliation. "In a day of adversity consider." Or we may suppose it penned after his recovery, but designed as a record of the convictions he was under, and the workings of his heart when he was in affliction, that upon every review of this psalm he might call to mind the good impressions then made upon him, and make a fresh improvement of them. To the same purpose was "the writing of Hezekiah when he had been sick." 2. To put others in mind of the same things which he was himself mindful of, and to teach them what to think, and what to say, when they are sick and in affliction; let them think as he did, and speak as he did.

First. He deprecates the wrath of God, and his displeasure, in his affliction; ver. 1, "O Lord, rebuke me not in thy wrath." With this same petition he began another prayer, for the visitation of the sick, Ps. vi. 1. This was most upon his heart, and should be most upon ours, when we are in affliction, that, however God rebukes and chastens us, it may not be in wrath and displeasure; for that will be wormwood and gall in the affliction and misery. Those that would escape the wrath of God must pray against that, more than any outward affliction; and be content to bear any outward affliction, while it comes from and consists with the law of God.

Secondly. He bitterly laments the impressions of God's displeasure upon his soul; ver. 2, "Thine arrows stick fast in me." Let Job's complaint, ch. vi. 4, expound David's here. By the arrows of the Almighty, he means the terrors of God, which did set themselves in array against him. He was under a very melancholy, frightful apprehension of the wrath of God against him for his sins, and thought he could look for nothing but judgment and fiery indignation to devour him. God's arrows, as they are sure to hit the mark, so they are sure to stick where they hit, to stick fast, till he is pleased to draw them out, and to bind up with his comforts the wound he has made with his terrors. This will be the everlasting misery of the damned; the arrows of God's wrath will stick fast in them, and the wound will be incurable. "Thy hand," thy heavy hand, "presseth me sore," and I am ready to sink under it; it not only lies hard upon me, but it lies long; and who knows the power of God's anger, the weight of his hand! Sometimes God shot his arrows and stretched forth his hand for David, Ps. xviii. 14; but now against him; so uncertain is the continuance of Divine comforts, where yet the continuance of Divine grace is assured. He complains of God's wrath, as that which inflicted the bodily distemper he was under; ver. 3, "There is no soundness in my flesh, because of thine anger." The bitterness of it, infused in his mind, affected his body; but that was not the worst; it caused the disquietness of his heart, by reason of which he forgot the courage of a soldier, the dignity of a prince, and all the cheerfulness of the sweet psalmist of Israel, and roared terribly, ver. 8. Nothing will disquiet the heart of a good man so much as the sense of God's anger; which shews what a fearful thing it is to fall into his hands. The way to keep the heart quiet is to keep ourselves in the love of God, and to do nothing to offend him.

Thirdly. He acknowledgeth his sin to be the procuring, provoking cause of all his troubles, and groans more under the load of guilt than any other load, ver. 3. He complains his flesh had no soundness, his bones had no rest, so great a toss was he in. It is "because of thine anger," that kindles the fire which burns so fierce; but in the next words he justifies God herein, and takes all the blame upon himself: It is "because of my sin." I have deserved it, and so have brought it upon myself: "mine own iniquities do correct me." If our trouble be the fruit of God's anger, we may thank ourselves, it is our sin that is the cause of it. Are we restless? It is sin that makes us so. If there were not sin in our souls there would be no pain in our bones, no illness in our bodies. It is sin, therefore, that this good man complains most of.

1. As a burthen, a heavy burthen; ver. 4, "Mine iniquities are gone over my head," as proud waters over a man that is sinking and drowning, or as a heavy burthen upon my head, pressing me down, more than I am able to bear or to bear up under. Note, Sin is a burthen. The power of sin dwelling in us is a weight, Heb. xii. 1; all are clogged with it, it keeps men from soaring upwards and pressing forward; all the saints are complaining of it as a body of death they are loaded with, Rom. vii. 24. The guilt of sin committed by us is a burthen, a heavy burthen; it is a burthen to God, he is pressed under it, Am. ii. 13; a burthen to the whole creation, which groans under it, Rom. viii. 21, 22. It will, first or last, be a burthen to the sinner himself, either a burthen of repentance, when he is pricked to the heart for it, labours and is heavy laden under it, or a burthen of ruin, when it sinks him to the lowest hell, and will for ever detain him there; it will be a talent of lead upon him, Zec. v. 8. Sinners are said to bear their iniquity. Threatenings are burthens.

2. As wounds, dangerous wounds; ver. 5, "My wounds stink and are corrupt;" as wounds in the body rankle and fester, and grow foul for want of being dressed and looked after; and it is through my own foolishness. Sins are wounds, Gen. iv. 23, painful, mortal wounds. Our wounds, by sin, are oftentimes in a bad condition, no care taken of them, no application made to them, and it is owing to the sinner's foolishness, in not confessing sin, Ps. xxxii. 3, 4. A slight sore neglected may prove of fatal consequence, and so may a slight sin, slighted and left unrepented of.

Fourthly. He bemoans himself because of his afflictions, and gives ease to his grief by giving vent to it, and pouring out his complaint before the Lord.

1. He was troubled in mind, his conscience was pained, and he had no rest in his own spirit; and a wounded spirit who can bear? He was troubled, or distorted, bowed down greatly, and went mourning all the day long, ver. 6. He was always pensive and melancholy, which made him a burthen and terror to himself. His spirit was feeble and sore broken, and his heart disquieted, ver. 8. Herein David, in his sufferings, was a type of Christ, who, being in his agony, cried out, "My soul is exceeding sorrowful." This is a sorer affliction than any other in this world; whatever God is pleased to lay upon us, we have no reason to complain, as long as he preserves to us the use of our reason, and the peace of our consciences.

2. He was sick and weak in body; his loins filled with a loathsome disease, some swelling, or ulcer, or inflammation; some think a plague-sore, such as Hezekiah's boil; and there was no soundness in his flesh, but, like Job, he was all over distempered. See, 1st. What vile bodies these are which we carry about with us, and what grievous diseases they are liable to, and what an offence and grievance they may soon be made by some diseases to the souls that animate them, as they always are a cloud and clog. 2nd. That the bodies both of the greatest and of the best of men have in them the same seeds of diseases that the bodies of others have, and are liable to the same disasters. David himself, though so great a prince, and so great a saint, was not exempt from the most grievous diseases; there was no soundness even in his flesh; probably this was after his sin in the matter of Uriah, and thus did he smart in his flesh for his fleshly lusts. When at any time we are distempered in our bodies, we ought to remember how God has been dishonoured in and by our bodies. He was feeble and sore broken, ver. 8. His heart panted, and was in a continual palpitation, ver. 10. His strength and limbs failed him; as for the light of his eyes, that was gone from him, either with much weeping, or by a defluxion of rheum upon them, or through the lowness of his spirits, and the frequent returns of a deliquium. Note, Sickness will tame the strongest body, and the stoutest spirit. David was famed for his courage and great exploits; and yet, when God contended with him by bodily sickness, and the impressions of his wrath upon his mind, his hair is cut, his heart fails him, and he is become weak as water. Therefore, let not the strong man glory in his strength, nor any man set grief at defiance, however it may be thought at a distance.

3. His friends were unkind to him; ver. 11, "My lovers" (such as had been merry with him in the day of his mirth) now "stand aloof from my sore." They would not sympathize with him in his griefs, nor so much as come within hearing of his complaints; but, like the priest and Levite, Lu. x. 31, "passed by on the other side." Even his kinsmen, that were bound to him by blood and alliance, stood afar off. See what little reason we have to trust in man, or to wonder if we be disappointed in our expectations of kindness from men. Adversity tries friendship, and separates between the precious and the vile. It is our wisdom to make sure a Friend in heaven, who will not stand aloof from our sore, and from whose love no tribulation or distress shall be able to separate us. David in his troubles was a type of Christ in his agony, Christ on his cross, feeble and sore broken, and then deserted by his friends and kinsmen, who beheld afar off.

Lastly. In the midst of his complaints he comforts himself with the cognizance God graciously took both of his griefs and of his prayers; ver. 9, "Lord, all my desire is before thee;" thou knowest what I want, and what I would have, "my groaning is not hid from thee." Thou knowest the burthens I groan under, and the blessings I groan after. The groanings which cannot be uttered are not hid from Him that searcheth the heart, and knows what is the mind of the spirit, Rom. viii. 26, 27. In singing this, and praying it over, whatever burthen lies upon our spirits, we should by faith cast it upon God, and all our care concerning it, and then be easy.

12 They also that seek after my life lay snares for me:
And they that seek my hurt speak mischievous things,
And imagine deceits all the day long.
13 But I, as a deaf man, heard not;
And I was as a dumb man that openeth not his mouth.
14 Thus I was as a man that heareth not,
And in whose mouth are no reproofs.

xxxvii. 36. For "he passed away," the Greek has "I passed by," which also appears in the Latin Vulgate and the Syriac.

xxxvii. 37. The word rendered "mark" also means "keep" or "preserve." The Syriac translates this verse, "Keep integrity, and choose uprightness, because there is a good end to men of peace." The Greek also differs from the English, and some moderns have thought it conveyed the true idea; it is, "Keep innocency, and see uprightness, for there is a remainder to a peaceful man." By "end" in this verse and verse 38, some think "posterity" is meant, which may be true, but it scarcely conveys the whole of the meaning, to which Symmachus gives the wider sense of "things to come."

xxxviii. Title. The words "to bring to remembrance" are thought by some not to represent the Hebrew exactly, although the Greek and Latin favour them, adding, however, "for the Sabbath," which phrase is not in the original. Some, as Fürst, give the signification of praising God in the sacrifices. The aim of the inspired 15 For in thee, O LORD, do I hope:

Thou wilt hear, O Lord my God.
16 For I said, Hear me,
Lest otherwise they should rejoice over me: [me.
When my foot slippeth, they magnify themselves against 17 For I am ready to halt,
And my sorrow is continually before me.
18 For I will declare mine iniquity;
I will be sorry for my sin.
19 But mine enemies are lively, and they are strong:
And they that hate me wrongfully are multiplied.
20 They also that render evil for good are mine adversaries;
Because I follow the thing that good is.
21 Forsake me not, O LORD:
O my God, be not far from me.
22 Make haste to help me,
O Lord my salvation.

In these verses,

First. David complains of the power and malice of his enemies, who, it should seem, not only took occasion from the weakness of his body, and the trouble of his mind, to insult over him, but took advantage from thence to do him a mischief. He hath a great deal to say against them, which he humbly offers as a reason why God should appear for him, as Ps. xxv. 19, "Consider mine enemies."

1. They are very spiteful and cruel; "They seek my hurt;" nay, "they seek after my life," ver. 12. That life which was so precious in the sight of the Lord, and all good men, was aimed at, as if it had been forfeited, or a public nuisance. Such is the enmity of the serpent's seed against the seed of the woman; it would wound the head, though it can but reach the heel. It is the blood of the saints that is thirsted after.

2. They are very subtle and politic. They lay snares, they imagine deceits, and herein they are restless and unwearied; they do it all the day long; they speak mischievous things one to another; that is, every one has something or other to propose, that may be a mischief to me. Mischief covered and carried on by deceit may well be called a snare.

3. They are very insolent and abusive. "When my foot slippeth;" that is, when I fall into any trouble, or when I make any mistake, misplace a word, or take a false step, "they magnify themselves against me;" they are pleased with it, and promise themselves that it will ruin my interest, and that if I slip I shall certainly fall and be undone.

4. They are not only unjust, but very ungrateful; "They hate me wrongfully," ver. 19. I never did them any ill turn, nor so much as bore them any ill-will, nor ever gave them any provocation; nay, "they render evil for good," ver. 20. Many a kindness I have done them, for which I might have expected a return of kindness; but "for my love they are my adversaries," Ps. cix. 4; such a rooted enmity there is in the hearts of wicked men to goodness for its own sake, that they hate it, even then when they themselves have the benefit of it; they hate prayer, even in those that pray for them; and hate peace, even in those that would be at peace with them: but very ill-natured those are whom no courtesy will oblige, but they are rather exasperated by it.

5. They are very impious and devilish; they are my adversaries purely because "I follow the thing that good is." They hated him not only for his kindness to them, but for his devotion and obedience to God; they hated him because they hated God, and all that bear his image. If we suffer ill for doing well, we must not think it strange; from the beginning it was so. Cain slew Abel because his works were righteous. Nor must we think it hard, because it will not be always so; for so much the greater will our reward be.

6. They are many and mighty; they are lively, they are strong, they are multiplied; ver. 19, "Lord, how they are increased that trouble me," Ps. iii. 1. Holy David was weak and faint, his heart panted, and his strength failed; he was melancholy and of a sorrowful spirit, and persecuted by his friends; but at the same time his wicked enemies were strong and lively, and their number increased. Let us not, therefore, pretend to judge of men's characters by their outward condition; none knows love or hatred by all that is before them. It should seem that David in this, as in other complaints he makes of his enemies, has an eye to Christ, whose persecutors were such as are here described,—perfectly lost to all honour and virtue. None hate Christianity but such as have first divested themselves of the first principles of humanity, and broken through its most sacred bonds.

Secondly. He reflects with comfort upon his own peaceable and pious behaviour, under all the injuries and indignities that were done him. It is then only that our enemies do us a real mischief, when they provoke us to sin, (Neh. vi. 13,) when they prevail to put us out of the possession of our own souls, and drive us from God and our duty. If by Divine grace we are enabled to prevent this mischief, we quench their fiery darts, and save ourselves harmless; if still we hold fast our integrity and our peace, who can hurt us? This David did here.

1. He kept his temper, and was not ruffled or discomposed by any of the slights that were put upon him, or the mischievous things that were said or done against him; ver. 13, 14, "I, as a deaf man, heard not;" I took no notice of the affronts put upon me, did not resent them, nor was put into disorder by them; much less did I meditate revenge, or study to return the injury. Note, The less notice we take of the unkindness and injuries that are done us, the more we consult the quiet of our own minds. Being deaf, he was dumb, as a man in whose mouth there are no reproofs; he was as silent as if he had nothing to say for himself, for fear of putting himself into a heat, and incensing his enemies yet more against him; he would not only not recriminate upon them, but not so much as vindicate himself, lest his necessary defence should be construed his offence. Though they sought after his life, and his silence might be taken for a confession of his guilt, yet he was as "a dumb man, that openeth not his mouth." Note, When our enemies are most clamorous, ordinarily it is our prudence to be silent, or to say little, lest we make ill worse. David could not hope by his mildness to win upon his enemies, or by his soft answers to turn away their wrath; for they were men of such base spirits that they rendered him evil for good, and yet he carried it thus meekly towards them, that he might prevent his own sin, and might have the comfort of it in the reflection. Herein David was a type of Christ, who was "as a sheep dumb before the shearer," and "when he was reviled, reviled not again;" as 1 both are examples to us not to render railing for railing.

2. He kept close to his God by faith and prayer, and so both supported himself under these injuries, and silenced his own resentments of them. 1st. He trusted in God; ver. 15, "I was as a dumb man that openeth not his mouth, for in thee, O Lord, do I hope." I depend upon thee to plead my cause, and clear my innocency, and some way or other to put them to silence and shame. His lovers and friends, that should have owned him, and stood by him, and appeared as witnesses for him, withdrew from him, ver. 10. But God is a friend that will never fail us, if we hope in him; "I was as a man that heareth not, for thou wilt hear." What need I hear and God hear too? as 1 Pet. v. 7, "He careth for you," and what need you care and God care too? 'Thou wilt answer,' so some, and therefore I will say nothing. Note, It is a good reason why we should bear reproach and calumny with silence and patience, because God is a witness to all the wrong that is done us, and in due time will be a witness for us, and against those that do us wrong; therefore let us be silent, because if we be then we may expect that God will appear for us, for that is an evidence we trust in him; but if we undertake to manage for ourselves, we take God's work out of his hands, and forfeit the benefit of his appearing for us. Our Lord Jesus, therefore, "when he suffered, threatened not," because he "committed himself to him that judgeth righteously," 1 Pet. ii. 23, and we shall lose nothing at last by doing so. 'Thou shalt answer, Lord, for me.' 2nd. He called upon God; ver. 16, "For I said, Hear me," that is supplied; "I said so," as ver. 15, "in thee do I hope, for thou wilt hear, lest they should rejoice over me;" I comforted myself with that, when I was apprehensive that they would run me down. It is a great support to us, when men are false and unkind, that we have a God to go to, whom we may be free with, and who will be faithful to us.

Thirdly. He here bewails his own follies and infirmities.

1st. He was very sensible of the present workings of corruption in him, and that he was now ready to repine at the providence of God, and to be put into a passion by the injuries men did him; "I am ready to halt," ver. 17. This will best be explained by a reflection like this which the psalmist made upon himself in a like case, Ps. lxxiii. 2, "My feet were almost gone, when I saw the prosperity of the wicked," so here, "I was ready to halt," ready to say, "I have cleansed my hands in vain." His sorrow was continual; "All the day long have I been plagued," Ps. lxxiii. 13, 14, and it was continually before him; he could not forbear poring upon it, and that made him almost ready to halt between religion and irreligion. The fear of this drove him to his God; "In thee do I hope," not only that thou wilt plead my cause, but that thou wilt prevent my falling into sin. Good men, by setting their sorrow continually before them, have been ready to halt, who by setting God always before them, have kept their standing.

2nd. He remembered against himself his former transgressions, acknowledging that by them he had brought these troubles upon himself, and forfeited the Divine protection. Though before men he could justify himself, before God he will judge and condemn himself; ver. 18, "I will declare mine iniquity," and not cover it; "I will be sorry for my sin," and not make a light matter of it; and this helped to make him silent under the rebukes of Providence and the reproaches of men. Note, If we be truly penitent for sin, that will make us patient under affliction, and particularly under unjust censures. Two things are required in repentance: 1st. Confession of sin; "I will declare mine iniquity;" I will not only in general own myself a sinner, but I will make a particular acknowledgment of what I have done amiss. We must declare our sins before God freely and fully, and with their aggravating circumstances, that we may give glory to God, and take shame to ourselves. 2nd. Contrition for sin. I will be sorry for it. Sin will have sorrow; every true penitent grieves for the dishonour he has done to God, and the wrong he has done to himself; 'I will be in care,' or 'fear about my sin,' so some, in fear, lest it ruin me, and in care to get it pardoned.

Fourthly. He concludes with very earnest prayers to God for his gracious presence with him, and seasonable powerful succour in his distress; ver. 21, 22, "Forsake me not, O Lord," though my friends forsake me, and though I deserve to be forsaken by thee; "be not far from me," as my unbelieving heart is ready to fear thou art. Nothing goes nearer to the heart of a good man in affliction than to be under the apprehension of God's deserting him in wrath; nor doth any thing therefore come more feelingly from his heart than this prayer, "Lord, be not thou far from me; make haste for my help," for I am ready to perish, and in danger of being lost, if relief do not come quickly. God gives us leave not only to call upon him when we are in trouble, but to hasten him. He pleads, Thou art my God, whom I serve, and on whom I depend to bear me out; and my salvation, who alone art able to save me, who hast engaged thyself by promise to save me, and from whom alone I expect salvation. Is any afflicted? let him thus pray, let him thus plead, let him thus hope, in singing this psalm.

PSALM XXXIX.

David seems to have been in a great toss when he penned this psalm, and, upon some account or other, very uneasy; for it is with some difficulty that he conquers his passion, and composeth his spirit himself to take that good counsel which he had given to others, Ps. xxxvii., to rest in the Lord, and wait patiently for him, without fretting; for it is easier to give the good advice than to give the good example of quietness under affliction. What was the particular trouble which gave occasion for the conflict David was now in, doth not appear. Perhaps it was the death of some dear friend or relation that was the trial of his patience, and that suggested to him these meditations of mortality; and at the same time it should seem he himself was weak and ill, and under some prevailing distemper. His enemies likewise were seeking advantages against him, and watched for his halting that they might have something to reproach him for. Thus aggrieved, I. He relates the struggle that was in his breast between grace and corruption, between passion and patience, ver. 1—3. II. He meditates upon the doctrine of man's frailty and mortality, and prays to God to instruct him in it, ver. 4—6. III. He applies himself to God for the pardon of his sins, the removal of his afflictions, and the lengthening out of his life till he was ready for death, ver. 7—13. This is a funeral psalm, and very proper for the occasion. In singing of it, we should get our hearts duly affected with the brevity, uncertainty, and calamitous state of human life; and those on whose comforts God has by death made breaches, will find this psalm of great use to them, in order to their obtaining what we ought to aim much at under such an affliction, which is to get it sanctified to us for our spiritual benefit, and to get our hearts reconciled to the holy will of God in it.

writer may have been not only to recall to mind his own sins and God's chastisements and mercies, but to celebrate or commemorate thankfully the Lord's righteous acts.

xxxviii. 1. The language of this psalm is peculiarly energetic, and the figures indicate very severe afflictions; and yet it does not seem needful to consider the psalmist as enduring painful and loathsome disease in his body. Translators have rather intensified some of the terms employed. Thus in verse 1 the word "hot" is redundant; for although "heat" is the primary and "anger" only the secondary meaning, it is needless and objectionable to express both. Similarly, the word "fast," in verse 2, is objectionable; and the phrase "thy hand presseth me sore" should be "thy hand descends upon me." Verse 5 means that the wounds or stripes which had been inflicted upon him were offensive and festering, which is but too well known to be the case with men wounded in conflict and battle. Verse 7 should have been, "my loins are filled with a fever heat," but is a

I held my peace, even from good;
And my sorrow was stirred.

While I was musing the fire burned:
Then spake I with my tongue,

And mine age is as nothing before thee: [Selah.

Surely they are disquieted in vain: [them.

David here recollects, and leaves upon record, the workings of his heart under his afflictions, and it is good for us to do so, that what was thought amiss may be amended, and what was well thought of may be improved the next time.

First. He remembered the covenants he had made with God to walk circumspectly, and to be very cautious both of what he did and what he said. When at any time we are tempted to sin, and are in danger of falling into it, we must call to mind the solemn vows we have made against sin, against that particular sin we are upon the brink of. God can and will mind us of them; Jer. ii. 20, "Thou saidst, I will not transgress," and therefore we ought to mind ourselves of them. So David did here.

1. He remembers that he had resolved in general to be very cautious and circumspect in his walking; ver. 1, "I said, I will take heed to my ways;" and it was well said, and what he would never unsay, and therefore must never gainsay. Note, 1st. It is the great concern of every one of us to take heed to our ways, that is, to walk circumspectly, while others walk at all adventures. 2nd. We ought stedfastly to resolve that we will take heed to our ways, and frequently to renew that resolution. Fast bind, fast find. 3rd. Having resolved to take heed to our ways, we must upon all occasions mind ourselves of that resolution, for it is a covenant never to be forgotten, but which we must be always mindful of.

2. He remembers that he had in particular covenanted against tongue sins. That he would not sin with his tongue, that he would not speak amiss, either to offend God, or "offend the generation of the righteous," Ps. lxxiii. 15. It is not so easy as we could wish not to sin in thought; but if an evil thought should arise in his mind he would lay his hand upon his mouth, and suppress it, that it should go no farther; and this is so great an attainment, that "if any offend not in word, the same is a perfect man," and so needful a one, that he who "seems to be religious, but bridles not his tongue, his religion is vain." David had resolved, 1st. That he would at all times watch against tongue sins. "I will keep a bridle," or muzzle, "upon my mouth." A bridle upon it, as upon an unruly horse, to guide and direct it, to check and curb it, to keep it in the right way, and on a good pace: see Jas. iii. 3. Watchfulness in the habit is the bridle upon the head; watchfulness in the act and exercise is the hand upon the bridle, a muzzle upon it, as upon an unruly dog that is fierce and doth mischief. By particular stedfast resolution, corruption is restrained from breaking out at the lips, and so is muzzled. 2nd. That he would double his guard against them, when there was most danger of scandal, "when the wicked is before me." When he was in company with the wicked, he would take heed of saying any thing that might harden them, or give occasion to them to blaspheme. If good men light into bad company, they must take heed what they say. Or, "when the wicked is before me," that is, in my thoughts, when he was contemplating the pride and power, the prosperity and flourishing estate of evil-doers, he was tempted to speak amiss, and therefore then he would take special care what he said. Note, The stronger the temptation to a sin is, the stronger the resolution must be against it.

Secondly. Pursuant to these covenants he made a shift, with much ado, to bridle his tongue; ver. 2, "I was dumb with silence, I held my peace, even from good." His silence was commendable, and the greater the provocation was, the more praiseworthy was his silence. Watchfulness and resolution in the strength of God's grace will do more towards the bridling of the tongue than we can imagine, though it be an unruly evil. But what shall we say of his keeping silence even from good? Was it his wisdom that he refrained good discourse when the wicked were before him, because he would not cast pearls before swine? I rather think it was his weakness; because he might not say any thing he would say nothing, but ran into an extreme, which was a reproach to the law, for that prescribes a mean between extremes. The same law which forbids all corrupt communications requires that which is good, and to the use of edifying, Eph. iv. 29.

Thirdly. The less he spoke the more he thought, and the more warmly. Binding the distempered part did but draw the humour to it. "My sorrow was stirred, my heart was hot within me," ver. 3. He could bridle his tongue, but he could not keep his passion under, though he suppressed the smoke that was as a fire in his bones; and while he was musing upon his afflictions, and upon the prosperity of the wicked, the fire burned. Note, Those that are of a fretful, discontented spirit, ought not to pore much, for while they suffer their thoughts to dwell upon the causes of their calamity the fire of their discontent is fed with fuel, and burns the more furiously. Impatience is a sin that has its ill cause within ourselves, and that is musing, and its ill effect upon ourselves, and that is no less than burning. If, therefore, we would prevent the mischief of ungoverned passions, we must redress the grievance of ungoverned thoughts.

Fourthly. When he did speak at last, it was to the purpose. At the last I spake with my tongue. And some make what he said to be the breach of his good purpose, and that in what he said he sinned with his tongue; and so they make what follows to be a passionate wish that he might die, like Elijah, 1 Kin. xix. 4, and Job, ch. vi. 8; but I rather take it to be, not the breach of his good purpose, but the reformation of his mistake in carrying it too far; he had kept silence from good, but now he would so keep silence no longer. He had nothing to say to the wicked that were before him, for to them he knew not how to place his words, but, after long musing, the first word he said was a prayer, and a devout meditation upon a subject which it will be good for us all to think much of.

1. He prays to God to make him sensible of the shortness and uncertainty of life, and the near approach of death; ver. 4, "Lord, make me to know mine end, and the measure of my days." He doth not mean, Lord, let me know how long I shall live, and when I shall die; we could not in faith pray such a prayer, for God has nowhere promised to let us know, but has in wisdom locked up that knowledge among the secret things which belong not to us, nor would it be good for us to know it; but, "Lord, make me to know my end," is, Lord, give me wisdom and grace to consider it, Deu. xxxii. 29, and to improve what I know concerning it. "The living know that they shall die," Eccl. ix. 5, but few care for thinking of it; we have therefore need to pray, that God by his grace would conquer that aversion which is in our corrupt hearts to the thoughts of death. Lord, make me to consider. 1st. What death is. It is my end, the end of my life, and all the employments and enjoyments of life; it is the end of all men, Eccl. vii. 2. It is a final period to our state of probation and preparation, and an awful entrance upon a state of recompence and retribution. To a wicked man, it is the end of all his joys: to a godly man, it is the end of all his griefs. Lord, give me to know my end: that is, to be better acquainted with death, and to make it more familiar to me, Job xvii. 14; and to be more affected with the greatness of the change, Lord, give me to consider what a serious thing it is to die. 2nd. How near it is. Lord, give me to consider the measure of my days, that they are measured in the counsel of God, the end is a fixed end, so the word signifies, ("My days are determined," Job xiv. 5,) and that the measure is but short; My days will soon be numbered and finished. When we look upon death as a thing at a distance, we are tempted to adjourn the necessary preparations for it; but when we consider how short life is we shall see ourselves concerned to do what our hand finds to do, not only with all our might, but with all possible expedition. 3rd. That it is continually working in us. Lord, give me to consider how frail I am, how scanty the stock of life is, and how faint the spirits, which are as the oil to keep that lamp burning. We find, by daily experience, that the earthly house of this tabernacle is mouldering and going to decay; Lord, make us to consider this, that we may secure mansions in the house not made with hands.

2. He meditates upon the brevity and vanity of life, pleading it with God for relief under the burthens of life, as Job often, and pleading it with himself for his quickening to the business of life.

1st. Man's life on earth is short, and of no continuance, and that is a reason why we should sit loose to it, and prepare for the end of it; ver. 5, "Behold, thou hast made my days as an handbreadth," the breadth of four fingers, a certain dimension, a small one, and the measure whereof we have always about us, always before our eyes. We need no rod, no pole, no measuring line, wherewith to take the dimension of our days, nor any skill in arithmetic wherewith to compute the number of them; no, we have the standard of them at our fingers'-end, and there is no multiplication of it; it is but one handbreadth in all. Our time is short, and God has made it so; for the number of our months is with him. It is short, and he knows it to be so; it is as nothing before thee. He remembers how short our time is, Ps. lxxxix. 47. It is nothing in comparison with thee, so some. All time is nothing to God's eternity, much less our share of time.

2nd. Man's life on earth is vain, and of no value, and therefore it is folly to be fond of it, and wisdom to make sure of a better life. Adam is Abel, man is vanity, in his present state; is not what he seems to be, has not what he promised himself. He and all his comforts lie at a continual uncertainty, and if there were not another life after this, all things considered, he were made in vain. He is vanity, that is, he is mortal, he is mutable. Observe how emphatically this truth is expressed here. First. Every man is vanity, without exception; high and low, rich and poor, all meet in this. Secondly. He is so at his best estate, when he is young, and strong, and healthful, in wealth and honour, and the height of prosperity; when he is most easy, and merry, and secure, and thinks his mountain stands strong. Thirdly. He is altogether vanity, as vain as you can imagine. All man is all vanity, so it may be read; every thing about him is uncertain, nothing is substantial and durable but what relates to the new man. Fourthly. Verily he is so. This is a truth of undoubted certainty, but which we are very unwilling to believe, and need to have solemnly attested to us, as indeed it is by frequent instances. Fifthly. Selah is annexed, as a note commanding observation. Stop here, and pause a while, that you may take time to consider and apply this truth, that every man is vanity. We ourselves are so.

Now for the proof of the vanity of man, as mortal, he here instances in three things, and shews the vanity of each of them, ver. 6. 1*st.* The vanity of our joys and honours; "Surely every man walketh" (even when he walks in state, when he walks in pleasure) in a shadow, in an image, "in a vain show." When he makes a figure, his fashion passeth away, and his great pomp is but great fancy, Acts xxv. 23. It is but a show, and therefore a vain show, like the rainbow, the gaudy colours of which must needs vanish, and disappear quickly, when the substratum is but a cloud, a vapour; such is life, Jas. iv. 14, and therefore such are all the gaieties of it. 2*nd.* The vanity of our griefs and fears; "Surely they are disquieted in vain." Our disquietments are often groundless; we vex ourselves without any just cause, and the occasions of our trouble are many times the creatures of our own fancy and imagination: and they are always fruitless; we disquiet ourselves in vain, for we cannot, with all our disquietment, alter the nature of things, nor the counsel of God. Things will be as they are, when we have disquieted ourselves never so much about them. 3*rd.* The vanity of our cares and toils. He takes a great deal of pains to heap up riches, and they are but like heaps of muck in the furrows of the field, good for nothing unless they be spread. But when he has filled his treasures with his trash he knows not who shall gather them, nor to whom they shall descend when he is gone; for he shall not take them away with him. He asks not, For whom do I labour? and that is his folly, Eccl. iv. 8. But if he did ask he could not tell whether he should be a wise man or a fool, a friend or a foe, Eccl. ii. 19. "This is vanity."

7 And now, Lord, what wait I for?
My hope is in thee
8 Deliver me from all my transgressions:
Make me not the reproach of the foolish.
9 I was dumb, I opened not my mouth;
Because thou didst it.
10 Remove thy stroke away from me:
I am consumed by the blow of thine hand.
11 When thou with rebukes dost correct man for iniquity,
Thou makest his beauty to consume away like a moth:
Surely every man is vanity. Selah.
12 Hear my prayer, O LORD,
And give ear unto my cry;

it stands both disagreeable and misleading. Our translators timidly imitated some of their precursors; not all, for one gives, "my reins are full of burning," which is literally exact. The Greek and Latin render "my soul is full of delusions," according to the common readings; but some Greek copies have "my loins are full of delusions." The Syriac version is, "my legs are full of trembling," which is inaccurate. The fathers, Ambrose, Jerome, Augustine, and Gregory, followed by Bellarmine and other Romanists, refer the "illusions" or "delusions" of their translation to impure ideas. This, however, is wholly gratuitous. The Hebrews used the word "loins," as we may "bosom," "heart," &c., to denote strong emotion.

xxxviii. 11. The Hebrew word rendered "sore" denotes a stroke or affliction. The psalmist's friends stood at a distance from him during his affliction.

xxxviii. 17. For "ready to halt," the Syriac is "ready to suffer;" and the Greek and Latin have "ready for scourges."

Hold not thy peace at my tears:
For I am a stranger with thee,
And a sojourner, as all my fathers were.
13 O spare me, that I may recover strength,
Before I go hence, and be no more.

The psalmist having meditated on the shortness and uncertainty of life, and the vanity and vexation of spirit that attends all the comforts of life, here, in these verses, turns his eyes and heart heavenward. When there is no solid satisfaction to be had in the creature, it is to be found in God, and in communion with him; and to him we should be driven by our disappointments in the world. David here speaks,

First. His dependence on God, ver. 7. Seeing all is vanity, and man himself is so, 1. He despairs of a happiness in the things of the world, and disclaims all expectations from it. "Now, Lord, what wait I for?" Even nothing from the things of sense and time; I have nothing to wish for, nothing to hope for from this earth. Note, The consideration of the vanity and frailty of human life should deaden our desires to the things of this world, and lower our expectations from it. If the world be such a thing as this, God deliver me from having or seeking my portion in it. We cannot count upon constant health and prosperity, nor upon comfort in every relation, for it is all as uncertain as our continuance here. Now, though I have sometimes foolishly promised myself this and the other from the world, now I am of another mind. 2. He takes hold of happiness and satisfaction in God; "My hope is in thee." Note, When creature confidences fail it is our comfort that we have a God to go to, a God to trust to, and we should thereby be quickened to take so much the faster hold of him by faith.

Secondly. His submission to God, and his cheerful acquiescence in his holy will, ver. 9. If our hope be in God for a happiness in the other world, we may well afford to reconcile ourselves to all the dispensations of his providence concerning us in this world. "I was dumb, I opened not my mouth," in a way of complaint and murmuring. He now again recovered that serenity and sedateness of mind which was disturbed, ver. 2. Whatever comforts he is deprived of, whatever crosses he is burthened with, he will be easy; "because thou didst it." It did not come to pass by chance; but according to thine appointment. We may here see, 1. A good God doing all, and ordering all events concerning us. Of every event we may say, This is the finger of God, it is the Lord's doing, whoever were the instruments. 2. A good man for that reason saying nothing against it. He is dumb, he has nothing to object, no question to ask, no dispute to raise upon it; all that God doth is well done.

Thirdly. His desire towards God, and the prayers he puts up to him; "Is any afflicted? let him pray," as David here,

1. For the pardoning of his sin and the preventing of his shame, ver. 8. Before he prays, ver. 10, "Remove thy stroke from me," he prays, ver. 8, "Deliver me from all mine offences," from the guilt I have contracted, the punishment I have deserved, and the power of corruption I have been captivated by. When God forgives our sins, he delivers us from them, he delivers us from them all. He pleads, "Make me not a reproach to the foolish." Wicked people are foolish people; and they then shew their folly most when they think to shew their wit by scoffing at God's people. When David prays that God would pardon his sins, and not make him a reproach, it is to be taken as a prayer for peace of conscience; Lord, leave me not to the power of melancholy, which the foolish will laugh at me for. And as a prayer for grace, that God would never leave him to himself so far as to do any thing that might make him a reproach to bad men. Note, This is a good reason why we should both watch and pray against sin, because the credit of our profession is nearly concerned in the preservation of our integrity.

2. For the removal of his affliction, that he might speedily be eased of his present burthens; ver. 10, "Remove thy stroke away from me." Note, When we are under the correcting hand of God, our eye must be to God himself, and not to any other for relief; he only that inflicts the stroke can remove it. And we may then in faith, and with satisfaction, pray that our afflictions may be removed, when our sins are pardoned, Isa. xxxviii. 17, and when as here the affliction is sanctified, and has done its work, and we are humbled under the hand of God.

1st. He pleads the great extremity he was reduced to by his affliction, which made him the proper object of God's compassion: "I am consumed by the blow of thy hand." His sickness prevailed to that degree that his spirits failed, his strength was wasted, and his body emaciated. The blow or conflict of thine hand has brought me even to the gates of death. Note, The strongest, and boldest, and best of men cannot bear up under, much less make head against, the power of God's wrath. It was not his case only, but any man will find himself an unequal match for the Almighty, ver. 11. When God doth at any time contend with us, when with rebukes he corrects us, First. We cannot impeach the equity of his controversy, but must acknowledge that he is righteous in it; for whenever he correcteth man it is for iniquity. Our ways and our doings procure the trouble to ourselves, and we are beaten with a rod of our own making. It is "the yoke of our transgressions" though it be bound with his hand, Lam. i. 14. Secondly. We cannot oppose the effects of his controversy, but he will be too hard for us. As we have nothing to move in arrest of his judgment, so we have no way of escaping the execution. God's rebukes "make man's beauty to consume away like a moth;" we see it often, we feel it sometimes, how much the body is weakened and decayed by sickness in a little time. The countenance is changed; where is the ruddy cheek and lip, the sprightly eye, the lively look, the smiling face? It is the reverse of all this. What a poor thing is beauty, and what fools are they that are proud of it, or in love with it, when it will certainly and may quickly be consumed thus? Some make the moth to represent man, who is as easily crushed as a moth with the touch of a finger, Job iv. 19. Others make it to represent the Divine rebukes, which silently and insensibly waste and consume us, as the moth doth the garment. All which abundantly proves what he had said before, that surely every man is vanity, weak and helpless; so he will be found when God comes to contend with him.

2nd. He pleads the good impressions made upon him by his affliction. He hoped the end was accomplished for which it was sent, and that therefore it would be removed in mercy; and unless an affliction hath done its work, though it may be removed, it is not removed in mercy. First. It had set him a weeping, and he hoped God would take notice of that. When "the Lord God called to mourning," he answered the call, and accommodated himself to the dispensation, and therefore could in faith pray, "Lord, hold not thy peace at my tears," ver. 12. He that doth not willingly afflict and grieve the children of men, much less his own children, will not hold his peace at their tears, but will either speak deliverance for them, (and if he speak it is done,) or in the meantime speak comfort to them, and make them to hear joy and gladness. Secondly. It had set him a praying; and afflictions are sent to stir up prayer. If they have that effect, and when we are afflicted we pray more, and pray better than before, we may hope that God will hear our prayer, and give ear to our cry; for the prayer which by his providence he gives occasion for, and which by his Spirit of grace he indites, shall not return void. Thirdly. It had helped to wean him from the world, and to take his affections off from it. Now he began more than ever to look upon himself as a stranger and sojourner here, like all his fathers, not at home in this world, but travelling through it to another, to a better, and would never reckon himself at home till he came to heaven. He pleads it with God; Lord, take cognizance of me, and of my wants and burthens, for I am a stranger here, and therefore meet with strange usage; I am slighted and oppressed as a stranger, and whence should I expect relief but from thee, from that other country to which I belong?

Lastly. He prays for a reprieve yet a little longer; ver. 13, "O spare me," ease me, raise me up from this illness, "that I may recover strength" both in body and mind, that I may get into a more calm and composed frame of spirit, and may be better prepared for another world, before I go hence by death and shall be no more in this world. Some make this to be a passionate wish that God would send him help quickly or it would be too late, like that Job x. 20, 21. But I rather take it as a pious prayer that God would continue him here till by his grace he had made him fit to go hence, and that he might finish the work of life before his life was finished. "Let my soul live and it shall praise thee."

PSALM XL.

It should seem David penned this psalm upon occasion of his deliverance, by the power and goodness of God, from some great and pressing trouble, by which he was in danger of being overwhelmed; probably it was some trouble of mind, arising from a sense of sin, and of God's displeasure against him for it. Whatever it was, the same Spirit that indited his praises for that deliverance was in him at the same time a spirit of prophecy, testifying of the sufferings of Christ, and the glory that should follow; or ever he was aware he was led to speak of Christ's undertaking, and the discharge of his undertaking, in words that must be applied to Christ only; and therefore how far the praises that here go before that illustrious prophecy, and the prayers that follow, may safely and profitably be applied to him, it will be worth while to consider in this psalm. I. David records God's favour to him in delivering him out of his deep distress, with thankfulness to his praise, ver. 1—5. II. Thence he takes occasion to speak of the work of our redemption by Christ, ver. 6—10. III. That gives him encouragement to pray to God for mercy and grace, both for himself and for his friends, ver. 11—17. If in singing this psalm we mix faith with the prophecy of Christ, and join in sincerity with the praises and prayers here offered up, we make melody with our hearts to the Lord.

To the chief Musician, A Psalm of David.

I WAITED patiently for the LORD;
And he inclined unto me, and heard my cry.
2 He brought me up also out of an horrible pit,
Out of the miry clay,
And set my feet upon a rock,
And established my goings.
3 And he hath put a new song in my mouth,
Even praise unto our God:
Many shall see it, and fear,
And shall trust in the LORD
4 Blessed is that man that maketh the LORD his trust,
And respecteth not the proud, nor such as turn aside to lies. [thou hast done, 5 Many, O LORD my God, are thy wonderful works which
And thy thoughts which are to us-ward:
They cannot be reckoned up in order unto thee:
If I would declare and speak of them, they are more than can be numbered.

In these verses we have,

First. The great distress and trouble that the psalmist was in. This is supposed, ver. 2, that he was plunged into a horrible pit, and into miry clay; out of which he could not work himself, and in which he found himself sinking yet farther. He saith nothing here either of the sickness of his body or the insults of his enemies, and therefore we have reason to think it was some inward disquiet and perplexity of spirit that was now his greatest grievance. Despondency of spirit under the sense of God's withdrawings, and prevailing doubts and fears about the eternal state, are indeed a horrible pit and miry clay, and have been so to many a dear child of God.

Secondly. His humble attendance upon God, and his believing expectations from him in those depths: "I waited patiently for the Lord," ver. 1; 'waiting I waited.' He expected relief from no other but from God; the same hand that tears must heal, that smites must bind up, Hos. vi. 1, or it will never be done. From God he expected relief, and he was big with the expectation, not doubting but it would come in due time. There is power enough in God to help the weakest, and grace enough in God to help the unworthiest of all his people that trust in him. But he waited patiently; which intimates that the relief did not come quickly, yet he doubted not but it would come, and resolved to continue believing, and hoping, and praying, till it did come. Those whose expectation is from God may wait with assurance, but must wait with patience. Now this is very applicable to Christ. His agony both in the garden and on the cross was the same continued, and it was a horrible pit and miry clay. Then was his soul troubled and exceeding sorrowful; but then he prayed, "Father, glorify thy name," "Father, save me;" then he kept hold of his relation to his Father, "My God, my God," and thus waited patiently for him.

Thirdly. His comfortable experience of God's goodness to him in his distress, which he records for the honour of God, and his own and others' encouragement.

1. God answered his prayers: "He inclined unto me and heard my cry." Those that wait patiently for God, though they may wait long, do not wait in vain. Our Lord Jesus "was heard in that he feared," Heb. v. 7. Nay, he was sure the Father heard him always.

2. He silenced his fears, and stilled the tumult of his spirits, and gave him a settled peace of conscience, ver. 2. He brought me out of that horrible pit of despondency and despair, scattered the clouds, and shone bright upon my soul with the assurances of his favour, and not only so, but set my feet upon a rock, and established my goings. Those that have been under the prevalency of a xxxviii. 18. For "I will be sorry," &c., the Syriac translates, "I shall be purified from my sin." The words point to inward painful remorse for sin.

xxxviii. 19. The idea of the first clause is, "my enemies have life and strength."

xxxix. Title. Various explanations of Jeduthun have been advocated, but it is proper to regard it simply as the name of a Levite who distinguished himself in the service of song. From him it is maintained that one of the bands of Temple singers was called. Here it is the man Jeduthun. Some have said this psalm was written after the captivity of Babylon, but there is no reason whatever for that idea.

xxxix. 5. Meditations on the brevity of human life have been always common. Those in the psalm before us may be compared with passages in Cicero, Plutarch, Terence, Sophocles, Theognis, Plato, Maximus Tyrius, &c.

religious melancholy, and by the grace of God have been relieved, may apply this very feelingly to themselves. They are brought up out of a horrible pit, and, 1st. The mercy is completed by the setting of their feet upon a rock, where they find firm footing, are as much elevated with the hopes of heaven as they were before cast down with the fears of hell. Christ is the rock on which a poor soul may stand fast, and on whose mediation alone, between us and God, we can build any solid hopes or satisfaction. 2nd. It is continued in the establishment of their goings. Where God has given a stedfast hope, he expects there should be a steady, regular conversation, and if that be the blessed fruit of it we have reason to acknowledge with abundance of thankfulness the riches and power of his grace.

3. He filled him with joy, as well as peace, in believing. "He hath put a new song in my mouth," that is, he has given me cause to rejoice, and a heart to rejoice. He was brought as it were into a new world, and that filled his mouth with a new song, even praise to our God; for to his praise and glory must all our songs be sung. Fresh mercies, especially such as we never yet received, call for new songs. This is applicable to our Lord Jesus, in his reception to paradise, his resurrection from the grave, and his exaltation to the joy and glory set before him; he was brought out of the horrible pit, set upon a rock, and had a new song put in his mouth.

Fourthly. The good improvement that should be made of this instance of God's goodness to David.

1. David's experience would be an encouragement to many to hope in God, and for that end he leaveth it here upon record. "Many shall see and fear, and trust in the Lord." They shall fear the Lord and his justice, which brought David, and the Son of David, into that horrible pit, and shall say, "If this be done to the green tree, what shall be done to the dry?" They shall fear the Lord and his goodness, in filling the mouth of David, and the Son of David, with new songs of joy and praise. There is a holy, reverent fear of God which is not only consistent with, but the foundation of, our hope in him. They shall not fear him and shun him, but fear him and trust in him, in their greatest straits, not doubting but to find him as able and ready to help them as David did in his distress. God's dealings with our Lord Jesus are our great encouragement to trust in God. When it pleased the Lord to bruise him, and put him to grief for our sins, he demanded our debt from him; and when he raised him from the dead, and set him at his own right hand, he made it to appear that he had accepted the payment he made, and was satisfied with it; and what greater encouragement can we have to fear and worship God, and to trust in him? see Rom. iv. 25; v. 1, 2. The psalmist invites others to make God their hope, as he did, by pronouncing those happy that do so; ver. 4, "Blessed is the man that maketh the Lord his trust," and him only, that has great and good thoughts of him, and is entirely devoted to him, and respecteth not the proud; doth not do as they do that trust in themselves, nor depend upon those who proudly encourage others to trust in them, for both the one and the other turn aside to lies, as indeed all those do that turn aside from God. This is applicable particularly to our faith in Christ. Blessed are they that trust in him, and in his righteousness alone, and respect not the proud Pharisees that set up their own righteousness in competition with that; that will not be governed by their dictates, nor turn aside to lies with the unbelieving Jews, who submit not to the righteousness of God, Rom. x. 3. Blessed are they that escape this temptation.

2. The joyful sense he had of this mercy led him to observe with thankfulness the many other favours he had received from God, ver. 5. When God puts new songs into our mouth, we must not forget our former songs, but repeat them; "Many, O Lord my God, are thy wonderful works, which thou hast done," both for me and others. This is but one of many. Many are the benefits with which we are daily loaded, both by the providence and by the grace of God. 1st. They are his works. Not only the gifts of his bounty, but the operations of his power; he works for us, he works in us, and thus he favours us with matter not only for thanks, but for praise. 2nd. They are his wonderful works. The contrivance of them admirable; his condescension to us in bestowing them upon us admirable; eternity itself will be short enough to be spent in the admiration of them. 3rd. His wonderful works are all the product of his thoughts to usward. He doth all according to the counsel of his own will, Eph. i. 11; the purposes of his grace, which he purposed in himself, Eph. iii. 11. They are the projects of infinite wisdom, the designs of everlasting love, 1 Cor. ii. 7; Jer. xxxi. 3; thoughts of good, and not of evil, Jer. xxix. 11. His gifts and callings will therefore be without repentance, because they are not sudden resolves, but the result of his thoughts, his many thoughts, to usward. 4th. They are innumerable. They cannot be methodized or reckoned up in order. There is an order in all God's works, but they are so many that present themselves to our view at once, that we know not where to begin nor which to name next; the order of them, and their natural references and dependences, and how the links of the golden chain are joined is a mystery to us, and what we shall not be able to account for till the veil be rent, and the mystery of God finished. Nor can they be counted, not the very heads of them. When we have said the most we can of the wonders of Divine love to us, we must conclude with an et cætera,—'and such like,' and adore the depth, despairing to find the bottom.

6 Sacrifice and offering thou didst not desire;
Mine ears hast thou opened:
Burnt offering and sin offering hast thou not required.
7 Then said I, Lo, I come:
In the volume of the book it is written of me,
8 I delight to do thy will, O my God:
Yea, thy law is within my heart.
9 I have preached righteousness in the great congregation:
Lo, I have not refrained my lips, O LORD, thou knowest.
10 I have not hid thy righteousness within my heart;
I have declared thy faithfulness and thy salvation:
I have not concealed thy lovingkindness and thy truth from the great congregation.

The psalmist being struck with amazement at the wonderful works that God had done for his people, is strangely carried out here to foretell that work of wonder which excelleth all the rest, and is the foundation and fountain of all, that of our redemption by our Lord Jesus Christ. God's thoughts, which were to usward concerning that work, were the most curious, the most copious, the most gracious, and therefore above any other to be most admired. This paragraph is quoted by the apostle, Heb. x. 5, &c., and applied to Christ, and his undertaking for us. As in the institutions, so in the devotions of the Old Testament, there is more of Christ than perhaps the Old Testament saints were aware of; and when the apostle would shew us the Redeemer's voluntary undertaking of his work, he doth not fetch his account out of the book of God's secret counsels, which belong not to us, but from the things revealed. Observe,

First. The utter insufficiency of the legal sacrifices to atone for sin in order to our peace with God, and our happiness in him. "Sacrifice and offering thou didst not desire," that is, thou wouldst not have the Redeemer to offer them; something he must have to offer, but not these, Heb. viii. 3, therefore he must not be of the house of Aaron, Heb. vii. 14. Or, in the days of the Messiah burnt-offering and sin-offering will no longer be required, but all those ceremonial institutions will be abolished. But that is not all; even while the law concerning them was in full force, it might be said, God did not desire them, nor accept them for their own sake. They could not take away the guilt of sin by satisfying God's justice; the life of a sheep, which is so much inferior in value to that of a man, (Mat. xii. 12,) could not pretend to be an equivalent, much less an expedient to preserve the honour of God's government and laws, and repair the injury done to that honour by the sin of man. They could not take away the terror of sin by pacifying the conscience, nor the power of sin, by sanctifying the nature; it was impossible, Heb. ix. 9; x. 1—4. What there was in them that was valuable resulted from their reference to Jesus Christ, of whom they were types; shadows indeed, but shadows of good things to come, and trials of the faith and obedience of God's people; of their obedience to the law, and their faith in the Gospel. But the substance must come, which is Christ, who must bring that glory to God, and that grace to man, which it was impossible these sacrifices should ever do.

Secondly. The designation of our Lord Jesus to the work and office of Mediator. "Mine ears hast thou opened," that is, God the Father disposed him to the undertaking, Isa. l. 5, 6, and then obliged him to go through with it. 'Mine ear hast thou digged.' It is supposed to allude to the law and custom of binding servants to serve for ever, by boring their ear to the door-post: see Ex. xxi. 6. Our Lord Jesus was so in love with his undertaking, that he would not go out free from it, and therefore engaged to persevere for ever in it. And for this reason he is able to save us to the uttermost, because he has engaged to serve his Father to the uttermost, who upholds him in it, Isa. xlii. 1.

Thirdly. His own voluntary consent to this undertaking. "Then said I, Lo, I come;" then, when sacrifice and offering would not do, rather than the work should be undone, "I said, Lo, I come," to enter the lists with the powers of darkness, and to advance the interests of God's glory and kingdom. This speaks three things: 1. That he freely offered himself to this service, which he was under no engagement at all to, prior to his own voluntary susception. It was no sooner proposed to him, but with the greatest cheerfulness he consented to it, and was wonderfully well pleased with the undertaking; had he not been perfectly voluntary in it he could not have been a surety, he could not have been a sacrifice; for it is by this will—this animus offerentis,—'mind of the offerer,—that we are sanctified, Heb. x. 10. 2. That he firmly obliged himself to it. "I come," that is, I promise to come in the fulness of time. And therefore the apostle saith, it was when he came into the world that he had an actual regard to this promise, by which he had engaged his heart to approach unto God. He thus entered into bonds not only to shew the greatness of his love, but because he was to have the honour of his undertaking before he had fully performed it; though the price was not paid, it was secured to be paid, so that he was the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world. 3. That he frankly owned himself engaged. He said, "Lo, I come;" said it all along to the Old Testament saints, who therefore knew him by the title of ὁ ἐρχόμενος,—"he that should come." This word was the foundation on which they built their faith and hope, and which they looked and longed for the accomplishment of.

Fourthly. The reason why he came in pursuance of his undertaking. Because in the volume of the book it was written of him. 1. In the close rolls of the Divine decree and counsel, there it was written, that his ear was opened; and he said, "Lo, I come." There the covenant of redemption was recorded, the counsel of peace between the Father and the Son; and to that he had an eye in all he did, the commandment he received of his Father. 2. In the letters patent of the Old Testament, Moses and all the prophets testified of him; in all the volumes of that book something or other was written of him, which he had an eye to, that all might be accomplished, Jno. xix. 28.

Fifthly. The pleasure he took in his undertaking. Having freely offered himself to it, he did not fail, nor was discouraged, but proceeded with all possible satisfaction to himself; ver. 8, 9, "I delight to do thy will, O my God." It was to Christ his meat and drink to go on with the work appointed to him, Jno. iv. 34, and the reason here given is, "Thy law is within my heart." It is written there; it rules there; it is an active, commanding principle there; it is meant of the law concerning the work and office of the Mediator, what he was to do and suffer. This law was dear to him, and had an influence upon him in his whole undertaking. Note, When the law of God is written in our hearts, our duty will be our delight.

Sixthly. The publication of the Gospel to the children of men, even in the great congregation, ver. 9, 10. The same that as a priest wrought out redemption for us, as a prophet by his own preaching first, then by his apostles, and still by his Word and Spirit, makes it known to us. The great salvation began to be spoken by the Lord, Heb. ii. 3. It is the Gospel of Christ that is preached to all nations. Observe, 1. What it is that is preached. It is righteousness, ver. 9; God's righteousness, ver. 10; the everlasting righteousness which Christ has brought in, Dan. ix. 24; compare Rom. i. 16, 17. It is God's faithfulness to his promise, and the salvation which had long been looked for; it is God's lovingkindness and his truth,—his mercy according to his word. Note, In the work of our redemption we ought to take notice how bright all the Divine attributes shine, and give to God the praise of each of them. 2. To whom it is preached. To the great congregation, ver. 9; and again, ver. 10. When Christ was here on earth he preached to multitudes, thousands at a time. The Gospel was preached both to Jews and Gentiles, to great congregations of both. Solemn religious assemblies are a Divine institution, and in them the glory of God in the face of Christ ought to be both praised to the glory of God and preached for the edification of men. 3. How it is preached. Freely and openly; "I have not refrained my lips;" I have not hid it; I have not concealed it. This intimates, that whoever undertook to preach the Gospel of Christ would be in great temptation to hide it, and conceal it, because it must be preached with great contention, and in the face of great opposition. But Christ himself and those whom he calls to that work, set their faces as a flint, Isa. l. 7, and were wonderfully carried on in it. And it is well for us that they were so, for by this means our eyes come to see this joyful light, and our ears to hear this joyful sound, which otherwise we might for ever have perished in ignorance of.

11 Withhold not thou thy tender mercies from me, O LORD:
Let thy lovingkindness and thy truth continually preserve me.

xxxix. 6. The Latin is, "surely man passeth as an image." Our translators also have the word "image" in the margin. The meaning is that man is rather a semblance than a reality on earth, rather a shadow than a substance.

xxxix. 11. The words rendered, "thou makest his beauty to consume away like a moth," may be somewhat amended. According to the margin, the Hebrew is, "thou makest that which is to be desired in him to melt away." The idea is that God causes whatever he prizes, or is prized in man, to pass away as a garment is consumed by a moth.

xl. 6. There is very much diversity of opinion about the words translated, "mine ears hast thou opened," i.e., dug or bored. According to some, the allusion is to the Hebrew law, which enjoined the piercing of the ear with an awl. But why may not the words mean that He who formed the ear, and opens it to receive instruction, has given the speaker ears to hear, willingness to hear, or an

12 For innumerable evils have compassed me about:
Mine iniquities have taken hold upon me,
So that I am not able to look up;
They are more than the hairs of mine head:
Therefore my heart faileth me.
13 Be pleased, O LORD, to deliver me:
O LORD, make haste to help me.
14 Let them be ashamed and confounded together
That seek after my soul to destroy it;
Let them be driven backward and put to shame
That wish me evil.
15 Let them be desolate for a reward of their shame
That say unto me, Aha, aha.
16 Let all those that seek thee
Rejoice and be glad in thee:
Let such as love thy salvation
Say continually, The LORD be magnified.
17 But I am poor and needy;
Yet the LORD thinketh upon me:
Thou art my help and my deliverer;
Make no tarrying, O my God.

The psalmist having meditated upon the work of redemption, and spoken of it in the person of the Messiah, now comes to make improvement of the doctrine of his mediation between us and God, and therefore speaks in his own person. Christ having done his Father's will, and finished his work, and given orders for the preaching of the Gospel to every creature, we are encouraged to come boldly to the throne of grace for mercy and grace.

First. This may encourage us to pray for the mercy of God, and to put ourselves under the protection of that mercy, ver. 11: Lord, thou hast not spared thy Son, nor withheld him, withhold not thou thy tender mercies then, which thou hast laid up for us in him; for wilt thou not with him also freely give us all things? Rom. viii. 32. "Let thy lovingkindness and thy truth continually preserve me." The best saints are in continual danger, and see themselves undone, if they be not continually preserved by the grace of God; and the everlasting lovingkindness and truth of God is that which we have to depend upon for our preservation to the heavenly kingdom, Ps. lxi. 7.

Secondly. This may encourage us in reference to the guilt of sin, that Jesus Christ has done that towards our discharge from it which sacrifice and offering could not do. See here, 1. The frightful sight he had of sin, ver. 12. This was it that made the discovery he was now favoured with of a Redeemer very welcome to him. He saw his iniquities to be evils, the worst of evils; he saw that they compassed him about; in all the reviews of his life, and his reflections upon each step of it, still he discovered something amiss. The threatening consequences of his sin surrounded him; look which way he would he saw some mischief or other waiting for him, which he was conscious to himself his sins had deserved. He saw them taking hold of him, arresting him, as the bailiff doth the poor debtor; he saw them to be innumerable, and more than the hairs of his head. Convinced, awakened consciences are apprehensive of danger, from the numberless number of the sins of infirmity, which seem small as hairs, but being numerous are very dangerous; "Who can understand his errors?" God numbers our hairs, Mat. x. 30, which yet we cannot number, so he keeps an account of our sins, which we keep no account of. The sight of sin so oppressed him, that he could not hold up his head, "I am not able to look up;" much less could he keep up his heart, "therefore my heart fails me." Note, The sight of our sins in their own colours would drive us to distraction if we had not at the same time some sight of a Saviour. 2. The careful recourse he had to God under the sense of sin, ver. 13. Seeing himself brought by his sins to the very brink of ruin, eternal ruin, with what a holy passion does he cry out, "Be pleased, O Lord, to deliver me," ver. 13. O save me from the wrath to come, and the present terrors I am in through the apprehensions of that wrath. I am undone, I die, I perish, without speedy relief. In a case of this nature, where the bliss of an immortal soul is concerned, delays are dangerous; therefore, "O Lord, make haste to help me."

Thirdly. This may encourage us to hope for victory over our spiritual enemies, that seek after our souls to destroy them, ver. 14; the roaring lion that goes about continually seeking to devour:—if Christ has triumphed over them, we through him shall be more than conquerors. In the belief of this we may pray with humble boldness, "Let them be ashamed and confounded together, and driven backward," ver. 14; "Let them be desolate," ver. 15. Both the conversion of a sinner and the glorification of a saint are great disappointments to Satan; who doth his utmost with all his power and subtlety to hinder both. Now, our Lord Jesus having undertaken to bring about the salvation of all his chosen, we may in faith pray that both these ways that great adversary may be confounded. When a child of God is brought into that horrible pit and the miry clay, Satan cries, Aha, aha, thinking he has gained his point; but he shall rage when he sees the brand plucked out of the fire, and shall be desolate for a reward of his shame. "The Lord rebuke thee, O Satan;" "The accuser of the brethren is cast out."

Fourthly. This may encourage all that seek God, and love his salvation, to rejoice in him and to praise him, ver. 16. See here, 1. The character of good people, conformable to the laws of natural religion; they seek God, desire his favour, and in all their exigences apply themselves to him, as a people should seek unto their God. And conformable to the laws of revealed religon; they love his salvation, that great salvation of which the prophets inquired and searched diligently, which the Redeemer undertook to work out, when he said, "Lo, I come." All that shall be saved love the salvation, not only as a salvation from hell, but a salvation from sin. 2. The happiness secured to good people, by this prophetical prayer. They that seek God shall rejoice and be glad in him; and with good reason, for he will not only be found of them, but will be their bountiful rewarder. They that love his salvation shall be filled with the joy of his salvation; and shall say continually, "The Lord be magnified," and thus they shall have a heaven upon earth. Blessed are they that are thus still praising God.

Lastly. This may encourage the saints in distress and affliction to trust in God, and comfort themselves in him, ver. 17: David himself was one of these; "I am poor and needy." A king, perhaps, now on the throne; and yet being troubled in spirit, he calls himself poor and needy, lost and undone without a Saviour. In want and distress, "yet the Lord thinketh upon me," in and through the Mediator, by whom we are made accepted. Men forget the poor and needy, and seldom think of them; but God's thoughts towards them, which he had spoken of, ver. 5, are their support and comfort. They may assure themselves that God is their help under their troubles, and will be in due time their deliverer out of their troubles, and will make no long tarrying; for the vision is for an appointed time, and therefore, though it tarry, we may wait for it, for it shall come; it will come, it will not tarry.

PSALM XLI.

God's kindness and truth have often been the support and comfort of the saints, when they have had most experience of men's unkindness and treachery; David here found them so upon a sick-bed, when he found his enemies very barbarous, but his God very gracious. I. He here comforts himself in his communion with God under his sickness, by faith receiving and laying hold of God's promises to him, ver. 1—3; and lifting up his heart in prayer to God, ver. 4. II. He here represents the malice of his enemies against him, their malicious censures of him, their spiteful reflections upon him, and their insolent carriage towards him, ver. 5—9. III. He leaves his case with God, not doubting but that he would own and favour him, ver. 10, 11; and so the psalm concludes with a doxology, ver. 13. Is any afflicted with sickness? let him sing the beginning of the psalm; is any persecuted by enemies? let him sing the latter end of it; and we may, any of us, in singing of it, meditate upon both the calamities and comforts of good people in this world.

To the chief Musician, A Psalm of David.

BLESSED is he that considereth the poor:
The LORD will deliver him in time of trouble.
2 The LORD will preserve him, and keep him alive;
And he shall be blessed upon the earth:
And thou wilt not deliver him unto the will of his enemies.
3 The LORD will strengthen him upon the bed of languishing:
Thou wilt make all his bed in his sickness.
4 I said, LORD, be merciful unto me:
Heal my soul; for I have sinned against thee.

In these verses we have,

First. God's promises of succour and comfort to those that consider the poor; and we may suppose that David makes mention of these with application, either, 1. To his friends, who were kind to him, and very considerate of his case, now he was in affliction; blessed is he that considers poor David. Here and there he met with one that sympathized with him, and was concerned for him, and kept up their good opinion of him, and respect for him, notwithstanding his afflictions; while his enemies were so insolent and abusive to him. On these he pronounceth this blessing, not doubting but that God would recompense to them all the kindness they had done him, particularly when they also came to be in affliction. The provocations which his enemies gave him did but endear his friends so much the more to him. Or, 2. To himself. He had the testimony of his conscience for him, that he had considered the poor; that when he was in honour and power at court he had taken cognizance of the wants and miseries of the poor, and had provided for their relief, and therefore was sure God would according to his promise strengthen and comfort him in his sickness. Here is a comment upon that promise; "Blessed are the merciful, for they shall obtain mercy." Observe,

1st. What the mercy is which is required of us. It is to consider the poor or afflicted, whether in mind, body, or estate. These we are to consider with prudence and tenderness; we must take notice of their affliction, and inquire into their state, must sympathize with them, and judge charitably concerning them. We must wisely consider the poor; that is, we must ourselves be instructed by the poverty and affliction of others, it must be Maschil to us, that is the word here used.

2nd. What the mercy is that is promised to us, if we thus shew mercy. He that considers the poor (if he cannot relieve them, yet he considers them, and has a compassionate concern for them, and in relieving them doth it considerately, and with discretion,) God will be sure to consider him. He shall not only be recompensed in the resurrection of the just, but he shall be blessed upon the earth. This branch of godliness, as much as any other, has the promise of the life that now is, and is ordinarily recompensed with temporal blessings; liberality to the poor is the surest and safest way of thriving. Such may be sure of seasonable and effectual relief from God.

First. In all troubles. He will deliver them in the day of evil; so that when the times are at the worst it shall go well with them, and they shall not fall into the calamities in which others are involved; if any be hid in the day of the Lord's anger, they shall. They who thus distinguish themselves from those that have hard hearts God will distinguish from those that have hard usage. Are they in danger? he will preserve and keep them alive; and to those who have a thousand times forfeited their lives, as the best have, it must be acknowledged a great favour if they have their lives given them for a prey. He doth not say they shall be preferred, but they shall be preserved and kept alive, when the arrows of death fly thick round about them. Do their enemies threaten them? God will not deliver them into the will of their enemies; and the most potent enemy we have can have no power against us, but what is given him from above. The good-will of a God that loves us is sufficient to secure us from the ill-will of all that hate us, men or devils; and that good-will we may promise ourselves an interest in if we have considered the poor, and helped to relieve and rescue them.

Secondly. Particularly in sickness; ver. 3, "The Lord will strengthen him," both in body and mind, "upon the bed of languishing," on which he had long lain sick, "and he will make all his bed." A very condescending expression, alluding to the care of those that nurse and tend sick people, especially of mothers for their children when they are sick, which is to make their beds easy for them; and that bed must needs be well made which God himself has the making of. He will make all his bed from head to foot, so that no part shall be uneasy; 'he will turn his bed,' (so the word is,) to shake it up, and make it very easy, or, he will turn it into a bed of health. Note, God has promised his people that he will strengthen them, and make them easy under their bodily pains and sicknesses. He has not promised that they shall never be sick, nor that they shall not lie long languishing, nor that their sickness shall not be unto death, but he has promised to enable them to bear their affliction with patience, obedient spirit? The first-named and more common explanation may be dismissed, and we may take as an instructive parallel the text of the prophet, "To obey is better than sacrifice, and to hearken than the fat of rams"—that is, "Thou hast given me grace to offer something better than the legal sacrifices, even a willing obedience, my life, my all." The celebrated passage in Heb. x. 5—10 begins, "Sacrifice and offering thou wouldest not, but a body hast thou prepared me." Of the prophetic application of this there is no doubt; but how came the Hebrew words for "my ears" to be rendered "a body?" We think that originally the translation was correct, but that at a very early period the Greek words for "mine ears" got changed into the present reading, which could easily have happened.

xl. 7. "In the volume of the book," i.e., a rolled-up book. The word "volume" properly means a roll, but is now applied to books of the ordinary form. Copies of the law used by the Jews in their service must be rolls or scrolls, if intended for the officiating priests and cheerfully to wait the issue. The soul shall by his grace be made to dwell at ease, when the body lies in pain.

Secondly. David's prayer directed and encouraged by these promises; ver. 4, "I said, Heal my soul." It is good for us to keep some account of our prayers, that we may not unsay in our practices any thing that we said in our prayers. Here is, 1. His humble petition; "Lord, be merciful to me." He appeals to mercy, as one that knew he could not stand the test of strict justice. The best saints, even those that have been merciful to the poor, have not made God their debtor, but must throw themselves on his mercy. When we are under the rod we must thus recommend ourselves to the tender mercy of our God; "Lord, heal my soul." Sin is the sickness of the soul; pardoning mercy heals it, renewing grace heals it; and this spiritual healing we should be more earnest for than for bodily health. 2. His penitent confession; "I have sinned against thee," and therefore my soul needs healing. I am a sinner, a miserable sinner, therefore "God be merciful to me," Lu. xviii. 13. It doth not appear that this hath reference to any particular gross act of sin, but in general to his many sins of infirmity, which his sickness set in order before him, and the dread of the consequences of which made him pray, "Heal my soul."

5 Mine enemies speak evil of me,
When shall he die, and his name perish?
6 And if he come to see me, he speaketh vanity:
His heart gathereth iniquity to itself;
When he goeth abroad, he telleth it.
7 All that hate me whisper together against me:
Against me do they devise my hurt.
8 An evil disease, say they, cleaveth fast unto him:
And now that he lieth he shall rise up no more.
9 Yea, mine own familiar friend, in whom I trusted, which did eat of my bread,
Hath lifted up his heel against me.
10 But thou, O LORD, be merciful unto me,
And raise me up, that I may requite them.
11 By this I know that thou favourest me,
Because mine enemy doth not triumph over me.
12 And as for me, thou upholdest me in mine integrity,
And settest me before thy face for ever.
13 Blessed be the LORD God of Israel
From everlasting, and to everlasting. Amen, and Amen.

David often complains of the insolent carriage of his enemies towards him when he was sick; which as it was very barbarous in them, so it could not but be very grievous to him. They were not indeed arrived to that modern pitch of wickedness, of poisoning his meat or drink, or giving him something to make him sick, but when he was sick they insulted over him; ver. 5, "Mine enemies speak evil of me," designing thereby to grieve his spirit, to ruin his reputation, and so to sink his interest. Observe,

First. The conduct of David's enemies.

1. They longed for his death; "When shall he die, and his name perish" with him. He had but an uncomfortable life, and yet they grudged him that; but it was a useful life. He was upon all accounts the greatest ornament and blessing of his country, and yet it seems there were some who were sick of him, as the Jews were of Paul, crying out, "Away with such a fellow from the earth." We ought not to desire the death of any; but to desire the death of useful men for their usefulness has much in it of the venom of the old serpent. They envied him his name, and the honour he had won; and doubted not but if he were dead that would be laid in the dust with him; yet see how they were mistaken. When he had served his generation he did die, Acts xiii. 36, but did his name perish? No; it lives and flourishes to this day in the sacred writings, and will to the end of time; for the memory of the just is and shall be blessed.

2. They picked up every thing they could to reproach him with; ver. 6, "If he come to see me," as it has always been reckoned a piece of neighbourly kindness to visit the sick, "he speaketh vanity;" that is, he pretends friendship, and that his errand is to mourn with me, and to comfort me; tells me he is very sorry to see me so much indisposed, and wisheth me my health, but it is all flattery and falsehood. We complain, and justly, of the want of sincerity in our days, and that there is scarce any true friendship to be found among men; but it seems by this the former days were no better than these. David's friends were all compliment, and had nothing of that affection for him in their hearts which they made profession of; but that was not the worst of it, it was upon a mischievous design that they came to see him, that they might make invidious remarks upon every thing he said or did; and might represent it as they pleased to others, with their own comments upon it, so as to render him odious or ridiculous. "His heart gathereth iniquity to itself," puts ill constructions upon every thing; and then when he goes among his companions he tells it them that they may tell it others; "Report, say they, and we will report it," Jer. xx. 10. If he made any complaints of his illness, they would reproach him for his pusillanimity; if little complaints, for his stupidity. If he prayed, or gave them good counsel, they would banter it, and call it canting. If he kept silence from good when the wicked were before him, they would say he had forgot his religion now he was sick. There is no fence against those whose malice thus gathers iniquity.

3. They promised themselves that he would never recover from this sickness, nor ever wipe off the odium with which they had loaded him. They whispered together against him, ver. 7; speaking that secretly in one another's ears which they could not for shame speak out, and which if they did, they knew it would be confuted. Whisperers and backbiters are put together among the worst of sinners, Rom. i. 29, 30. They whispered that their plot against him might not be discovered, and so defeated; there is seldom whispering, we say, but there is lying, or some mischief on foot. Those whisperers devised evil to David; concluding he would die quickly, they contrived how to break all the measures he had concerted for the public good; to prevent the prosecution of them, and to undo all that he had hitherto been doing. This he calls devising hurt against him; and they doubted not but to gain their point, for "an evil disease," 'a thing of Belial,' say they, "cleaveth fast unto him." The reproach with which they had loaded his name they hoped would cleave so fast to it, that it would perish with him, and then they should gain their point; they went by a modern maxim, fortiter calumniari, aliquid adhærebit,—'fling an abundance of calumny, some will be sure to stick.' Or, this disease he is now under will certainly make an end of him: for it is the punishment of some great enormous crime, which he will not be brought to repent of, and proves him, however he has appeared, a son of Belial. Or, it is inflicted by Satan, who is called Belial, the wicked one, 2 Cor. vi. 15. It is (according to a loose way of speaking some have) a devilish disease; and, therefore, it will cleave fast to him, and "now that he lieth," now his distemper prevails so far as to oblige him to keep his bed, "he shall rise up no more;" we shall be rid of him, and divide the spoil of his preferments. We are not to think it strange if, when good men are sick, there be those that hope for their death, as well as those that fear it, which makes the world not worthy of them, Rev. xi. 10.

4. There was one particularly, in whom he had reposed a great deal of confidence, that took part with his enemies, and was as abusive to him as any of them; ver. 9, "my own familiar friend." Probably he means Ahithophel, who had been his bosom friend, and prime minister of state, in whom he trusted, as one inviolably firm to him, and whose advice he relied much upon in dealing with his enemies, who did eat of his bread; that is, with whom he had been very intimate, and whom he had taken to sit at the table with him; nay, whom he had maintained and given a livelihood to, and so obliged both in gratitude and interest to stick to him. They that had their maintenance from the king's palace did not think it meet for them to see the king's dishonour, Ezr. iv. 14, much less to do him dishonour; yet this base and treacherous confidant of David's forgot all the eaten bread, and lifted up his heel against him that had lifted up his head; not only deserted him, but insulted him, kicked at him, endeavoured to supplant him. Those are wicked indeed whom no courtesy done them, nor confidence reposed in them, will oblige; and let us not think it strange if we receive abuses from such. David did, and the Son of David, for of Judas the traitor David here in the Spirit spake; our Saviour himself so expounds this, and therefore gave Judas the sop, that the Scripture might be fulfilled; "He that eateth bread with me, has lift up his heel against me," Jno. xiii. 18, 26. Nay, have not we ourselves carried it thus perfidiously and disingenuously towards God? We eat of his bread daily, and yet lift up the heel against him, as Jeshurun that waxed fat and kicked, Deu. xxxii. 15.

Secondly. Now how did David bear this insolent, ill-natured carriage of his enemies towards him?

1. He prayed to God that they might be disappointed. He said nothing to them, but turned himself to God; "O Lord, be thou merciful to me," for they are unmerciful, ver. 10. He had prayed, in reference to the guilt of his sins, ver. 4, "Lord, be merciful to me;" and now again, in reference to the insults of his enemies, "Lord, be merciful to me," for that is a prayer will fit every case. God's mercy has in it a redress for every grievance. They endeavour to run me down, but, Lord, do thou raise me up from this bed of languishing, from which they think I shall never rise. "Raise me up, that I may requite them;" that is, that I may render them good for evil; so some, for that was David's practice, Ps. vii. 4; xxxv. 13. A good man will even wish for an opportunity of making it to appear that he bears no malice to those that have been injurious to him; but, on the contrary, is ready to do them any good office. Or, that as a king I may put them under the marks of my just displeasure, banish them the court, and forbid them my table for the future; which would be a necessary piece of justice for warning to others. Perhaps in this prayer is couched a prophecy of the exaltation of Christ, whom God raised up that he might be a just avenger of all the wrongs done to him and to his people, particularly by the Jews, whose utter destruction followed not long after.

2. He assured himself that they would be disappointed; ver. 11, "By this I know that thou favourest me" and my interest, "because mine enemy doth not triumph over me." They hoped for his death; but he found himself, through mercy, recovering, and this would add to the comfort of his recovery, 1st. That it would be a baulk to his adversaries. They would be crest-fallen, and wretchedly ashamed, and there would be no occasion to upbraid them with their disappointment, they would fret at it themselves. Note, Though we may not take a pleasure in the fall of our enemies, we may take a pleasure in the frustrating of their designs against us. 2nd. That that would be a token of God's favour to him, and a certain evidence that he did favour him, and would continue to do so. Note, When we can discern the favour of God to us in any mercy personal or public, that doubles it and sweetens it.

3. He dependeth upon God who had thus delivered him from many an evil work, to preserve him to his heavenly kingdom, as blessed Paul, 2 Tim. iv. 18; "And as for me," forasmuch as thou favourest me, as a fruit of that favour and to qualify me for the continuance of it, "thou upholdest me in mine integrity, and" in order to that "settest me before thy face," hast thine eye always upon me for good; or, because thou dost, by thy grace, uphold me in my integrity, I know that thou wilt in thy glory set me for ever before thy face. Note, 1st. When at any time we suffer in our reputation, our chief concern should be about our integrity, and then we may cheerfully leave it to God to secure our reputation. David knows, if he can but persevere in his integrity, he needs not fear his enemies' triumphs over him. 2nd. The best man in the world holds his integrity no longer than God upholds him in it, for by his grace we are what we are; if we be left to ourselves we shall not only fall, but fall away. 3rd. It is a great comfort to us that, however we are weak, God is able to uphold us in our integrity, and will do it if we commit the keeping of it to him. 4th. If the grace of God did not take a constant care of us, we should not be upheld in our integrity. His eye is always upon us, else we should soon start aside from him. 5th. Those whom God now upholds in their integrity he will set before his face for ever, and make them happy in the vision and fruition of himself. "He that endures to the end shall be saved."

4. The psalm concludes with a solemn doxology, or adoration of God, as "the Lord God of Israel," ver. 13. It is not certain whether this verse pertains to this particular psalm; if so, it teaches us this, that a believing hope of our preservation through grace to glory is enough to fill our hearts with joy, and our mouths with everlasting praise, even in our greatest straits; or, whether it were added as the conclusion of the first book of Psalms, which is reckoned to end here; the like being subjoined to Ps. lxxii.; lxxxix.; cvi.; and then it teacheth us to make God the Omega who is the Alpha, to make him the end who is the beginning of every good work. We are here taught, 1st. To give glory to God as the Lord God of Israel, a God in covenant with his people; that has done great and kind things for them, and has more and better in reserve. 2nd. To give him glory as an eternal God, that hath both his being and his blessedness "from everlasting and to everlasting." 3rd. To do this with great affection and fervour of spirit, intimated in the double seal set to it; "Amen, and Amen;" be it so now, be it so to all eternity. We say Amen to it, and let all others say Amen too.

PSALM XLII.

If the book of Psalms be, as some have styled it, a mirror or looking-glass of pious and devout affections, this psalm in particular deserves as much as any one psalm to be so entitled, and is as proper as any other to kindle and excite such in us. Gracious desires xl. 14—16. These verses may, like some similar in form, be read either as a series of prayers or as a series of declarations of what shall be. If we place these words all in the mouth of Messiah, as many do, the ordinary explanation raises difficulties which we cannot here discuss; nor need we, because we do not regard the psalmist as abdicating his personality.

xl. 17. It is well to remind the reader from time to time that such language as "poor and needy" is not to be restricted to material poverty and want; in fact, it applies as much or more to one in trouble, and needing help and comfort.

xli. 1. The word for "poor" here is different from those rendered "poor" and "needy" in Psa. xl. 17; but, like them and our own "poor," "mean," &c., is by no means limited to material destitution.

xlii. 1. The Hebrew word here is Ayal, one form of which appears in the name, Aijalon. In reference to this passage, Dr. Tristram says, "As the deer could only obtain water at certain places in the

are here strong and fervent; gracious hopes and fears, joys and sorrows, are here struggling, but the pleasing passion comes off a conqueror; or we may take it for a conflict between sense and faith, sense objecting and faith answering. I. Faith begins with holy desires towards God and communion with him, ver. 1, 2. II. Sense complains of the darkness and cloudiness of the present condition, aggravated by the remembrance of the former enjoyments, ver. 3, 4. III. Faith silenceth the complaint with the assurance of a good issue at last, ver. 5. IV. Sense renews its complaints of the present dark and melancholy state, ver. 6, 7. V. Faith holds up the heart notwithstanding, with hope that the day will dawn, ver. 8. VI. Sense repeats its lamentations, ver. 9, 10, and sighs out the same remonstrance it had before made of its grievances. VII. Faith gets the last word, ver. 11, for the silencing of the complaints of sense; and though it be almost the same with that, ver. 5, yet now it prevails and carries the day. The title doth not tell us who was the penman of the psalm, but most probably it was David; and we may conjecture it was penned by him at a time when, either by Saul's persecution, or Absalom's rebellion, he was driven from the sanctuary, and cut off from the privilege of waiting upon God in public ordinances. The strain of it is much the same with Ps. lxiii., and therefore we may presume it was penned by the same hand, and upon the same or a like occasion. In singing it, if we be either in outward affliction or inward distress, we may accommodate to ourselves the melancholy expressions we find here; if not, we must in singing them sympathize with those whose case they speak too plainly, and thank God it is not our own case; but those passages in it which express and excite holy desires towards God, and dependence on him, we must earnestly endeavour to bring our minds up to.

To the chief Musician, Maschil, for the sons of Korah.

AS the hart panteth after the water brooks,
So panteth my soul after thee, O God

HARTS.

2 My soul thirsteth for God, for the living God:
When shall I come and appear before God?
3 My tears have been my meat day and night,
While they continually say unto me, Where is thy God?
4 When I remember these things, I pour out my soul in me: [to the house of God,
For I had gone with the multitude, I went with them
With the voice of joy and praise,
With a multitude that kept holyday.
5 Why art thou cast down, O my soul?
And why art thou disquieted in me?
Hope thou in God: for I shall yet praise him
For the help of his countenance.

Holy love to God, as the chief good and our felicity, is the power of godliness, the very life and soul of religion, without which all external professions and performances are but a shell and carcase; now here we have some of the expressions of that love. Here is,

First. Holy love thirsting. Love upon the wing, soaring upwards in holy desires towards the Lord, and towards the remembrance of his name; ver. 1, 2, "My soul panteth, thirsteth for God," for nothing more than God, but still for more and more of him. Now observe,

1. When it was that David thus expressed his vehement desire towards God. It was, 1st. When he was debarred from his outward opportunities of waiting on God. When he was banished to the land of Jordan, a great way off from the courts of God's house. Note, Sometimes God teacheth us effectually to know the worth of mercies by the want of them, and whets our appetites to the means of grace by cutting us short in those means; we are apt to loathe that manna when we have plenty of it, which will be very precious to us if ever we come to know the scarcity of it. 2nd. When he was deprived in a great measure of the inward comfort he used to have in God. He now went mourning, but he went on panting. Note, If God by his grace has wrought in us sincere and earnest desires towards him, we may take comfort from these, when we want those ravishing delights we have sometimes had in God, because lamenting after God is as sure an evidence that we love him as rejoicing in God. Before the psalmist records his doubts, and fears, and griefs which had sorely shaken him, he premiseth this, that he looked upon the living God as his chief good, and had set his heart upon him accordingly, and was resolved to live and die by him; and casting anchor thus at first, he rides out the storm.

2. What is the object of his desire, and what it is he thus thirsts after. 1st. He pants after God, he thirsts for God; not the ordinances themselves, but the God of the ordinances. A gracious soul can take little satisfaction in God's courts if it do not meet with God himself there; "O that knew where I might find him!" that I might have more of the tokens of his favour, the graces and comforts of his Spirit, and the earnests of his glory. 2nd. He has herein an eye to God as the living God, that has life in himself, and is the fountain of life and all happiness to those that are his. The living God, not only in opposition to dead idols, the works of men's hands, but to all the dying comforts of this world, which perish in the using. Living souls can never take up their rest any where short of a living God. 3rd. He longs to come and appear before God, to make himself known to him, as being conscious to himself of his own sincerity; to attend on him, as a servant appears before his master, to pay his respects to him, and receive his commands; to give an account to him, as one from whom our judgment proceeds. To appear before God is as much the desire of the upright as it is the dread of the hypocrite. The psalmist knew he could not come into God's courts but he must come to his charges, for so was the law, that none should appear before God empty; yet he longs to come, and will not grudge the charges.

3. What is the degree of this desire. It is very importunate; it is his soul that pants, his soul that thirsts; which speaks not only the sincerity, but the strength of his desire. His longing for the water of the well of Bethlehem was nothing to this. He compares it to the panting of a hart, or deer, which is naturally hot and dry, especially of a hunted buck, after the water brooks. Thus earnestly doth a gracious soul desire communion with God, thus impatient is it in the want of that communion, so impossible it should take up with any thing short of that communion, and so insatiable in taking the pleasures of that communion when the opportunity of it returns, still thirsting after the full enjoyment of him in the heavenly kingdom.

Secondly. Holy love mourning for God's present withdrawings, and the want of the benefit of solemn ordinances; ver. 3, "My tears have been my meat day and night," during this forced absence from God's house. His circumstances were sorrowful, and he accommodated himself to them, received the impressions, and returned the expressions of sorrow; even the royal prophet was a weeping prophet when he wanted the comforts of God's house. His tears were mingled with his meat; nay, they were his meat day and night; he fed, he feasted upon his own tears, when there was such just cause for them; and it was a satisfaction to him that he found his heart so much affected with a grievance of this nature. Observe, He did not think it enough to shed a tear or two at parting from the sanctuary, to weep a farewell prayer when he took his leave; but as long as he continued under a forced absence from that place of his delight he never looked up, but wept day and night. Note, Those that are deprived of the benefit of public ordinances constantly miss them, and therefore should constantly mourn for the want of them, till they are restored to them again. Two things aggravated his grief:

1. The reproaches with which his enemies teazed him; "They continually say unto me, Where is thy God?" 1st. Because he was absent from the ark, the token of God's presence. Judging of the God of Israel by the gods of the heathen, they concluded he had lost his God. Note, Those are mistaken who think that when they have robbed us of our Bibles, and our ministers, and our solemn assemblies, they have robbed us of our God; for, though God has tied us to them when they are to be had, he has not tied himself to them. We know where our God is, and where to find him, when we know not where his ark is, nor where to find that. Wherever we are there is a way open heavenward. 2nd. Because God did not presently appear for his deliverance, they concluded that he had abandoned him; but herein also they were deceived. It doth not follow that the saints have lost their God, because they have lost all their other friends. However, by this base reflection on God and his people, they added affliction to the afflicted, and that was what they aimed at. Nothing is more grievous to a gracious soul than that which is intended to shock its hope and confidence in God.

2. The remembrance of his former liberties and enjoyments; ver. 4, "Son, remember thy good things," is a great aggravation of evil things; so much do our powers of reflection and prospect add to the grievance of this present time. David remembered the days of old, and then his soul was poured out in him; he melted away, and the thought almost broke his heart. He poured out his soul within him in sorrow, and then poured out his soul before God in prayer. But what was it that occasioned this colliquation of spirit? It was not the remembrance of the pleasures at court, or the entertainments of his own house, from which he was now banished, that afflicted him; but the remembrance of the free access he had formerly had to God's house, and the pleasure he had in attending the sacred solemnities there. 1st. He went to the house of God, though in his time it was but a tent; nay, if this psalm was penned, as many think it was, at the time of his being persecuted by Saul, the ark was then in a private house, 2 Sam. vi. 3; but the meanness, obscurity, and inconveniency of the place did not lessen his esteem of that sacred symbol of the Divine presence. David was a courtier, a prince, a man of honour, a man of business, and yet very diligent in attending God's house, and joining in public ordinances; even in the days of Saul, when he and his great men inquired not at it, 1 Chr. xiii. 3. Whatever others did, David and his house would serve the Lord. 2nd. He went with the multitude, and thought it no disparagement to his dignity to be at the head of a crowd in attending upon God. Nay, this added to the pleasure of it, that he was accompanied with a multitude, and therefore it is twice mentioned, as that which he greatly lamented the want of now. The more the better, in the service of God; it is the liker to heaven, and a sensible help to our comfort in the communion of saints. 3rd. He went with the voice of joy and praise, not only with joy and praise in his heart, but with the outward expressions of it, proclaiming his joy, and speaking forth the high praises of his God. Note, When we wait upon God in public ordinances we have reason to do it both with cheerfulness and thankfulness, to take to ourselves the comfort, and give to God the glory of our liberty of access to him. 4th. He went to keep holy days; not to keep them in vain mirth and recreation, but in religious exercises. Solemn days are spent most comfortably in solemn assemblies.

Thirdly. Holy love hoping; ver. 5, "Why art thou cast down, O my soul?" His sorrow was upon a very good account, and yet it must not exceed its due limits, nor prevail to depress his spirits; he therefore communes with his own heart for his relief. Come, my soul, I have something to say to thee in thy heaviness. Let us consider, 1. The cause of it. Thou art cast down, as one stooping and sinking under a burthen, Pr. xii. 25. Thou art disquieted, in confusion and disorder, now, why art thou so? This may be taken either as an inquiring question; Let the cause of this uneasiness be duly weighed, and see whether it be a just cause. Our disquietments would many times vanish before a strict scrutiny into the grounds and reasons of them. Why am I cast down? Is there a cause, a real cause? Have not others more cause that do not make so much ado? Have not we at the same time cause to be encouraged? Or, it may be taken as an expostulating question. Those that commune much with their own hearts will often have occasion to chide them, as David here. Why do I thus dishonour God by my melancholy dejections? Why do I discourage others, and do so much injury to myself? Can I give a good account of this tumult? 2. The cure of it. "Hope thou in God, for I shall yet praise him." A believing confidence in God is a sovereign antidote against prevailing despondency and disquiet of spirit. And therefore when we chide ourselve wilderness, and those far off, so the psalmist could only join in the ordinances of God at the tabernacle, from which he was far distant. What species of deer is intended by Ayal is not clear. Unless the term be general, it must have been either the fallow-deer (dama vulgaris) or the red deer (cervus elaphus). The former is a native of Persia, and was probably common in the more fertile and wooded parts of the country, but it is now all but extinct in Palestine. Hasselquist met with it on Mount Tabor, where we were told it is still to be found, as well as in the woods between that mountain and the gorge of the Litany river. We ourselves only met with a single animal, in an open glade about ten miles west of the Sea of Galilee. Its teeth have been found in bone breccia in the Lebanon, where it certainly does not now exist. But it would be much more easily extirpated than the antelopes of the desert, or the wild goats of the mountain, from its partiality for those districts which man has always continued to inhabit." Some of the ancients and some for our dejections, we must charge ourselves to hope in God. When the soul embraces itself, it sinks; if it catch hold on the power and promise of God, it keeps the head above water. Hope in God, 1st. That he shall have glory from us: "I shall yet praise him." I shall experience such a change in my estate, that I shall not want matter for praise; and such a change in my spirit, that I shall not want a heart for praise. It is the greatest honour and happiness of a man, and the greatest desire and hope of every good man, to be unto God for a name and a praise. What is the crown of heaven's bliss but this, that there we shall be for ever praising God? And what is our support under our present woes but this, that we shall yet praise God, that they shall not prevent or abate our endless hallelujahs? 2nd. That we shall have comfort in him. We "shall praise him for the help of his countenance;" for his favour, and the support we have by it, and the satisfaction we have in it. Those that know how to value and improve the light of God's countenance will find in that a suitable, seasonable, and sufficient help in the worst of times, and that which will furnish them with constant matter for praise. David's believing expectation of this kept him from sinking, nay, it kept him from drooping. His harp was a palliative cure of Saul's melancholy; but his hope was an effectual cure of his own.

6 O my God, my soul is cast down within me:
Therefore will I remember thee from the land of Jordan,
and of the Hermonites,
From the hill Mizar.
7 Deep calleth unto deep at the noise of thy waterspouts;
All thy waves and thy billows are gone over me.
8 Yet the LORD will command his lovingkindness in the daytime,
And in the night his song shall be with me,
And my prayer unto the God of my life. [me?
9 I will say unto God my rock, Why hast thou forgotten
Why go I mourning because of the oppression of the enemy?
10 As with a sword in my bones, mine enemies reproach me;
While they say daily unto me, Where is thy God?
11 Why art thou cast down, O my soul?
And why art thou disquieted within me?
Hope thou in God: for I shall yet praise him,
Who is the health of my countenance, and my God.

Complaints and comforts here, as before, take their turn, like night and day in the course of nature.

First. He complains of the dejections of his spirit, but comforts himself with the thoughts of God, ver. 6. 1. In his troubles his soul was dejected, and he goes to God and tells him so: "O my God, my soul is cast down within me." It is a great support to us, when upon any account we are distressed, that we have liberty of access to God, and liberty of speech before him, and may open to him the causes of our dejection. David had communed with his own heart about its own bitterness, and had not as yet found relief; and therefore he turns to God, and opens before him the trouble. Note, When we cannot get relief for our burthened spirits by pleading with ourselves, we should try what we can do by praying to God, and leaving our case with him. We cannot still these winds and waves, but we know who can. 2. In his devotions his soul was elevated; and, finding the disease very painful, he had recourse to that as a sovereign remedy. My soul is plunged; therefore, to prevent its sinking, "I will remember thee," meditate upon thee, and call upon thee, and try what that will do to keep up my spirit. Note, The way to forget the sense of our miseries is to remember the God of our mercies. It was an uncommon case when the psalmist remembered God and was troubled, Ps. lxxvii. 3. Ordinarily he remembered God and was comforted, and therefore had recourse to that expedient now. He was now driven to the utmost borders of the land of Canaan, to shelter himself there from the rage of his persecutors, sometimes to the country about Jordan, and when discovered there, then to the land of the Hermonites, or to a hill called Mizar, or the little hill. But, 1st. Wherever he went he took his religion along with him; in all these places he remembered God, and lifted up his heart to him, and kept his secret communion with him. This is the comfort of the banished, the wanderers, the travellers, of those that are strangers in a strange land, undique ad cœlos tantundem est viæ,—'wherever they are, there is a way open heavenwards.' 2nd. Wherever he was, he retained his affection for the courts of God's house. From the land of Jordan, or from the top of the hills, he used to look a long look, a longing look, towards the place of the sanctuary, and wish himself there. Distance and time could not make him forget that which his heart was so much upon, and which lay so near it.

Secondly. He complains of the tokens of God's displeasure against him, but comforts himself with the hopes of the return of his favour in due time.

1. He saw his troubles coming from God's wrath, and that discouraged him; ver. 7, "Deep calls unto deep," one affliction comes upon the neck of another, as if it were called to hasten after it; and thy waterspouts give the signal, and sound the alarm of war. It may be meant of the terrors and tosses of his mind under the apprehensions of God's anger. One frightful thought summoned another, and made way for it, as is usual in melancholy people. He was overpowered and overwhelmed with a deluge of grief, like that of the old world when the windows of heaven were opened, and the fountains of the great deep were broken up. Or it is an allusion to a ship at sea, in a great storm, tossed by the roaring waves which go over it, Ps. cvii. 25. Whatever waves and billows of affliction go over us at any time, we must call them God's waves, and his billows, that we may humble ourselves under his mighty hand, and may encourage ourselves to hope that, though we be threatened, we shall not be ruined; for the waves and billows are under a Divine check, "The Lord on high is mightier than the noise of these many waters." Let not good men think it strange if they be exercised with many and various trials, and if they come thick upon them God knows what he doth, and so shall they shortly. Jonah in the whale's belly made use of these words of David, Jonah ii. 3, (they are exactly the same in the original,) and of him they are literally true, "All thy waves and thy billows are gone over me;" for the book of Psalms is contrived so as to reach every one's case.

2. He expected his deliverance to come from God's favour; ver. 8, "Yet the Lord will command his lovingkindness." Non si male nunc et olim sic erit,—'Things are bad, but they shall not always be so.' After the storm there will come a calm, and the prospect of this supported him when deep called unto deep. Observe, 1st. What he promised himself from God. "The Lord will command his lovingkindness." He eyes the favour of God as the fountain of all the good he looked for, that is life, that is better than life; and with that God will gather those from whom he has in a little wrath hid his face, Isa. liv. 7, 8. God's conferring of his favour is called his commanding it, which intimates both the freeness of it,—we cannot pretend to merit it, but it is bestowed in a way of sovereignty; he gives like a king,—and the efficacy of it, he speaks his lovingkindness, and makes us to hear it; "speaks, and it is done." He "commands deliverance," Ps. xliv. 4; "commands the blessing," Ps. cxxxiii. 3, as one having authority. By commanding his lovingkindness, he commands down the waves and the billows, and they shall obey him. This he will do in the daytime; for God's lovingkindness will make day in the soul at any time. Though weeping has endured for a night, a long night, yet joy will come in the morning. 2nd. What he promised for himself to God. If God command his lovingkindness for him, he will meet it, and bid it welcome with his best affections and devotions. First. He will rejoice in God; "In the night his song shall be with me." The mercies we receive in the day, we ought to return thanks for at night; when others are sleeping, we should be praising God: see Ps. cxix. 62, "At midnight will I rise to give thanks." In silence and solitude, when we are retired from the hurries of the world, we must be pleasing ourselves with the thoughts of God's goodness. Or in the night of affliction, before the day dawns in which God commands his lovingkindness, I will sing songs of praise in the prospect of it. Even in tribulation the saints can rejoice in hope of the glory of God; sing in hope, and praise in hope, Rom. v. 2, 3. It is God's prerogative to give songs in the night, Job xxxv. 10. Secondly. He will seek to God in a constant dependence upon him, "My prayer shall be to the God of my life." Our believing expectation of mercy must not supersede but quicken our prayers for it. God is the God of our life, in whom we live and move, the author and giver of all our comforts, and, therefore, to whom should we apply ourselves by prayer but to him? And from him what good may not we expect? It would put life into our prayers, in them to eye God as the God of our life; for then it is for our lives, and the lives of our souls, that we stand up to make request.

Thirdly. He complains of the insolence of his enemies, and yet comforts himself in God as his friend, ver. 9—11.

1. His complaint is, that his enemies oppressed and reproached him, and this made a great impression upon him. 1st. They oppressed him to that degree that he went mourning from day to day, from place to place, ver. 9. He did not break out into indecent passions, though abused as never man was; but he silently wept out his grief, and went mourning. And for this we cannot blame him; it must needs grieve a man that truly loves his country, and seeks the good of it, to see himself run upon, and hardly used, as if he were an enemy to it. Yet David ought not from hence to conclude that God had forgotten him and cast him off, nor thus to expostulate with him, as if he did him as much wrong in suffering him to be trampled upon, as they did that trampled upon him. "Why go I mourning?" and "why hast thou forgotten me?" We may complain to God, but we are not allowed thus to complain of him. 2nd. They reproached him so cuttingly, that it was a sword in his bones, ver. 10. He had mentioned before what the reproach was that touched him thus to the quick, and here he repeats it: "They say daily unto me, Where is thy God?" A reproach which was therefore very grievous to him, both because it reflected dishonour upon God, and was intended to discourage his hope in God, which he had enough to do to keep up in any measure, and which was but too apt to fail of itself.

2. His comfort is, that God is his rock, ver. 9. A rock to build upon, a rock to take shelter in. The Rock of ages, in whom is everlasting strength, would be his rock, his strength in the inner man, both for doing and suffering. And to him he had access with confidence; to God his rock he might say what he had to say, and be sure of a gracious audience. He therefore repeats what he had said, ver. 5, and concludes with it; ver. 11, "Why art thou cast down, O my soul?" His griefs and fears were clamorous and troublesome, they were not silenced, though they were again and again answered; but here at length his faith came off a conqueror, and forced the enemies to quit the field. And he gains this victory, 1st. By repeating what he had before said; chiding himself, as before, for his dejections and disquietments, and encouraging himself to trust in the name of the Lord, and to stay himself upon his God. Note, It may be of great use to us to think our good thoughts over again; and, if we do not gain our point with them at first, perhaps we may the second time; however, where the heart goes along with the words, it is no vain repetition. We have need to press the same thing over and over again upon our own hearts, and all little enough. 2nd. By adding one word to it. There he hoped to praise God for the salvation that was in his countenance; here, I will praise him, saith he, as the salvation of my countenance, from the present cloud that is upon it. If God smile upon me, that will make me look pleasant, look up, look forward, look round with pleasure. He adds, And my God, related to me, in covenant with me. All that he is, all that he has, is mine, according to the true intent and meaning of the promise. This thought enabled him to triumph over all his griefs and fears. God's being with the saints in heaven, and being their God, is that which will wipe away all tears from their eyes, Rev. xxi. 3, 4.

PSALM XLIII.

This psalm, it is likely, was penned upon the same occasion with the former, and having no title may be looked upon as an appendix to it. The malady presently returning, he had immediate recourse to the same remedy, because he had entered it in his book with a probatum est,—'it has been proved,' upon it. The 2nd verse of this psalm is almost the very same with the 9th verse of the foregoing psalm, as the 5th of this is exactly the same with the 11th of that. Christ himself, who had the Spirit without measure, when there was occasion, prayed a second and third time, saying the same words, Mat. xxvi. 44. In this psalm, I. He appeals to God concerning the injuries that were done him by his enemies, ver. 1, 2. II. He prays to God to restore to him the free enjoyment of public ordinances again, and promiseth a good improvement of them, ver. 3, 4. III. He endeavours to still the tumult of his own spirit with a lively hope and confidence in God, ver. 5, which if we labour after in singing this psalm, we sing with grace in our hearts.

JUDGE me, O God, and plead my cause
Against an ungodly nation:
O deliver me from the deceitful and unjust man.
2 For thou art the God of my strength:
Why dost thou cast me off? [enemy?
Why go I mourning because of the oppression of the modern Roman Catholic editors absurdly say that the old hart draws a serpent into its nostrils, whereby it is poisoned, but by drinking water, "casteth his hornes and hair, and becometh, as it were, young again." So the Douay Bible.

xlii. 6. "The land of Jordan" has been understood of the district on the east of the Jordan, to which David fled on the outbreak of the sedition headed by Absalom. It is to be noted, however, that Theodoret ascribes this psalm to the Babylonian captivity, and if he is correct, there is no allusion to David's flight. For "Hermonites" read Hermonim, i.e., Hermons, the plural of Hermon. The mountain Hermon has three summits, and hence, probably, the plural form of its name. There are some curious and interesting ruins on one of the summits, perhaps those of a pagan temple mentioned by Jerome. This mountain is in the north-east of Palestine. "The hill Mizar," i.e., the little mountain, is nowhere else alluded to by name, and its identity is unknown.

3 O send out thy light and thy truth:
Let them lead me; [nacles.
Let them bring me unto thy holy hill, and to thy taber-
4 Then will I go unto the altar of God,
Unto God my exceeding joy:
Yea, upon the harp will I praise thee,
O God my God.
5 Why art thou cast down, O my soul?
And why art thou disquieted within me?
Hope in God: for I shall yet praise him,
Who is the health of my countenance, and my God.

David here makes his application to God, by faith and prayer, as his judge, his strength, his guide, his joy, his hope, with suitable affections and expressions.

First. As his judge, his righteous judge, who he knew would judge him, and who (being conscious of his own integrity) he knew would judge for him; ver. 1, "Judge me, O God, and plead my cause." There were those that impeached him, against them he is defendant, and from their courts, where he stood unjustly convicted and condemned, he appeals to the court of heaven, the supreme judicature; praying to have their judgment given against him reversed, and his innocency cleared. There were those that had injured him; against them he is plaintiff, and exhibits his complaint to him who is the avenger of wrong, praying for justice for himself, and upon them. Observe, 1. Who his enemies were with whom he had this struggle. Here was an ill body of men, whom he calls an ungodly or unmerciful nation; and those that are unmerciful make it appear that they are ungodly, for those that have any fear or love of their Master will have compassion on their fellow servants. And here was one ill man the head of them, a deceitful and unjust man; most probably Saul, who not only shewed no kindness to David, but dealt most perfidiously and dishonestly with him. If Absalom was the man he meant, his character was no better. As long as there are such bad men out of hell, nations of them, it is not strange that good men who are yet out of heaven meet with hard and base treatment. Some think that David, by the spirit of prophecy, calculated this psalm for the use of the Jews in their captivity in Babylon, and that the Chaldeans are the ungodly nation here meant; and to them it was very applicable, but only as other like scriptures, none of which are of private interpretation. God might design it for their use, whether David did or no. 2. What is his prayer with reference to them. "Judge me." As to the quarrel God had with him for sin, he prays, "Enter not into judgment with me," for then I shall be condemned; but as to the quarrel his enemies had with him, he prays, Lord, "judge me," for I know that I shall be justified; "Plead my cause against them," that is, take my part, and in thy providence appear on my behalf. He that has an honest cause may expect that God will plead it. Plead my cause so as to deliver me from them, that they may not have their will against me. We must reckon our cause sufficiently pleaded, if we be delivered, though our enemies be not destroyed.

Secondly. As his strength, his all-sufficient strength; so he eyes God; ver. 2, "Thou art the God of my strength, my God," my strength, from whom all my strength is derived, in whom I strengthen myself, who hast many a time strengthened me, and without whom I am weak as water, and utterly unable either to do or suffer any thing for thee. David now went mourning, destitute of spiritual joys, yet he found God the God of his strength; however, if we cannot comfort ourselves in God, we may stay ourselves upon him, and may have spiritual supports when we want spiritual suavities. David here pleads this with God. Thou art the God on whom I depend as my strength, why then dost thou cast me off? This was a mistake; for God never cast off any that trusted in him, whatever melancholy apprehensions they may have of their own state. Thou art the God of my strength, why then is mine enemy too strong for me; and why go I mourning because of his oppressive power? It is hard to reconcile the mighty force of the church's enemies with the almighty power of the church's God; but the day will reconcile them, when all his enemies shall become his footstool.

Thirdly. As his guide, his faithful guide; ver. 3, "Lead me, bring me to thy holy hill." He prays, 1. That God by his providence would bring him back from his banishment, and open a way for him again to the free enjoyment of the privileges of God's sanctuary. His heart is upon the holy hill and the tabernacles, not upon his family comforts, or his court preferments or diversions; he could bear the want of these, but he is impatient to see God's tabernacles again. Nothing so amiable in his eyes as those; thither he would fain be brought back. In order to this, he prays, "Send out thy light and thy truth," that is, let me have this as a fruit of thy favour which is light; and the performance of thy promise which is truth; and we need desire no more to make us happy than the good that flows from God's favour, and is included in his promise. That mercy, that truth is enough, is all; and when we see these in God's providences we see ourselves under a very safe conduct. Note, Those whom God leads, he leads to his holy hill and to his tabernacles; those therefore who pretend to be led by the Spirit, and yet turn their backs upon instituted ordinances, certainly deceive themselves. 2. That God by his grace would bring him into communion with himself, and prepare him for the vision and fruition of himself in the other world. Some of the Jewish writers by the light and truth here understand Messiah the prince, and Elias his forerunner. These are come in answer to the prayers of the Old Testament; but we are still to pray for God's light and truth, that is, the Spirit of light and truth, who supplies the want of Christ's bodily presence, to lead us into the mystery of godliness, and to guide us in the way to heaven. When God sends his light and truth into our hearts, those will guide us to the upper world in all our devotions, as well as in all our aims and expectations; and if we conscientiously follow that light and truth they will certainly bring us to the holy hill above.

Fourthly. As his joy, his exceeding joy. If God guide him to his tabernacles, if he restore him to his former liberties, he knows very well what he has to do, "Then will I go unto the altar of God," ver. 4; he will get as near as he can unto God his exceeding joy. Note, 1. Those that come to the tabernacles should come to the altar; that come to ordinances, should qualify themselves to come, and then come to special ordinances, to those that are most affecting and most binding. The nearer we come, the closer we cleave, to God, the better. 2. Those that come to the altar of God, must see to it that therein they come unto God, and draw near to him with the heart, with a true heart. We come in vain to holy ordinances, if we do not in them come to the holy God. 3. Those that come unto God, must come to him as their exceeding joy, not only as their future bliss, but as their present joy; and that not a common, but an exceeding joy, far exceeding all the joys of sense and time. The phrase in the original is very emphatical, 'Unto God the gladness of my joy, or of my triumph. Whatever we rejoice or triumph in, God must be the joy of it, all our joy in it must terminate in him, and must pass through the gift to the giver. 4. When we come to God as our exceeding joy, our comforts in him must be the matter of our praises of him as God, and our God; "Upon the harp will I praise thee, O God, my God." David was an artist at the harp, 1 Sam. xvi. 16, 18; and with that in which he excelled he would praise God, for God is to be praised with the best we have; it is fit he should be so who is the best.

Fifthly. As his hope, his never-failing hope, ver. 5. Here, as before, David quarrels with himself for his dejections and despondencies, and owns he did ill to yield to them, and that he had no reason to do so: "Why art thou cast down, O my soul?" and then quiets himself in the believing expectation he had of giving glory to God, "Hope in God, for I shall yet praise him;" and of enjoying glory with God, He is "the health of my countenance, and my God." This is what we cannot too much insist upon, for it is what we must live and die by.

PSALM XLIV.

We are not told either who was the penman of this psalm or when and upon what occasion it was penned. Upon a melancholy occasion we are sure, not so much to the penman himself, then we could have found occasions enough for it in the history of David and his afflictions, but to the church of God in general; and therefore, if we suppose it penned by David, yet we must attribute it purely to the spirit of prophecy, and must conclude that that Spirit, whatever he had, had in view the captivity in Babylon, or the sufferings of the Jewish church under Antiochus, or rather the afflicted state of the Christian church in its early days, to which ver. 22 is applied by the apostle, Rom. viii. 36, and indeed in all its days on earth, for it is its determined lot that it must enter into the kingdom of heaven through many tribulations. And if we have any gospel psalms pointing at the privileges and comforts of Christians, why should we not have one pointing at their trials and exercises? It is a psalm calculated for a day of fasting and humiliation upon occasion of some public calamity, either pressing or threatening. In it the church is taught, I. To own with thankfulness to the glory of God the great things God had done for their fathers, ver. 1—8. II. To exhibit a memorial of their present calamitous estate, ver. 9—16. III. To file a protestation of their integrity and adherence to God notwithstanding, ver. 17—22. IV. To lodge a petition at the throne of grace for succour and relief, ver. 22—26. In singing this psalm we ought to give God the praise of what he has formerly done for his people, to represent our own grievances, or sympathize with those parts of the church that are in distress, to engage ourselves, whatever happens, to cleave to God and duty, and then cheerfully to wait the event.

To the chief Musician for the sons of Korah, Maschil.

WE have heard with our ears, O God,
Our fathers have told us,
What work thou didst in their days,
In the times of old.
2 How thou didst drive out the heathen with thy hand,
And plantedst them;
How thou didst afflict the people,
And cast them out. [sword,
3 For they got not the land in possession by their own
Neither did their own arm save them: [countenance,
But thy right hand, and thine arm, and the light of thy Because thou hadst a favour unto them.
4 Thou art my King, O God:
Command deliverances for Jacob.
5 Through thee will we push down our enemies:
Through thy name will we tread them under that rise up 6 For I will not trust in my bow, [against us.
Neither shall my sword save me.
7 But thou hast saved us from our enemies,
And hast put them to shame that hated us.
8 In God we boast all the day long.
And praise thy name for ever. Selah.

Some observe that most of the psalms that are entitled, Maschil, psalms of instruction, are sorrowful psalms: for afflictions give instruction, and sorrow of spirit opens the ear to them; "Blessed is the man whom thou chastenest and teachest." In these verses, the church, though now trampled upon, calls to remembrance the days of her triumph, of her triumph in God, and over her enemies. This is very largely mentioned here, 1. As an aggravation of the present distress. The yoke of servitude cannot but lie very heavy on the necks of those that used to wear the crown of victory; and the tokens of God's displeasure must needs be most grievous to those that have been long accustomed to the tokens of his favour. 2. As an encouragement to hope that God would yet turn again their captivity, and return in mercy to them; and accordingly he mixes prayers and comfortable expectations with his record of former mercies. Observe,

First. Their commemoration of the great things God had formerly done for them. In general, ver. 1, "Our fathers have told us what work thou didst in their days." Observe, 1. The many operations of Providence are here spoken of as one work. They have told us "the work which thou didst," for there is a wonderful harmony and uniformity in all that God doth, and the many wheels make but one wheel, Eze. x. 13; many works make but one work. 2. It is a debt which every age owes to posterity, to keep an account of God's works of wonder, and transmit the knowledge of them to the next generation. Those that went before us told us what God did in their days, we are bound to tell those that come after us what he has done in our days, and let them do the like justice to those that shall succeed them; thus shall "one generation praise his works to another," Ps. cxlv. 4; "The fathers to the children shall make known his truth," Isa. xxxviii. 19. 3. We must not only make mention of the work God has done in our own days, but must also acquaint ourselves and our children with what he did in the times of old, long before our own days; and of this we xliii. 1. The older interpreters, who thought this and the preceding psalm of the date of the captivity, understood the "ungodly nation" to refer to the Babylonians, and "the deceitful and unjust man" to be the Babylonian king. All this is mere fancy.

xliii. 3. The holy hill of God was Mount Zion, where the tabernacle was erected and the altar stood. We have the plural form "tabernacles," because of the different structures which the tabernacle included (Compare Psa. xlvi. 4.)

xliv. Title. A French commentator says, "This psalm has no name of author, and we do not know the date of its composition. The words 'for the sons of Korah' only served to indicate to which of the families of the Levites it was entrusted or assigned to be sung, when it was selected to form part of the service. In general it was unnecessary that we should always know who were the authors of all the parts of the Bible, provided we had the assurance that the Jews—who were entrusted with the oracles of God, as St. Paul says, and to have in the Scripture a sure word of history, as sure as the word of prophecy. 4. Children must diligently attend to what their parents tell them of the wonderful works of God, and keep it in remembrance, as that which will be of great use to them. 5. Former experiences of God's power and goodness are strong supports to faith, and powerful pleas in prayer under present calamities. See how Gideon insists upon it, Jud. vi. 13, "Where be all his miracles which our fathers told us of?" In particular their fathers had told them,

1st. How wonderfully God planted Israel in Canaan at first, ver. 2, 3. He drove out the natives to make room for Israel, afflicted them, and cast them out, gave them as dust to Israel's sword, and as driven stubble to their bow. The many complete victories which Israel obtained over the Canaanites, under the command of Joshua, were not to be attributed to themselves, nor could they challenge the glory of them. First. They were not owing to their own merit, but to God's favour and free grace; it was through "the light of thy countenance, because thou hadst a favour to them;" "Not for thy righteousness or the uprightness of thy heart doth God drive them out from before thee," Deu. ix. 5, 6; but because God would "perform the oath which he sware unto their fathers," Deu. vii. 8. The less praise this allows us, the more comfort it administers to us, that we may see all our successes and enlargements coming to us from the favour of God, and the light of his countenance. Secondly. They were not owing to their own might, but to God's power engaged for them, without which all their own efforts and endeavours had been fruitless. It was not by their own sword that they got the land in possession, though they had great numbers of mighty men; nor did their own arm save them from being driven back by the Canaanites, and put to shame; but it was God's right hand and his arm. He fought for Israel, else they had fought in vain; it was through him that they did valiantly and victoriously. It was God that planted Israel in that good land, as the careful husbandman plants a tree, from which he promiseth himself fruit: see Ps. lxxx. 8. This is applicable to the planting of the Christian church in the world by the preaching of the Gospel. Paganism was wonderfully driven out, as the Canaanites, not all at once, but by little and little; not by any human policy or power, for God chose to do it by the weak and foolish things of the world, but by the wisdom and power of God. Christ by his Spirit went forth conquering and to conquer; and the remembrance of that is a great support and comfort to those that groan under the yoke of anti-christian tyranny; for to the state of the church under the power of the New Testament Babylon, some think (and particularly the learned Amyraldus) the complaints in the latter part of this psalm may very fitly be accommodated. He that by his power and goodness planted a church for himself in the world will certainly support it by the same power and goodness, and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it.

2nd. How frequently he had given them success against their enemies that attempted to disturb them in the possession of that good land; ver. 7, "Thou hast" many a time "saved us from our enemies;" and hast put to flight, and so put to shame, them that hated us. Witness the successes of the judges against the nations that oppressed Israel. Many a time have the persecutors of the Christian church, and those that hate it, been put to shame by the power of truth, Acts vi. 10.

Secondly. The good use they make of this record, and had formerly made of it, in consideration of the great things God had done for their fathers of old.

1. They had taken God for their sovereign Lord, had sworn allegiance to him, and put themselves under his protection; ver. 4, "Thou art my king, O God." He speaks in the name of the church, as Ps. lxxiv. 12, "Thou art my king of old." God has as a king made laws for his church, provided for the peace and good order of it, judged for it, pleaded its cause, fought its battles, and protected it. It is his kingdom in the world, and ought to be subject to him, and to pay him tribute; or, the psalmist speaks for himself here; Lord, "Thou art my king," whither shall I go but to thee with my petitions? The favour I ask is not for myself, but for thy church. Note, It is every one's duty to improve their personal interest at the throne of grace for the public welfare and prosperity of the people of God, as Moses, "If I have found grace in thy sight," guide thy people, Ex. xxxiii. 13.

2. They had always applied themselves to him by prayer for deliverance, when at any time they were in distress; "Command deliverances for Jacob." Observe, 1st. The enlargedness of their desire. They pray for deliverances, not one, but many, as many as they had need of, how many soever they were; a series of deliverances, a deliverance from every danger. 2nd. The strength of their faith in the power of God: they do not say, work deliverances, but command them, which notes his doing it easily and instantly; Speak, and it is done: such was the faith of the centurion, Mat. viii. 8, "Speak the word only, and my servant shall be healed;" and his doing it effectually; command it, as one having authority, whose command will be obeyed; "Where the word of a king is, there is power," much more the word of the King of kings.

3. They had trusted and triumphed in him. As they owned that it was not their own sword and bow that had saved them, ver. 3, so neither did they trust to their own sword or bow to save them for the future; ver. 6, "I will not trust in my bow," not in any of my military preparations, as if those would stand me in stead without God; no, "through thee will we push down our enemies," ver. 5; that is, we will attempt it in thy strength, relying only upon that, and not upon the number or valour of our forces; and having thee on our side we will not doubt of success in the attempt. "Through my name," that is, by virtue of thy wisdom directing us, thy power strengthening us and working for us, and thy promise securing success to us, we shall, we "will, tread them under that rise up against us."

4. They had made him their joy and praise; ver. 8, "In God we have boasted," in him we do and will boast every day, and "all the day long." When their enemies boasted of their strength and successes, as Sennacherib and Rabshakeh hectored Hezekiah, they owned they had nothing to boast of in answer thereunto but their relation to God, and their interest in him; and if he were for them they could set all the world at defiance. "Let him that glories glory in the Lord;" and let that for ever exclude all other boasting. Let those that trust in God make their boast in him; for they know whom they have trusted. Let them boast in him all the day long; for it is a subject that can never be exhausted. But let them withal praise his name for ever; if they have the comfort of his name, let them give unto him the glory due to it.

9 But thou hast cast off, and put us to shame;
And goest not forth with our armies.
10 Thou makest us to turn back from the enemy:
And they which hate us spoil for themselves.
11 Thou hast given us like sheep appointed for meat;
And hast scattered us among the heathen.
12 Thou sellest thy people for nought,
And dost not increase thy wealth by their price.
13 Thou makest us a reproach to our neighbours,
A scorn and a derision to them that are round about us.
14 Thou makest us a byword among the heathen,
A shaking of the head among the people
15 My confusion is continually before me,
And the shame of my face hath covered me,
16 For the voice of him that reproacheth and blasphemeth
By reason of the enemy and avenger.

The people of God here complain to him of the low and afflicted condition that they were in, under the prevailing power of their enemies and oppressors; which was the more grievous to them because they were now trampled upon who had always been used in their struggles with their neighbours to win the day, and get the upper hand, and because those were now their oppressors whom they had many a time triumphed over and made tributaries; and, especially, because they had boasted in their God, with great assurance that he would still protect and prosper them, which made the distress they were in, and the disgrace they were under, the more shameful. Let us see what the complaint is.

First. That they wanted the usual tokens of God's favour to them, and presence with them; ver. 9, "Thou hast cast off," that is, thou seemest to have cast us off, and our cause, and to have cast off thy wonted care of us, and concern for us, and so hast put us to shame, for we boasted of the constancy and perpetuity of thy favour. Our armies go forth as usual, but they are put to flight; we gain no ground, but lose what we have gained, for thou goest not forth with them; for if thou didst, which way soever they turned they would prosper,—but it is quite contrary. Note, God's people, when they are cast down, are tempted to think themselves cast off, and forsaken of God; but it is a mistake. "Hath God cast away his people? God forbid," Rom. xi. 1.

Secondly. That they were put to the worst before their enemies in the field of battle; ver. 10, "Thou makest us to turn back from the enemy," as Joshua complained when they met with a repulse at Ai, Jos. vii. 8. We are dispirited and have lost the ancient valour of Israelites; we flee, we fall before those that used to flee and fall before us, and then they that hate us have the plunder of our camp and of our country; they spoil for themselves, and reckon all their own that they can lay their hands on. Attempts to shake off the Babylonish yoke have been ineffectual, and we have rather lost ground by them.

Thirdly. That they were doomed to the sword and to captivity; ver. 11, "Thou hast given us like sheep appointed for meat." They make no more conscience of killing ar Israelite than of killing a sheep; nay, like the butcher, they make a trade of it, they take a pleasure in it as a hungry man in his meat; and we are led with as much ease, and as little resistance, as a lamb to the slaughter. Many are slain, and the rest scattered among the heathen, continually insulted by their malice, or in danger of being infected by their iniquities. They looked upon themselves as bought and sold, and charged it upon God, "Thou sellest thy people;" when they should have charged it upon their own sins, "for your iniquities have you sold yourselves," Isa. l. 1. However, thus far was right, that they looked above the instruments of their trouble, and kept their eye upon God, as well knowing that their worst enemies had no power against them, but what was given them from above; they own it was God that delivered them into the hands of the ungodly, as that which is sold is delivered to the buyer. 'Thou sellest them for nought, and dost not increase in their price,' so it may be read; dost not sell them by auction to those that will bid most for them, but in haste, to those that will bid first for them; any one shall have them that will. Or, as we read it, "Thou dost not increase thy wealth by their price;" intimating that they could have suffered this contentedly, if they had been sure that it would have redounded to the glory of God, and that his interests might have been some way served by their sufferings. But it was quite contrary; Israel's disgrace turned to God's dishonour, so that he was so far from being a gainer in his glory by the sale of them, that it should seem he was greatly a loser by it: see Isa. lii. 5; Eze. xxxvi. 20.

Fourthly. That they were loaded with contempt, and all possible ignominy put upon them. In this also they acknowledge God: "Thou makest us a reproach;" that is, thou bringest those calamities upon us which occasion the reproach, and thou permittest their virulent tongues to smite us. They complain, 1. That they were ridiculed and bantered, and were looked upon as the most contemptible people under the sun; their troubles were turned to their reproach, and upon the account of them they were derided. 2. That their neighbours and those about them, from whom they could not withdraw, were most abusive to them, ver. 13. 3. That the heathen and the people that were strangers to the commonwealth of Israel, and aliens to the covenants of promise, made them a byword, and shook the head at them as triumphing in their fall, ver. 14. 4. That the reproach was constant and incessant; ver. 15, "My confusion is continually before me." The church in general, the psalmist in particular, was continually teased and vexed with the insults of the enemy; to those that are going down every one cries, Down with them. 5. That it was very grievous, and in a manner overwhelmed him; "The shame of my face has covered me." He blushed for sin, or rather for the dishonour done to God; and then it was a holy blushing. 6. That it reflected upon God himself. The reproach which the enemy and the avenger cast upon them was downright blasphemy against God, ver. 16, and 2 Kin. xix. 3; therefore, no doubt but God would appear for them. As there is no trouble more grievous to a generous and ingenuous mind than reproach and calumny, so there is none more grievous to a holy, gracious soul than blasphemy and dishonour done to God.

17 All this is come upon us;
Yet have we not forgotten thee,
Neither have we dealt falsely in thy covenant.
18 Our heart is not turned back,
Neither have our steps declined from thy way;
19 Though thou hast sore broken us in the place of dragons,
And covered us with the shadow of death.
20 If we have forgotten the name of our God,
Or stretched out our hands to a strange god;
21 Shall not God search this out?
For he knoweth the secrets of the heart.

that end directed by the providence of God—only received into the sacred collection books written immediately by Divine inspiration." Opinions have differed a good deal as to its date. Theodoret regarded it as predictive of the sufferings of the Jews under the Macedonians, &c. It is referred to David by the Targum; to Hezekiah's time by Patrick; to the captivity of Babylon by Clarke and Good; and to the siege of Jerusalem under Nebuchadnezzar by Rosenmüller. All we can say is that it was written in a time of public calamity.

xliv. 19. The words, "Thou hast sore broken us in the place of dragons, and covered us with the shadow of death," require a remark. For "place of dragons" the Greek is "place of injury," which cannot represent the present Hebrew text. In this place the word rendered "dragons" probably means jackals, and "place of jackals" will be lonely and desolate places. "The shadow of death" means intense darkness and obscurity; we are not at all required to take it as meaning death.

22 Yea, for thy sake are we killed all the day long;
We are counted as sheep for the slaughter.
23 Awake, why sleepest thou, O Lord?
Arise, cast us not off for ever.
24 Wherefore hidest thou thy face,
And forgettest our affliction and our oppression?
25 For our soul is bowed down to the dust:
Our belly cleaveth unto the earth.
26 Arise for our help,
And redeem us for thy mercies' sake.

The people of God, being greatly afflicted and oppressed, here apply themselves to him; whither else should they go?

First. By way of appeal concerning their integrity; which he only is an infallible judge of, and which he will certainly be the reward of. Two things they call God to witness to:

1. That, though they suffered these hard things, yet they kept close to God and to their duty; ver. 17, "All this is come upon us," and it is as bad, perhaps, as bad can be, "yet have we not forgotten thee;" not cast off the thoughts of thee, nor deserted the worship of thee, for though we cannot deny but that we have dealt foolishly, yet we have not "dealt foolishly in thy covenant," so as to cast thee off, and take to other gods. Though idolaters were our conquerors, we did not therefore entertain any more favourable thoughts of their idols and idolatries; though thou hast seemed to forsake us, and withdraw from us, yet we have not therefore forsaken thee. The trouble they had been long in was very great; we have been "sore broken in the place of dragons," that is, among men as fierce, and furious, and cruel as dragons. We have been covered with the shadow of death, that is, we have been under deep melancholy, and apprehensive of nothing but death. We have been wrapped up in obscurity, and buried alive; and thou hast thus broken us, thou hast thus covered us, ver. 19. Yet we have not harboured any hard thoughts of thee, nor meditated a retreat from thy service. Though thou hast slain us, we have continued to trust in thee; "our heart is not turned back;" we have not secretly withdrawn our affections from thee, "neither have our steps," either in our religious worship, or in our conversation, "declined from thy way," ver. 18; the way which thou hast appointed us to walk in. When the heart turns back, the steps will soon decline; for it is the evil heart of unbelief that inclines us to depart from God. Note, We may the better bear our troubles, how pressing soever, if in them we still hold fast our integrity. While our troubles do not drive us from our duty to God, we should not suffer them to drive us from our comfort in God; for he will not leave us, if we do not leave him.

For the proof of their integrity they take God's omniscience to witness; which is as much the comfort of the upright in heart as it is the terror of hypocrites; ver. 20, 21, "If we have forgotten the name of our God," under pretence that he had forgotten us, or in our distress had stretched out our hands to a strange god, as more likely to help us, "shall not God search this out?" shall he not know it more fully and distinctly than we know that which we have with the greatest care and diligence searched out? Shall he not judge it, and call us to an account for it? Forgetting God was a heart-sin; and stretching out the hand to a strange god was often a secret sin, Eze. viii. 14. But heart-sins and secret sins are known to God, and must be reckoned for; for he knows the secrets of the heart, and therefore is an infallible judge of the words and actions.

2. That therefore they suffered these hard things because they kept close to God and to their duty; ver. 22, it is "for thy sake that we are killed all the day long," because we stand related to thee; are called by thy name, call upon thy name, and will not worship other gods. In this the spirit of prophecy had reference to those who suffered even unto death for the testimony of Christ, to whom it is applied, Rom. viii. 36. So many were killed and put to such lingering deaths, that they were in the killing all the day long; so universally was this practised, that when a man became a Christian, he reckoned himself as a "sheep appointed for the slaughter."

Secondly. By way of petition, with references to their present distress, that God would in his own due time work deliverance for them. Their request is very importunate; "Awake, arise," ver. 23; "Arise for our help, redeem us," ver. 26; come speedily and powerfully to our relief; Ps. lxxx. 2, "Stir up thy strength, and come and save us." They complained, ver. 12, that God had sold them; here they pray, ver. 26, that God would redeem them, for there is no appealing from God but by appealing to him. If he sell us, it is not any one else that can redeem us; the same hand that tears must heal, that smites must bind up, Hos. vi. 1. They complained, ver. 9, "Thou hast cast us off;" but here they pray, ver. 23, "Cast us not off for ever;" let us not be finally forsaken of God. The expostulations are very moving; "Why sleepest thou?" ver. 23. He that keeps Israel, neither slumbers nor sleeps; but when he doth not presently appear for the deliverance of his people, they are tempted to think he sleeps. The expression is figurative, as Ps. lxxviii. 65, "Then the Lord awaked as one out of sleep;" but it was applicable to Christ in the letter, Mat. viii. 24; he was asleep when the disciples were in a storm, and they awoke him, saying, "Lord, save us, we perish!" "Wherefore hidest thou thy face," that we may not see thee and the light of thy countenance? Or, that thou mayest not see us and our distresses. Thou "forgettest our affliction and our oppression," for it still continues, and we see no way open for our deliverance. And, lastly, The pleas are very proper; not their own merit and righteousness, though they had the testimony of their consciences concerning their integrity, but they plead the poor sinner's pleas. 1. Their own misery, which made them the proper object of the Divine compassion; ver. 25, "Our soul is bowed down to the dust," under prevailing grief and fear. We are become as creeping things, the most despicable animals; "Our belly cleaveth unto the earth," we cannot lift up ourselves, neither revive our own drooping spirits, nor recover ourselves out of our low and sad condition, and we lie exposed to be trodden on by every insulting foe. 2. God's mercy; "O redeem us for thy mercies' sake." We depend upon the goodness of thy nature, which is the glory of thy name, Ex. xxxiv. 6: and upon those sure mercies of David which are conveyed by the covenant to all his spiritual seed.

PSALM XLV.

This psalm is an illustrious prophecy of Messiah the Prince. It is all over gospel, and points at him only, as a Bridegroom espousing the church to himself, and as a King ruling in it and ruling for it; and it is probable our Saviour has reference to this psalm when he compares the kingdom of heaven, more than once, to a nuptial solemnity, the solemnity of a royal nuptial, Mat. xxii. 2; xxv. 1. We have no reason to think it has any reference to Solomon's marriage with Pharaoh's daughte If I though it had reference to any other than the mystical marriage between Christ and his church, I would rather apply it to some of David's marriages, because he was a man of war, such a one as the bridegroom here is described to be, which Solomon was not. But I take it to be purely and only meant of Jesus Christ; of him speaketh the prophet of him and of no other man; and to him ver. 6, 7, is applied in the New Testament, Heb. i. 8, nor can it be understood of any other. The preface speaks the excellency of the song, ver. 1. The psalm speaks, I. Of the royal Bridegroom, who is Christ. 1. The transcendent excellency of his person, ver. 2; 2. The glory of his victories, ver. 3—5; 3. The righteousness of his government, ver. 6, 7; 4. The splendour of his court, ver. 8, 9. II. Of the royal bride, which is the church: 1. Her consent gained, ver. 10, 11; 2. The nuptials solemnized, ver. 12—15; 3. The issue of this marriage, ver. 16, 17. In singing this psalm our hearts must be filled with high thoughts of Christ, with an entire submission to, and satisfaction in, his government, and earnest desire of the enlarging and perpetuating of his church in the world.

To the chief Musician upon Shoshannim, for the sons of Korah, Maschil, A Song of loves.

MY heart is inditing a good matter:
I speak of the things which I have made touching the king:
My tongue is the pen of a ready writer.
2 Thou art fairer than the children of men:
Grace is poured into thy lips:
Therefore God hath blessed thee for ever.
3 Gird thy sword upon thy thigh, O most mighty,
With thy glory and thy majesty.
4 And in thy majesty ride prosperously
Because of truth and meekness and righteousness;
And thy right hand shall teach thee terrible things.
5 Thine arrows are sharp in the heart of the king's enemies;
Whereby the people fall under thee.

Some make Shoshannim, in the title, to signify an instrument of six strings; others take it in its primitive signification for lilies or roses, which probably were strewed with other flowers at nuptial solemnities; and then it is easily applicable to Christ, who calls himself the rose of Sharon, and the lily of the valleys, Cant. ii. 1. It is a song of loves, concerning the holy love that is between Christ and his church. It is a song of the well-beloved, the virgins, the companions of the bride, ver. 14, prepared to be sung by them. The virgin company that attend the Lamb on mount Zion are said to sing a new song, Rev. xiv. 3, 4.

The preface, ver. 1, speaks, 1. The dignity of the subject. It is a good matter, and it is pity such a moving art as poetry should ever be employed about a bad matter. It is touching the King, king Jesus, and his kingdom and government. Note, Those that speak of Christ speak of a good matter, no subject so noble, so copious, so fruitful, so profitable, and so well becoming us. It is a shame that this good matter is not more the matter of our discourse. 2. The excellency of the management. This song was a confession with the mouth of faith in the heart concerning Christ and his church. 1st. The matter was well digested, as it well deserved. "My heart is inditing it." Which perhaps is meant of that Spirit of prophecy that dictated the psalm to David; that Spirit of Christ which was in the prophets, 1 Pet. i. 11. But it is applicable to his devout meditations and affections in his heart, out of the abundance of which his mouth spake. Things concerning Christ ought to be thought of by us with all possible seriousness, with fixedness of thought, and a fire of holy love: especially when we are to speak of those things. We then speak best of Christ and Divine things, when we speak from the heart that which has warmed and affected us; and we should never be rash in speaking of the things of Christ, but weigh well beforehand what we have to say, lest we speak amiss: see Eccl. v. 2. 2nd. It was well expressed. "I will speak of the things which I have made." He would express himself, First. With all possible clearness, as one that did himself understand, and was affected with the things he spoke of. Not, I will speak the things I have heard from others, that is speaking by rote: but the things which I have myself studied. Note, What God has wrought in our souls, as well as what he has wrought for them, we must declare to others, Ps. lxvi. 16. Secondly. With all possible cheerfulness, freedom, and fluency. "My tongue is as the pen of a ready writer," guided by my heart in every word, as the pen is by the hand. We call the prophets the penmen of Scripture, whereas really they were but the pen. The tongue of the most subtle disputant, and the most eloquent orator, is but the pen with which God writes what he pleaseth. Why should we quarrel with the pen, if bitter things be written against us? or idolize the pen, if it write in our favours? David not only spoke what he thought of Christ, but wrote it, that it might spread the farther, and last the longer. His tongue was as the pen of a ready writer, that lets nothing slip. When the heart is inditing a good matter, it is pity but the tongue should be as the pen of a ready writer to leave it upon record. In these verses the Lord Jesus is presented,

First. As most beautiful and amiable in himself. It is a marriage song, and therefore the transcendent excellences of Christ are represented by the beauty of the royal bridegroom; ver. 2, "Thou art fairer than the children of men," than any of them. He proposed, ver. 1, to speak of the king, but immediately directs his speech to him. They that have an admiration and affection for Christ, love to go to him and tell him so. Thus we must profess our faith that we see his beauty, and our love that we are pleased with it. "Thou art fair, thou art fairer, than the children of men." Note, Jesus Christ is in himself, and in the eyes of all believers, more amiable and lovely than the children of men. The beauties of the Lord Jesus, as God, as Mediator, far surpass those of the human nature in general, and those which the most amiable and excellent of the children of men are endowed with. There is more in Christ to engage our love than there is or can be in any creature. Our beloved is more than another beloved. The beauties of this lower world and its charms are in danger of drawing away our hearts from Christ, and therefore we are concerned to understand how much he excelleth them all, and how much more worthy he is of our love.

Secondly. As the great favourite of Heaven. He is fairer than the children of men, for God has done more for him than for any of the children of men; and all his kindness to the children of men is for his sake, and passeth through his hands, through his mouth. 1. He hath grace, and he has it for us; "Grace is poured into thy lips." By his word, his promise his Gospel, the good will of God is made known to us, and the good work of God is begun and carried on in us. He received all grace from God, all the endowments that were requisite xlv. Title. The Greek and its Latin version read, "Unto the end, for them that shall be changed, for the sons of Korah, for understanding: a canticle for the beloved one." The fanciful interpretations put upon these words need not be repeated, as the words themselves are only in part a translation from the Hebrew title. The Syriac is, "Spoken or ascribed to the sons of Korah in the days of Moses; appearance of Christ; and concerning the Church and the glorious power of Adonai." The Hebrew title involves but little difficulty; Shoshannim, or "the lilies," in accordance with the principle we have adopted, means a band or choir of singers so called. The psalm is addressed or assigned to the leader of the band called Shoshannim, who were Levites of the family of Korah; it is a psalm for instruction, and its imagery and language are those of ardent affection. Its symbolical character is unquestionable. A large space would be required by a bare list of the explanations of the title suggested by scholars of repute, but we omit them all with one partial exception. For "a to qualify him for his work and office as Mediator, that from his fulness we might receive, Jno. i. 16. It was not only poured into his heart, for his own strength and encouragement, but poured into his lips, that by the words of his mouth in general, and the kisses of his mouth to particular believers, he might communicate both holiness and comfort. From this grace poured into his lips proceeded those gracious words which all admired, Lu. iv. 22. The Gospel of grace is poured into his lips, for "it began to be spoken by the Lord," and from him we receive it; he hath the words of eternal life. 'The spirit of prophecy is put into thy lips;' so the Chaldee. 2. He hath the blessing, and he has it for us. Therefore, because thou art the great trustee of Divine grace for the use and benefit of the children of men, "therefore God has blessed thee for ever;" that is, has made thee an everlasting blessing, so as that in thee all the nations of the earth shall be blessed. Where God gives his grace, he will give his blessing. We are blessed with spiritual blessings in Christ Jesus, Eph. i. 3.

Thirdly. As victorious over all his enemies. The royal bridegroom is a man of war, and his nuptials do not excuse him from the field of battle, (as was allowed by the law, Deu. xxiv. 5,) nay, they bring him to the field of battle, for he is to rescue his spouse by dint of sword out of her captivity; to conquer her, and to conquer for her, and then to marry her. Now we have here,

1. His preparations for war; ver. 3, "Gird thy sword upon thy thigh, O most mighty." The word of God is the sword of the Spirit. By the promises of that word, and the grace contained in those promises, souls are made willing to submit to Jesus Christ, and become his loyal subjects; and by the threatenings of that word, and the judgments executed according to them, those that stand it out against Christ will in due time be brought down and ruined. By the Gospel of Christ many Jews and Gentiles were converted, and at length the Jewish nation was destroyed, according to the predictions of it, for their implacable enmity to it; and paganism was quite abolished. The sword here girt on Christ's thigh is the same which is said to proceed out of his mouth, Rev. xix. 15. When the Gospel was sent forth to be preached to all nations, then our Redeemer girt his sword upon his thigh.

2. His expedition to this holy war. He goes forth with his glory and his majesty, as a great king takes the field, with abundance of pomp and magnificence—his sword, his glory and majesty. In his Gospel he appears transcendently great and excellent, bright and blessed, in the honour and majesty which the Father has laid upon him. Christ, both in his person and in his Gospel, had nothing of external glory or majesty, nothing to charm men; for "he had no form nor comeliness:" nothing to awe men, for "he took upon him the form of a servant;" but it was all spiritual glory, spiritual majesty. There is so much grace, and therefore glory, in that word, "He that believes shall be saved;" so much terror, and therefore majesty, in that word, "He that believes not shall be damned;" that we may well say, in the chariot of that Gospel, which these words are the sum of, the Redeemer rides forth in glory and majesty. "In thy majesty ride prosperously," ver. 4. 'Prosper thou; ride thou.' This speaks the promise of his Father, that he should prosper, according to the good pleasure of the Lord, that he should divide the spoil with the strong, in recompence of his sufferings. Those cannot but prosper to whom God saith, Prosper, Isa. lii. 10—12. And it speaks the good wishes of his friends, praying that he may prosper in the conversion of souls to him, and the destruction of all the powers of darkness that rebel against him. "Thy kingdom come." Go on and prosper.

3. The glorious cause in which he is engaged: "because of truth, and meekness, and righteousness," which were in a manner sunk and lost among men, and which Christ came to retrieve and rescue. 1st. The Gospel itself is "truth, meekness, and righteousness;" it commands by the power of truth and righteousness, for Christianity has these incontestably on its side, and yet it is to be promoted by meekness and gentleness, 1 Cor. iv. 12, 13; 2 Tim. ii. 25. 2nd. Christ appears in it, in his "truth, meekness, and righteousness," and these are his glory and majesty, and because of these he shall prosper. Men are brought to believe on him because he is truth, to learn of him because he is meek. Mat. xi. 29, (the gentleness of Christ is a thing of mighty force, 2 Cor. x. 1,) and to submit to him because he is righteous and rules with equity. 3rd. The Gospel, as far as it prevails with men, sets up in their hearts "truth, meekness, and righteousness;" rectifies their mistakes by the light of truth, controls their passions by the power of meekness, and governs their hearts and lives by the laws of righteousness. Christ came, by setting up his kingdom among men, to restore these glories to a degenerate world, and to maintain the cause of these just and rightful rulers under him that, by error, malice, and iniquity, had been deposed.

4. The success of his expedition. "Thy right hand shall teach thee terrible things;" that is, thou shalt experience a wonderful Divine power going along with thy Gospel, to make it victorious; and the effects of it will be terrible things. 1st. In order to the conversion and reduction of souls to him, there are terrible things to be done; the heart must be pricked, conscience must be startled, and the terrors of the Lord must make way for his consolations. This is done by the right hand of Christ. The Comforter shall continue, Jno. xvi. 8. 2nd. In the conquest of the gates of hell, and its supporters, in the destruction of Judaism and Paganism, terrible things will be done, which will make men's hearts fail them for fear, Lu. xxi. 26, and great men and chief captains call to the rocks and mountains to fall on them, Rev. vi. 15. The next verse describes these terrible things; ver. 5, "Thine arrows are sharp in the heart of the king's enemies." First. Those that were by nature enemies are thus wounded, in order to their being reduced and reconciled. Convictions are like the arrows of the bow, which are sharp in the heart on which they fasten, and bring people to fall under Christ, in subjection to his laws and government. They that thus fall on this stone, shall be broken, Mat. xxi. 44. Secondly. Those that persist in their enmity are thus wounded, in order to their being ruined. The arrows of God's terrors are sharp in their hearts, whereby they shall fall under him, so as to be made his footstool, Ps. cx. 1. Those that would not have him to reign over them shall be brought forth and slain before him, Lu. xix, 27; that would not submit to his golden sceptre, shall be broken to pieces by his iron rod.

6 Thy throne, O God, is for ever and ever:
The sceptre of thy kingdom is a right sceptre.
7 Thou lovest righteousness, and hatest wickedness:
Therefore God, thy God, hath anointed thee
With the oil of gladness above thy fellows.
8 All thy garments smell of myrrh, and aloes, and cassia,
Out of the ivory palaces, whereby they have made thee glad.
9 Kings' daughters were among thy honourable women:
Upon thy right hand did stand the queen in gold of Ophir.

We have here the royal Bridegroom filling his throne with judgment, and keeping his court with splendour.

First. He here fills his throne with judgment. It is God the Father that saith to the Son here, "Thy throne, O God, is for ever and ever;" as appears, Heb. i. 8, 9, where this is quoted to prove that he is God, and has a "more excellent name than the angels." The Mediator is God, else he had neither been able to do the Mediator's work, nor fit to wear the Mediator's crown. Concerning his government observe,

1. The eternity of it. It is "for ever and ever." It shall continue on earth throughout all the ages of time, in despite of all the opposition of the gates of hell; and in the blessed fruits and consequences of it it shall last as long as the days of heaven, and run parallel with the line of eternity itself. And, perhaps, even then the glory of the Redeemer, and the blessedness of the redeemed, shall be in a continual, infinite progression; for it is promised, that not only of his government, but "of the increase of his government and peace there shall be no end," Isa. iv. 7, even then when "the kingdom shall be delivered up to God, even the Father," 1 Cor. xv. 24, the throne of the Redeemer will continue.

2. The equity of it. "The sceptre of thy kingdom," that is, the administration of thy government is right, exactly according to the eternal counsel and will of God, which is the eternal rule and reason of good and evil; and whatever Christ doth he doth none of his subjects any wrong, but rights those that do suffer wrong, "He loveth righteousness, and hateth wickedness," ver. 7. He himself loves to do righteousness, and hates to do wickedness; and he loves those that do righteousness, and hates those that do wickedness. By the holiness of his life, the merit of his death, and the great design of his Gospel, he has made it to appear that he loves righteousness, for by his example, his satisfaction, and his precepts, he has brought in an everlasting righteousness; and that he hates wickedness, for never did God's hatred of sin appear so as it did in the sufferings of Christ.

3. The establishment and elevation of it. "Therefore God, even thy God," (Christ, as mediator, called God his God, Jno. xx. 17, as commissioned by him, and the head of those that are taken into covenant with him,) he "has anointed thee with the oil of gladness;" therefore, that is, 1st. In order to this righteous government of thine, God has given thee his Spirit, that Divine unction, to qualify thee for thine undertaking; Isa. lxi. 1, "The Spirit of the Lord God is upon me, because he has anointed me." What God called him to he fitted him for, Isa. xi. 2. The Spirit is called the oil of gladness, because of the delight wherewith Christ was filled in carrying on his undertaking. He was anointed with the Spirit above all his fellows, that is, above all those that were anointed, whether priests or kings. 2nd. In recompence of what thou hast done and suffered for the advancement of righteousness, and the destruction of sin, God has anointed thee with the oil of gladness; that is, has brought thee to all the honours and all the joys of thine exalted state; "Because he humbled himself, God has highly exalted him," Phil. ii. 8, 9. His anointing him notes the power and glory to which he is exalted; he is invested in all the dignities and authorities of the Messiah; and his anointing him with the oil of gladness, notes the joy that was set before him, (so his exaltation is expressed, Heb. xii. 2,) both in the light of his Father's countenance, Acts ii. 28, and in the success of his undertaking, which he shall see and be satisfied, Isa. liii. 11. This he is anointed with above all his fellows, that is, above all believers, who are his brethren, and who partake of the anointing; but they by measure, he without measure. But the apostle brings it to prove his preeminence above the angels, Heb. i. 4, 9. The salvation of sinners is the joy of angels, Lu. xv. 10, but much more of the Son.

Secondly. He keeps his court with splendour and magnificence.

1. His robes of state, wherein he appears, are taken notice of, not for their pomp, which might strike an awe upon the spectator, but their pleasantness and the gratefulness of the odours with which they were perfumed; ver. 8, "They smell of myrrh, aloes, and cassia," compounding the oil of gladness with which he and his garments were anointed. These were some of the ingredients of the holy anointing oil which God appointed, the like to which was not to be made up for any common use, Ex. xxx. 23, 24, which was typical of the unction of the Spirit, which Christ the great high priest of our profession received, and to which, therefore, there seems here to be a reference. It is the savour of these good ointments, his graces and comforts, that draws souls to him, Cant. i. 3, 4, and makes him precious to believers, 1 Pet. ii. 7.

2. His royal palaces are said to be ivory ones, such as were then reckoned most magnificent. We read of an ivory house that Ahab made, 1 Kin. xxi. 39. The mansions of light above are the ivory palaces whence all the joys both of Christ and believers come, and where they will be for ever in perfection; for by them he is made glad, and all that are his with him; for they shall enter into the joy of their Lord.

3. The beauties of his court shine very bright. In public appearances at court, when the pomp of it is shewed, nothing is supposed to contribute so much to it as the splendour of the ladies, which is alluded to here, ver. 9.

1st. Particular believers are here compared to the ladies at court, richly dressed, in honour of the sovereign. "Kings' daughters are among thy honourable women," whose looks, and mien, and ornaments, we may suppose, by the height of their extraction, to excel all others. All true believers are born from above; they are the children of the King of kings, these attend the throne of the Lord Jesus daily with their prayers and praises, which is really their honour, and he is pleased to reckon it his. The numbering of kings' daughters among his honourable woman, or maids of honour, intimates that the kings whose daughters they were should be tributaries to him, and dependants on him, and would therefore think it a preferment to their daughters to attend him.

2nd. The church in general, constituted of these particular believers, is here compared to the queen herself, the queen consort, which by an everlasting covenant he hath betrothed to himself. She stands at his right hand, near to him, and receiving honour from him, in the richest array, in gold of Ophir, in robes woven with gold thread, or with a gold chain, and other ornaments of gold. This is the bride, the Lamb's wife, whose graces, that are her ornaments, are compared to fine linen, clean and white, Rev. xix. 8, for their purity; here to gold of Ophir, for their costliness; for as we owe our redemption, so we owe our adorning, not to corruptible things, but to the precious blood of the Son of God.

10 Hearken, O daughter, and consider, and incline thine ear;
Forget also thine own people, and thy father's house;
11 So shall the king greatly desire thy beauty:
For he is thy Lord; and worship thou him.
12 And the daughter of Tyre shall be there with a gift;
Even the rich among the people shall intreat thy favour 13 The king's daughter is all glorious within:
Her clothing is of wrought gold.

song of loves," Ainsworth translates "a song of the well-beloved virgins," which he explains of "kings' daughters and other honourable daughters attending upon and coming with the queen; the friends of the bridegroom and bride, verses 10—15, who should sing this marriage song in praise of them. Therefore this hymn setteth forth Christ in his glory, and his spouse, the Church, in her beauty."

xlv. 8. The use of myrrh as a perfume is of the highest antiquity, and the same is true of cassia; both were procurable in Arabia. The so-called aloes must not be confounded with the drug of that name, but was an odorous wood, probably reduced to powder and mixed with other ingredients. The "ivory palaces" may have been ornamental ivory caskets for containing perfumes.

xlv. 9. For "the queen in gold of Ophir," the Prayer-Book version is, "the queen in a vesture of gold, wrought about with divers colours," which is not a translation from the Hebrew, but a free rendering of the Greek.

14 She shall be brought unto the king in raiment of needle-
The virgins her companions that follow her [work:
Shall be brought unto thee.
15 With gladness and rejoicing shall they be brought:
They shall enter into the king's palace.
16 Instead of thy fathers shall be thy children,
Whom thou mayest make princes in all the earth.
17 I will make thy name to be remembered in all generations:
Therefore shall the people praise thee for ever and ever.

This latter part of the psalm is addressed to the royal bride, standing on the right hand of the royal Bridegroom. God, that said to the Son, "Thy throne is for ever and ever," saith this to the church, who upon the account of her espousals to the Son, he here calls his daughter.

First. He tells her of the duties expected from her, which ought to be considered by all those that come into relation to the Lord Jesus: "Hearken therefore, and consider" this, "and incline thine ear;" that is, submit to those conditions of thine espousals, and bring thy will to comply with them. This is the method of profiting by the Word of God; "He that hath ears let him hear," let him hearken diligently; he that hearkens, let him consider and weigh it duly; he that considers, let him incline, and yield to the force of what is laid before him. And what is it that is here required?

1. She must renounce all others; "Forget thine own people and thy father's house," according to the law of marriage; retain not the affection thou hast had for them, nor covet to return to them again; banish all such remembrance (not only of thy people that were dear to thee, but of thy father's house that was dearer,) as may incline thee to look back, as Lot's wife to Sodom. When Abraham, in obedience to God's call, had quitted his native soil, he was not so much as "mindful of the country from whence he came out." This shews, 1st. How necessary it was for those who were converted from Judaism or paganism to the faith of Christ, wholly to cast out the old leaven, and not to bring into their Christian profession either the Jewish ceremonies or the heathen idolatries, for these would make such a mongrel religion in Christianity as the Samaritans had. 2nd. How necessary it is for us all when we give up our names to Jesus Christ to hate father and mother, and all that is dear to us in this world, in comparison; that is, to love them less than Christ and his honour, and our interest in him, Lu. xiv. 26. And here is very good encouragement given to the royal bride thus entirely to break off from her former alliances; "So shall the king greatly desire thy beauty," which intimates that the mixing of her old rites and customs, whether Jewish or Gentile, with her religion, would blemish her beauty, and would be in danger of losing her interest in the affections of the royal Bridegroom; but if she entirely conformed to his will he would delight in her. The beauty of holiness, both on the church and on particular believers, is in the sight of Christ of great price, and very amiable. Where that is he saith, "This is my rest for ever: here will I dwell; for I have desired it." Among the golden candlesticks he walks with pleasure, Rev. ii. 1.

2. She must reverence him; must love, honour, and obey him; "He is thy Lord, and worship thou him." The church is to be subject to Christ, as the wife to the husband, Eph. v. 24; to call him Lord as Sarah called Abraham, and to obey him, 1 Pet. iii. 6; and so not only to submit to his government, but to give him Divine honours. We must worship him as God, and our Lord; for this is the will of God, that "all men should honour the Son, even as they honour the Father;" nay, in so doing, it is reckoned that they honour the Father. If we confess that Christ is Lord, and pay our homage to him accordingly, it is to the glory of God the Father, Phil. ii. 11.

Secondly. He tells her of the honours designed for her.

1. Great court should be made to her, and rich presents brought her; ver. 12, "The daughter of Tyre," a rich and splendid city, "the daughter of the king of Tyre, shall be there with a gift;" every royal family round about shall send a branch as a representative of the whole, to seek thy favour, and to make an interest in thee; "even the rich among the people," whose wealth might be thought to discharge them from dependence at court, yet they "shall entreat thy favour," for his sake to whom thou art espoused, that by thee they may make him their friend. The Jews, the pretending Jews, who are rich to a proverb,—as rich as a Jew,—shall come and worship before the church's feet in the Philadelphian period, and shall know that Christ has loved her, Rev. iii. 9. When the Gentiles, being converted to the faith of Christ, join themselves to the church, they then come with a gift, 2 Cor. viii. 5; Rom. xv. 16; when with themselves they devote all they have to the honour of Christ and the service of his kingdom, they then come with a gift.

2. She shall be very splendid and highly esteemed in the eyes of all; 1st. For her personal qualifications, the endowments of her mind, which every one shall admire; ver. 13, "The king's daughter is all glorious within." Note, The glory of the church is spiritual glory, and that is indeed all glory; it is the glory of the soul, and that is the man; it is glory in God's sight, and it is an earnest of eternal glory. The glory of the saints falls not within the ken of a carnal eye. As their life, so their glory, is hid with Christ in God, neither can the natural man know it, for it is spiritually discerned; but those who do so discern it highly value it. Let us see here what is that true glory which we should be ambitious of, not that which makes a fair show in the flesh, but which is in "the hidden man of the heart, in that which is not corruptible," 1 Pet. iii. 4; "Whose praise is not of men, but of God," Rom. ii. 29. 2nd. For her rich apparel. Though all her glory is within, that for which she is truly valuable, yet her clothing also is of wrought gold. The conversation of Christians, in which they appear in the world, must be enriched with good works; not gay and gaudy ones, like paint and flourish, but substantially good, like gold; and it must be accurate and exact, like wrought gold, which is worked with a great deal of care and caution.

3. Her nuptials shall be celebrated with a great deal of honour and joy; ver. 14, 15, "She shall be brought to the king," as the Lord God brought the woman to the man, Gen. ii. 22, which was a type of this mystical marriage between Christ and his church. None are brought to Christ but whom the Father brings, and he has undertaken to do it; so brought to the king, ver. 14, as to enter into the king's palace, ver. 15, which intimates a two-fold bringing of the spouse to Christ: 1st. In the conversion of souls to Christ; then they are espoused to him, privately contracted, as chaste virgins, 2 Cor. xi. 2; Rom. vii. 4. 2nd. In the completing of the mystical body, and the glorification of all the saints at the end of time. Then the bride, the Lamb's wife, shall be made completely ready, when all that belong to the election of grace shall be called in, and called home, and all gathered together to Christ, 2 Thes. ii. 1. Then is the marriage of the Lamb come, Rev. xix. 7; xxi. 2, and the virgins go forth to meet the bridegroom, Mat. xxv. 1; then they shall enter into the king's palaces, into the heavenly mansions, to be ever with the Lord. In both these espousals, observe to the honour of the royal bride, First. Her wedding clothes, raiment of needlework, the righteousness of Christ, the graces of the Spirit, both curiously wrought by Divine wisdom. Secondly. Her bridemaids, "the virgins her companions," the wise virgins that have oil in their vessels as well as in their lamps, those that being joined to the church cleave to it, and follow it, these shall go in to the marriage. Thirdly. The mirth with which the nuptials will be celebrated; "with gladness and rejoicing shall she be brought." When the prodigal is brought home to his father, "it is meet that we should make merry and be glad," Lu. xv. 32; and when the marriage of the Lamb is come, "let us be glad and rejoice," Rev. xix. 7; for the "day of his espousals is the day of the gladness of his heart," Cant. iii. 11.

4. The progeny of this marriage shall be illustrious; ver. 16, "Instead of the fathers, shall be thy children." Instead of the Old Testament church, the economy of which was waxen old, and ready to vanish away, Heb. viii. 13, as the fathers that are going off, there shall be a New Testament church, a Gentile church, that shall be grafted into the same olive, and partake of its root and fatness, Rom. xi. 17; "more" and more eminent "shall be the children of the desolate, than the children of the married wife," Isa. liv. 1. This promise to Christ is of the same import with that Isa. liii. 10, "He shall see his seed," and these shall be made "princes in all the earth," that is, there shall be some of all nations brought into subjection to Christ, and so made princes, "made to our God kings and priests," Rev. i. 6. Or it may intimate that there should be a much greater number of Christian kings than ever there was of Jewish kings; those in Canaan only,—these in all the earth; nursing fathers, and nursing mothers to the church, which shall suck the breasts of kings. They are princes of Christ's making; for by him kings reign, and princes decree justice.

5. The praise of this marriage shall be perpetual, in the praises of the royal Bridegroom; ver. 18, "I will make thy name to be remembered." His Father has given him a name above every name, and here promiseth to make it perpetual, by keeping up a succession of ministers and Christians in every age that should bear up his name, which shall thus endure for ever, Ps. lxxii. 17, by being remembered in all the generations of time, for the entail of Christianity shall not be cut off. Therefore, because they shall remember thee in all generations, they shall praise thee for ever and ever. They that help to support the honour of Christ on earth shall in heaven see his glory, and share in it, and be for ever praising him. In the believing hope of our everlasting happiness in the other world, let us always keep up the remembrance of Christ, as our only way thither in our generation; and, in assurance of the perpetuating of the kingdom of the Redeemer in the world, let us transmit the remembrance of him to succeeding generations, that his "name may endure for ever, and be as the days of heaven."

PSALM XLVI.

This psalm encourageth us to hope and trust in God, and his power and providence, and gracious presence with his church in the worst of times, and directs us to give him the glory of what he has done for us, and what he will do. Probably it was penned upon occasion of David's victories over the neighbour nations, 2 Sam. viii., and the rest which God gave him from all his enemies round about. We are here taught, I. To take comfort in God when things look very black and threatening, ver. 1—5. II. To mention to his praise the great things he has wrought for the church against its enemies, ver. 6—9. III. To assure ourselves that God, who hath glorified his own name, will glorify it yet again, and to comfort ourselves with that, ver. 10, 11. We may, in singing it, apply it either to our spiritual enemies, and the encouragement we have to hope that through Christ we shall be more than conquerors over them, or to the public enemies of Christ's kingdom in the world, and their threatening insults, endeavouring to preserve a holy security and serenity of mind when they seem most formidable. It is said of Luther, that when he heard any discouraging news, he would say, 'Come, let us sing the forty-sixth psalm.'

To the chief Musician for the sons of Korah, A Song upon Alamoth.

GOD is our refuge and strength,
A very present help in trouble.
2 Therefore will not we fear,
Though the earth be removed,

EFFECTS OF AN EARTHQUAKE IN CALABRIA.

xlvi. Title. The words rendered "a song upon Alamoth" have been otherwise explained. In the Greek it is "for the hidden a psalm," but whether hidden things or hidden men is not said—probably things. The Latin is nearly the same. By some "Alamoth" is understood of a musical instrument; by others, a tune adapted for girls' voices; by others, girls or virgins; and by others, "mysteries." This last is the sense in which the word was taken by the Greek translators. Like "Shoshannim," and other peculiar words, it is probably the title or description of a choir of singers. Whether the "Alamoth" company consisted of maidens, or of youths with feminine voices, we cannot say. Perhaps the twofold application of the Hebrew root to youth and secrecy may be due to the privacy in which Oriental children were brought up.

xlvi. 4. It is difficult to see what literal river or stream could gladden the city of God, if thereby we are to understand the city Jerusalem, or even Mount Zion. But while such a stream did not

And though the mountains be carried into the midst of the sea;
3 Though the waters thereof roar and be troubled,
Though the mountains shake with the swelling thereof.
4 There is a river, [Selah.
The streams whereof shall make glad the city of God,
The holy place of the tabernacles of the most High.
5 God is in the midst of her;
She shall not be moved:
God shall help her, and that right early.

The psalmist here teacheth us by his own example,

First. To triumph in God, and his relation to us, and presence with us, especially when we have had some fresh experiences of his appearing on our behalf; ver. 1, "God is our refuge and strength;" we have found him so, he has engaged to be so, and he ever will be so. Are we pursued? God is our refuge, to whom we may flee, and in whom we may be safe, and think ourselves so,—secure upon good grounds, Pr. xviii. 10. Are we oppressed by troubles? Have we work to do, and enemies to grapple with? God is our strength to bear us up under burthens—to fit us for all our services and sufferings; who will by his grace put strength into us, and on whom we may stay ourselves. Are we in distress? He is a help, to do all that for us which we need, "a present help," 'a help found,' so the word is, that is, one whom we have found to be so; a help on which we may write, probatum est,—'it is tried,' as Christ is called a "tried stone," Isa. xxviii. 16. Or, a help at hand, that is never to seek, but is always ready to be found of us; or, a help sufficient, a help accommodated to every case and exigence. Whatever it is, he is "a very present help;" we cannot desire a better help, nor shall ever find the like in any creature.

Secondly. To triumph over the greatest dangers. "God is our strength and our help," a God all-sufficient to us, "therefore will not we fear." Those that with a holy reverence fear God need not with any amazement to be afraid of the power of hell or earth; "If God be for us, who can be against us" to do us any harm? It is our duty, it is our privilege, to be thus fearless; it is an evidence of a clear conscience, of an honest heart, and of a lively faith in God and his providence and promise; "We will not fear, though the earth be removed," though all our creature-confidences fail us, and sink us; nay, though that which should support us threaten to swallow us up, as the earth did Korah, for whose sons this psalm was penned, and some think by them, yet while we keep close to God, and have him for us, we will not fear, for we have no cause to fear.

——Et si fractus illabatur orbis
Impavidum ferient ruinæ.
Let Jove's dread arms with thunder rend the spheres,
Beneath the crush of worlds undaunted he appears.—Hor.

Observe here,

1. How threatening the danger is. We will suppose the earth to be removed and thrown into the sea, even the mountains, the strongest and firmest parts of the earth, to lie buried in the unfathomed ocean,—we will suppose the sea to roar and rage, and make a dreadful noise, and its foaming billows to insult the shore with so much violence as even to shake the mountains, ver. 3; though kingdoms and states be in confusion, embroiled in wars, tossed with tumults, and their governments in continual revolution; though their powers combine against the church and people of God, aim at no less than their ruin, and go very near to gain their point, "yet will not we fear," knowing that all these troubles will end well for the church: see Ps. xciii. 4. If the earth be removed, those have reason to fear that have laid up their treasures on earth, and set their hearts upon it, but not those who have laid up for themselves treasures in heaven, and who then expect to be most happy, when "the earth and the works that are therein shall be burnt up." Let those be troubled at the troubling of the waters who build their confidence on such a floating foundation, but not those who are led to "the rock that is higher than they," and find firm footing upon that rock.

2. How well-grounded the defiance of this danger is, considering how well-guarded the church is, and that interest which we are concerned for. It is not any private particular concern of our own that we are in pain about; no, it is "the city of God, the holy place of the tabernacles of the Most High;" it is the ark of God for which our hearts tremble. But when we consider what God has provided for the comfort and safety of his church we shall see reason to have our hearts fixed, and set above the fear of evil tidings. Here is,

1st. Joy to the church, even in the most melancholy and sorrowful times; ver. 4, "There is a river, the streams whereof shall make it glad," even then when the waters of the sea roar and threaten it. It alludes to the waters of Siloam, which went softly by Jerusalem, Isa. viii. 6, 7, and though of no great depth or breadth, yet the waters of it were made serviceable to the defence of Jerusalem in Hezekiah's time, Isa. xxii. 10, 11. But this here must be understood spiritually: the covenant of grace is the river, the promises of which are the streams; the Spirit of grace is the river, Jno. vii. 38, 39, the comforts of which are "the streams that make glad the city of our God." God's word and ordinances are rivers and streams with which God makes his saints glad in cloudy and dark days. God himself is to his church a place of "broad rivers and streams," Isa. xxviii. 21. The streams that make glad the city of God are not rapid, but gentle, like those of Siloam. Note, The spiritual comforts which are conveyed to the saints by soft and silent whispers, and which come not with observation, are sufficient to balance the most loud and noisy threatenings of an angry and malicious world.

2nd. Establishment to the church. Though heaven and earth are shaken, yet "God is in the midst of her, she shall not be moved," ver. 5. God has assured his church of his special presence with it, and concern for it; his honour is embarked in it, he hath set up his tabernacle in it, and has undertaken the protection of it, and therefore she shall not be moved; that is, First. Not destroyed, not removed, as the earth may be, ver. 2. The church shall survive the world, and be in bliss when that is in ruins. It is built upon a rock, and "the gates of hell shall not prevail against it." Secondly. Not disturbed, not much moved with fears of the issue. If God be for us, if God be with us, we need not be moved at the most violent attempts made against us.

3rd. Deliverance to the church. Though its dangers be very great, "God shall help her," and then who can hurt her? help her under her troubles, that she shall not sink; nay, that the more she is afflicted, the more she shall multiply. "God shall help her" out of her troubles, "and that right early;" when the morning appeareth, that is, very speedily, for he is a present help, ver. 1; and very seasonably; then when things are brought to the last extremity, and when the relief will be most welcome. This may be applied by particular believers themselves; if God be in our hearts, in the midst of us by his word dwelling richly in us, we shall be established, we shall be helped; let us therefore trust and not be afraid; all is well and will end well.

6 The heathen raged, the kingdoms were moved:
He uttered his voice, the earth melted.
7 The LORD of hosts is with us;
The God of Jacob is our refuge. Selah.
8 Come, behold the works of the LORD,
What desolations he hath made in the earth.
9 He maketh wars to cease unto the end of the earth;
He breaketh the bow, and cutteth the spear in sunder;
He burneth the chariot in the fire.
10 Be still, and know that I am God:
I will be exalted among the heathen,
I will be exalted in the earth.
11 The LORD of hosts is with us;
The God of Jacob is our refuge. Selah

These verses give glory to God both as King of nations and as King of saints.

First. As King of nations, ruling the world by his power and providence, and overruling all the affairs of the children of men to his own glory. He doth according to his will among the inhabitants of the earth, and none may say, "What dost thou?"

1. He checks the rage, and breaks the power, of the nations that oppose him and his interest in the world; ver. 6, "The heathen raged" at David's coming to the throne, and at the setting up of the kingdom of the Son of David: compare Ps. ii. 1, 2. "The kingdoms were moved" with indignation, and rose in a tumultuous, furious manner, to oppose it; but God "uttered his voice, spake to them in his wrath," and they were moved in another sense, they were struck into confusion and consternation, put into disorder, and all their measures broke, the earth itself melted under them, so that they found no firm footing, their earthly hearts failed them for fear, and dissolved like snow before the sun. Such a colliquation of the spirits of the enemies is described, Jud. v. 4, 5; and see Lu. xxi. 25, 26.

2. When he pleaseth to draw his sword and give it commission he can make great havoc among the nations, and lay all waste; ver. 8, "Come, behold the works of the Lord;" they are to be observed, Ps. lxvi. 5, and to be sought out, Ps. cxi. 2. All the operations of Providence must be considered as the works of the Lord, and his attributes and purposes must be taken notice of in them. Particularly take notice of the "desolations he hath made in the earth," among the enemies of his church, who thought to have laid the land of Israel desolate. The destruction tney designed to bring upon the church has been turned upon themselves. War is a tragedy which commonly destroys the stage it is acted on; David carried the war into the enemy's country: and O what desolations did it make there! cities were burnt, countries laid waste, armies of men cut off and laid heaps upon heaps. Come and see the effects of desolating judgments, and stand in awe of God; say, "How terrible art thou in thy works!" Ps. lxvi. 3. Let all that oppose him see this with terror, and expect the same cup of trembling to be put into their hands; let all that fear him, and trust in him, see it with pleasure, and not be afraid of the most formidable powers armed against the church. Let them gird themselves, but they shall be broken to pieces.

3. When he pleaseth to sheathe his sword, he puts an end to the wars of the nations, and crowns them with peace, ver. 9. War and peace depend on his word and will as much as storms and calms at sea do, Ps. cvii. 25, 29. "He maketh wars to cease unto the ends of the earth;" sometimes in pity to the nations, that they may have a breathing time, when by long wars with each other they have run themselves out of breath. Both sides perhaps are weary of the war, and willing to let it fall; expedients are found out for accommodation; martial princes are removed, and peacemakers set in their room; and then the bow is broken by consent, the spear cut asunder, and turned into a pruning-hook, and the sword beaten into a ploughshare; and the chariots of war burned, there being no more occasion for them. Or rather it may be meant of what he doth at other times in favour of his own people. He maketh those wars to cease that were waged against them, and designed for their ruin. He breaks the enemy's bow that was drawn against them; "No weapon formed against Zion shall prosper," Isa. liv. 16. The total destruction of Gog and Magog is prophetically described by the burning of their weapons of war, Eze. xxxix. 9, 10; which intimates likewise the church's perfect security and assurance of lasting peace, which made it needless to lay up those weapons of war for their own service. The bringing of a long war to a good issue is a work of the Lord which we ought to behold with wonder and thankfulness.

Secondly. As King of saints; and as such we must own that "great and marvellous are his works," Rev. xv. 3. He doth and will do great things,

1. For his own glory; ver. 10, "Be still, and know that I am God." 1st. Let his enemies be still, and threaten no more, but know it to their terror that he is God, one infinitely above them, and that will certainly be too hard for them. Let them rage no more, for it is all in vain, he that sits in heaven laughs at them; and in spite of all their impotent malice against his name and honour he "will be exalted among the heathen," and not only among his own people; he "will be exalted in the earth," and not only in the church. Men will set up themselves, will have their own way, and do their own will, but let them know that God will be exalted, he will have his way; will do his own will, will glorify his own name, and "wherein they deal proudly he will be above them," and make them know that he is so. 2nd. Let his own people be still, let them be calm and sedate, and tremble no more, but know to their comfort that the Lord is God; he is God alone, and "he will be exalted above the heathen." Let him alone to maintain his honour, to fulfil his own counsels, and to support his own interest in the world. Though we be depressed, yet let us not be dejected, for we are sure God will be exalted, and that may satisfy us; he will work for his great name, and then no matter what becomes of our little names. When we pray, "Father, glorify thy name," we ought to act faith upon the answer given to that prayer when Christ himself prayed it, "I have both glorified it, and will glorify it yet again." Amen, Lord, so be it.

2. For his people's safety and protection. He triumphs in the former: "I will be exalted;" they triumph in this, ver. 7, and again, ver. 11. It is the burthen of the song, "The Lord of hosts is with us," he is on our side, he takes our part, is present with us, and president over us, and "the God of Jacob is our refuge," to whom we may flee, and in whom we may confide and be sure of safety. Let all believers triumph in this. 1st. They have the presence of a God of power, of all power: "The Lord of hosts is with us." God is the Lord of hosts, for he and could not exist, there is no reason to see anything but what is beautiful and true in the figures employed. The metaphor reminds us of the comparisons instituted in Psa. i.

xlvii. Title. This psalm is by some ascribed to David as its author, and it has been understood of the victory and ascension of Christ by various ancient authors, as Chrysostom, Jerome, Augustine, Theodoret, &c. Gill similarly regards it as a prophecy of Christ's ascent to heaven. The title in the Syriac version is, "For the sons of Korah; upon the glory of God which was on Mount Sinai; and it is interpreted of the calling of the Gentiles."

xlvii. 4. The words, "He shall choose our inheritance for us," very fairly represent the Hebrew; but the Greek has, "He chose for us his inheritance," and this is followed, as usual, by the Latin. The Syriac is, "He caused us to choose the inheritance and the glory of Jacob. whom he loved." The idea of the writer is that God chose for his ancient people their heritage, which heritage is called has all the creatures which are called the hosts of heaven and earth at his beck and command, and he makes what use he pleaseth of them, as the instruments either of his justice or of his mercy. This sovereign Lord is with us, sides with us, acts with us, and has promised he will never leave us. Hosts may be against us, but we need not fear them if the Lord of hosts be with us. 2nd. They are under the protection of a God in covenant; who not only is able to help them, but is engaged in honour and faithfulness to help them. He is the God of Jacob, not only Jacob the person, but Jacob the people; nay, and of all praying people, the spiritual seed of wrestling Jacob; and he is our refuge, by whom we are sheltered, and in whom we are satisfied, who by his providence secures our welfare, when without are fightings; and who by his grace quiets our minds, and establisheth them, when within are fears. The Lord of hosts, the God of Jacob, has been, is, and will be, with us; has been, is, and will be, our refuge; the original includes all; and well may "Selah" be added to it. Mark this, and take the comfort of it, and say, "If God be for us, who can be against us?"

PSALM XLVII.

The scope of this psalm is to stir us up to praise God, to stir up all people to do it. And I. We are directed in what manner to do it: publicly, cheerfully, and intelligently, ver. 1, 6, 7. II. We are furnished with matter for praise: 1. God's majesty, ver. 2; 2. His sovereign and universal dominion, ver. 2, 7—9; 3. The great things he had done and would do for his people, ver. 3—5. Many suppose that this psalm was penned upon occasion of the bringing up of the ark to mount Zion, which ver. 5 seems to refer to, "God is gone up with a shout;" but it looks farther to the ascension of Christ into the heavenly Zion, after he had finished his undertaking on earth, and to the setting up of his kingdom in the world, to which the heathen should become willing subjects. In singing this psalm we are to give honour to the exalted Redeemer, to rejoice in his exaltation, and to celebrate his praises, confessing that he is Lord, to the glory of God the Father.

To the chief Musician, A Psalm for the sons of Korah.

O CLAP your hands, all ye people;
Shout unto God with the voice of triumph.
2 For the LORD most high is terrible;
He is a great King over all the earth.
3 He shall subdue the people under us,
And the nations under our feet.
4 He shall choose our inheritance for us,
The excellency of Jacob whom he loved. Selah.

The psalmist, having his own heart filled with great and good thoughts of God, endeavours to engage all about him in the blessed work of praise; as one convinced that God is worthy of all blessing and praise, and as one grieved at his own and others' backwardness to, and barrenness in, this work. Observe in these verses,

First. Who are called upon to praise God; "All ye people," all ye people of Israel. Those were his own subjects, and under his charge, and therefore he will engage them to praise God, for on them he has an influence. Whatever others do, he and his house, he and his people, shall praise the Lord. Or, All ye people and nations of the earth; and so it may be taken as a prophecy of the conversion of the Gentiles, and the bringing of them into the church: see Rom. xv. 11.

Secondly. What they are called upon to do: "O clap your hands," in token of your own joy and satisfaction in what God has done for you; of your approbation, nay, your admiration, of what God has done in general; and of your indignation against all the enemies of God's glory, Job xxvii. 23. Clap your hands, as men transported with pleasure, that cannot contain themselves; "shout unto God," not to make him hear,—his ear is not heavy,—but to make all about you hear, and take notice how much you are affected and filled with the works of God. Shout with the voice of triumph in him, and in his power and goodness, that others may join with you in the triumph. Note, Such expressions of pious and devout affections, as to some may seem indecent and imprudent, yet ought not to be hastily censured and condemned, much less ridiculed, because if they come from an upright heart God will accept the strength of the affection, and excuse the weakness of the expressions of it.

Thirdly. What is suggested to us as matter for our praises.

1. That the God with whom we have to do is a God of awful majesty; ver. 2, "The Lord most high is terrible." He is infinitely above the noblest creatures, higher than the highest; there are those perfections in him that are to be reverenced by all, and particularly that power, holiness, and justice, that are to be dreaded by all those that contend with him.

2. That he is a God of sovereign and universal dominion; he is a King that reigns alone, and with an absolute power, a King over all the earth; all the creatures, being made by him, are subject to him; and therefore he is a great King, the King of kings.

3. That he takes a particular care of his people and their concerns, has done so, and ever will;

1st. In giving them victory and success, ver. 3. Subduing the people and nations under them, both those that stood in their way, Ps. xliv. 2, and those that made attempts upon them. This God had done for them; witness the planting of them in Canaan, and their continuance there unto this day. This they doubted not but he would still do for them by his servant David, who prospered which way soever he turned his victorious arms; but this looks forward to the kingdom of the Messiah, which was to be set over all the earth, and not confined to the Jewish nation. Jesus Christ shall subdue the Gentiles. He shall bring them in as sheep into the fold, so the word signifies, not for slaughter, but for preservation. He shall subdue their affections, and make them a willing people in the day of his power; shall bring their thoughts into obedience to him, and reduce them which had gone astray under the conduct of the great Shepherd and Bishop of souls, 1 Pet. ii. 25.

2nd. In giving them rest and settlement; ver. 4, "He shall choose our inheritance for us." He had chosen the land of Canaan to be an inheritance for Israel; it was the land which the Lord their God spied out for them: see Deu. xxxii. 8. This justified their possession of that land, and gave them a good title; and this sweetened their enjoyment of it, and made it comfortable. They had reason to think it a happy lot, and to be satisfied in it, when it was that which Infinite Wisdom chose for them. And the setting up of God's sanctuary in it, made it the excellency, the honour of Jacob, Am. vi. 8; and he chose so good an inheritance for Jacob because he loved him, Deu. vii. 8. Apply this spiritually, and it speaks, First. The happiness of the saints, that God himself hath chosen their inheritance for them, and it is a goodly heritage. He has chosen it who knows the soul, and what will serve to make it happy, and he has chosen so well that he himself has undertaken to be the inheritance of his people, Ps. xvi. 5, and he has laid up for them in the other world an inheritance incorruptible, 1 Pet. i. 4. This will be indeed "the excellency of Jacob," whom because he loved, he prepared for them such a happiness as eye has not seen. Secondly. The faith and submission of the saints to God. This is the language of every gracious soul, God shall choose my inheritance for me, let him appoint me my lot, and I will acquiesce in the appointment. He knows what is good for me better than I do for myself, and therefore I will have no will of my own but what is resolved into his.

5 God is gone up with a shout,
The LORD with the sound of a trumpet.
6 Sing praises to God, sing praises:
Sing praises unto our King, sing praises.
7 For God is the King of all the earth:
Sing ye praises with understanding.
8 God reigneth over the heathen:
God sitteth upon the throne of his holiness.
9 The princes of the people are gathered together,
Even the people of the God of Abraham:
For the shields of the earth belong unto God:
He is greatly exalted.

We are here most earnestly pressed to praise God, and to sing his praises. So backward are we to this duty, that we have need to be urged to it by precept upon precept, and line upon line; so we are here, ver. 6, "Sing praises to God," and again, "sing praises. Sing praises to our King," and again, "sing praises." This intimates that it is a very necessary and excellent duty, that it is a duty we ought to be frequent and abundant in; we may sing praises again and again in the same words, and it is no vain repetition if it be done with new affections. Should not a people praise their God? Dan. v. 4. Should not subjects praise their king? God is our God, our King, and therefore we must praise him; we must sing his praises, as those that are pleased with them, and that are not ashamed of them. But here is a needful rule subjoined, ver. 7, "Sing ye praises with understanding," with maschil. 1. Intelligently; as those that do yourselves understand why and for what reasons you praise God, and what is the meaning of the service. This is the Gospel rule, 1 Cor. xiv. 15, to "sing with the Spirit, and with the understanding also." It is only with the heart that we make melody to the Lord, Eph. v. 19. It is not an acceptable service if it be not a reasonable service. 2. Instructively; as those that desire to make others understand God's glorious perfections, and to teach them to praise him. Three things are mentioned in these verses as just matter for our praises, and each of them will admit of a double sense:

First. We must praise God going up; ver. 5, "God is gone up with a shout;" which may refer, 1. To the carrying up of the ark to the hill of Zion, which was done with great solemnity, David himself dancing before it; the priests, it is likely, blowing the trumpets, and the people following with their loud huzzas. The ark being the instituted token of God's special presence with them, when that was brought up by warrant from him, he might be said to go up; and the emerging of God's ordinances out of obscurity, in order to the more public and solemn administration of them, is a great favour to any people, which they have reason to rejoice in, and give thanks for. 2. To the ascension of our Lord Jesus into heaven when he had finished his work on earth, Acts i. 9. Then "God went up with a shout," the shout of a king, of a conqueror, as one that, having spoiled principalities and powers, then led captivity captive, Ps. lxviii. 18. He went up as Mediator, typified by the ark and the mercy-seat over it, and was brought as the ark was into the most holy place, that is, into heaven itself: see Heb. ix. 24. We read not of a shout, or the sound of a trumpet, at the ascension of Christ; but they were the inhabitants of the upper world, those sons of God that then shouted for joy, Job xxxviii. 7. He shall come again in the same manner as he went, Acts i. 11; and we are sure he shall come again with a shout, and the sound of a trumpet.

Secondly. We must praise God reigning, ver. 7, 8. God is not only our king, and therefore we owe our homage to him, but he is king of all the earth, ver. 7, over all the kings of the earth, and therefore in every place the incense of praise is to be offered up to him. Now this may be understood, 1. Of the kingdom of providence. God, as Creator and the God of nature, reigns over the heathen, disposeth of them and all their affairs as he pleaseth, though they know him not, nor have any regard to him. He sits upon the throne of his holiness, which he hath prepared in the heavens, and there he ruleth over all, even over the heathen, serving his own purposes by them and upon them. See here the extent of God's government. All are born within his allegiance; even the heathen that serve other gods, yet are ruled by the true God, our God, whether they will or no. See the equity of his government. It is a throne of holiness on which he sits, whence he gives warrants, orders, and judgment, in which we are sure there is no iniquity. 2. Of the kingdom of the Messiah. Jesus Christ, who is God, and whose throne is for ever and ever, reigns over the heathen; not only is he intrusted with the administration of the providential kingdom, but he shall set up the kingdom of his grace in the Gentile world, and rule in the hearts of multitudes that were bred up in heathenism, Eph ii. 12, 13. This the apostle speaks of as a great mystery, that the Gentiles should be fellow-heirs, Eph. iii. 6. Christ sits upon the throne of his holiness, his throne in the heavens, where all the administrations of his government are intended to shew forth God's holiness, and to advance holiness among the children of men.

Thirdly. We must praise God as attended and honoured by the princes of the people, ver. 9. This may be understood, 1. Of the congress or convention of the states of Israel, the heads and rulers of the several tribes, to the solemn feasts, or to despatch the public business of the nation. It was the honour of Israel that they were the people of the God of Abraham, as they were Abraham's seed, and taken into his covenant; and thanks be to God this blessing of Abraham is come upon the isles of the Gentiles, Gal. iii. 14. It was their happiness that they had a settled government, princes of their people, who were the shields of their land. Magistracy is the shield of a nation, and it is a great mercy to any people to have this shield; especially when their princes, their shields, belong unto the Lord, are devoted to his honour, and their power is employed in his service; for then he is greatly exalted. It is likewise the honour of God that in another sense the shields of the earth do belong to him; magistracy is his institution, and he serves his own purposes by it in the government of the world, turning the hearts of kings as the rivers of water which way soever he pleaseth. It was well with Israel when the princes of their people were gathered together to consult for the public welfare. The unanimous agreement of the great ones of a nation, in the things that belong to its peace, is a very happy omen, which promiseth abundance of blessings.

"the excellency of Jacob," and may include the land, the Temple, and all other material and spiritual privileges of Israel. The words "Jacob, whom he loved," are analogous to Mal. i. 2, and may be taken to denote preference.

xlvii. 9. "The shields of the earth:" the word "shields" is a metaphor for princes or rulers of the people, in their character of defenders and protectors. Men, however elevated their position, are subject to the command and control of God.

xlviii. 1—3. The "city of God" is Jerusalem; and "mountain of his holiness"—his holy mountain—is no doubt that Mount Zion which is called the "joy of the whole earth," or land. The words rendered "on the sides of the north, the city of the great King," were misunderstood by many of the olden interpreters, who made up for their lack of knowledge by their ingenuity. Thus one of them says Mount Zion "lies towards the northern part of the land of promise, and is, as it were, a wall protecting that region from the t may be applied to the calling of the Gentiles into the church of Christ, d taken as a prophecy that in the days of the Messiah the kings of the earth nd their people should join themselves to the church, and bring their glory and power into the new Jerusalem. That they should all become the people of the God of Abraham, to whom it was promised that he should be the father of many nations. The 'volunteers of the people;' so it may be read. It is the same word that is used, Ps. cx. 3, "Thy people shall be willing;" for those that are gathered to Christ are not forced, but made freely willing to be his. When the shields of the earth, the ensigns of royal dignity, 1 Kin. xiv. 27, 28, are surrendered to the Lord Jesus, as the keys of a city are presented to the conqueror or sovereign, when princes use their power for the advancement of the interests of religion, then Christ is greatly exalted.

PSALM XLVIII.

This psalm, as the two former, is a triumphant song. Some think it was penned on occasion of Jehoshaphat's victory, 2 Chr. xx.; others, of the rout given to Sennacharib, when his army laid siege to Jerusalem in Hezekiah's time; but, for aught I know, it might be penned by David upon occasion of some eminent victory obtained in his time; yet not so calculated for that but that it might serve any other the like occasion in after times, and be applicable also to the glories of the gospel church, of which Jerusalem was a type, especially when it shall come to be a church triumphant, the heavenly Jerusalem, Heb. xii. 22; the Jerusalem which is above, Gal. iv. 26. Jerusalem is here praised, I. For its relation to God, ver. 1, 2. II. For God's care of it, ver. 3. III. For the terror it strikes upon its enemies, ver. 4—7. IV. For the pleasure it gives to its friends, who delight to think, 1. Of what God hath done, doth, and will do for it, ver. 8; 2. Of the gracious discoveries he makes of himself in and for that holy city, ver. 9, 10; 3. Of the effectual provision which is made for its safety, ver. 11—13; 4. Of the assurance we have of the perpetuity of God's covenant with the children of Zion, ver. 14. In singing this psalm, we must be affected with the privilege we have as members of the gospel church, and must express and excite our sincere good will to all its interests.

A Song and Psalm for the sons of Korah.

GREAT is the LORD, and greatly to be praised
In the city of our God, in the mountain of his holiness.
2 Beautiful for situation,
The joy of the whole earth, is mount Zion,
On the sides of the north, the city of the great King.
3 God is known in her palaces for a refuge.
4 For, lo, the kings were assembled,
They passed by together.
5 They saw it, and so they marvelled;
They were troubled, and hasted away.
6 Fear took hold upon them there,
And pain, as of a woman in travail.
7 Thou breakest the ships of Tarshish
With an east wind.

The psalmist is designing to praise Jerusalem, and set forth the grandeur of that city; but he begins with the praises of God and his greatness, ver. 1, and ends with the praises of God and his goodness, ver. 14; for, whatever is the subject of our praises, God must be both the Alpha and Omega of them; and particularly, whatever is said to the honour of the church must redound to the honour of the church's God. What is here said to the honour of Jerusalem is,

First. That the King of heaven owns it. It is the city of our God, ver. 1, which he chose out of all the cities of Israel to put his name there; and of Zion he said kinder things than ever he said of any place upon earth; "This is my rest for ever: here will I dwell; for I have desired it," Ps. cxxxii. 13, 14. It is the city of the great King, ver. 2, the King of all the earth, who is pleased to declare himself in a special manner present there. This our Saviour quotes to prove that to swear by Jerusalem is profanely to swear by God himself, Mat. v. 35, for it is the city of the great King, who has chosen it for the special residence of his grace, as heaven is of his glory.

1. It is enlightened with the knowledge of God. "In Judah God is known," and his name is great, but especially in Jerusalem, the head-quarters of the priests, whose lips were to keep this knowledge. In Jerusalem God is great, ver. 1, who, in other places, was made little of, was made nothing of. Happy the kingdom, the city, the family, the heart, in which God is great, in which he is uppermost, in which he is all. There God is known, ver. 3; and where he is known he will be great: none contemn God but those that are ignorant of him.

2. It is devoted to the honour of God. It is, therefore, called the "mountain of his holiness," for, Holiness to the Lord, is written upon it, and all the furniture of it, Zec. xiv. 20, 21. This is the privilege of the church of Christ, that it is a holy nation, a peculiar people; Jerusalem, the type of it, is called the holy city, as bad as it was, Mat. xxvii. 53, till that was set up, but never after.

3. It is the place appointed for the solemn service and worship of God. There he is greatly praised, and greatly to be praised, ver. 1. Note, The clearer discoveries are made to us of God and his greatness, the more it is expected we should abound in his praises. They that from all parts of the country brought their offerings to Jerusalem, had reason to be thankful that God would not only permit them thus to attend him, but promise to accept them, and meet them with a blessing, and reckon himself praised and honoured by their services. Herein Jerusalem typified the Gospel church; for what little tribute of praise God has from this earth ariseth from that church upon earth, which is therefore his tabernacle among men.

4. It is taken under his special protection, ver. 3. He is known for a refuge; that is, he has approved himself such a one, and as such a one he is there applied to by his worshippers. They that know him will trust in him, and seek to him, Ps. ix. 10. God was known not only in the streets, but even in the palaces of Jerusalem, for a refuge; the great men had recourse to God, and acquaintance with him. And then religion was likely to flourish in the city, when it reigned in the palaces.

5. Upon all these accounts, Jerusalem, and especially mount Zion, on which the temple was built, were universally beloved and admired; "Beautiful for situation, and the joy of the whole earth," ver. 2. The situation must needs be every way agreeable, when Infinite Wisdom chose it for the place of the sanctuary; and that which made it beautiful was that it was the mountain of holiness, for there is a beauty in holiness. This earth is, by sin, covered with deformity, and therefore justly might that spot of ground which was thus beautified with holiness, be called, "the joy of the whole earth;" that is, what the whole earth had reason to rejoice in, that God would thus, in very deed, dwell with man upon the earth. Mount Zion was on the north side of Jerusalem, and so was a shelter to the city from the cold and bleak winds that blew from that quarter; or, if fair weather was expected out of the north, they were thus directed to look Zionward for it.

JERUSALEM, FROM THE NORTH.

Secondly. That the kings of the earth were afraid of it. That "God was known in their palaces for a refuge," they had had a late instance, and a very remarkable one. Whatever it was,

1. They had had but too much occasion to fear their enemies. For "the kings were assembled," ver. 4. The neighbouring princes were confederate against Jerusalem, their heads and horns, their policies and powers, were combined for its ruin; they were assembled with all their forces, they passed, advanced, and marched on together, not doubting but presently to make themselves masters of that city which should have been the joy, but was the envy, of the whole earth.

2. God made their enemies to fear them. The very sight of Jerusalem struck them into a consternation, and gave check to their fury; as the sight of the tents of Jacob frightened Balaam from his purpose to curse Israel, Num. xxiv. 2. "They saw it and marvelled, and hasted away," ver. 5. Not veni, vidi, vici,—'I came, I saw, I conquered;' but, on the contrary, veni, vidi, victus sum,—'I came, I saw, I was defeated.' Not that there was any thing to be seen in Jerusalem that was so very formidable, but the sight of it brought to mind what they had heard concerning the special presence of God in that city, and the Divine protection it was under; and God impressed such terrors upon their minds thereby as made them retire with precipitation. Though they were kings, though they were many in confederacy, yet they knew themselves an unequal match for Omnipotence, and therefore fear came upon them, and pain, ver. 6. Note, God can dispirit the stoutest of his church's enemies, and soon put them in pain that live at ease. The fright they were in upon the sight of Jerusalem is here compared to the throes of a woman in travail, which are sharp and grievous, which sometimes come suddenly, 1 Thes. v. 3, which cannot be avoided, and which are effects of sin and the curse. The defeat hereby given to their designs upon Jerusalem is compared to the dreadful work made with a fleet of ships by a violent storm, when some are split, others shattered, all dispersed; ver. 7, "Thou breakest the ships of Tarshish with an east wind:" effects at sea lie thus exposed. The terrors of God are compared to an east wind, Job xxvii. 20, 21. These shall put them into confusion, and break all their measures. "Who knows the power of God's anger?"

8 As we have heard, so have we seen
In the city of the LORD of hosts, in the city of our God·
God will establish it for ever. Selah.
9 We have thought of thy lovingkindness, O God,
In the midst of thy temple.
10 According to thy name, O God,
So is thy praise unto the ends of the earth:
Thy right hand is full of righteousness.
11 Let mount Zion rejoice,
Let the daughters of Judah be glad,
Because of thy judgments.
12 Walk about Zion, and go round about her: wild and furious north wind; so, also, the Christian Church is, as it were, a wall opposed to the spiritual north wind—that is, the blasts of unclean spirits." The expression "sides of the north" occurs in Isa. xiv. 13 and Ezek. xxxviii. 15, in which latter case it is translated according to its meaning, "north parts." Rosenmüller understands the words under notice to signify that Jerusalem was built on the northern portion of a group of elevations, which might be regarded as one mountain. As a fact, the best part of the city was on the north. The principal front of some of the famous palaces and temples of Western Asia was towards the north. Gill's explanation is that Jerusalem was to the north of Zion, which is very uncertain. Probably the ancient city lay chiefly to the north of the Temple.

xlviii. 7. "Ships of Tarshish" seem to have been a class of merchant ships, so called from their having gained their reputation in the trade with Tarshish. They were mostly ships of Tyre and Sidon, but were called "ships of Tarshish," as we call some "Indiamen."

Tell the towers thereof.
13 Mark ye well her bulwarks, consider her palaces;
That ye may tell it to the generation following.
14 For this God is our God for ever and ever:
He will be our guide even unto death.

We have here the good use and improvement which the people of God are taught to make of his late glorious and gracious appearances for them against their enemies, that they might work for their good.

First. Let our faith in the work of God be hereby confirmed. If we compare what God has done with what he has spoken, we shall find that, as we have heard so have we seen, ver. 8; and what we have seen obliges us to believe what we have heard. 1. As we have heard done in former providences, in the days of old, so have we seen done in our own days. Note, God's latter appearances for his people, against his and their enemies, are consonant to his former appearances, and should put us in mind of them. 2. As we have heard in the promise and prediction, so have we seen in the performance and accomplishment. We have heard that God is the Lord of hosts, and that Jerusalem is the city of our God, is dear to him, is his particular care, and now we have seen it; we have seen the power of our God, we have seen his goodness, we have seen his care and concern for us, that he is a wall of fire round about Jerusalem, and the glory in the midst of her. Note, In the great things that God has done and is doing for his church, it is good to take notice of the fulfilling of the Scriptures; and this would help us the better to understand both the providence itself and the Scripture that is fulfilled in it.

Secondly. Let our hope of the stability and perpetuity of the church be hereby encouraged. From what we have seen, compared with what we have heard in the city of our God, we may conclude that God will establish it for ever. This was not fulfilled in Jerusalem, that was long since destroyed, and all its glory laid in the dust, but has its accomplishment in the Gospel church; we are sure that that shall be established for ever, it is built upon a rock, and the gates of hell cannot prevail against it, Mat. xvi. 18; God himself has undertaken the establishment of it; it is the Lord that has founded Zion, Isa. xiv. 32. And what we have seen, compared with what we have heard, may encourage us to hope in that promise of God upon which the church is built.

Thirdly. Let our minds be hereby filled with good thoughts of God. From what we have heard, and seen, and hope for, we may take occasion to think much of God's lovingkindness whenever we meet in the midst of his temple, ver. 9. All the streams of mercy that flow down to us must be run up to the fountain of God's lovingkindness. It is not owing to any merit of ours, but purely to his mercy, and the peculiar favour he bears to his people. This, therefore, we must think of with delight, think frequently and fixedly of. What subject can we dwell upon more noble, more pleasant, more profitable! We must have God's lovingkindness always before our eyes, Ps. xxvi. 3, especially when we attend upon him in his temple. And when we enjoy the benefit of public ordinances undisturbed, we meet in his temple, and there is none to make us afraid, we should take occasion from thence to think of his lovingkindness.

Fourthly. Let us give to God the glory of the great things which he has done for us, and mention them to his honour; ver. 10, "According to thy name, O God, so is thy praise," not only in Jerusalem, but "to the ends of the earth." By the late signal deliverance of Jerusalem, God had made himself a name, that is, he had gloriously discovered his wisdom, power, and goodness, and made all the nations about sensible of it; and so was his praise, that is, some in all parts would be found giving glory to him accordingly. As far as his name goes, his praise will go, at least it should go, and at length it shall go, when all the ends of the world shall praise him, Ps. xxii. 27; Rev. xi. 15. Some by this name understand especially that glorious name of his, the Lord of hosts; according to that name, so is his praise, for all the creatures, even to the ends of the earth are under his command. But his people must in a special manner acknowledge his justice in all he doth for them; Righteousness fills thy right hand; that is, all the operations of thy power are consonant to the eternal rules of equity.

Fifthly. Let all the members of the church in particular take to themselves the comfort of what God doth for his church in general; ver. 11, "Let mount Zion rejoice," the priests and Levites that attend the sanctuary, and then let all the daughters of Judah, the country towns, and the inhabitants of them, be glad; let the women in their songs and dances, as usual on occasion of public joys, celebrate with thankfulness this great salvation which God has wrought for us. Note, When we have given God the praise, we may then take the pleasure of the extraordinary deliverances of the church; and be glad because of God's judgments, that is, the operations of his providence, all which we may see wrought in wisdom, (therefore called judgments,) and working for the good of his church.

Sixthly. Let us diligently observe the instances and evidences of the church's beauty, strength, and safety, and faithfully transmit our observations to those that shall come after us; ver. 12, 13, "Walk about Zion." Some think this refers to the ceremony of the triumph. Let those who are employed in that solemnity walk round the walls, as they did, Neh. xii. 31, singing and praising God; and in doing this, let "them tell the towers, and mark well the bulwarks," 1. That they might magnify the late wonderful deliverance God had wrought for them. Let them observe with wonder, that the towers and bulwarks are all in their full strength, and none of them damaged; the palaces in their beauty, and none of them blemished; there is not the last damage done to the city by the kings that were assembled against it; ver. 5, "Tell this to the generation following," as a wonderful instance of God's care of his holy city, that the enemies should not only not ruin or destroy it, but not so much as hurt or deface it. 2. That they might fortify themselves against the fear of the like threatening danger another time. And so, 1st, We may understand it literally of Jerusalem, and the stronghold of Zion. Let the daughters of Judah see the towers and bulwarks of Zion, with as much pleasure as the kings their enemies saw them with terror, ver. 5. Jerusalem was generally looked upon as an impregnable place, as appears, Lam. iv. 2, "All the inhabitants of the world would not have believed that an enemy should have entered the gates of Jerusalem." Nor could they have entered, if the inhabitants had not sinned away their defence. Set your heart to her bulwarks. That intimates, that the principal bulwarks of Zion were not the objects of sense, which they might set their eye upon, but the objects of faith, which they must set their hearts upon. It was well enough fortified, indeed, both by nature and art; but its bulwarks that were mostly to be relied upon were the special presence of God in it, the beauty of holiness he had put upon it, and the promises he had made concerning it. Consider Jerusalem's strength, and tell it to the generations to come, that they may do nothing to weaken it, and that, if at any time it be in distress, they may not basely surrender it to the enemy as not tenable. Calvin observes here, that when they are directed to transmit to posterity a particular account of the towers, and bulwarks, and palaces of Jerusalem, it is intimated that in process of time they would all be destroyed, and remain no longer to be seen: for otherwise what need was there to preserve the description and history of them? When the disciples were admiring the buildings of the temple, their Master told them, that in a little time one stone of it should not be left upon another, Mat. xxiv. 1, 2. Therefore, 2nd. This must certainly be applied to the gospel church, that mount Zion, Heb. xii. 22. Consider the towers, and bulwarks, and palaces of that, that you may be invited and encouraged to join yourselves to it, and embark in it. See it founded on Christ, the rock fortified by the Divine power, guarded by him that neither slumbers nor sleeps. See what precious ordinances are its palaces, what precious promises are its bulwarks; "Tell this to the generation following," that they may with purpose of heart espouse its interests, and cleave to it.

Seventhly. Let us triumph in God, and in the assurances we have of his everlasting lovingkindness, ver. 14. Tell this to the generation following, transmit this truth as a sacred depositum to your posterity, that "this God," who has now done such great things for us, "is our God for ever and ever;" he is constant and unchangeable in his love to us, and care for us. 1. If God be our God, he is ours for ever, not only through all the ages of time, but to eternity; for it is the everlasting blessedness of glorified saints, that "God himself will be with them, and will be their God," Rev. xxi. 3. 2. If he be our God, he will be our guide, our faithful constant guide, to shew us our way, and to lead us in it; he will be so, even unto death, which will be the period of our way, and will bring us to our rest. He will lead and keep us even to the last. He will be our guide above death; so some. He will so guide us as to set us above the reach of death, so that it shall not be able to do us any real hurt. He will be our guide beyond death; so others. He will conduct us safe to a happiness on the other side death, to a life in which there shall be no more death. If we take the Lord for our God, he will conduct and convey us safe to death, through death, and beyond death; down to death, and up again to glory.

PSALM XLIX.

This psalm is a sermon, and so is the next. In most of the psalms we have the penman praying or praising; in these we have him preaching; and it is our duty in singing psalms to teach and admonish ourselves and one another. The scope and design of this discourse is to convince the men of this world of their folly in setting their hearts upon the things of this world, and so to persuade them to seek the things of a better world; as also to comfort the people of God in reference to their own troubles, and the grief that ariseth from the prosperity of the wicked. I. In the preface he proposeth to awaken worldly people out of their security, ver. 1—3; and to comfort himself and other godly people in a day of distress, ver. 4, 5. II. In the rest of the psalm, 1. He endeavours to convince sinners of their folly in doting upon the wealth of this world, by shewing them, 1st. That they cannot, with all their wealth, save their friends from death, ver. 6—9; 2nd. They cannot save themselves from death, ver. 10; 3rd. They cannot secure to themselves a happiness in this world, ver. 11, 12; much less, 4th. Can they secure to themselves a happiness in the other world, ver. 14. 2. He endeavours to comfort himself and other good people, 1st. Against the fear of death, ver. 15; 2nd. Against the fear of the prospering power of wicked people, ver. 16—20. In singing this psalm, let us receive these instructions, and be wise.

To the chief Musician, A Psalm for the sons of Korah.

HEAR this, all ye people;
Give ear, all ye inhabitants of the world:
2 Both low and high,
Rich and poor, together.
3 My mouth shall speak of wisdom;
And the meditation of my heart shall be of understanding.
4 I will incline mine ear to a parable:
I will open my dark saying upon the harp.

EGYPTIAN MINSTREL.

5 Wherefore should I fear in the days of evil,
When the iniquity of my heels shall compass me about?

This is the psalmist's preface to his discourse concerning the vanity of the world, and its insufficiency to make us happy; and we seldom meet with an introduction more solemn than this is, for there is no truth of more undoubted certainty, nor of greater weight and importance, and the consideration of which will be of more advantage to us.

First. He demands the attention of others to that which he was about to say; ver. 1, 2, "Hear this, all ye people;" hear it, and heed it, hear it, and consider it; what is spoken once, hear twice, hear and give ear, Ps. lxii. 9, 11. Not only, hear all ye Israelites, and give ear all the inhabitants of Canaan; but, "hear, all ye people, and give ear all the inhabitants of the world," for this doctrine is not peculiar to those that are blessed with Divine revelation, but even the light of nature witnesseth to it. All men may know, and therefore, let all men consider, that their riches will not profit them in the day of death. Both low and high, both rich and poor, must come together to hear the Word of God; let both therefore hear this with application. Let those that are high and rich xlviii. 11. The "daughters of Judah" are not simply the women of Judah, but either the inhabitants generally or its towns and villages.

xlix. 1, 2. This beautiful and carefully constructed psalm is remarkable for its parallelisms. In verse 1, "all people" are the same as "all inhabitants of the world;" in verse 2, the phrases rendered "low and high" mean the same as "rich and poor."

xlix. 3, 4. Here, also, the parallelisms are striking. The first and second members of verse 3 correspond in sense, only one refers to the utterance and the other to the inward thought. In verse 4 the first clause is, "I will incline mine ear," that is, will listen "to a parable;" while the second refers to the chanting of it upon the harp. The parable is the sententious utterance of wisdom; the "dark saying" is really the same, but its language is more obscure and ambiguous.

xlix. 5. The Syriac of this verse is, "I am not afraid in evil days, when the iniquity of my foes surrounds me." Our version in the world hear of the vanity of their worldly possessions, and not be proud of them, nor secure in the enjoyment of them, but lay them out in doing good, that with them they may make to themselves friends; let those that are poor and low, hear this, and be content with their little, and not envy those that have abundance. Poor people are as much in danger by an inordinate desire towards the wealth of the world as rich people by an inordinate delight in it.

He gives a good reason why his discourse should be regarded; ver. 3, "My mouth shall speak of wisdom." What he had to say, 1. It was true and good. It is wisdom and understanding; it will make those wise and intelligent that receive it and submit to it. It is not doubtful, but certain; not trival, but weighty; not a matter of nice speculation, but of admirable use to guide us in the right way to our great end. 2. It was what he had himself well digested. What his mouth spoke was the meditation of his heart, as Ps. xix. 14; xlv. 1; it was what God put into his mind, what he had himself seriously considered, and was fully apprised of the meaning of, and convinced of the truth of. That which ministers speak from their own hearts is most likely to reach the hearts of their hearers.

Secondly. He engageth his own attention; ver. 4, "I will incline mine ear to a parable." It is called a parable, not because it is figurative and obscure, but because it is a wise discourse, and very instructive. It is the same word that is used concerning Solomon's proverbs. The psalmist will himself incline his ear to it. This intimates, 1. That he was taught it by the Spirit of God, and did not speak of himself. Those that undertake to teach others must first learn themselves. 2. That he thought himself nearly concerned in it, and was resolved not to venture his own soul upon that bottom which he dissuaded others from venturing theirs upon. 3. That he would not expect others should attend to that which he himself did not attend to as a matter of the greatest importance. Where God gives the tongue of the learned, he first wakens the ear to hear as the learned, Isa. l. 4.

Thirdly. He promiseth to make the matter as plain and as affecting as he could; "I will open my dark saying upon the harp." What he learned for himself he would not conceal or confine to himself, but would communicate it for the benefit of others. 1. Some understood it not, it was a riddle to them. Tell them of the vanity of the things that are seen, and of the reality and weight of invisible things, and they say, "Ah, Lord God, doth he not speak parables?" For the sake of such he would open this dark saying, and make it so plain that he that runs might read it. 2. Others understood it well enough, but they were not moved by it, it never affected them, and for their sake he would open it upon the harp, and try that expedient to work upon them, to win upon them. 'A verse may find him who a sermon flies.'—Herbert.

Fourthly. He begins with the application of it to himself; and that is the right method in which to treat of Divine things: we must first preach to ourselves, before we undertake to admonish or instruct others. Before he comes to set down the folly of carnal security, ver. 6, he here lays down, from his own experience, the benefit and comfort of a holy gracious security, which they enjoy who trust in God and not in their worldly wealth; "Wherefore should I fear?" he means, wherefore should I fear their fear, Isa. viii. 12, the fears of worldly people. 1. Wherefore should I be afraid of them? "Wherefore should I fear in the days" of trouble and persecution, "when the iniquity of my heels," or of my supplanters that endeavour to trip up my heels, shall compass me about, and they shall surround me with their mischievous attempts? Why should I be afraid of those, all whose power lies in their wealth, and that will not enable them to redeem their friends; and therefore I will not fear it, it cannot enable them to ruin me. The great men of the world will not appear at all formidable when we consider what little stead their wealth will stand themselves in. We need not fear their casting us down from our excellency, who cannot support themselves in their own excellency. 2. Wherefore should I be afraid like them? The days of old age and death are the days of evil, Eccl. xii. 1. In the day of judgment, the iniquity of our heels, or of our steps, our past sins, will compass us about, will be set in order before us. "Every work will be brought into judgment, with every secret thing;" and "every one of us must give account of himself." In these days worldly wicked people will be afraid; nothing more dreadful to them that have set their hearts upon the world than to think of leaving it. Death to them is the king of terrors, because after death the judgment, when their sins will surround them as so many furies; but wherefore should a good man fear death, who has God with him? Ps. xxiii. 4. When his iniquities compass him about, he sees them all pardoned, his conscience is purified and pacified; and then even in the judgment-day, when the hearts of others fail them for fear, they can lift up their heads with joy, Lu. xxi. 26, 28. Note, The children of God, though never so poor, are in this truly happy, above the most prosperous of the children of this world, that they are well guarded against the terrors of death, and the judgment to come.

6 They that trust in their wealth,
And boast themselves in the multitude of their riches;
7 None of them can by any means redeem his brother,
Nor give to God a ransom for him:
8 (For the redemption of their soul is precious,
And it ceaseth for ever:)
9 That he should still live for ever,
And not see corruption.
10 For he seeth that wise men die,
Likewise the fool and the brutish person perish,
And leave their wealth to others. [for ever,
11 Their inward thought is, that their houses shall continue
And their dwelling places to all generations;
They call their lands after their own names.
12 Nevertheless man being in honour abideth not:
He is like the beasts that perish.
13 This their way is their folly:

In these verses we have,

First. A description of the spirit and way of worldly people, whose portio is in this life, Ps. xvii. 14. It is taken for granted that they have wealth, and a multitude of riches, ver. 6; houses and lands of inheritance, which they call their own, ver. 11. Many times God gives abundance of the good things of this world to bad men, that live in contempt of him and rebellion against him; by which it appears, that they are not the best things in themselves, for then God would give most of them to his best friends, and that they are not the best things for us, for then they would not have so much of them who, being marked for ruin, are to be ripened for it by their prosperity, Pr. i. 32. It is possible a man may have abundance of the wealth of the world, and be made better by it,—may thereby have his heart enlarged in love and thankfulness and obedience, and may do that good with it which will be fruit abounding to his account; and therefore it is not men's having riches that denominates them worldly, but their setting their hearts upon them as the best things; and so these worldly people are here described.

1. They repose a confidence in their riches. "They trust in their wealth," ver. 6; they depend upon it as their portion and happiness, and expect that it will secure them from all evil, and supply them with all good, and they need nothing else, no, not God himself. Their gold is their hope, Job xxxi. 24; and so it becomes their god. Thus our Saviour explains the difficulty of the salvation of rich people, Mar. x. 24; "How hard is it for them that trust in riches to enter into the kingdom of God!" see 1 Tim. vi. 17.

2. They take a pride in their riches. They "boast themselves in the multitude" of them, as if they were sure tokens of God's favour, and certain proofs of their own ingenuity and industry: "My might, and the power of my hand has gotten me this wealth;" as if they made them truly great and happy, and more really excellent than their neighbours. They boast that they have all they would have, Ps. x. 3, and can set all the world at defiance; "I sit as a queen, and shall be a lady for ever;" therefore "they call their lands after their own names," hoping thereby to perpetuate their memory. And if their lands do retain the names by which they called them, it is but a poor honour; but many times they change their names when they change their owners.

3. They flatter themselves with an expectation of the perpetuity of their worldly possessions; ver. 14, "Their inward thought is that their houses shall continue for ever," and with this thought they please themselves. Are not all thoughts inward? Yes; but it intimates, 1st. That this thought is deeply rooted in their minds; is rolled and revolved there, and carefully lodged in the innermost recesses of their hearts. A godly man has thoughts of the world; but they are his outward thoughts, his inward thought is reserved for God and heavenly things. But a worldly man has only some floating foreign thoughts of the things of God, while his fixed thought, his inward thought, is about the world; that lies nearest his heart, and is upon the throne there. 2nd. There it is industriously concealed; they cannot for shame say that they expect their houses to continue for ever, but inwardly they think so. If they cannot persuade themselves that "they shall continue for ever," yet they are so foolish as to think their houses shall, and their dwelling-places. And suppose they should, what good will that do them when they shall be no longer theirs? But they will not, for the world passeth away, and the fashion of it. All things are devoured by the teeth of time.

Secondly. A demonstration of their folly herein. In general, ver. 13, "This their way is their folly." Note, The way of worldliness is a very foolish way. They that lay up their treasure on earth, and set their affections on things below, act contrary both to right reason and to their true interest. God himself pronounced him a fool who thought his goods were laid up for many years, and that they would be a portion for his soul, Lu. xii. 19, 20; and yet "their posterity approve their sayings," agree with them in the same sentiments, say as they say, and do as they do, and tread in the steps of their worldliness. Note, The love of the world is a disease that runs in the blood; men have it by kind, till the grace of God cures it. To prove the folly of carnal worldlings, he shews,

1. That with all their wealth they cannot save the life of the dearest friend they have in the world, nor purchase a reprieve for him when he is under the arrest of death; ver. 7—9, "There is none of them can by any means redeem his brother,"—his brother worldling, who would give him counter-security out of his own estate, if he would but be bail for him; and gladly he would, in hopes that he might do the same kindness for him another time. But their words will not be taken one for another, nor will one man's estate be the ransom of another man's life. God doth not value it, it is of no account with him; and the true value of things is as they stand in his books. His justice will not accept it by way of commutation or equivalent. The Lord of our brother's life is the Lord of our estate, and may take both if he pleaseth, without either difficulty to himself or wrong to us; and therefore one cannot be ransom for another. We cannot bribe death, that our brother should still live, much less that he should live for ever in this world; nor bribe the grave, that he should not see corruption: for we must needs die, and return to the dust; and there is no discharge from that war. What folly is it to trust to that, and boast of that, which will not enable us so much as for one hour to respite the execution of the sentence of death upon a parent, a child, or a friend, that is to us as our own soul! It is certainly true, that "the redemption of the soul is precious, and ceaseth for ever;" that is, life when it is going cannot be stayed, and when it is gone it cannot be recalled by any human art, or worldly price. But this looks farther to the eternal redemption which was to be wrought out by the Messiah, whom the Old Testament saints had an eye to as the Redeemer. Immortality and an everlasting life is a jewel of too great a value to be purchased by the wealth of this world; "We are not redeemed with corruptible things, such as silver and gold," 1 Pet. i. 18, 19. The learned Dr. Hammond applies the 8th and 9th verses expressly to Christ; 'The redemption of the soul shall be precious,' shall be high prized, it shall cost very dear; but being once wrought "it shall cease for ever;" that is, it shall never need to be repeated, Heb. ix. 25, 26; x. 14. 'And he,' that is, the Redeemer, 'shall yet live for ever, and shall not see corruption.' He shall rise again before he sees corruption, and then shall live for evermore, Rev. i. 18. Christ did that for us which all the riches of the world could not do, and therefore good reason he should be dearer to us than any worldly things. Christ did that for us which a brother, a friend, could not do for us; no, not one of the best estate or interest, and therefore those that love father or brother more than him are not worthy of him. This likewise shews the folly of worldly people, who sell their souls for that which would never buy them.

2. That with all their wealth they cannot secure themselves from the stroke of death. The worldling sees, and it vexes him to see it, that "wise men die, likewise the fool and the brutish person perish," ver. 10. Therefore he cannot but expect that it will at length come to his own turn; he cannot find any encouragement to hope that he himself shall continue for ever, and therefore foolishly comforts himself with this, that though he shall not his house shall. Some rich people are wise, they are politicians; but they cannot outwit death, nor evade his stroke with all their art and management. Others are fools, and brutish, (fortuna favet fatuis,—'fools are fortune's favourites;') these, though they do no good, yet perhaps do no great hurt in the world.

must be altered: "Why should I fear in days of evil, when the iniquity of men who lie in wait for me surrounds me?" Ebn Ezra translates, "Why should I fear in the day of evil? why should iniquity surround my heels?" Modern critics generally accept the preceding rendering.

xlix. 6—13. Although the leading idea of these verses is apparent enough, there are some critical difficulties. The Syriac mistranslates the last words of verse 8, and joins them to verse 9—"Labour for ever that thou mayest live for ever; and thou shalt not see corruption." The Greek and Latin resemble this in part, but the ordinary Hebrew text must not be disturbed. The words in verse 11, "Their inward thought is," &c., we should, without scruple, alter in accordance with ancient authorities—"Their sepulchres will be their houses for ever." The words of verse 12, "Man being in honour abideth not," may be questioned. The Syriac has "understood" for "abideth," so have the Greek and Latin (compare, also, verse 20).

But that shall not excuse them; they shall perish, and be taken away by death, as well as the wise that did mischief with their craft. Or, by the wise and the foolish, we may understand the godly and the wicked. The godly die, and their death is their deliverance; the wicked perish, their death is their destruction; but, however, they leave their wealth to others. 1st. They cannot continue with it, nor will it serve to procure them a reprieve. That is a frivolous plea, though once it served a turn; Jer. xli. 8, "Slay us not, for we have treasures in the field." 2nd. They cannot carry it away with them, but leave it behind them. 3rd. They cannot foresee who will enjoy it when they have left it. They must leave it to others, but to whom they know not, perhaps to a fool, Eccl. ii. 19; perhaps to an enemy. And as men's wealth will stand them in no stead in a dying hour, so neither will their honour; ver. 12, "Man being in honour abideth not." We will suppose a man advanced to the highest pinnacle of preferment, as great and happy as the world can make him; man in splendour, "man at his best estate," surrounded and supported with all the advantages he can desire, yet then he abideth not, his honour doth not continue, that is a fleeting shadow; he himself doth not. He tarries not all night: this world is an inn, in which his stay is so short that he can scarce be said to get a night's lodging in it; so little rest is there in these things, he has but a baiting-time. "He is like the beasts that perish;" that is, he must as certainly die as the beasts, and his death will be as final a period to his state in this world as theirs is; his dead body likewise will putrefy as theirs doth; and, as Dr. Hammond observes, oftentimes the greatest honours and wealth, unjustly gotten by the parent, descend not to any one of his posterity, (as the beasts when they die leave nothing behind them to their young ones but the wide world to feed in,) but fall into other hands immediately, for which he never designed to gather them.

3. That their condition on the other side death will be very miserable. The world they dote upon will not only not save them from death, but will sink them so much the lower into hell; ver. 14, "Like sheep they are laid in the grave." Their prosperity did but feed them like sheep for the slaughter, Hos. iv. 16; and then death comes and shuts them up in the grave like fat sheep in a fold, "to be brought forth to the day of wrath," Job xxi. 30. Multitudes of them, like flocks of sheep dead of some disease, are thrown into the grave, and there death shall feed on them; the second death, the worm that dies not, Job xxiv. 20. Their own guilty consciences, like so many vultures, shall be continually preying upon them with, Son, remember, Lu. xvi. 25. Death insults and triumphs over them, as it is represented in the fall of the king of Babylon; at which "hell from beneath is moved," Isa. xiv. 9, &c. While a saint can ask proud death, "Where is thy sting?" death will ask the proud sinner, Where is thy wealth, thy pomp? and the more he was fattened with prosperity, the more sweetly will death feed on him. And in the morning of the resurrection, when all that sleep in the dust shall awake, Dan. xii. 2, "the upright shall have dominion over them;" shall not only be advanced to the highest dignity and honour, when they are filled with everlasting shame and contempt,—elevated to the highest heavens, when they are sunk to the lowest hell,—but they shall be assessors with Christ in passing judgment upon them, and shall applaud the justice of God in their ruin. When the rich man in hell begged that Lazarus might bring him a drop of water to cool his tongue, he owned that that upright man had dominion over him; as the foolish virgins also owned the dominion of the wise, and that they lay much at their mercy when they begged, "Give us of your oil." Let this comfort us in reference to the oppressions which the upright are now often groaning under, and the dominion which the wicked have over them. The day is coming when the tables will be turned, Est. ix. 1; and "the upright will have the dominion." Let us now judge of things as they will appear at that day. But what will become of all the beauty of the wicked? Alas! that shall all be "consumed in the grave from their dwelling." All that upon which they valued themselves, and for which others caressed and admired them, it was all adventitious and borrowed; it was paint and varnish, and they will rise in their own native deformity. The beauty of holiness is that which the grave, that consumes all other beauty, cannot touch, or do any damage to. 'Their beauty shall consume; the grave,' or hell, 'being a habitation to every one of them;' and what beauty can be there where there is nothing but the blackness of darkness for ever?

15 But God will redeem my soul from the power of the grave:
For he shall receive me. Selah.
16 Be not thou afraid when one is made rich,
When the glory of his house is increased;
17 For when he dieth he shall carry nothing away:
His glory shall not descend after him.
18 Though while he lived he blessed his soul:
And men will praise thee, when thou doest well to thyself.
19 He shall go to the generation of his fathers;
They shall never see light.
20 Man that is in honour, and understandeth not,
Is like the beasts that perish.

Good reason is here given to good people,

First. Why they should not be afraid of death. There is no cause for that fear, if they have such a comfortable prospect as David here has of a happy state on the other side death, ver. 15. He had shewed, ver. 14, how miserable the dead are that die in their sins, here he shews how blessed the dead are that die in the Lord. The distinction of men's outward condition, how great a difference soever it makes in life, makes none at death; rich and poor meet in the grave. But the distinction of men's spiritual state, though in this life it makes a small difference, where all things come alike to all, yet at and after death it makes a very great one; "Now he is comforted, and thou art tormented." The righteous has hope in his death, so has David here hope in God concerning his soul. Note, The believing hopes of the soul's redemption from the grave, and reception to glory, are the great support and joy of the children of God in a dying hour. They hope,

1. That God will redeem their souls from the power of the grave; which includes, 1st. The preserving of the soul from going to the grave with the body. The grave has a power over the body, by virtue of the sentence, Gen. iii. 19; and it is cruel enough in executing that power, Cant. viii. 6; but it has no such power over the soul. It has power to silence, and imprison, and consume the body: but the soul then moves, and acts, and converseth more freely than ever, Rev. vi. 9, 10; it is immaterial and immortal. When death breaks the dark lantern, yet it doth not extinguish the candle that was pent up in it. 2nd. The reuniting of the soul and body at the resurrection. The soul is often put for the life: that indeed falls under the power of the grave for a time, but it shall at length be redeemed from it, when "mortality shall be swallowed up of life." The God of life, that was its Creator at first, can and will be its Redeemer at last. 3rd. The salvation of the soul from eternal ruin. God shall redeem my soul from the sheol of hell, the wrath to come, that pit of destruction into which the wicked shall be cast, ver. 14. It is great comfort to dying saints, that they shall not be hurt of the second death, Rev. ii. 11; and therefore the first death has no sting, and the grave no victory.

2. That he will receive them to himself. He redeems their souls, that he may receive them; Ps. xxxi. 5, "Into thy hands I commit my spirit, for thou hast redeemed it." He will receive them into his favour, will admit them into his kingdom, into the mansions that are prepared for them, Jno. xiv. 2, 3; those everlasting habitations, Lu. xvi. 9.

Secondly. Why they should not be afraid of the prosperity and power of wicked people in this world, which, as it is their pride and joy, so it has often been the envy, and grief, and terror of the righteous; which yet, all things considered, there is no reason for.

1. He supposeth the temptation very strong to envy the prosperity of sinners, and to be afraid that they will carry all before them with a high hand, and with their wealth and interest to run down religion and religious people; to be afraid that they will be found the truly happy people. For he supposeth, 1st. That they are made rich, and so are enabled to give law to all about them, and have every thing at command. Pecuniæ obedunt omnes et omnia,—'Every person and every thing obeys the commanding influence of money.' 2nd. That the glory of their house, from very small beginnings, is increased greatly; which naturally makes men haughty, insolent, and imperious, ver. 16. Thus they seem to be the favourites of Heaven, and therefore formidable. 3rd. That they are very easy and secure in themselves, and in their own minds; ver. 18, "In his lifetime he olessed his soul," that is, he thought himself a very happy man; and such a one as he would be, and a very good man, and such a one as he should be, because he prospered in the world. He blessed his soul, as that rich fool who said to his soul, Soul, take thine ease, and be not disturbed either with cares and fears about the world, or with the rebukes and admonitions of conscience; all is well, and will be well for ever. Note, First. It is of great consequence to us what that is in which we bless our souls, upon the score of which we think well of ourselves. Believers bless themselves in the God of truth, Isa. lxv. 16; and think themselves happy if he be theirs. Carnal people bless themselves in the wealth of the world, and think themselves happy if they have abundance of that. Secondly. There are many whose precious souls lie under God's curse, and yet they do themselves bless them. They applaud that in themselves which God condemns; and speak peace to themselves when God denounceth war against them. Yet this is not all. 4th. They are in good reputation among their neighbours; "Men will praise thee," and cry thee up, as having done well for thyself in raising such an estate and family. This is the sentiment of all the children of this world, that those do best for themselves that do most for their bodies, by heaping up riches, though nothing is done at the same time for the soul, nothing for eternity; and, accordingly, they "bless the covetous, whom the Lord abhors," Ps. x. 3. And if men were to be our judges it were our wisdom thus to recommend ourselves to their good opinion; but what will it avail us to be approved of men, if God condemn us? Dr. Hammond understands this of the good man here spoken to, for it is the second person, not of the wicked man spoken of; 'He in his lifetime blessed his soul, but thou shalt be praised for doing well unto thyself.' The worlding magnified himself, but thou, that dost not, like him, speak well of thyself, but do well for thyself in securing thy eternal welfare, thou shalt be praised, if not of men, yet of God, which will be thine everlasting honour.

2. He suggests that which is sufficient to take off the strength of the temptation, by directing us to look forward to the end of prospering sinners, Ps. lxxiii. 17. Think what they will be in the other world, and you will see no cause to envy them what they are and have in this world.

1st. In the other world they will be never the better for all the wealth and prosperity they are now so fond of. It is a miserable portion, which will not last so long as they must; ver. 17, "when he dies," it is taken for granted that he goes into another world himself, but "he shall carry nothing away with him" of that which he has been so long heaping up. The greatest and wealthiest cannot therefore be the happiest, because they are never the better for their living in this world; as they came naked into it, they shall go naked out of it. But those have something to shew in the other world for their living in this world, who can say through grace, that though they came corrupt and sinful, and spiritually naked into it, they go renewed and sanctified, and well clothed with the righteousness of Christ, out. They that are rich in the graces and comforts of the Spirit have something which when they die they shall carry away with them; something which death cannot strip them of, nay, which death will be the improvement of. But for worldly possessions, "as we brought nothing into the world," but what we have had from others, "so it is certain we shall carry nothing out," but leave it to others, 1 Tim. vi. 7. They shall descend; but "their glory," that which they called and counted their glory, and gloried in, "shall not descend after them," to lessen the disgrace of death and the grave; to bring them off in the judgment, or abate the torments of hell. Grace is glory that will ascend with us, but no earthly glory will descend after us.

2nd. In the other world they will be infinitely the worse for all their abuses of the wealth and prosperity they enjoyed in this world; ver. 19, "The soul shall go to the generation of his fathers," his worldly, wicked fathers, whose sayings he approved, and whose steps he trod in, his fathers that would not hearken to the word of God, Zec. i. 5. He shall go to be there where they are that shall never see light, shall never have the least glimpse of comfort and joy, being condemned to utter darkness. Be not afraid then of the pomp and power of wicked people; for "man that is in honour," if he be not wise and good, his end will be miserable; "if he understand not," he is to be pitied rather than envied. A fool, a wicked man in honour, is really as despicable an animal as any under the sun; he "is like the beasts that perish," ver. 20; and it is better be a beast than be a man that makes himself like a beast. Men in honour that understand, that know and do their duty, and make conscience of it, are as gods, and children of the Most High. But men in honour that understand not, that are proud, and sensual, and oppressive, are as beasts, and they shall perish like the beasts, ingloriously as to this world, though not like the beasts indemnified as to another world. Let prospering sinners, therefore, be afraid for themselves; but let not even suffering saints be afraid of them.

PSALM L.

This psalm, as the former, is a psalm of instruction, not of prayer or praise. It is a psalm of reproof and admonition, in singing of which we are to teach and admonish one another. In the foregoing psalm, after a general demand of attention, God by his prophet deals, ver. 3, with the children of this world, to convince them of their sin and folly in setting their hearts upon the wealth of this world. In this psalm, after a like preface, he deals with those that were in profession the church's children, to convince them of their sin and folly in placing their religion in ritual services, while they

For "folly," in verse 13, the Syriac and Greek have "stumbling-block," which is a probable correction.

xlix. 14. "Death shall feed on them" should rather be, "Death shall feed them," or pasture them; he will both provide for them and control them. The next clause, "The upright shall have dominion over them in the morning," whatever it may ultimately point to, signifies that the righteous will be exalted speedily above the wicked and worldly-minded rich men, whom they outlive. Correctly interpreted, the words rendered "in the morning" mean "speedily." The next clause, "And their beauty shall consume in the grave from their dwelling," has caused a good deal of trouble to expositors. We believe the true sense is, that "their form is to be consumed in the grave, where their dwelling is."

xlix. 18. "He blessed his soul;" i.e., he congratulated himself on his happy lot. The words "when thou doest well to thyself" signify "when thou art in prosperity."

neglected practical godliness; and this is as sure a way to ruin as the other. This psalm is intended, I. As a reproof to the carnal Jews, both those that rested in the external performances of their religion, and were remiss in the more excellent duties of prayer and praise, and those that expounded the law to others, but lived wicked lives themselves. II. As a prediction of the abolishing of the ceremonial law, and of the introducing of a spiritual way of worship in and by the kingdom of the Messiah, Jno. iv. 23, 24. III. As a representation of the day of judgment, in which God will call men to an account concerning their observance of those things which they have thus been taught. Men shall be judged according to what is written in the books; and therefore Christ is fitly represented speaking as a judge then when he speaks as a lawgiver. Here is, 1. The glorious appearance of the Prince that gives law and judgment, ver. 1—6; 2. Instruction given to his worshippers to turn their sacrifices into prayers, ver. 7—15; 3. A rebuke to those that pretend to worship God, but live in disobedience to his commands, ver. 16—20; their doom read, ver. 21, 22; and warning given to all to look to their conversation as well as to their devotions, ver. 23. And these instructions and admonitions we must take to ourselves, and give to one another, in singing this psalm.

A Psalm of Asaph.

THE mighty God, even the LORD, hath spoken,
And called the earth
From the rising of the sun unto the going down thereof.
2 Out of Zion, the perfection of beauty,
God hath shined.
3 Our God shall come, and shall not keep silence:
A fire shall devour before him,
And it shall be very tempestuous round about him.
4 He shall call to the heavens from above,
And to the earth, that he may judge his people.
5 Gather my saints together unto me;
Those that have made a covenant with me by sacrifice.
6 And the heavens shall declare his righteousness:
For God is judge himself. Selah.

It is probable Asaph was not only the chief musician that was to put a tune to this psalm, but was himself the penman of it; for we read that in Hezekiah's time "they praised God with the words of David, and of Asaph the seer," 2 Chr. xxix. 30. Here is,

First. The court called in the name of the King of kings; ver. 1, "The mighty God, even the Lord, hath spoken;" El, Elohim, Jehovah, the God of infinite power, justice, and mercy, Father, Son, and Holy Ghost. God is the judge, the Son of God came for judgment into the world, and the Holy Ghost is the Spirit of judgment. All the earth is called to attend, not only because the controversy God had with his people Israel for their hypocrisy and ingratitude may safely be referred to any man of reason, (nay, let the house of Israel itself judge between God and his vineyard, Isa. v. 3,) but because all the children of men are concerned to know the right way of worshipping God, in spirit and in truth, and when the kingdom of the Messiah should be set up, all should be instructed in the evangelical worship, and invited to join in it: see Mal. i. 11; Acts x. 34; and because, in the day of final judgment, all nations shall be gathered together to receive their doom, and every man shall give account of himself unto God.

Secondly. The judgment set, and the Judge taking his seat. As when God gave the law to Israel in the wilderness, it is said, "He came from Sinai, and rose up from Seir, and shined forth from mount Paran, and came with ten thousands of his saints, and then from his right hand went a fiery law," Deu. xxxiii. 2; so, with allusion to that, when God comes to reprove them for their hypocrisy, and to send forth his Gospel to supersede the legal institutions, it is said here, 1. That he shall shine out of Zion, as then from the top of Sinai, ver. 2. Because in Zion his oracle was now fixed, thence his judgments upon that provoking people were denounced, and thence the orders issued for the execution of them, Joel ii. 1, "Blow ye the trumpet in Zion," (sometimes there are more than ordinary appearances of God's presence and power working with and by his word and ordinances, for the convincing of men's consciences, and the reforming and refining of his church, and then God, who always dwells in Zion, may be said to shine out of Zion,) and because the Gospel, which set up spiritual worship, was to go forth from mount Zion, Isa. ii. 4; Mic. iv. 1; and the preachers of it were to begin at Jerusalem, Lu. xxiv. 47; and Christians are said to come unto mount Zion to receive their instructions, Heb. xii. 22, 28. Zion is here called the perfection of beauty, because it was the holy hill, and holiness is indeed the perfection of beauty. 2. That he shall come and not keep silence, shall no longer seem to wink at the sins of men as he had done, ver. 21, but shall shew his displeasure at them, and shall also cause that mystery to be published to the world by his holy apostles, which had long lain hid, that the Gentiles should be fellow-heirs, Eph. iii. 5, 6, and that the partition wall of the ceremonial law should be taken down; this shall now no longer be concealed. In the great day "our God shall come, and shall not keep silence," but shall make those to hear his judgment that would not hearken to his law. 3. That his appearance should be very majestic and terrible; "a fire shall devour before him." The fire of his judgments shall make way for the rebukes of his word, in order to the awakening of the hypocritical nation of the Jews, that the sinners in Zion, being afraid of that devouring fire, (Isa. xxxiii. 14,) they might be startled out of their sins. When his gospel kingdom was to be set up, Christ came to send fire on the earth, Lu. xii. 44. And the Spirit was given in cloven tongues as of fire, introduced by a rushing mighty wind, which was very tempestuous, Acts ii. 2, 3. And in the last judgment, Christ shall come in flaming fire, 2 Thes. i. 8; see Dan. vii. 9; Heb. x. 27. 4. That as on mount Sinai he came with ten thousands of his saints, so he shall now call to the heavens from above, to take notice of this solemn process, ver. 4, as Moses often called heaven and earth to witness against Israel, Deu. iv. 26; xxxi. 28; xxxii. 1; and God by his prophets, Isa. i. 2; Mic. vi. 2. And the equity of the judgment of the great day will be attested and applauded by heaven and earth, by saints and angels, even all the holy myriads.

Thirdly. The parties summoned: ver. 5, "Gather my saints together unto me." This may be understood either, 1. Of saints indeed. Let them be gathered to God through Christ; let the few pious Israelites be set by themselves, for to them the following denunciations of wrath do not belong. Rebukes to hypocrites ought not to be terrors to the upright. When God will reject the services of those that only offered sacrifice, resting in the outside of the performance, he will graciously accept those that in sacrificing make a covenant with him, and so attend to, and answer the end of, the institution of sacrifices. The design of the preaching of the Gospel, and the setting up of Christ's kingdom, was to gather together in one the children of God, Jno. xi. 52; and at the second coming of Jesus Christ all his saints shall be gathered together unto him, 2 Thes. ii. 1, to be assessors with him in the judgment: for the saints shall judge the world, 1 Cor. vi. 2. Now it is here given as a character of the saints, that they have made a covenant with God by sacrifice. Note. 1st. Those only shall be gathered to God as his saints who have in sincerity covenanted with him, who have taken him to be their God, and given up themselves to him to be his people, and thus have joined themselves unto the Lord. 2nd. It is only by sacrifice, by Christ the great sacrifice, (from whom all the legal sacrifices derived what value they had,) that we poor sinners can covenant with God so as to be accepted of him. There must be an atonement made for the breach of the first covenant before we can be admitted again into covenant. Or, 2. It may be understood of saints in profession, such as the people of Israel were, who are called a kingdom of priests, and a holy nation, Ex. xix. 6. They were, as a body politic, taken into covenant with God, the covenant of peculiarity; and it was done with great solemnity by sacrifice, Ex. xxiv. 8. Let them come and hear what God hath to say to them; let them receive the reproofs God sends them now by his prophets, and the Gospel he will in due time send them by his Son, which shall supersede the ceremonial law. And if these be slighted let them expect to hear from God another way, and to be judged by that word which they will not be ruled by.

Fourthly. The issue of this solemn trial foretold; ver. 6, "The heavens shall declare his righteousness;" those heavens that were called to be witnesses to the trial, ver. 4. The "people in heaven shall say, Hallelujah; true and righteous are his judgments," Rev. xix. 1, 2. The righteousness of God in all the rebukes of his word and providence, in the establishment of his Gospel, (which brings in an everlasting righteousness, and in which the righteousness of God is revealed,) and especially in the judgment of the great day, is what the heavens will declare; that is, 1. It will be universally known, and proclaimed to all the world. As the heavens declare the glory, the wisdom, and power of God the Creator, Ps. xix. 1, so they shall no less openly declare the glory, the justice, and righteousness of God the Judge. And so loud do they proclaim both, that "there is no speech nor language where their voice is not heard," as it follows there, ver. 3. 2. It will be incontestably owned and proved. Who can deny what the heavens declare? Even sinners' own consciences will subscribe to it, and hell as well as heaven will be forced to acknowledge the righteousness of God. The reason given is, for "God is judge himself," and therefore, 1st. He will be just; for it is impossible he should do any wrong to any of his creatures; he never did, nor ever will. When men are employed to judge for him, it is possible they may do unjustly; but when He is judge himself there can be no injustice done. "Is God unrighteous, who taketh vengeance?" The apostle for this reason startles at the thought of it: "God forbid! for then how shall God judge the world?" Rom. iii. 5, 6. These decisions will be perfectly just, for against them there will lie no exception, and from them there will lie no appeal. He will be justified. God is judge, and therefore he will not only execute justice, but he will oblige all to own it; for he will be clear when he judgeth, Ps. li. 4.

7 Hear, O my people, and I will speak;
O Israel, and I will testify against thee:
I am God, even thy God.
8 I will not reprove thee for thy sacrifices
Or thy burnt offerings, to have been continually before me.
9 I will take no bullock out of thy house,
Nor he goats out of thy folds.
10 For every beast of the forest is mine,
And the cattle upon a thousand hills.
11 I know all the fowls of the mountains:
And the wild beasts of the field are mine.
12 If I were hungry, I would not tell thee:
For the world is mine, and the fulness thereof.
13 Will I eat the flesh of bulls,
Or drink the blood of goats?
14 Offer unto God thanksgiving;
And pay thy vows unto the most High:
15 And call upon me in the day of trouble:
I will deliver thee, and thou shalt glorify me.

God is here dealing with those that placed all their religion in the observances of the ceremonial law, and thought those sufficient.

First. He lays down the original contract between him and Israel, in which they had avouched him to be their God, and he them to be his people, and so both parties were agreed: ver. 7, "Hear, O my people, and I will speak." Note. It is justly expected that whatever others do, when he speaks, his people should give ear; who will if they do not? and then we may comfortably expect that God will speak to us when we are ready to hear what he saith. Even when he testifies against us in the rebukes and threatenings of his word and providences, we must be forward to hear what he saith, to hear even "the rod and him that has appointed it."

Secondly. He puts a slight upon the legal sacrifices, ver. 8, &c. Now,

1. This may be considered as looking back to the use of these under the law. God had a controversy with the Jews; but what was the ground of the controversy? Not their neglect of the ceremonial institutions; no, they had not been wanting in the observance of them, their burnt offerings had been continually before God, they took a pride in them, and hoped by their offerings to procure a dispensation for their lusts, as the adulterous woman, Pr. vii. 14. Their constant sacrifices they thought would both expiate and excuse their neglect of the weightier matters of the law. Nay, if they had in some degree neglected these institutions, yet that should not have been the cause of God's quarrel with them, for it was but a small offence in comparison with the immoralities of their conversation. They thought God was mightily beholden to them for the many sacrifices they had brought to his altar, and that they had made him very much their debtor by them, as if he could not have maintained his numerous family of priests without their contributions. But God here shews them the contrary: 1st. That he did not need their sacrifices. What occasion had he for their bullocks and goats, that has the command of all the beasts of the forest, and the cattle upon a thousand hills? ver. 9, 10; has an incontestable propriety in them, and dominion over them; has them all always under his eye, and within his reach, and can make what use he pleaseth of them? They all wait on him, and are all at his dispose, Ps. civ. 27—29. Can we add any thing to his store, whose all the wild fowl and wild beasts are, the world itself, and the fulness thereof? ver. 11, 12. God's infinite self-sufficiency proves our utter insufficiency to add any thing to him. 2nd. That he could not be benefited by their sacrifices. Their goodness of this kind could not possibly extend unto him; neither if they were in this matter righteous was he the better; ver. 13, "Will I eat the flesh of bulls?" It is as absurd to think that their sacrifices could of themselves, and by virtue of any innate excellency in them, add any pleasure or praise to God, as it would be to imagine that an infinite Spirit could be supported by meat and drink as our bodies are. It is said, indeed, of the dæmons whom the Gentiles worshipped, that they did "eat the fat of their sacrifices, and drink the wine of their drink offerings," Deu. xxxii. 38; they regaled themselves in the homage they robbed the true God of. But will the great Jehovah be thus entertained? No; "to obey is better than sacrifice," and to love God and our neighbour better than all burnt offerings; so much better, that God, by his prophets, often told them that their sacrifices were not only not acceptable, but abominable to him while they lived in sin. Instead of pleasing him he looked upon them as a mockery, and therefore an affront and provocation to him: see Pr. xv. 8; Isa. i. 11, &c.; lxvi. 3; Jer. vi. 20; Am. v. 21. They are, therefore, here warned not to rest in these performances; but to carry themselves in all other instances towards God as their God.

1. Title. This psalm is the first ascribed to Asaph. Eleven others bear his name. He was one of the Kohathites in David's time, as we learn from 1 Chron. xv. 17. See also 1 Chron. xxv. 1; 2 Chron. xxix. 30. The title in the Syriac is, "Ascribed to Asaph the prophet: because of the legal sacrifices of the covenant of Moses, and of their abolition. As for us, he warns us that if we do not his commandments, it will be our lot to be reprobates before him, because we have despised the spiritual Scriptures."

1. 1. The opening titles of the Divine Being are better untranslated: "El, Elohim, Jehovah hath spoken." So in Josh. xxii. 22, the original should be left: "El, Elohim, Jehovah; El, Elohim, Jehovah, he knoweth."

1. 2. Our version is more correct than the Syriac, "From Zion, a glorious crown, God hath appeared;" and it is preferable to the Septuagint, which the Latin follows, "From Zion the loveliness of his beauty. (3) God shall manifestly come, our God," &c.

2. This may be considered as looking forward to the abolishing of these by the Gospel of Christ: thus Dr. Hammond understands it. When God shall set up the kingdom of the Messiah he shall abolish the old way of worship by sacrifice and offerings; he will no more have those to be continually before him, ver. 8; he will no more require of his worshippers to bring him their bullocks and their goats to be burnt upon his altar, ver. 9. For, indeed, he never appointed this as that which he had any need of, or took any pleasure in; for, besides that all we have is his already, he has far more beasts in the forest, and upon the mountains, which we know nothing of, nor have any property in, than we have in our folds; but he instituted it to prefigure the great sacrifice which his own Son should in the fulness of time offer upon the cross, to make atonement for sin, and all the other spiritual sacrifices of acknowledgment with which God through Christ will be well pleased.

Thirdly. He directs to the best sacrifices of prayer and praise, as those which under the law were preferred before all burnt offerings and sacrifices, and on which then the greatest stress was laid, and which now under the Gospel come in the room of those carnal ordinances which were imposed until the times of reformation. He sheweth us here, ver. 14, 15, what is good, and what the Lord our God requires of us, and will accept, when sacrifices are slighted and superseded. 1. We must make a penitent acknowledgment of our sins; offer to God confession, so some read it, and understand it of the confession of sin, in order to our giving glory to God, and taking shame to ourselves, that we may never return to it. A broken and contrite heart is the sacrifice which God will not despise, Ps. li. 17. If the sin were not abandoned, the sin offering was not accepted. 2. We must give God thanks for his mercies to us; "offer to God thanksgiving" every day, often every day, "Seven times a day will I praise thee," and upon special occasions; and "this shall please the Lord," if it come from an humble, thankful heart, full of love to him, and joy in him, "better than an ox or bullock that has horns and hoofs," Ps. lxix. 30, 31. 3. We must make conscience of performing our covenants with him. "Pay thy vows to the Most High," forsake thy sins, and do thy duty better, pursuant to the solemn promises thou hast made him to that purpose. When we give God thanks for any mercy we have received, we must be sure to pay the vows we made to him when we were in the pursuit of the mercy, else our thanksgivings will not be accepted. Dr. Hammond applies this to the great gospel ordinance of the eucharist, in which we are to give thanks to God for his great love in sending his Son to save us, and to pay our vows of love and duty to him, and to give alms. Instead of all the Old Testament types of a Christ to come, we have that blessed memorial of a Christ already come. 4. In the day of distress, we must apply ourselves to God by faithful and fervent prayer; ver. 15, "Call upon me in the day of trouble," and not upon any other God. Our troubles, though we see them coming from God's hand, must drive us to him, and not drive us from him. We must thus acknowledge him in all our ways, depend upon his wisdom, power, and goodness, and refer ourselves entirely to him, and so give him glory. This is a cheaper, easier, readier way of seeking his favour than by a peace offering, and yet more acceptable. 5. When he, in answer to our prayers, delivers us, as he has promised to do in such way and time as he shall think fit, we must glorify him, not only by a grateful mention of his favour, but by living to his praise. Thus must we keep up our communion with God, meeting him with our prayers when he afflicts us, and with our praises when he delivers us.

16 But unto the wicked God saith,
What hast thou to do to declare my statutes,
Or that thou shouldest take my covenant in thy mouth?

And castest my words behind thee. [him,

And hast been partaker with adulterers.
19 Thou givest thy mouth to evil,
And thy tongue frameth deceit.
20 Thou sittest and speakest against thy brother;
Thou slanderest thine own mother's son.
21 These things hast thou done, and I kept silence;
Thou thoughtest that I was altogether such an one as God, by the psalmist, having instructed his people in the right way of worshipping him, and keeping up their communion with him, here directs his speech to the wicked, to hypocrites, whether they were such as professed the Jewish or the Christian religion. Hypocrisy is wickedness, for which God will judge. Observe here,

First. The charge drawn up against them.

1. They are charged with invading and usurping the honours and privileges of religion; ver. 16, "What hast thou to do," O wicked man, "to declare my statutes?" This is a challenge to those that are really profane, but seemingly godly, to shew what title they have to the cloak of religion, and by what authority they wear it, when they use it only to cover and conceal the abominable impieties of their hearts and lives; let them make out their claim to it if they can. Some think it points prophetically at the scribes and Pharisees, that were the teachers and leaders of the Jewish church, at the time when the kingdom of the Messiah, and that evangelical way of worship spoken of in the foregoing verses, were to be set up. They violently opposed that great revolution, and used all the power and interest which they had, by sitting in Moses' seat, to hinder it. But the account which our blessed Saviour gives of them, Mat. xxiii., and St. Paul, Rom. ii. 21, 22, makes this expostulation here agree very well to them. They took on them to declare God's statutes, but they hated Christ's instruction, and therefore what had they to do to expound the law who reject the Gospel? But it is applicable to all those that are practisers of iniquity, and yet professors of piety, especially if withal they be preachers of it. Note, It is very absurd in itself, and a great affront to the God of heaven, for those that are wicked and ungodly to declare his statutes, and to take his covenant in their mouths. It is very possible, and too common, for those that declare God's statutes to others to live in disobedience to them themselves; and for those that take God's covenant in their mouths yet in their hearts to continue their covenant with sin and death. But they are guilty of an usurpation; they take to themselves an honour which they have no title to; and there is a day coming when they will be thrust out as intruders. "Friend, how camest thou in hither?"

2. They are charged with transgressing and violating the laws and precepts of religion. 1st. They are charged with a daring contempt of the Word of God; ver. 17, "Thou hatest instruction." They loved to give instruction, and to tell others what they should do; for this fed their pride, and made them look great, and by this craft they got their living. But they hated to receive instruction from God himself; for that would be a check upon them, and a mortification to them: Thou hatest discipline, the reproofs of the Word, and the rebukes of Providence. Those that hate to be reformed, no wonder they hate the means of reformation; "Thou castest my words behind thee." They seemed to set God's words before them, when they sat in Moses' seat, and undertook to teach others out of the law, Rom. ii. 19; but in their conversations they cast God's word behind them, and did not care for seeing that rule which they were resolved not to be ruled by. This is despising the commandment of the Lord. 2nd. A close confederacy with the worst of sinners; ver. 18, "When thou sawest a thief," instead of reproving him, and witnessing against him, as those should do that declare God's statutes, "thou consentedst with him," didst approve of his practices, and desire to come in partner with him, and to share in the profits of his cursed trade. And "thou hast been partakers with adulterers;" hast done as they do, and encouraged them to go on in their wicked courses; hast done these things, and hast had pleasure in them that do them, Rom. i. 32. 3rd. A constant persisting in the worst of tongue sins; ver. 19, "Thou givest thy mouth to evil;" not only allowest thyself in, but addictest thyself wholly to, all manner of evil speaking. First. Lying; "Thy tongue frameth deceit," which notes contrivance and deliberation in lying. It knits or links deceit, so some. One lie begets another, and one fraud requires another to cover it. Secondly. Slandering; ver. 20, "Thou sittest and speakest against thy brother;" dost basely abuse and misrepresent him; magisterially judge and censure him, and pass sentence upon him, as if thou wert his master, to whom he must stand or fall; whereas he is thy brother, as good as thou art, and upon the level with thee, for he is "thy own mother's son." He is thy near relation, whom thou oughtest to love, to vindicate, and stand up for, if others abused him; yet thou dost thyself abuse him, whose faults thou oughtest to cover, and make the best of. If really he had done amiss, yet thou dost most falsely and unjustly charge him with that which he is innocent of; thou sittest and dost this, as a judge upon the bench with authority; thou sittest in the seat of the scornful, to deride and backbite those whom thou oughtest to respect and be kind to. Those that do ill themselves commonly delight in speaking ill of others.

Secondly. The proof of this charge; ver. 21, "These things thou hast done." The fact is too plain to be denied, the fault too bad to be excused; "These things" God knows, and thy own heart knows, "thou hast done." The sins of sinners will be proved upon them beyond contradiction, in the judgment of the great day. "I will reprove thee," or convince thee, so that thou shalt have not one word to say for thyself. The day is coming when impenitent sinners will have their mouths for ever stopped, and be struck speechless. What confusion will they be filled with when God shall set their sins in order before their eyes. They would not see their sins to their humiliation, but cast them behind their backs,—covered them, and endeavoured to forget them; nor would they suffer their own consciences to put them in mind of them; but the day is coming when God will make them see their sins to the everlasting shame and terror. He will set them in order:—original sin; actual sins; sins against the law; sins against the Gospel; against the first table, against the second table; sins of childhood and youth, of riper age and old age. He will set them in order, as the witnesses are set in order, and called in order against the criminal, and asked what they have to say against him.

Thirdly. The judge's patience, and the sinner's abuse of that patience. "I kept silence," did not give thee any disturbance in thy sinful way, but let thee alone to take thy course. Sentence against thine evil works was respited, and not executed speedily. Note, The patience of God is very great towards provoking sinners. He sees their sins, and hates them. It would be neither difficulty nor damage to him to punish them, and yet he waits to be gracious, and gives them space to repent, that he may render them inexcusable if they repent not. His patience is the more wonderful because the sinner makes such an ill use of it; "Thou thoughtest that I was altogether such a one as thyself," as weak and forgetful as thyself, as false to my word as thyself; nay, as much a friend to sin as thyself. Sinners take God's silence for consent, and his patience for connivance, and therefore the longer they are reprieved the more are their hearts hardened; but if they turn not they shall be made to see their error when it is too late, and that the God they provoke is just, and holy, and terrible, and not such a one as themselves.

Fourthly. The fair warning given of the dreadful doom of hypocrites; ver. 22, "Now consider this, ye that forget God." Consider that God knows and keeps account of all your sins, that he will call you to an account for them; that patience abused will turn into the greater wrath; that though you forget God, and your duty to him, he will not forget you and your rebellions against him. Consider this in time, before it be too late; for if these things be not considered, and the consideration of them improved, he will "tear you in pieces, and there will be none to deliver." It is the doom of hypocrites to be cut in sunder,

l. 8. Translate literally, "Not because of thy sacrifices will I rebuke thee, and thy burnt-offerings before me continually;" that is, sacrifices are a secondary matter compared with the inner principles of religion and morals; therefore, sacrifices are passed over in this rebuke, and Israel is reproved for sinning in reference to something much greater and more important.

l. 10. For "the cattle upon a thousand hills," the Syriac is, "the cattle that are on the mountains, and the bullocks." The Greek and Latin are similar. Others explain, "the cattle upon the hills by thousands;" but our version is best.

li. Title. This title is considered erroneous by some distinguished critics, who believe the psalm was written after the captivity; so Kennicott, Horsley, De Wette, Paulus, and others, relying chiefly on the closing verses. But the prevailing opinion in ancient and modern times has been in favour of the historic accuracy of the title.

li. 4. The words "thee only" intimate that, as compared with

Mat. xxiv. 21. Note, 1. Forgetfulness of God is at the bottom of all the wickedness of the wicked. They that know God, and yet do not obey him, do certainly forget him. 2. Those that forget God forget themselves; and it will be never right with them till they consider, and so recover themselves. Consideration is the first step towards conversion. 3. Those that will not consider the warnings of God's word will certainly be torn in pieces by the executions of his wrath. 4. When God comes to tear sinners in pieces, there is no delivering them out of his hand. They cannot deliver themselves, nor can any friend they have in the world deliver them.

Fifthly. Full instructions given to us all how to prevent this fearful doom. Let us hear the conclusion of the whole matter, (we have it ver. 23,) which directs us what to do that we may attain our chief end.

1. Man's chief end is to glorify God, and we are here told that whoso offers praise glorifies him; whether he be Jew or Gentile, those spiritual sacrifices shall be accepted of him. We must praise God, and we must sacrifice praise; direct it to God, as every sacrifice was; put it into the hands of the priest, our Lord Jesus, who is also the altar; see that it be made by fire, sacred fire; that it be kindled with the flame of holy and devout affection: we must be fervent in spirit, praising the Lord. And this he is pleased in infinite condescension to interpret as the glorifying him. Hereby we give him the glory due to his name, and do what we can to advance the interests of his kingdom among men.

2. Man's chief end, in conjunction with this, is to enjoy God. And we are here told that those who order their conversation aright shall see his salvation. 1st. It is not enough for us to offer praise, but we must withal order our conversation aright. Thanksgiving is good, but thanksliving is better. 2nd. Those that would have their conversation right must take care and pains to order it; to dispose it according to rule; to understand their way, and to direct it. 3rd. Those that take care of their conversation make sure their salvation. Them God will make to see his salvation; for it is a salvation ready to be revealed. He will make them to see it, and enjoy it; to see it, and to see themselves happy for ever in it. Note, The right ordering of the conversation is the only way, and it is a sure way, to obtain the great salvation.

PSALM LI.

Though David penned this psalm upon a very particular occasion, yet it is of as general use as any of David's psalms. It is the most eminent of the penitential psalms, and most expressive of the cares and desires of a repenting sinner. It is a pity indeed that in our devout addresses to God we should have anything else to do but to praise God, for that is the work of heaven; but we make other work for ourselves by our own sins and follies. We must come to the throne of grace, in the posture of penitents, to confess our sins, and sue for the grace of God, and if therein we would take with us words, we can nowhere find any more apposite than in this psalm, which is the record of David's repentance for his sin in the matter of Uriah, which was the greatest blemish upon his character; all the rest of his faults were nothing to this. It is said of him, 1 Kin. xv. 5, that "he turned not aside from the commandment of the Lord all the days of his life, save only in the matter of Uriah the Hittite." In this psalm, I. He confesseth his sin, ver. 3—6. II. He prays earnestly for the pardon of his sin, ver. 1, 2, 7, 8. III. For peace of conscience, ver. 8, 12. IV. For grace, to go and sin no more, ver. 10, 11, 14. V. For liberty of access to God, ver. 15. VI. He promiseth to do what he could for the good of the souls of others, ver. 13; and for the glory of God, ver. 16, 17, 19; and, lastly, concludes with a prayer for Zion and Jerusalem, ver. 18. Those whose consciences charge them with any gross sin should, with a believing regard to Jesus Christ, the Mediator, again and again pray over this psalm; nay, though we have not been guilty of adultery and murder, or any the like enormous crime, yet in singing it, and praying over it, we may very sensibly apply it all to ourselves, which if we do with suitable affections, we shall, through Christ, find mercy to pardon, and grace for seasonable help.

To the chief Musician, A Psalm of David, when Nathan the prophet came unto him, after he had gone in to Bath-sheba.

HAVE mercy upon me, O God,
According to thy lovingkindness:
According unto the multitude of thy tender mercies
Blot out my transgressions.
2 Wash me throughly from mine iniquity,
And cleanse me from my sin.
3 For I acknowledge my transgressions:
And my sin is ever before me.
4 Against thee, thee only, have I sinned,
And done this evil in thy sight:
That thou mightest be justified when thou speakest,
And be clear when thou judgest.
5 Behold, I was shapen in iniquity;
And in sin did my mother conceive me.
6 Behold, thou desirest truth in the inward parts:
And in the hidden part thou shalt make me to know wisdom.

The title has reference to a very sad story, that of David's fall. But though he fell he was not utterly cast down, for God graciously upheld him, and raised him up. 1. This sin, which in this psalm he laments, was the folly and wickedness he committed with his neghbour's wife; a sin not to be spoken of, or thought of, without detestation. His debauching Bathsheba was the inlet to all the other sins that followed; it was as the letting forth of water. This sin of David's is recorded for warning to all, that he that thinks he stands may take heed lest he fall. 2. The repentance in this psalm he expresseth he was brought to by the ministry of Nathan, who was sent of God to convince him of his sin, after he had continued about nine months (for aught appears) without any particular expressions of remorse and sorrow for it. But though God may suffer his people to fall into sin, and to lie a great while in it, yet he will by some means or other recover them to repentance, bring them to himself, and to their right mind again. Herein ordinarily he useth the ministry of the word, which yet he is not tied to. But those that have been overtaken in any fault ought to reckon a faithful reproof the greatest kindness that can be done them, and a wise reprover their best friend. "Let the righteous smite me, and it shall be excellent oil." 3. David being convinced of his sin, poured out his soul to God in prayer for mercy and grace. Whither should backsliding children return, but to the Lord their God, from whom they have backslidden, and who alone can heal their backslidings? 4. What were the workings of his heart towards God upon this occasion by Divine inspiration he drew up into a psalm, that it might be often repeated, and long after reviewed; and this he committed to the chief musician, to be sung in the public service of the church, 1st. As a profession of his own repentance, which he would have to be generally taken notice of, his sin having been notorious, that the plaister might be as wide as the wound. Those that truly repent of their sins will not be ashamed to own their repentance; but, having lost the honour of innocents, will rather covet the honour of penitents. 2nd. As a pattern to others, both to bring them to repentance by his example, and to instruct them in their repentance what to do, and what to say. Being converted himself, he thus strengthens his brethren, Lu. xxii. 32, and for this cause he obtained mercy, 1 Tim. i. 16. In these words we have,

First. David's humble petition, ver. 1, 2. His prayer is much the same with that which our Saviour puts into the mouth of his penitent publican in the parable, "God be merciful to me a sinner," Lu. xviii. 13. David was upon many accounts a man of great merit; he had not only done much, but suffered much in the cause of God; and yet, when he is convinced of sin, he doth not offer to balance his evil deeds with his good deeds, nor can he think that his services will atone for his offences; but he flies to God's infinite mercy, and depends upon that only for pardon and peace. "Have mercy upon me, O God." He owns himself obnoxious to God's justice, and therefore casts himself upon his mercy; and it is certain the best man in the world is undone if God be not merciful to him. Observe,

1. What his plea is for this mercy. "Have mercy upon me, O God," not according to the dignity of my birth, as descended from the prince of the tribe of Judah, not according to my public services as Israel's champion, or my public honours as Israel's king. His plea is not, "Lord, remember David in all his afflictions, how he vowed to build a place for the ark," Ps. cxxxii. 1, 2, a true penitent will make no mention of any such thing; but, Have mercy upon me for mercy sake. I have nothing to plead with thee but, 1st. The freeness of thy mercy, "according to thy lovingkindness," thy clemency, the goodness of thy nature, which inclines thee to pity the miserable. 2nd. The fulness of thy mercy. There is in thee not only lovingkindness and tender mercies, but abundance of it, a multitude of tender mercies for the forgiveness of many sinners, of many sins; to multiply pardons as we multiply transgressions.

2. What is the particular mercy he begs. The pardon of sin; "Blot out my transgressions," as a debt is blotted or crossed out of the book, when either the debtor has paid it or the creditor has remitted it; wipe out my transgressions, that they may not appear to demand judgment against me, nor stare me in the face to my confusion and terror. The blood of Christ, sprinkled upon the conscience to purify and pacify that, blots out the transgression, and being reconciled to God reconciles us to ourselves; ver. 2, "Wash me throughly from mine iniquity;" wash my soul from the guilt and stain of my sin by thy mercy and grace, for it is only from a ceremonial pollution that the water of separation will avail to cleanse me. Multiply to wash me; the stain is deep, for I have lain long soaking in the guilt, so that it will not easily be got out. O wash me much, wash me throughly; "Cleanse me from my sin." Sin defiles us, renders us odious in the sight of the holy God, and uneasy to ourselves; it disfits us for communion with God in grace or glory. When God pardons sin, he cleanseth us from it, so that we become acceptable to him, easy to ourselves, and have liberty of access to him. Nathan had assured David, upon his first profession of repentance, that his sin was pardoned, "The Lord has taken away thy sin, thou shalt not die," 2 Sam. xii. 13; yet he prays, "Wash me, cleanse me, blot out my transgressions;" for God will be sought unto, even for that which he has promised; and those whose sins are pardoned must pray that the pardon may be more and more cleared up to them. God hath forgiven him, but he could not forgive himself, and therefore he is thus importunate for pardon, as one that thought himself unworthy of it, and knew how to value it.

Secondly. David's penitential confessions, ver. 3—5. 1. He was very free to own his guilt before God; "I acknowledge my transgressions." This he had formerly found the only way of easing his conscience, Ps. xxxii. 4, 5. Nathan said, "Thou art the man." And so I am, saith David, "I have sinned." 2. He had such a deep sense of it, that he was continually thinking of it with sorrow and shame. His contrition for his sin was not a slight, sudden passion, but an abiding grief: "My sin is ever before me," to humble me and mortify me, and make me continually blush and tremble. It is ever against me, so some; I see it before me as an enemy, accusing and threatening me. David was upon all occasions put in mind of his sin, and was willing to be so for his farther abasement. He never walked on the roof of his house without a penitent reflection on his unhappy walk there, when from thence he saw Bathsheba; never lay down to sleep without a sorrowful thought of the bed of his uncleanness; never sat down to meat, never sent his servant on an errand, or took his pen in hand, but it put him in mind of his making Uriah drunk, the treacherous message he sent him, and the fatal warrant he wrote and signed for his execution. Note, The acts of repentance, even for the same sin, must be often repeated. It will be of good use for us to have our sins ever before us, that by the remembrance of our past sins we may be kept humble, may be armed against temptation, quickened to duty, and made patient under the cross.

1st. He confesseth his actual transgressions; ver. 4, "Against thee, thee only have I sinned." David was a very great man, and yet, having done amiss, submits to the discipline of a penitent, and thinks not his royal dignity will excuse him from it. Rich and poor must here meet together; there is one law of repentance for both; the greatest must be judged shortly, and therefore must judge themselves now. David was a very good man, and yet, having sinned, he willingly accommodates himself to the place and posture of a penitent. The best men, if they sin, should give the best example of repentance.

First. His confession is particular; "I have done this evil," this that I am now reproved for, this that my own conscience now upbraids me with. Note, It is good to be particular in the confession of sin, that we may be the more express in praying for pardon, and so may have the more comfort in it. We ought to reflect upon the particular heads of our sins of infirmity, and the particular circumstances of our gross sins.

Secondly. He aggravates the sin which he confesseth, and laid load upon himself for it; "Against thee, and in thy sight." Hence our Saviour seems to borrow the confession which in the parable he puts into the mouth of the returning prodigal; "I have sinned against heaven and before thee," Lu. xv. 18. Two things David laments in his sin: 1*st.* That it was committed against God. To him the affront is given, and he is the party wronged. It is his truth that by wilful sin we deny; his conduct that we despise; his command that we disobey; his promise that we distrust; his name that we dishonour; and it is with him that we deal deceitfully and disingenuously. From this topic Joseph fetched the great argument against sin, Gen. xxxix. 9, and David here the great aggravation of it; "Against thee only." Some make this to speak the prerogative of his crown, that as a king he was not accountable to any but God; but it is more agreeable to his present temper to suppose that it speaks the deep contrition of his soul for his sin, and that it was upon right grounds. He here offences against God, offences against man are as nothing; they remind us too that all sin is against God.

li. 5. Aristotle maintained that by nature we were born altogether without moral virtues. The psalmist teaches that man's very constitution is depraved and sinful.

li. 7. The reference here is to the Mosaic law for the ceremonial cleansing of one who has been a leper, the details of which are set out in Lev. xiv. The priest was to take the hyssop and other things enumerated there, to dip them into the blood of a bird, and to sprinkle the leper with the blood. A house was cleansed in a similar manner. Hyssop was also employed on certain other occasions, as at the Passover, for sprinkling the lintel and side-posts of the doorway with the blood of the lamb; and in preparing the water of separation: Ex. xii. 22; Num. xix. 6. But it is greatly disputed what plant was the hyssop of the Old Testament. The Hebrew name resembles our own, which is from the Greek. Dr.

sinned against Bathsheba and Uriah; against his own soul and body, and family; against his kingdom, and against the church of God, and all this helped to humble him; but none of these were sinned against so as God was; and therefore this he lays the most sorrowful accent upon, "Against thee only have I sinned." 2nd. That it was committed in God's sight. This not only proves it upon me, but renders it exceeding sinful. This should greatly humble us for all our sins, that they have been committed under the eye of God, which argues either a disbelief of his omniscience or a contempt of his justice.

Thirdly. He justifies God in the sentence past upon him, for that "the sword should never depart from his house," 2 Sam. xii. 10, 11. He is very forward to own his sin, and aggravate it, not only that he might obtain the pardon of it himself, but that by his confession he might give honour to God. 1st. That God might be justified in the threatenings he had spoken by Nathan. Lord, I have nothing to say against the justice of them; I deserve what is threatened, and a thousand times worse. Thus Eli acquiesced in the like threatenings, 1 Sam. iii. 18, "It is the Lord." And Hezekiah, 2 Kin. xx. 19, "Good is the word of the Lord, which thou hast spoken." 2nd. That God may be clear when he judgeth, that is, when he executes those threatenings. David published his confession of sin, that, when hereafter he should come into the temple, none might say, God had done him any wrong, for he owns the Lord is righteous. Thus will all true penitents justify God by condemning themselves: "Thou art just in all that is brought upon us."

2nd. He confesseth his original corruption; ver. 5, "Behold I was shapen in iniquity." He doth not call upon God to behold it, but upon himself. Come, my soul, look unto the rock out of which I was hewn, and thou wilt find "I was shapen in iniquity." 'Had I duly considered this before, I find I should not have made so bold with the temptation, nor have ventured among the sparks with such tinder in my heart, and so the sin might have been prevented. But let me consider it now, not to excuse or extenuate the sin,—Lord, I did so, but indeed I could not help it, my inclination led me to it;' (for as that plea is false, with due care and watchfulness, and improvement of the grace of God, he might have helped it, so it is what a true penitent never offers to put in;) 'but let me consider it rather as an aggravation of the sin; Lord, I have not only been guilty of adultery and murder, but I have an adulterous, murderous nature; therefore I abhor myself.' David elsewhere speaks of the admirable structure of his body, Ps. cxxxix. 14, 15, it was curiously wrought, and yet here he saith it was shapen in iniquity; sin was twisted in with it, not as it came out of God's hands, but as it comes through our parents' loins. He elsewhere speaks of the piety of his mother, that she was God's handmaid, and he pleads his relation to her, Ps. cxvi. 16; lxxxvi. 16, and yet here he saith she conceived him in sin; for, though she was by grace a child of God, she was by nature a daughter of Eve, and not excepted from the common character. Note, It is to be sadly lamented by every one of us, that we brought into the world with us a corrupt nature, wretchedly degenerated from its primitive purity and rectitude; we have from our birth the snares of sin in our bodies, the seeds of in in our souls, and a stain of sin upon both. This is what we call original sin, because it is as ancient as our original, and because it is the original of all our actual transgressions. This is that foolishness which is bound in the heart of a child, that proneness to evil, and backwardness to good, which is the burthen of the regenerate, and the ruin of the unregenerate. It is a bent to backslide from God.

Thirdly. David's acknowledgment of the grace of God, ver. 6, both his good will towards us, "Thou desirest truth in the inward parts," thou wouldst have us all honest and sincere, and true to our profession, and his good work in us, "In the hidden part thou" hast made, or "shalt make me to know wisdom." Note, 1. Truth and wisdom will go very far towards making a man a good man. A clear head and a sound heart (sincerity and prudence) bespeak the man of God perfect. 2. What God requires of us he himself works in us, and he works it in the regular way, enlightening the mind, and so gaining the will. But how doth this come in here? 1st. God is hereby justified and cleared. Lord, thou wast not the author of my sin; there is no blame to be laid upon thee; but I alone must bear it; for thou hast many a time admonished me to be sincere, and hast made me to know that which if I had duly considered would have prevented my falling into this sin; had I improved the grace thou hast given me, I had kept my integrity. 2nd. The sin is hereby aggravated. "Lord, thou desirest truth," but where was it when I dissembled with Uriah? "Thou hast made me to know wisdom;" but I have not lived up to what I have known. 3rd. He is hereby encouraged in his repentance to hope that God would graciously accept of him. For, First. God had made him sincere in his resolutions never to return to folly again. "Thou desirest truth in the inward part;" this is that which God has an eye to in a returning sinner, that "in his spirit there be no guile," Ps. xxxii. 2. And David was conscious to himself of the uprightness of his heart towards God in his repentance, and therefore doubted not but God would accept him. Secondly. He hoped that God would enable him to make good his resolutions, that in the hidden part, in the new man, which is called the hidden man of the heart, 1 Pet. iii. 4, he would make him to know wisdom, so as to discern and avoid the designs of the tempter another time. Some read it as a prayer: Lord, in this instance I have done foolishly, for the future make me to know wisdom. Where there is truth, God will give wisdom. Those that sincerely endeavour to do their duty shall be taught their duty.

7 Purge me with hyssop, and I shall be clean·
Wash me, and I shall be whiter than snow.
8 Make me to hear joy and gladness;
That the bones which thou hast broken may rejoice.
9 Hide thy face from my sins,
And blot out all mine iniquities.
10 Create in me a clean heart, O God;
And renew a right spirit within me.
11 Cast me not away from thy presence;
And take not thy holy spirit from me.
12 Restore unto me the joy of thy salvation;
And uphold me with thy free spirit.
13 Then will I teach transgressors thy ways;
And sinners shall be converted unto thee.

See here, First. What David prays for. Many excellent petitions he here puts up, to which, if we but add, "for Christ's sake," they are as evangelical as any other.

1. He prays that God would cleanse him from his sins, and the defilement he had contracted by them; ver. 7, "Purge me with hyssop;" that is, pardon my sins, and let me know that they are pardoned, that I may be restored to those privileges which by sin I had forfeited and lost. The expression here alludes to a ceremonial distinction, that of cleansing the leper, or those that were unclean by the touch of a body, by sprinkling water, or blood, or both, upon them with a bunch of hyssop, by which they were at length discharged from the restraints they were laid under by their pollution. Lord, let me be as well assured of my restoration to thy favour, and to the privilege of communion with thee, as they were thereby assured of their readmission to their former privileges. But it is founded upon gospel grace; "Purge me with hyssop," that is, with the blood of Christ applied to my soul by a lively faith, as water of purification was sprinkled with a bunch of hyssop. It is the blood of Christ, which is therefore called the blood of sprinkling, Heb. xii. 24, that purgeth the conscience from dead works, from that guilt of sin, and dread of God, which shuts us out of communion with him, as the touch of a dead body under the law shut a man out from the courts of God's house. If this blood of Christ, which cleanseth from all sin, cleanse us from our sin, then we shall be clean indeed, Heb. x. 2. If we be washed in this fountain opened, we shall be whiter than snow; not only acquitted, but accepted; so those are that are justified, Isa. i. 18, "Though your sins have been as scarlet, they shall be white as snow."

2. He prays that, his sins being pardoned, he might have the comfort of that pardon. He asks not to be comforted till first he is cleansed: but if sin, the bitter root of sorrow, be taken away, he can pray in faith, "Make me to hear joy and gladness," ver. 8, that is, let me have a well-grounded peace of thy creating, thy speaking, so "that the bones which thou hast broken" by convictions and threatenings "may rejoice," may not only be set again, and eased from the pain, but may be sensibly comforted, and, as the prophet speaks, may flourish as an herb. Note, 1st. The pain of a heart truly broken for sin may well be compared to that of a broken bone; and it is the same Spirit who as a Spirit of bondage smites and wounds, and as a Spirit of adoption heals and binds up. 2nd. The comfort and joy that ariseth from a sealed pardon to a penitent sinner is as refreshing as perfect ease from the most exquisite pain. 3rd. It is God's work not only to speak this joy and gladness, but to make us hear it, and take the comfort of it. He earnestly desires that God would lift up the light of his countenance upon him, and so put gladness into his heart, that he would not only be reconciled to him, but, which is a farther act of grace, let him know that he was so.

3. He prays for a complete and effectual pardon. This is that which he is most earnest for, as the foundation of his comfort; ver. 9, "Hide thy face from my sins," that is, be not provoked by them to deal with me as I deserve; they are ever before me, let them be cast behind thy back; "blot out all mine iniquities" out of the book of thine account; blot them out as a cloud is blotted out and dispelled by the beams of the sun, Isa. xliv. 22.

4. He prays for sanctifying grace; and this every true penitent is as earnest for as for pardon and peace, ver. 10. He doth not pray, Lord, preserve me my reputation; as Saul, "I have sinned, yet honour me before this people." No, his great concern is to get his corrupt nature changed. The sin he had been guilty of was, 1st. An evidence of its impurity, and therefore he prays, "Create in me a clean heart, O God." He now saw more than ever what an unclean heart he had, and sadly laments it, but sees it is not in his power to amend it, and therefore begs of God (whose prerogative it is to create) that he would create in him a clean heart. He only that made the heart can new make it; and to his power nothing is impossible. He created the world by the word of his power as the God of nature; and it is by the word of his power as the God of grace that we are clean, Jno. xv. 3; that we are sanctified, Jno. xvii. 17. 2nd. It was the cause of its disorder, and undid much of the good work that had been wrought in him, and therefore he prays, "Lord, renew a right spirit within me;" repair the decays of spiritual strength which this sin has been the cause of, and set me to rights again. Renew a constant spirit within me; so some. He had in this matter discovered much inconstancy and disagreeableness with himself, and therefore prays, Lord, fix me for the time to come, that I may never in like manner depart from thee.

5. He prays for the continuance of God's good will towards him, and the progress of his good work in him, ver. 11. 1st. That he might never be shut out from God's favour; "Cast me not away from thy presence," as one whom thou abhorrest, and canst not endure to look upon. He prays that he might not be thrown out of God's protection, but that wherever he went he might have the Divine presence with him, might be under the conduct of his wisdom, and in the custody of his power, and that he might not be forbidden communion with God: Let me not be banished thy courts, but always have liberty of access to thee, by prayer. He doth not deprecate the temporal judgments which God by Nathan had threatened to bring upon him; God's will be done: but, "Lord, rebuke me not in thy wrath." If the sword come into my house never to depart from it, yet let me have a God to go to in my distresses, and I am well enough. 2nd. That he might never be deprived of God's grace; "Take not thy holy Spirit from me." He knew he had by his sin grieved the Spirit, and provoked him to withdraw; and that, because he also is flesh, God might justly have said that his Spirit should no more strive with him, or work upon him, Gen. vi. 3. This he dreads more than any thing. We are undone if God take his holy Spirit from us. Saul was a sad instance of this; how exceeding sinful, how exceeding miserable was he, when "the Spirit of the Lord was departed from him!" David knew it, and therefore begs thus earnestly, Lord, whatever thou take from me, my children, my crown, my life, yet "take not thy holy Spirit from me," (see 2 Sam. vii. 15,) but continue thy holy Spirit with me, to perfect the work of my repentance, to prevent my relapse into sin, and to enable me to discharge my duty both as a prince and as a psalmist.

6. He prays for the restoration of Divine comforts, and the perpetual communications of Divine grace, ver. 12. David finds two ill effects of his sin: 1st. It had made him sad, and therefore he prays, "Restore unto me the joy of thy salvation." A child of God knows no true nor solid joy but the joy of God's salvation, joy in God his Saviour, and in the hope of eternal life. By wilful sin we forfeit this joy, and deprive ourselves of it; our evidences cannot but be clouded, and our hopes shaken. When we give ourselves so much cause to doubt of our interest in the salvation, how can we expect the joy of it? But when we truly repent, we may pray and hope that God will restore to us those joys. They that sow in penitential tears shall reap in the joys of God's salvation, when the times of refreshing shall come. 2nd. It had made him weak, and therefore he prays, "Uphold me with thy free Spirit:" I am ready to fall, either into sin or into despair; Lord, sustain me. My own spirit (though the spirit of a man will go far towards the sustaining his infirmity) is not sufficient, but if I be left to myself I shall certainly sink; therefore uphold me with thy Spirit, let him counterwork the evil spirit that would cast me down from mine excellency. Thy Spirit is a free Spirit, a free agent himself, working freely; and that makes those free whom he works upon, for where the Spirit of the Lord is there is liberty. 'Thy ingenuous, princely Spirit.' He was conscious to himself of his acting very disingenuously in the matter of Uriah, and unlike a prince; that his behaviour was base and paltry. Lord, saith he, let thy Spirit inspire my soul

Tristram is for identifying the Biblical hyssop with the caper. He says, "Putting together all the passages in which hyssop is mentioned, we find that it was a plant that grew in Egypt; that it grew also in the desert of Sinai, and in Palestine; that it grew out of chinks in walls and cliffs, for Solomon spoke of 'trees from the cedar tree that is in Lebanon even unto the hyssop that springeth out of the wall' (1 Kings iv. 33); and that it was capable of producing a stem three or four feet in length. All these requirements meet in the caper (capparis spinosa), and a further argument is the similarity of the Arabic name of the caper to the Hebrew—ezob, el asaf." Dean Stanley advocates the same explanation, and so does Dr. Forbes Royle. Others again abide by the old version, while Maimonides and many Jews think marjoram is meant; and Gesenius that the name was applied to more sweet-scented plants than one. After all, the name and the unanimity of the ancient versions plead strongly in favour of hyssop, or a similar odoriferous plant.

with noble and generous principles, that I may always act as becomes me. A free spirit will be a firm and fixed spirit, and will uphold us. The more cheerful we are in our duty, the more constant we shall be to it.

Secondly. See what David here promiseth, ver. 13. Observe, 1. What good work he promiseth God to do; "I will teach transgressors thy ways." David had been himself a transgressor, and therefore could speak experimentally to transgressors, and resolves, having himself found mercy with God in the way of repentance, to teach others God's ways, that is, our way to God by repentance; he would teach others that had sinned to take the same course that he had taken, to humble themselves, to confess their sins, and seek God's face; and God's way towards us in pardoning mercy, how ready he is to receive those that return to him. He taught the former by his own example for the direction of sinners in repenting; he taught the latter by his own experience, for their encouragement. By this psalm he is, and will be, to the world's end, teaching transgressors, telling them what God had done for his soul. Note, Penitents should be preachers; Solomon was so, and blessed Paul. 2. What good effect he promiseth himself from his doing this; "Sinners shall be converted unto thee," and shall neither persist in their wanderings from thee nor despair of finding mercy in their returns to thee. The great thing to be aimed at in teaching transgressors, is their conversion to God, that is a happy point gained, and happy they that are instrumental to contribute towards it, Jas. v. 20.

14 Deliver me from bloodguiltiness,
O God, thou God of my salvation:
And my tongue shall sing aloud of thy righteousness.
15 O Lord, open thou my lips;
And my mouth shall shew forth thy praise.
16 For thou desirest not sacrifice; else would I give it:
Thou delightest not in burnt offering
17 The sacrifices of God are a broken spirit: [despise
A broken and a contrite heart, O God, thou wilt not 18 Do good in thy good pleasure unto Zion:
Build thou the walls of Jerusalem. [ness,
19 Then shalt thou be pleased with the sacrifices of righteous-
With burnt offering and whole burnt offering:
Then shall they offer bullocks upon thine altar.

First. David prays against the guilt of sin, and prays for the grace of God, and enforceth both petitions with a plea taken from the glory of God, which he promiseth with thankfulness to shew forth.

1. He prays against the guilt of sin, that he might be delivered from that, and promiseth that then he would praise God, ver. 14. The particular sin he prays against is blood-guiltiness, the sin he had now been guilty of, having slain Uriah with the sword of the children of Ammon. Hitherto, perhaps, he had stopped the mouth of conscience with that frivolous excuse that he did not kill him himself; but now he was convinced that he was the murderer, and hearing the blood cry to God for vengeance he cries to God for mercy; "Deliver me from blood-guiltiness," that is, Let me not lie under the guilt of that kind I have contracted, but let it be pardoned to me, and let me never be left to myself to contract the like guilt again. Note, It concerns us all to pray earnestly against the guilt of blood. In this prayer he eyes God as the God of salvation. Note, Those to whom God is the God of salvation he will deliver from guilt, for the salvation he is the God of is salvation from sin. We may therefore plead this with him, Lord, thou art the God of my salvation, therefore deliver me from the dominion of sin. He promiseth that, if God would deliver him, his tongue should sing aloud of his righteousness; that is, God should have the glory both of pardoning mercy and of preventing grace. God's righteousness is often put for his grace, especially in the great business of justification and sanctification. This he would comfort himself in, and therefore sing of it; and this he would endeavour both to acquaint and to affect others with; he would sing aloud of it. This all those should do that have had the benefit of it, and owe their all to it.

2. He prays for the grace of God, and promiseth to improve that grace to his glory; ver. 15, "O Lord, open thou my lips," not only that I may teach and instruct sinners, which the best preacher cannot do to any purpose, unless God give him the opening of the mouth, and the tongue of the learned, but "that my mouth may shew forth thy praise;" not only that I may have abundant matter for praise, but a heart enlarged in praise. Guilt had closed his lips, had gone near to stop the mouth of prayer; he could not for shame, he could not for fear, come into the presence of that God whom he knew he had offended, much less speak to him; his heart condemned him, and therefore he had little confidence towards God. It cast a damp particularly upon his praises; when he had lost the joys of his salvation, his harp was hung upon the willow trees; therefore he prays, Lord, open my lips, put my heart in tune for praise again. To them that are tongue-tied by reason of guilt, the assurance of the forgiveness of their sins saith effectually, Ephphatha, —'Be opened;' and when the lips are opened, what should they speak but the praises of God? as Zacharias did, Lu. i. 64.

Secondly. David offers the sacrifice of a penitent, contrite heart, as that which he knew God would be pleased with.

1. He knew very well that the sacrificing of beasts was in itself of no account with God; ver. 16, "Thou desirest not sacrifice, else would I give it" with all my heart to obtain pardon and peace, but "thou delightest not in burnt offering." Here see how fond David would have been to give thousands of rams to make atonement for sin. Those that are thoroughly convinced of their misery and danger by reason of sin would spare no cost to obtain the remission of it. Mic. vi. 6, 7. But see how little God valued this! As trials of obedience, and types of Christ, he did indeed require sacrifices to be offered; but he had no delight in them for any intrinsic worth or value they had. "Sacrifice and offering thou wouldst not:" as they cannot make satisfaction for sin, so God cannot take any satisfaction in them, any otherwise than as the offering of them is expressive of love and duty to him.

2. He knew also how acceptable true repentance is to God; ver. 17, "The sacrifices of God are a broken spirit." See here, 1st. What the good work is that is wrought in every true penitent: "A broken spirit, a broken and a contrite heart." It is a work wrought upon the heart; that is it that God looks at and requires in all religious exercises, particularly in the exercises of repentance. It is a sharp work wrought there, no less than the breaking of the heart; not in despair, as we say when a man is undone, his heart is broken; but in necessary humiliation, and sorrow for sin. It is a heart breaking with itself, and breaking from its sin; it is a heart pliable to the word of God, and patient under the rod of God; a heart subdued and brought into obedience; it is a heart that is tender, like Josiah's, and trembles at God's word. Oh that there were such a heart in us! 2nd. How graciously God is pleased to accept of this. It is the sacrifices of God, not one, but many, it is instead of all burnt offering and sacrifice. The breaking of Christ's body for sin is the only sacrifice of atonement, for no sacrifice but that could take away sin: but the breaking of our hearts for sin is a sacrifice of acknowledgment, a sacrifice of God, for to him it is offered up; he requires it, he prepares it, (he provides this lamb for a burnt offering,) and he will accept of it. That which pleased God was not the feeding of a beast, and making much of it, but killing it; so it is not the pampering of our flesh, but the mortifying of it, that God will accept. The sacrifice was bound, was bled, was burnt; so the penitent heart is bound by convictions, bleeds in contrition, and then burns in holy zeal against sin and for God. The sacrifice was offered upon the altar, that sanctified the gift; so the broken heart is acceptable to God only through Jesus Christ. There is no true repentance without faith in him; and this is the sacrifice which he will not despise. Men despise that which is broken, but God will not. He despised the sacrifice of torn and broken beasts, but he will not despise that of a torn and broken heart. He will not overlook it, he will not refuse or reject it; though it make God no satisfaction for the wrong done him by sin, yet he doth not despise it. The proud Pharisee despised the broken-hearted publican, and he thought very meanly of himself; but God did not despise him. More is implied than is expressed; the great God overlooks heaven and earth to look with favour upon a broken and contrite heart, Isa. lxvi. 1, 2; lvii. 15.

Thirdly. David intercedes for Zion and Jerusalem, with an eye to the honour of God. See what a concern he had,

1. For the good of the church of God; ver. 16, "Do good in thy good pleasure unto Zion;" that is, 1st. To all the particular worshippers in Zion, to all that love and fear thy name. Keep them from falling into such wounding wasting sins as these of mine; defend and succour all that fear thy name. Those that have been in spiritual troubles themselves know how to pity and pray for those that are in like manner afflicted. Or, 2nd. To the public interests of Israel. David was sensible of the wrong he had done to Judah and Jerusalem by his sin; how it had weakened the hands and saddened the hearts of good people, and opened the mouths of their adversaries. He was likewise afraid lest, he being a public person, his sin should bring judgments upon the city and kingdom, and therefore he prays to God to secure and advance those public interests which he had damaged and endangered. He prays that God would prevent those national judgments which his sin had deserved, that he would continue those blessings, and carry on that good work which it had threatened to retard and put a stop to. He prays not only God would do good to Zion, as he did to other places by his providence, but that he would do it in his good pleasure, with the peculiar favour he bore to that place which he had chosen to put his name there; that the walls of Jerusalem, which perhaps were now in the building, might be built up, and that good work finished. Note, First. When we have most business of our own, and of greatest importance at the throne of grace, yet then we must not forget to pray for the church of God; nay, our Master has taught us in our daily prayers to begin with that, "Hallowed be thy name, thy kingdom come." Secondly. The consideration of the prejudice we have done to the public interests by our sins should engage us to do them all the service we can, particularly by our prayers.

2. For the honour of the churches of God, ver. 19. If God would shew himself reconciled to him and his people, as he had prayed, then they should go on with the public services of his house; 1st. Cheerfully to themselves. The sense of God's goodness to them would enlarge their hearts in all the instances and expressions of thankfulness and obedience. They will then come to his tabernacle with burnt offerings, with whole burnt offerings, which were intended purely for the glory of God, and they shall offer not lambs and rams only, but bullocks, the costliest sacrifices, upon his altar. 2nd. Acceptably to God. Thou shalt be pleased with them; that is, we shall have reason to hope so, when we perceive the sin taken away which threatened to hinder thine acceptance. Note, It is a great comfort to a good man to think of the communion that is between God and his people in their public assemblies; how he is honoured by their humble attendance on him, and they are happy in his gracious acceptance of them.

PSALM LII.

David no doubt was in very great grief when he said to Abiathar, 1 Sam. xxii. 22, "I have occasioned the death of all the persons of thy father's house," which were put to death upon Doeg's malicious information. To give some vent to that grief, and to gain some relief to his mind under it, he penned this psalm, wherein, as a prophet, and therefore with as good an authority as if he had been now a prince upon the throne, I. He arraigns Doeg for what he had done, ver. 1. II. He accuseth him, convicts him, and aggravates his crimes, ver. 2—4. III. He passeth sentence upon him, ver. 5. IV. He foretells the triumphs of the righteous in the execution of the sentence, ver. 6, 7. V. He comforts himself in the mercy of God, and the assurance he had that he should yet praise him, ver. 8, 9. In singing this psalm we should conceive a detestation of the sin of lying, foresee the ruin of those that persist in it, and please ourselves with the assurance of the preservation of God's church and people, in spite of all the malicious designs of the children of Satan, that father of lies.

To the chief Musician, Maschil, A Psalm of David, when Doeg the Edomite came and told Saul, and said unto him, David is come to the house of Ahimelech.

WHY boastest thou thyself in mischief, O mighty man?
The goodness of God endureth continually.
2 Thy tongue deviseth mischiefs;
Like a sharp razor, working deceitfully.
3 Thou lovest evil more than good;
And lying rather than to speak righteousness. Selah.
4 Thou lovest all devouring words,
O thou deceitful tongue.
5 God shall likewise destroy thee for ever, [ing place,
He shall take thee away, and pluck thee out of thy dwell-
And root thee out of the land of the living. Selah.

The title is a brief account of the story which the psalm refers to. David now at length saw it necessary to quit the court and shift for his own safety, for fear of Saul, who had once and again attempted to murder him. Being unprovided of arms and victuals, he, by a wile, got Ahimelech the priest to furnish him with li. 10. For "a right spirit" the marginal rendering, "a constant spirit," is preferable.

li. 12. The phrase "free spirit" rather signifies "a willing spirit." The clause has been very well rendered, "and let a willing spirit sustain me."

li. 18. This verse has induced many to think that David was not the author of the psalm; but others suppose the verse was added by a later hand, while others again believe the language of this prayer points to David's desire for the establishment of God's worship and Temple at Jerusalem, and the completion of its walls (2 Sam. v. 9).

lii. Title. There is no reason for doubting the accuracy of the statement contained in this title, which refers the composition to the circumstances recorded in 1 Sam. xxii. 9, &c.

lii. 2. Although the Hebrews did not shave themselves under ordinary circumstances, there were occasions on which they did so, both. Doeg, an Edomite, happened to be there, and he went and informed Saul against Ahimelech, representing him as confederate with a traitor; upon which accusation Saul grounded a very bloody warrant to kill all the priests; and Doeg, who was the prosecutor, was the executioner, 1 Sam. xxii. 9, &c. In these verses,

First. David argues the case fairly with this proud and mighty man, ver. 1. Doeg, it is probable, was mighty in respect of bodily strength; but if he were he gained no reputation to it by his easy victory over the unarmed priests of the Lord. It is no honour for those that wear a sword to hector those that wear an ephod. However, he was by his office a mighty man, for he was set over the servants of Saul, chamberlain of the household. This was he that boasted himself not only in the power he had to do mischief, but in the mischief he did. Note, It is bad to do ill, but it is worse to brag of it and glory in it when we have done; not only not to be ashamed of a wicked action, but to justify it; not only to justify it, but to magnify it, and value ourselves upon it. They that glory in their sin glory in their shame, and then it becomes yet more shameful. Mighty men are often mischievous men, and boast of their hearts' desire, Ps. x. 3. It is uncertain how the following words come in: "The goodness of God endures continually." Some make it the wicked man's answer to this question. The patience and forbearance of God, that great instance of his goodness, is abused by sinners, to the hardening of their hearts in their wicked ways; because sentence against their evil works is not executed speedily, nay, God is continually doing them good, therefore they boast in mischief, as if their prosperity in their wickedness were an evidence that there is no harm in it; but it is rather to be taken as an argument against him, to shew, 1. The sinfulness of his sin. God is continually doing good, and those that therein are like him have reason to glory in their being so; but thou art continually doing mischief, and therein art utterly unlike him, and contrary to him, and yet gloriest in being so. 2. The folly of it. Thou thinkest with the mischief which thou boastest of the artful contriving of, and successful carrying on of, to run down and ruin the people of God; but thou wilt find thyself mistaken; "the goodness of God endures continually" for their preservation, and then they need not fear what man can do unto them. The enemies in vain boast in their mischief while we have God's mercy to boast in.

Secondly. He draws up a high charge against him in the court of heaven, as he had drawn up a high charge against Ahimelech in Saul's court, ver. 2—4. He accuseth him of the wickedness of his tongue, that unruly evil full of deadly poison, and the wickedness of his heart which that was an evidence of. Four things he charges him with: 1. Malice. His tongue doth mischief, not only pricking like a needle, but cutting like a sharp razor. Scornful bantering words would not content him; he loved devouring words, words that would ruin the priests of the Lord, whom he hated. 2. Falsehood. It was a deceitful tongue that he did this mischief with, ver. 4; he loved lying, ver. 3; and this sharp razor did work deceitfully, ver. 2; that is, before he had this occasion given him to discover his malice against the priests, he had carried it very plausibly towards them. Though he were an Edomite, he attended the altars, and brought his offerings, and paid his respects to the priests as decently as any Israelite, though therein he put a force upon himself, for "he was detained before the Lord;" but herein he gained an opportunity of doing them so much the greater mischief. Or it may refer to the information itself which he gave in against Ahimelech; for the matter of fact was in substance true, yet it was misrepresented, and false colours put upon it, and therefore he might well be said to love lying, and to have a deceitful tongue. He told the truth, but not all the truth, as a witness ought to do. Had he told that David made Ahimelech believe he was then going upon Saul's errand, the kindness he shewed him would have appeared to be not only not traitorous against Saul, but respectful to him. It will not save us from the guilt of lying to be able to say there was some truth in what we said, if we pervert it, and make it to appear otherwise than it was. 3. Subtlety in sin. "Thy tongue deviseth mischiefs;" that is, it speaks the mischief which thy heart deviseth. The more there is of craft and contrivance in any wickedness, the more there is of the devil in it. 4. Affection to sin. "Thou lovest evil more than good;" that is, thou lovest evil, and hast no love at all to that which is good; thou takest delight in lying, and makest no conscience of doing right. Thou wouldest rather please Saul by telling a lie than please God by speaking truth. Those are of Doeg's spirit who, instead of being pleased (as we all ought to be) with an opportunity of doing a man kindness in his body, estate, or good name, are glad when they have a fair occasion to do a man a mischief, and readily close with an opportunity of that kind; that is loving evil more than good. It is bad to speak devouring words, but it is worse to love them, either in others or in ourselves.

Thirdly. He reads his doom, and denounceth the judgments of God against him for his wickedness, ver. 5. Thou hast destroyed the priests of the Lord, and cut them off, and therefore "God shall likewise destroy thee for ever." Sons of perdition actively shall be sons of perdition passively, as Judas and the man of sin. Destroyers shall be destroyed; those especially that hate, and persecute, and destroy the priests of the Lord, his ministers and people, who are made to our God priests, a royal priesthood, shall be taken away with a swift and everlasting destruction. Doeg is here condemned, 1. To be driven out of the church; "He shall pluck thee out of the tabernacle;" not thy dwelling-place, but God's, so it is most probably understood. Thou shalt be cut off from the favour of God, and his presence, and all communion with him, and shalt have no benefit, either by oracle or offering. Justly was he deprived of all the privileges of God's house, that had been so mischievous to his servants; he had come sometimes to God's tabernacle, and attended in his courts, but he was detained there, he was sick of the service, and sought an opportunity to defame his family. It was very fit therefore he should be taken away, and plucked out from thence: we would forbid one our house that should serve us so. Note, We forfeit the benefit of ordinances if we make an ill use of them. 2. To be driven out of the world; "He shall root thee out of the land of the living," in which thou thoughtest thyself so deeply rooted. When good men die, they are transplanted from the land of the living on earth, the nursery of the plants of righteousness, to that in heaven, the garden of the Lord, where they shall take root for ever; but when wicked men die, they are rooted out of the land of the living to perish for ever, as fuel to the fire of Divine wrath. This will be the portion of those that contend with God.

6 The righteous also shall see, and fear,
And shall laugh at him:
7 Lo, this is the man that made not God his strength;
But trusted in the abundance of his riches,
And strengthened himself in his wickedness.
8 But I am like a green olive tree in the house of God:
I trust in the mercy of God for ever and ever.
9 I will praise thee for ever because thou hast done it:
And I will wait on thy name;
For it is good before thy saints.

OLIVE TREES.—ver. 8.

David was at this time in great distress; the mischief Doeg had done him was but the beginning of his sorrows; and yet here we have him triumphing, and that is more than rejoicing, in tribulation. Blessed Paul, in the midst of his troubles, is in the midst of his triumphs, 2 Cor. ii. 14. David here triumphs,

First. In the fall of Doeg; yet, lest this should look like personal revenge, he doth not speak of it as his own act, but the language of other righteous persons. They shall observe God's judgments on Doeg, and speak of them,

1. To the glory of God. They shall see and fear, ver. 6; that is, they shall reverence the justice of God, and stand in awe of him as a God of almighty power, before whom the proudest sinner cannot stand, and before whom therefore we ought every one of us to humble ourselves. Note, God's judgments on the wicked should strike an awe upon the righteous, and make them afraid of offending God, and incurring his displeasure, Ps. cxix. 120; Rev. xv. 3, 4.

2. To the shame of Doeg. They shall laugh at him, not with a ludicrous, but a rational, serious laughter, as he that sits in heaven shall laugh at him, Ps. ii. 4. He shall appear ridiculous and worthy to be laughed at. We are told how they shall triumph in God's just judgments on him; ver. 7, "Lo, this is the man that made not God his strength." The fall and ruin of a wealthy, mighty man cannot be but generally taken notice of, and every one is apt to make his remarks upon it. Now this is the remark which the righteous should make upon Doeg's fall, that no better could come of it, since he took the wrong method of establishing himself in his wealth and power. If a new erected fabric tumbles down, presently every one inquires where was the fault in the building of it. Now that which ruined Doeg's prosperity was, 1st. That he did not build it upon a rock; "he made not God his strength;" that is, he did not think that the continuance of his prosperity depended upon the favour of God, and therefore took no care to make sure that favour, nor to keep himself in God's love, made no conscience of his duty to him, nor sought him in the least. Those wretchedly deceive themselves that think to support themselves in their power and wealth without God and religion. 2nd. That he did build it upon the sand. He thought his wealth would support itself; he "trusted in the abundance of his riches," which he imagined were laid up for many years; nay, he thought his wickedness would help to support it. He was resolved to stick at nothing for the securing and advancing of his honour and power; right or wrong, he would get what he could, and keep what he had, and be the ruin of any one that stood in his way; and this he thought would strengthen him. They may have anything that will make conscience of nothing. But now see what it comes to, see what untempered mortar he built his house with, now it is fallen, and himself buried in the ruins of it.

Secondly. In his own stability, ver. 8, 9. This mighty man is plucked up by the roots, "but I am like a green olive tree," planted and rooted, fixed and flourishing; he is turned out of God's dwelling-place, but I am established in it, not detained as Doeg by any thing but the abundant satisfaction I meet with there. Note, Those that by faith and love dwell in the house of God shall be like green olive trees there. The wicked are said to flourish like a green bay-tree, Ps. xxxvii. 35, which bears no useful fruit, though it have abundance of large leaves; but the righteous flourish like a green olive-tree, which is fat as well as flourishing, Ps. xcii. 14; and with its fatness honours God and man, Jud. ix. 9, deriving its root and fatness from the good olive, Rom. xi. 17. Now what must we do that we may be as green olive-trees?

1. We must live a life of faith and holy confidence in God and his grace. I see what comes of men's trusting in the abundance of their riches, and therefore "I trust in the mercy of God for ever and ever;" not in the world, but in God; not in my own merit, but in God's mercy, which dispenseth its gifts freely, even to the unworthy, and has in it an all sufficiency to be our portion and happiness. This mercy is for ever; it is constant and unchangeable, and its gifts will continue to all eternity; we must therefore for ever trust in it, and never come off from that bottom.

2. We must live a life of thankfulness and holy joy in God; ver. 9, "I will praise thee for ever, because thou hast done it," hast avenged the blood of thy priests upon their bloody enemy, and given him blood to drink, and hast performed thy promise to me, which he was as sure would be done in due time as if it were done already. It contributes very much to the beauty of our profession, and to our fruitfulness in every grace, to be much in praising God, and it is certain we never want matter for praise.

3. We must live a life of expectation, and humble dependence upon God. "I will wait on thy name;" that is, I will attend upon thee in all those ways wherein thou hast made thyself known, hoping for the discoveries of thy favour to me, and willing to tarry till the time appointed for them; "for it is good before thy saints;" or, in the opinion and judgment of thy saints, with whom David heartily concurs. It is the communis sensus fidelium,—'all the saints are of this mind,' 1st. That God's name is good in itself. That God's manifestations of himself to his people are gracious and very kind; there is no other name given but his, that would be our refuge and strong tower. 2nd. That it is very good as after a vow, and in connection with some special ceremonies. The use of the razor was more general among the Egyptians.

lii. 8. David does not suggest that the olive-tree grew in the house of God, but that he himself should flourish in the house of the Lord, as an olive-tree flourishes in a fertile soil. "The house of God" here is the Tabernacle, not the Temple. (Compare Psa. xcii. 13.)

liii. 1—6. This psalm is, with a few verbal differences, the same as the fourteenth. It is difficult, and perhaps impossible, to determine the reason of the repetition. The variations may have arisen with the author himself; or one of the later prophets may have introduced them for some special purpose. The word "Lord" occurs three times in Psa. xiv., but here not at all, "God" being put for it in each case. The principal change is in verse 5, which answers to verses 5 and 6 of Psa. xiv. The Greek thus renders the latter part of verse 5: "For God hath scattered the bones of men-pleasers; they were ashamed, for God despised them." Similarly the Syriac:

for us to wait on that name; that there is nothing better to calm and quiet our spirits, when they are ruffled and disturbed, and to keep us in the way of our duty, when we are tempted to use any indirect courses for our own relief, than to "hope, and quietly to wait for the salvation of the Lord," Lam. iii. 26. All the saints have experienced the benefit of it, who never attended him in vain, never followed his conduct but it ended well, nor were ever made ashamed of their believing expectations from him. What is good before all the saints, let us therefore abide and abound in, and in this particularly; "Turn thou to thy God, keep mercy and judgment, and wait on thy God continually," Hos. xii. 6.

PSALM LIII.

God speaketh once, yea twice, and it were well if man would even then perceive it. God in this psalm speaketh twice, for this is the same, almost verbatim, with the 14th Psalm. The scope of it is to convince us of our sins, to set us a blushing, and to set us a trembling because of them; and this is what we are so hardly brought to, that there is need of line upon line to this purpose. The word, as a convincing word, is compared to a hammer, the strokes whereof must be frequently repeated. God, by the psalmist here, I. Shews us how bad we are, ver. 1. II. Proves it upon us by his own certain knowledge, ver. 2, 3. III. He speaks terror to persecutors, the worst of sinners, ver. 4, 5. IV. He speaks encouragement to God's persecuted people, ver. 6. Some little variation there is between Ps. xiv. and this, but none considerable, only between ver. 5, 6, there, and ver. 5, where some expressions there used are here left out, concerning the shame which the wicked put upon God's people, and instead of that is here foretold the shame which God would put upon the wicked; which alteration, with some others, he made by Divine direction, when he delivered it the second time to the chief musician. In singing it, we ought to lament the corruption of the human nature, and the wretched degeneracy of the world we live in, yet rejoicing in hope of the great salvation.

To the chief Musician upon Mahalath, Maschil, A Psalm of David.

THE fool hath said in his heart, There is no God.
Corrupt are they, and have done abominable iniquity:
There is none that doeth good.
2 God looked down from heaven upon the children of men,
To see if there were any that did understand,
That did seek God
3 Every one of them is gone back:
They are altogether become filthy;
There is none that doeth good, no, not one
4 Have the workers of iniquity no knowledge?
Who eat up my people as they eat bread:
They have not called upon God.
5 There were they in great fear, where no fear was:
For God hath scattered the bones of him that encampeth against thee: [them.
Thou hast put them to shame, because God hath despised 6 Oh that the salvation of Israel were come out of Zion!
When God bringeth back the captivity of his people,
Jacob shall rejoice, and Israel shall be glad

This psalm was opened before, and therefore we shall here only observe, in short, some things concerning sin, in order to the increasing of our sorrow for it and hatred of it.

I. The fact of sin. Is that proved? Can the charge be made out? Yes; God is a witness to it, an unexceptionable witness. From the place of his holiness he looks on the children of men, and sees how little good there is among them, ver. 2. All the sinfulness of their hearts and lives is naked and open before him.

II. The fault of sin. Is there any harm in it? Yes; it is iniquity, ver. 1, 4; it is an unrighteous thing; it is that which there is no good in, ver. 1, 3; it is an evil thing, it is the worst of evils; it is that which makes this world such an evil world as it is; it is going back from God, ver. 3.

III. The fountain of sin. How comes it that men are so bad? Surely it is because there is no fear of God before their eyes. They say in their hearts, There is no God at all to call us to an account, none that we need to stand in awe of. Men's bad practices flow from their bad principles; if they profess to know God, yet in works, because in thoughts, they deny him.

IV. The folly of sin. He is a fool (in the account of God, whose judgment we are sure is right) that harbours such corrupt thoughts: atheists, whether in opinion or practice, are the greatest fools in the world. They that do not seek God, they do not understand; they are like brute beasts that have no understanding; for man is distinguished from the brutes, not so much by the powers of reason as by a capacity for religion. The workers of iniquity, whatever they pretend to, they have no knowledge. Those may truly be said to know nothing that do not know God, ver. 4.

V. The filthiness of sin. Sinners are corrupt, ver. 1; their nature is vitiated and spoiled; and the more noble the nature is the more vile it is when it is depraved; as that of the angels. Corruptio optimi est pessima,—'The best things when corrupted become the worst.' Their iniquity is abominable, it is odious to the Holy God, and it renders them so; whereas otherwise he hates nothing that he has made. It makes men filthy, altogether filthy; wilful sinners (pardon the expression) even stink above ground in the nostrils of the God of heaven and the holy angels. What neatness soever proud sinners pretend to, it is certain wickedness is the greatest nastiness in the world.

VI. The fruit of sin. See to what a degree of barbarity it brings men at last. When men's hearts are hardened through the deceitfulness of sin, see their cruelty to their brethren, that are bone of their bone; because they will not run with them to the same excess of riot, they eat them up as they eat bread; as if they were not only become beasts, but beasts of prey. And see their contempt of God at the same time; they have not called upon him, but scorn to be beholden to him.

VII. The fear and shame that attend sin; ver. 5, "There were they in great fear," who had made God their enemy; their own guilty consciences frightened them, and filled them with horror, though otherwise there was no apparent cause of fear: "the wicked flees when none pursues." See the ground of this fear; it is because God hath formerly scattered the bones of those that encamped against his people; not only broken their power, and dispersed their forces, but slain them, and reduced their bodies to dry bones, like those scattered at the grave's mouth, Ps. cxli. 7. Such will be the fate of those that lay siege to the camp of the saints, and the beloved city, Rev. xx. 9; and the apprehensions of this cannot but put those into frights that eat up God's people. This enables the virgin, the daughter of Zion, to put them to shame, and expose them, because God hath despised them; to laugh at them, because He that sits in heaven laughs at them. We need not look upon those enemies with fear whom God looks upon with contempt. If he despiseth them, we may.

Lastly. The faith of the saints, and their hope and power touching the cure of this great evil, ver. 6. There will come a Saviour, a great salvation, a salvation from sin. Oh that it might be hastened! for it will bring in glorious and joyful times. There were those in the Old Testament times that looked and hoped, that prayed and waited, for this redemption. 1. God would in due time save his church from the sinful malice of its enemies, which would bring joy to Jacob and Israel, that had long been in a mournful, melancholy state. Such salvations were often wrought, and all typical of the everlasting triumphs of the glorious church. 2. He will save all believers from their own iniquities, that they may not be led captive by them, which will be everlasting matter of joy to them. From this work the Redeemer had "his name Jesus, for he shall save his people from their sins," Mat. i. 21.

PSALM LIV.

The key of this psalm hangs at the door, for the title tells us upon what occasion it was penned, when the inhabitants of Ziph, men of Judah, types of Judas the traitor, betrayed David to Saul, by informing him where he was, and putting him in a way how to seize him. This they did twice, 1 Sam. xxiii. 19; xxvi. 1, and it is upon record to their everlasting infamy. The psalm is sweet; the former part of it, perhaps, was meditated when he was in his distress, and when the danger was over was put into writing, and the two last verses added, which speak his thankfulness for the deliverance; which yet might be written in faith, even then when he was in the midst of his fright. Here, I. He complains to God of the malice of his enemies, and prays for help against them, ver. 1—3. II. He comforts himself with an assurance of the Divine favour and protection, and that in due time his enemies should be confounded, and he delivered, ver. 4—7. What time we are in distress, we may comfortably sing this psalm.

To the chief Musician on Neginoth, Maschil, A Psalm of David, when the Ziphims came and said to Saul, Doth not David hide himself with us?

SAVE me, O God, by thy name,
And judge me by thy strength.
2 Hear my prayer, O God;
Give hear to the words of my mouth.
3 For strangers are risen up against me,
And oppressors seek after my soul:
They have not set God before them. Selah.

We may observe here,

First. The great distress that David was now in, which the title gives an account of. The Ziphims came of their own accord and informed Saul where David was, with a promise to deliver him into his hand. One would have thought, when David was retired into the country, he should not have been pursued; into a desert country, he should not have been discovered; and into his own country, he should not have been betrayed; and yet it seems he was. Never let a good man expect to be safe and easy till he comes to heaven. How treacherous, how officious were these Ziphims! It is well God is faithful, for men are not to be trusted, Mic. vii. 5.

Secondly. His prayer to God for succour and deliverance, ver. 12. He appeals to God's strength, by which he was able to help him; and to his name, by which he was engaged to help him; and begs he would save him from his enemies, and judge him, that is, plead his cause, and judge for him. David has no other plea to depend upon but God's name, no other power to depend upon but God's strength, and those he makes his refuge and confidence. This would be the effectual answer of his prayers, ver. 2, which, even in his flight, when he had not opportunity for solemn address to God, he was ever and anon lifting up to heaven: "Hear my prayer," which comes from my heart, "and give ear to the words of my mouth."

Thirdly. His plea, which is taken from the character of his enemies, ver. 3. 1. They are strangers. Such were the Ziphites, unworthy the name of Israelites; they have used me more basely and barbarously than the Philistines themselves would have done. The worst treatment may be expected from those who, having broken through the bonds of relation and alliance, make themselves strangers. 2. They are oppressors. Such was Saul, who, as a king, should have used his power for the protection of his good subjects, but abused it for their destruction. Nothing so grievous as oppression in the seat of judgment, Eccl. iii. 16. Paul's greatest perils were by his own countrymen, and by false brethren, 2 Cor. xi. 26, and so were David's. 3. They were very formidable and threatening. They not only hated him and wished him ill, but they rose up against him in a body, joining their power to do him a mischief. 4. They were very spiteful and malicious. They "seek after my soul;" they hunt for the precious life, no less will satisfy them. We may in faith pray that God would not by his providence give success, lest it should look like giving countenance, to such cruel, bloody men. 5. They were very profane and atheistical; and for this reason he thought God was concerned in honour to appear against them: "They have not set God before them," that is, they have quite cast off the thoughts of God, they do not consider that his eye is upon them, that in fighting against his people they fight against him, nor have they any dread of the certain fatal consequences of such an unequal engagement. Note, From those who do not set God before them no good is to be expected; nay, what wickedness will not such men be guilty of? What bonds of nature, or friendship, or gratitude, or covenant, will hold those that have broken through the fear of God? "Selah;" mark this. Let us all be sure to set God before us at all times, for if we do not, we are in danger of going all to naught.

4 Behold, God is mine helper:
The Lord is with them that uphold my soul.
5 He shall reward evil unto mine enemies:
Cut them off in thy truth.

"For God hath scattered their bones; for those who please men are ashamed, because God hath rejected them." The readings of Aquila, Symmachus, Jerome, and the Chaldee resemble our present Hebrew text.

liv. Title. The title of the Greek version corresponds with the Hebrew, but the Syriac says that the psalm was written "when David sent Joab and his army to fight against Absalom," and that "to us it signifies the victory and the prayer of him that is preserved by God."

Assuming the correctness of the Hebrew title, it is doubtful whether it refers to the incidents recorded in 1 Sam. xxiii. 19, or to those in 1 Sam. xxvi. 1.

liv. 3. The Ziphites were not strangers in the ordinary sense, but had estranged or alienated themselves from David. The Chaldee renders the word "proud," which is justified by a various reading, and Psa. lxxxvi. 14.

liv. 6. For "I will freely sacrifice" we may translate "I will

6 I will freely sacrifice unto thee:
I will praise thy name, O LORD; for it is good.
7 For he hath delivered me out of all trouble:
And mine eye hath seen his desire upon mine enemies.

We have here the lively actings of David's faith in his prayer, by which he was assured that the issue would be comfortable, though the attempt upon him was formidable.

First. He was sure that he had God on his side; that God took his part, ver. 4. He speaks it with an air of triumph and exultation, "Behold, God is mine helper." If we be for him, he is for us; and if he be for us, we shall have such help in him as that we need not fear any power engaged against us. Though men and devils aim to be our destroyers, they shall not prevail while God is our helper. "The Lord is with them that uphold my soul;" compare Ps. cxviii. 7, "The Lord taketh my part with them that help me." There are some that uphold me, and God is one of them; he is the principal one; none of them could help me, if he did not help them. Every creature is that to us, and no more, that God makes it to be. He means, The Lord is he that doth uphold my soul, and keep me from tiring in my work, and sinking under my burthens. He that by his providence upholds all things by his grace upholds the souls of his people. God, that will in due time save his people, doth in the meantime sustain them and bear them up, so that the spirit he has made shall not fail before him.

Secondly. God taking part with him he doubted not but his enemies should both flee and fall before him; ver. 5, "He shall reward evil unto mine enemies that observe me," seeking an opportunity to do me a mischief. The evil they designed against me the righteous God will return upon their own heads. David would not render evil to them; but he knew God would: "I, as a deaf man, heard not, for thou wilt hear." The enemies we forgive, if they repent not, God will judge; and for this reason we must not avenge ourselves, because God hath said, "Vengeance is mine." But he prays, "Cut them off in thy truth." This is not a prayer of malice, but a prayer of truth, for it has an eye to the word of God, and only desires the performance of that. There is truth in God's threatenings as well as in his promises, and sinners that repent not will find it so to their cost.

Thirdly. He promiseth to give thanks to God for all the experiences he had had of his goodness to him; ver. 6, "I will sacrifice unto thee." Though sacrifices were expensive, yet, when God required that his worshippers should in that way praise him, David would not only offer them, but offer them freely, and without grudging. All our spiritual sacrifices must in this sense be free-will offerings, for God loves a cheerful giver. Yet he will not only bring his sacrifice, which was but the shadow, the ceremony, he will mind the substance, "I will praise thy name." A thankful heart, and the calves of our lips giving thanks to his name, are the sacrifices God will accept. "I will praise thy name, for it is good." Thy name is not only great, but good, and therefore to be praised. To praise thy name is not only what we are bound to, but it is good, it is pleasant, it is profitable; it is good for us, Ps. xcii. 1, therefore "I will praise thy name."

Fourthly. He speaks of his deliverance as a thing done, ver. 7. I will praise thy name, and say, "He hath delivered me;" this shall be my song then. That which he rejoiceth in is a complete deliverance, "He hath delivered me from all trouble;" and a deliverance to his heart's content, "Mine eye hath seen its desire upon mine enemies;" not seen them cut off and ruined, but forced to retreat; tidings being brought to Saul that the Philistines were upon him, 1 Sam. xxiii. 27, 28. That was all David desired, to be himself safe; when he saw Saul draw off his forces he saw his desire. "He hath delivered me from all trouble." Either, 1. With this thought David comforted himself when he was in distress, "He hath delivered me from all trouble" hitherto, and many a time I have gained my point, and seen my desire on mine enemies, therefore he will deliver me out of this trouble. We should thus in our greatest straits encourage ourselves with our past experiences. Or, 2. With this thought he magnified his present deliverance when the fright is over, that it was an earnest of farther deliverance. He speaks of the completing of his deliverance as a thing done, though he had as yet many troubles before him; because, having God's promise for it, he was as sure of it as if it was done already. He that hath begun to deliver me from this trouble shall deliver me from all troubles, and shall at length give me to "see my desire upon mine enemies." This may, perhaps, point at Christ, of whom David was a type; God would deliver him out of all the troubles of his state of humiliation, and he was perfectly sure of it. And all things are said to be put under his feet; for, though "we see not yet all things put under him," yet we are sure "he shall reign till all his enemies be made his footstool," and he shall see his desire upon them. However, it is an encouragement to all believers to make that use of their particular deliverances which St. Paul doth, like David here, 2 Tim. iv. 17, 18, "He that delivered me from the mouth of the lion, shall deliver me from every evil work, and will preserve me to his heavenly kingdom."

PSALM LV.

It is the conjecture of many expositors that David penned this psalm upon occasion of Absalom's rebellion, and that the particular enemy he here speaks of, that dealt treacherously with him, was Ahithophel; and some will therefore make David's troubles here typical of Christ's sufferings, and Ahithophel's treachery a figure of Judas', because they both hanged themselves. But there is nothing in it that is particularly applied to Christ in the New Testament. David was in great distress when he penned this psalm. I. He prays that God would manifest his favour to him, and pleads his own sorrow and fear, ver. 1—8. II. He prays that God would manifest his displeasure against his enemies, and pleads their great wickedness and treachery, ver. 9—15; and again, ver. 20, 21. III. He assures himself that God would in due time appear for him against his enemies, comforts himself with the hopes of it, and encourageth others to trust in God, ver. 16—19; and again, ver. 22, 23. In singing this psalm we may, if there be occasion, apply it to our own troubles; if not, we may sympathize with those to whose case it comes nearer, foreseeing that there will be at last indignation and wrath to the persecutors, salvation and joy to the persecuted.

To the chief Musician on Neginoth, Maschil, A Psalm of David.

GIVE ear to my prayer, O God;
And hide not thyself from my supplication.
2 Attend unto me, and hear me:
I mourn in my complaint, and make a noise;
3 Because of the voice of the enemy,
Because of the oppression of the wicked:
For they cast iniquity upon me,
And in wrath they hate me.
4 My heart is sore pained within me:
And the terrors of death are fallen upon me.
5 Fearfulness and trembling are come upon me,
And horror hath overwhelmed me.
6 And I said, Oh that I had wings like a dove!
For then would I fly away, and be at rest.
7 Lo, then would I wander far off,
And remain in the wilderness. Selah.
8 I would hasten my escape
From the windy storm and tempest.

In these verses we have,

First. David praying. Prayer is a salve for every sore, and a relief to the spirit under every burthen. "Give ear to my prayer, O God," ver. 1, 2. He doth not set down the petitions he offered up to God in his distress, but begs that God would hear the prayers which at every turn his heart lifted up to God, and grant an answer of peace to them; "Attend to me, hear me." Saul would not hear his petitions, his other enemies regarded not his pleas, but, Lord, be thou pleased to hearken to me. "Hide not thy face from my supplication;" either as one unconcerned, and not regarding it, nor seeming to take any notice of it; or, as one displeased, angry at me, and therefore at my prayer. If we, in our prayers, sincerely lay open ourselves, our case, our hearts to God, we have reason to hope that he will not hide himself, his favours, his comforts from us.

Secondly. David weeping; for in this he was a type of Christ, that he was a man of sorrows, and often in tears; ver. 2, "I mourn in my complaint," or, in my meditation, my melancholy musings, "and make a noise;" I cannot forbear such sighs and groans, and other expressions of grief, as discover it to those about me. Great griefs are sometimes noisy and clamorous, and by that means are in some measure lessened, while those increase that are stifled, and have no vent given them. But what was the matter? ver. 3, it is "because of the voice of the enemy," the menaces and insults of Absalom's party, that hectored and talked big, and stirred up the people to cry out against David, and shout him out of his palace and capital city, as afterwards the chief priests stirred up the mob to cry out against the Son of David, "Away with him, Crucify him." Yet it was not the voice of the enemy only that fetched tears from David's eyes, but their oppression, and the hardship he was thereby reduced to. "They cast iniquity upon me." They could not justly charge David with any maladministration in his government, could not prove any act of oppression or injustice upon him, but they loaded him with calumnies. Though they found no iniquity in him relating to his trust as a king, yet they cast all manner of iniquity upon him, and represented him to the people as a tyrant, fit to be expelled. Innocency itself is no security against violent and lying tongues. They hated him themselves, nay, in wrath they hated him; there was in their enmity both the heat and violence of anger, or sudden passion, and the implacableness of hatred and rooted malice; and therefore they studied to make him odious, that others also might hate him. This made him mourn, and the more, because he could remember the time when he was the darling of the people, and answered his name, David,—'a beloved one.'

Thirdly. David trembling, and in great consternation. We may well suppose him to be so, upon the breaking out of Absalom's conspiracy, and the general defection of the people, even those that he had little reason to suspect.

1. See what fear seized him. David was a man of great boldness, and in some very eminent instances had signalized his courage, and yet, when the danger was surprising and imminent, his heart failed him. Let not the stout man, therefore, glory in his courage any more than the strong man in his strength. Now David's heart is sore pained within him; the terrors of death are fallen upon him, ver. 4. Now fearfulness of mind, and trembling of body, are come upon him, and horror has covered and overwhelmed him, ver. 5; when without are fightings, no marvel that within are fears; and if it was upon the occasion of Absalom's rebellion, we may suppose that the remembrance of his sin in the matter of Uriah, which God was now reckoning with him for, added as much more to the fright. Sometimes David's faith made him in a manner fearless, and he could boldly say, when surrounded with enemies, "I will not be afraid what man can do unto me." But at other times his fears prevail and tyrannize; for the best men are not always alike strong in faith.

2. See how desirous he was in this fright to retire into a desert, any whither to be far enough from hearing the voice of the enemy, and seeing their oppressions. He said, ver. 6, said it to God in prayer, said it to himself in meditation, said it to his friends in complaint, "O that I had wings like a dove!" As much as he had been sometimes in love with Jerusalem, now it was become a rebellious city he longed to get clear of it, and, like the prophet, wisheth he had in the wilderness a lodging place of wayfaring men, that he might leave his people and go from them, for they are an assembly of treacherous men, Jer. ix. 2. This agrees very well with David's resolution upon the breaking out of that plot, "Arise, let us flee, and make speed to depart," 2 Sam. xv. 14. Observe,

1st. How he would make his escape; he was so surrounded with enemies that he saw not how he could escape but upon the wing, and therefore wisheth, "O that I had wings," not like a hawk, that flies strongly, but "like a dove," that flies swiftly; he wishes not for wings to fly upon the prey, but to fly from the birds of prey; for such his enemies were. The wings of a dove were most agreeable to him who was of a dovelike spirit, and therefore the wings of an eagle would not become him. The dove flies low, and takes shelter as soon as she can; and thus would David fly.

2nd. What he would make his escape from; "from the windy storm and tempest," the tumult and ferment that the city was now in, and the danger to which he was exposed. Herein he was like a dove that cannot endure noise.

3rd. What he aimed at in making this escape; not victory, but rest. "I would fly away and be at rest," ver. 6. I would fly any whither, if it were to a barren, frightful wilderness, never so far off, so I might be quiet, ver. 7. Note, Peace and quietness in silence and solitude is what the wisest and best of men have most earnestly coveted, and the more when they have been vexed and wearied with the noisiness and clamour of those about them. Gracious souls wish to retire from the hurry and bustle of this world, where they may sweetly enjoy God and themselves; and if there be any true peace on this side heaven, it is they that enjoy it in those retirements. This makes death desirable to a child of God, that it is a final escape from all the storms and tempests of this world to perfect and everlasting rest.

9 Destroy, O Lord, and divide their tongues:
For I have seen violence and strife in the city.

willingly sacrifice," or the sense may be, "I will offer a free-will offering." Patrick expresses it, "I will offer thee liberal sacrifices;" and Hammond, "I will sacrifice a voluntary oblation," which is a very good explanation.

liv. 7. The words "his desire" are unnecessarily added by the translators. The psalmist says, "Mine eye hath looked upon mine enemies."

lv. Title. The occasion of this psalm is not here stated, but the Chaldee refers it to the rebellion of Absalom. The Syriac ascribes it to David when he mourned over Absalom, who had been slain. These, however, are only conjectures; though the first of them is very probably correct.

lv. 2. The Syriac version is, "Hear me and answer me, and regard my cry and hear me." The Hebrew of the second clause is peculiar, and variously interpreted: "I shall wander about in my complaining, and lament;" "I am tossed about complaining and troubled;" "I am

10 Day and night they go about it upon the walls thereof:
Mischief also and sorrow are in the midst of it.
11 Wickedness is in the midst thereof:
Deceit and guile depart not from her streets.
12 For it was not an enemy that reproached me;
Then I could have borne it: [self against me;
Neither was it he that hated me that did magnify him-
Then I would have hid myself from him:
13 But it was thou, a man mine equal,
My guide, and mine acquaintance.
14 We took sweet counsel together,
And walked unto the house of God in company.
15 Let death seize upon them,
And let them go down quick into hell:
For wickedness is in their dwellings, and among them.

David here complains of his enemies, whose wicked plots had brought him, though not to his faith's end, yet to his wit's end, and prays against them by the spirit of prophecy. Observe here,

First. The character he gives of the enemies he feared. They were of the worst sort of men, and his description of them agrees very well with Absalom and his accomplices.

1. He complains of the city, Jerusalem, which strangely fell in with Absalom, and fell off from David, so that he had none there but his own guards and servants that he could repose any confidence in; "How is that faithful city become a harlot!" David did not take the representation of it from others, but with his own eyes, and with a sad heart, did himself see nothing but violence and strife in the city, ver. 9; for when they grew disaffected and disloyal to David they grew mischievous one to another. If he walked the rounds upon the walls of the city, he saw that violence and strife went about it day and night, and mounted its guards, ver. 10. All the arts and methods which the rebels used for the fortifying of the city were made up of violence and strife, and there were no remains of honesty or love among them. If he looked into the heart of the city, mischief and injury, mutual wrong and vexation, were in the midst of it; wickedness, all manner of wickedness, is in the midst thereof. Jusque datum sceleri, — 'wickedness was legalized;' "deceit and guile," and all manner of treacherous dealing, "departed not from her streets," ver. 11. It may be meant of the base and barbarous usage they gave to David's friends and such as they knew were firm and faithful to him; they did them all the mischief they could by fraud or force. Is this the character of Jerusalem, the royal city, and which is more, the holy city? and in David's time too, so soon after the thrones of judgment and the testimony of Israel were both placed there? Is "this the city that men call the perfection of beauty?" Lam. ii. 15. Is Jerusalem, the head-quarters of God's priests, so ill taught? Can Jerusalem be ungrateful to David himself, its own illustrious founder, and be made too hot for him? Let us not think strange at the corruptions and disorders of this church on earth, but long to see the new Jerusalem, where there is no violence or strife, no mischief or guile, and into which no unclean thing shall enter, nor any thing that disquiets.

2. He complains of one of the ringleaders of the conspiracy, that had been very industrious to foment jealousies, to misrepresent him and his government, and to incense the city against him; it was one that reproached him, as if he either abused his power, or neglected the use of it, for that was Absalom's malicious suggestion; "There is no man deputed of the king to hear thee," 2 Sam. xv. 3. That, and other the like accusations, were industriously spread among the people. And who was most active in it? Not a sworn enemy, not Shimei, or any of the nonjurors; "then I could have borne it." for I should not have expected better from them, (and we find how patiently he did bear Shimei's curses,) not one that professed to hate me, then I would have stood upon my guard against him, would have hid myself and my counsels from him, so that it would not have been in his power to betray me; "but it was thou, a man mine equal," ver. 13. The Chaldee paraphrase names Ahithophel as the person here meant, and nothing in that plot seems to have discouraged David so much as to hear that Ahithophel was among the conspirators with Absalom, 2 Sam. xv. 31, for he was the king's counsellor, 1 Chr. xxvii. 33. "It was thou, a man mine equal," one whom I esteemed as myself, a friend as mine own soul, whom I had laid in my bosom, and made hail-fellow with myself; to whom I had communicated all my secrets, and who knew my mind as well as I myself did; my guide with whom I advised, and by whom I was directed in all my affairs, whom I made president of the council, and prime minister of state; my intimate acquaintance, and familiar friend; this is the man that now abuseth me. I have been kind to him; but I find him thus basely ungrateful; I have put a trust in him, but I find him thus basely treacherous; nay, and he could not have done me the one half of the mischief he doth, if I had not shewed him so much respect. All this must needs be very grievous to an ingenuous mind, and yet this was not all. This traitor had seemed a saint, else he had never been David's bosom friend; ver. 14, "We took counsel together," spent many an hour together with a great deal of pleasure in religious discourse; or, as Dr. Hammond reads it, 'we joined ourselves together to the assembly;' I gave him the right hand of fellowship in holy ordinances, and then "we walked to the house of God in company," to attend the public service. Note, 1st. There always has been, and always will be, a mixture of good and bad, sound and unsound, in the visible church, between whom, perhaps, for a long time, we can discern no difference, but the Searcher of hearts doth. David, who went to the house of God in his sincerity, had Ahithophel in company with him, who went in his hypocrisy. The pharisee and the publican went together to the temple to pray; but, sooner or later, they that are perfect, and they that are not, will be made manifest. 2nd. Carnal policy may carry men on very far and very long in a profession of religion, while it is in fashion and will serve a turn. In the court of pious David, none more devout than Ahithophel, and yet his heart not right in the sight of God. 3rd. We must not wonder if we be sadly deceived in some that have made great pretensions to those two sacred things, —religion and friendship. David himself, though a very wise man, was thus imposed upon, which may make our like disappointments the more tolerable.

Secondly. His prayers against them, which we are both to stand in awe of and to comfort ourselves in, as prophecies, but not to copy into our prayers against any particular enemies of our own. He prays,

1. That God would disperse them as he did the Babel builders; ver. 9, "Destroy, O Lord, and divide their tongues;" that is, blast their counsels, by making them to disagree among themselves, and clash with one another. Send an evil spirit among them, that they may not understand one another; but be envious and jealous one of another. This prayer was answered in the turning of Ahithophel's counsel into foolishness, by setting up the counsel of Hushai against it. God often destroys the church's enemies by dividing them; nor is there a surer way to the destruction of any people than their division. A kingdom, an interest, divided against itself, cannot long stand.

2. That God would destroy them, as he did Dathan and Abiram, and their associates, who were confederate against Moses, whose throat being an open sepulchre, the earth therefore opened, and swallowed them up. This was then a new thing which God executed, Num. xvi. 30. But David prays that it might now be repeated, or something equivalent; ver. 15, "Let death seize upon them" by Divine warrant, "and let them go down quick into hell;" let them be dead, and buried, and damned in a moment; for wickedness is wherever they are, it is in the midst of them. The souls of impenitent sinners go down quick, or alive, into hell; for they have a perfect sense of their miseries, and shall, therefore, live still, that they may be still miserable. This prayer is a prophecy of the utter, the final, the everlasting ruin of all those who, whether secretly or openly, oppose and rebel against the Lord's Messiah.

16 As for me, I will call upon God;
And the LORD shall save me.
17 Evening, and morning, and at noon, will I pray,
And cry aloud:
And he shall hear my voice. [was against me:
18 He hath delivered my soul in peace from the battle that
For there were many with me.
19 God shall hear, and afflict them,
Even he that abideth of old. Selah.
Because they have no changes,
Therefore they fear not God. [with him:
20 He hath put forth his hands against such as be at peace
He hath broken his covenant.
21 The words of his mouth were smoother than butter,
But war was in his heart:
His words were softer than oil,
Yet were they drawn swords.
22 Cast thy burden upon the LORD,
And he shall sustain thee:
He shall never suffer the righteous to be moved.
23 But thou, O God, shalt bring them down into the pit of destruction: [days;
Bloody and deceitful men shall not live out half their
But I will trust in thee.

In these verses,

First. David perseveres in his resolution to call upon God; being well assured that he should not seek him in vain; ver. 16, "As for me," let them take what course they please to secure themselves; let violence and strife be their guards, prayer shall be mine; this I have found comfort in, and therefore this I will abide by. "I will call upon God," and commit myself to him, "and the Lord shall save me;" "for whosoever shall call on the name of the Lord," in a right manner, "shall be saved," Rom. x. 13. He resolves to be both fervent and frequent in this duty. 1. He will pray fervently. "I will pray, and cry aloud;" I will meditate, so the former word signifies; I will speak with my own heart, and the prayer shall come from thence. Then we pray aright when we pray with all that is within us; think first, and then pray over our thoughts; for the true nature of prayer is lifting up the heart to God. And having meditated, he will cry, he will cry aloud; the fervour of his spirit in prayer shall be expressed, and yet more excited by the intenseness and earnestness of his voice. 2. He will pray frequently, every day, and three times a day; "Evening, and morning, and at noon." It is probable this had been his constant practice, and he resolves to continue it now he is in his distress. And then we may come the more boldly to the throne of grace in trouble, when we do not then first begin to scrape acquaintance with God, as I may say, but it is what we have constantly practised, and the trouble finds the wheels of prayer agoing. They that think three meals a day little enough for the body ought much more to think three solemn prayers a day little enough for the soul, and to count it a pleasure, not a task. As it is fit in the morning we should begin the day with God, and in the evening close it with him, so it is fit in the midst of the day we should retire awhile to converse with him. It was Daniel's practice to pray three times a day, Dan. vi. 10; and noon was one of Peter's hours of prayer, Acts x. 9. Let not us be weary of praying often, for God is not weary of hearing; "he shall hear my voice," and not blame me for coming too often, but the oftener the better, the more welcome.

Secondly. He assures himself that God would in due time give an answer of peace to his prayers.

1. That he himself should be delivered, and his fears prevented; those fears with which he was much disordered, ver. 4, 5, by the exercise of faith were now silenced, and he begins to rejoice in hope; ver. 18, "God has delivered my soul in peace," that is, he will deliver it, and David is as sure of the deliverance as if it were already wrought. His enemies were at war with him, and the battle was against him, but God delivered him in peace, that is, brought him off with as much comfort as if he had never been in danger. If he did not deliver him in victory yet he delivered him in peace, inward peace, he delivered his soul in peace; by patience and holy joy in God he kept possession of that. Those are safe and easy whose hearts and minds are kept by that "peace of God which passeth all understanding," Phil. iv. 7. David, in his fright, thought all were against him, but now he sees there were many with him,—more than he imagined; his interest proved better than he expected, and this he gives God the glory of; for it is he that raiseth us up friends when we need them, and makes them faithful to us. There were many with him; for though his subjects deserted him, and went over to Absalom, yet God was with him, and the good angels. With an eye of faith he now sees himself sur-borne down in my sorrow, and am in great perturbation;" "I am distressed in musing, and cry out." We think the true sense is, "I am agitated by my reflections, and am in confusion." The reference is to the inward thoughts of the psalmist upon his outward troubles, and the internal distress which he experienced.

lv. 15. The Syriac is, "Bring death upon them, and let them come down alive to Sheol;" Symmachus translates, "Let death overtake them suddenly." The idea of Gesenius is, "Let death take them by surprise;" but Fürst thinks it should rather be, "Let death overspread them." A various reading is, "Desolations on them!" The second clause, "Let them go down to Sheol alive," is not a reference to the place of torment, though it is difficult to reconcile it with the fancy that the Hebrews had no conception of a future state of rewards and punishments, nor even of another life.

lv. 18. The Syriac is, "Deliver my soul from those who know me, for in contention they were with me." The Greek is "He will deliver rounded, as Elisha was, with chariots of fire, and horses of fire, and therefore triumphs thus, "There are many with me," more with me than against me, 2 Kin. vi. 16, 17.

2. That his enemies should be reckoned with, and brought down. They had frighted him with their menaces, ver. 3, but here he saith enough to frighten them, and make them tremble with more reason, and no remedy, for they could not ease themselves of their fears as David could, by faith in God.

1st. David here gives their character, as the reason why he expected God would bring them down. First. They were impious and profane, and stand in no awe of God, of his authority or wrath; ver. 19, "Because they have no changes," no afflictions, no interruption to the constant course of their prosperity, no crosses to empty them from vessel to vessel, "therefore they fear not God;" they live in a constant neglect and contempt of God and religion, which is the cause of all their other wickedness, and by which they are certainly marked for destruction. Secondly. They are treacherous and false, and will not be held by the most sacred and solemn engagements; ver. 20, "He hath put forth his hand against such as be at peace with him,"—that never provoked him, nor gave him any cause to quarrel with them; nay, to whom he had given all possible encouragement to expect kindness from him. He has put forth his hand against those whom he had given his hand to, "and has broken his covenant," both with God and man,—has perfidiously violated his engagements to both, than which nothing makes men riper for ruin. Thirdly. They are base and hypocritical; pretending friendship while they design mischief; ver. 21, "The words of his mouth" (probably he means Ahithophel particularly,) "were smoother than butter, and softer than oil;" so courteous was he, and obliging,—so free in his professions of respect and kindness, and the proffers of his service,—and yet at the same time, "war was in his heart;" and all this courtesy was but a stratagem of war, and those very words had such a mischievous design in them that they were as drawn swords designed to stab. They smile in a man's face, and cut his throat at the same time, as Joab, that kissed and killed. Satan is such an enemy that flatters men into their ruin; "when he speaks fair, believe him not."

2nd. David here foretells their ruin. First. "God shall afflict them," and bring them into straits and frights, and recompense tribulation to them that have troubled his people, and this in answer to the prayers of his people; "God shall hear and afflict them,"—hear the cries of the oppressed, and speak terror to their oppressors; "even he that abideth of old," who is God from everlasting and world without end, and who sits Judge from the beginning of time, and hath always presided in the affairs of the children of men. Mortal men, though never so high and strong, will easily be crushed by an eternal God, and are a very unequal match for him. This the saints have comforted themselves with in reference to the threatening power of the church's enemies, Hab. i. 12, "Art thou not from everlasting, O Lord?" Secondly. "God shall bring them down," not only to the dust, but "to the pit of destruction," ver. 23; to the bottomless pit, which is called destruction, Job xxvi. 6. He afflicted them, ver. 19, to see if that would humble and reform them; but they not being wrought upon by that, he shall at last bring them to ruin. Those that are not reclaimed by the rod of affliction will certainly be brought down into the pit of destruction. They are bloody and deceitful men; that is, the worst of men, and therefore shall not live out half their days, that is, not half so long as men ordinarily live, and as they might have lived in a course of nature, and as they themselves expected to live. They shall live as long as the Lord of life, the righteous judge, has appointed, with whom the number of our months is, but he has determined to cut them off by an untimely death in the midst of their days. They were bloody men, and cut others off, and therefore God will justly cut them off. They were deceitful men, and defrauded others of the one half perhaps of what was their due, and now God will cut them short, though not of that which was their due, yet of that which they counted upon.

Thirdly. He encourageth himself and all good people to commit themselves to God, with confidence in him. He himself resolves to do so; ver. 23, "I will trust in thee," in thy providence, and power, and mercy, and not in my own prudence, strength, or merit. When bloody and deceitful men are cut off in the midst of their days, I shall still live by faith in thee. And this he will have others to do; ver. 22, "Cast thy burthen upon the Lord," whoever thou art that art burthened, and whatever the burthen is. 'Cast thy gift upon the Lord,' so some read it; whatever blessings God has bestowed upon thee to enjoy, commit them all to his custody, and particularly commit the keeping of thy soul to him. Or, whatever it is that thou desirest God should give thee, leave it to him to give it thee in his own way and time. 'Cast thy care upon the Lord,' so the Seventy, to which the apostle refers, 1 Pet. v. 7. Care is a burthen; it maketh the heart stoop, Pr. xii. 25; we must cast it upon God by faith and prayer, commit our way and works to him; "Let him do as seemeth him good," and we will be satisfied. To cast our burthen upon God is to stay ourselves on his providence and promise, and to be very easy in the assurance that all shall work for good. If we do so, it is promised, 1. That he will sustain us, both support and supply us; will himself carry us in the arms of his power, as the nurse carries the sucking child; will strengthen our spirits so by his Spirit as that they shall sustain the infirmity. He has not promised presently to free us from that trouble which gives rise to our cares and fears, but he will provide that we be not tempted above what we are able, and that we shall be able according as we are tempted. 2. That he "will never suffer the righteous to be moved," to be so shaken by any troubles as to quit either their duty to God or their comfort in him. However, 'He will not suffer them to be moved for ever,' as some read it; though they fall, they shall not be utterly cast down.

PSALM LVI.

It seems by this, and many other psalms, that even in times of the greatest trouble and distress David never hung his harp upon the willow trees, never unstrung it, or laid it by; but when his dangers and fears were greatest yet still he was in tune for singing God's praises. He was in imminent peril when he penned this psalm, at least when he meditated it; yet even then his meditation of God was sweet. I. He complains of the malice of his enemies, and begs mercy for himself, and justice against them, ve.. 1, 2, 5—7. II. He confides in God, being assured that he took his part, comforting himself with this, that therefore he was safe, and should be victorious, and that while he lived he should praise God. ver. 3, 4, 8—13. How pleasantly may a good Christian, in singing this psalm, rejoice in God, and praise him for what he will do, as well as for what he hath done.

To the chief Musician upon Jonath-elem-rechokim, Michtam of David, when the Philistines took him in Gath.

BE merciful unto me, O God: for man would swallow me up;
He fighting daily oppresseth me.
2 Mine enemies would daily swallow me up: many be they that fight against me, O thou most High.
For they be
3 What time I am afraid,
I will trust in thee.
4 In God I will praise his word,
In God I have put my trust;
I will not fear what flesh can do unto me.
5 Every day they wrest my words:
All their thoughts are against me for evil.
6 They gather themselves together,
They hide themselves, they mark my steps,
When they wait for my soul.
7 Shall they escape by iniquity?
In thine anger cast down the people, O God.

David in this psalm, by his faith, throws himself into the hands of God, then when he had by his fear and folly thrown himself into the hands of the Philistines. It was when they took him in Gath, whither he fled for fear of Saul, forgetting the quarrel they had with him for killing Goliath; but they soon put him in mind of it, 1 Sam. xxi. 10, 11. Upon that occasion he changed his behaviour, but with so little ruffle to his temper that then he penned both this psalm and the 34th. This is called Michtam, 'a golden psalm.' So some other psalms are entitled, but this has something peculiar in the title; it is "upon Jonath-elem-rechokim," which signifies, 'the silent dove afar off;' some apply that to David himself, who wished for the wings of a dove on which to fly away. He was innocent and inoffensive, mild and patient as a dove; was at this time driven from his nest, from the sanctuary, Ps. lxxxiv. 3; was forced to wander afar off, to seek for shelter in distant countries. There he was like the doves of the valleys, mourning and melancholy; but silent, neither murmuring against God nor railing at the instruments of his trouble; herein a type of Christ, who was as a sheep dumb before the shearers, and a pattern to Christians, who, wherever they are, and whatever injuries are done them, ought to be as silent doves. In this former part of the psalm,

First. He complains to God of the malice and wickedness of his enemies, to shew what reason he had to fear them, and what cause, what need, there was that God should appear against them; ver. 1, "Be merciful to me, O God." That petition includes all the good we come to the throne of grace for. If we obtain mercy there, we obtain all we can desire; and need no more to make us happy. It implies likewise our best plea, not our merit, but God's mercy; his free, rich mercy. He prays he might find mercy with God; for with men he could find no mercy. When he fled from the cruel hands of Saul he fell into the cruel hands of the Philistines. Lord, saith he, be thou merciful to me now, or I am undone. The mercy of God is what we may flee to, and trust to, and in faith pray for, when we are surrounded on all sides with difficulties and dangers. He complains,

1. That his enemies were very numerous; ver. 2, "They be many that fight against me," and think to overpower me with numbers. Take notice of this, "O thou Most High," and make it to appear that wherein they deal proudly thou art above them. It is a point of honour to come in to the help of one against many; and if God be on our side, how many soever they are that fight against us, we may upon good grounds boast that there are more with us; for (as that great general said,) 'How many do we reckon him for?'

2. That they were very barbarous. They would swallow him up, ver. 1; and again, ver. 2, they sought to devour him; no less would serve; they came upon him with the utmost fury, like beasts of prey, to eat up his flesh, Ps. xxvii. 2. Man would swallow him up, those of his own kind, from whom he might have expected humanity. The ravenous beasts prey not upon those of their own species, yet a bad man would devour a good man if he could. They are men weak and frail; make them to know that they are so, Ps. ix. 20.

3. That they were very unanimous; ver. 6, "They gather themselves together." Though they were many, and of different interests among themselves, yet they united and combined against David, as Herod and Pilate against the Son of David.

4. That they were very powerful; quite too hard for him if God did not help him. "They fight against me," ver. 2; they oppress me, ver. 1; I am almost overcome and borne down by them, and reduced to the last extremity.

5. That they were very subtle and crafty; ver. 6, "They hide themselves;" industriously cover their designs, that they may the more effectually prosecute and pursue them. They hide themselves as a lion in his den, that they may mark my steps; that is, they observe every thing I say and do with a critical eye, that they may have something to accuse me of. Thus Christ's enemies watched him, Lu. xx. 20. Or, they have an eye upon all my motions, that they may gain an opportunity to do me a mischief, and may lay their snares for me.

6. That they were very spiteful and malicious. They put invidious constructions upon every thing he said, though never so honestly meant, and prudently expressed; ver. 5, "They wrest my words," put them upon the rack to extort that out of them which was never in them, and so they made him an offender for a word, Isa. xxix. 21; misrepresenting it to Saul, and aggravating it, to incense him yet more against him. They made it their whole business to ruin David, all their thoughts were against him for evil, which put evil interpretations upon all his words.

7. That they were very restless and unwearied. They continually waited for his soul; it was the life, the precious life, they hunted for; it was his death they longed for, ver. 6. They fought daily against him, ver. 1, and would daily swallow him up, ver. 2, and every day they wrested his words, ver. 5. Their malice would not admit the least cessation of arms, or the acts of hostility, but they were continually pushing at him. Such as this is the enmity of Satan and his agents against the kingdom of Christ, and the interests of his holy religion, which, if we cordially espouse, we must not think it strange to meet with such treatment as this, as though some strange thing happened to us. Our betters have been thus used; "so persecuted they the prophets."

Secondly. He encourageth himself in God, and in his promises, power, and providence, ver. 3, 4. In the midst of his complaints, and before he has said what he has to say of his enemies, he triumphs in the Divine protection. 1. He resolves to make God his confidence, then when dangers were most threatening, and all other confidences failed; "what time I am afraid," in the day of my fear, when I am most terrified from without, and most timorous within, then "I will trust in thee," and thereby my fears shall be silenced. Note, There are some times which are in a special manner times of fear with God's people; and in these times it is their duty and interest to trust in God, as their God, and to know whom they have trusted. This will fix the heart, and keep it in peace. 2. He resolves to make God's promises the matter of his praises, and so we have reason to make them; ver. 4, "In God I will praise," not only his work which he has done, but "his word" which he has spoken; I will give him thanks for a promise, though not yet performed. "In God;" that is, my soul in peace from those who come nigh me, for among many they were with me." These variations must be due to various readings. Many explain the deliverance of the future: "He will deliver my soul in peace from the battle wherein I am engaged." The latter clause is explained by some, "for many are with me," or on my side; and by others, "though many are against me," or "when with many they are against me." The last explanation is a very good one; God gives his people peace when many make war upon them.

lvi. Title. The Hebrew words, "Jonath-elem-rechokim," have been left untranslated, in accordance with the plan usually followed in our version in dealing with technical expressions. Gesenius says the words mean "the dumb dove among foreigners;" i.e., perhaps the people of Israel in exile, the title of a poem to the tune of which this psalm was sung. By an altered division of the letters, Fürst makes the phrase "dove of God from the remoteness of the sea," which may have been the commencement of an exile song. As the first words of in his strength, and by his assistance, I will both glory in his word and give him the glory of it. "His word;" that is, his providences, (so some,) every event that he orders and appoints concerning me. When I speak well of God, with him I will speak well of every thing that he doth. 3. Thus supported, he will bid defiance to all adverse powers; when "in God I have put my trust," I am safe, I am easy, and "I will not fear what flesh can do unto me." It is but flesh, and cannot do much; nay, it can do nothing but by Divine permission. As we must not trust to an arm of flesh when it is engaged for us, so we must not be afraid of an arm of flesh when it is stretched out against us.

Thirdly. He foresees and foretells the fall of those that fought against him, and of all others that think to establish themselves in and by any wicked practices; ver. 7, "Shall they escape by iniquity?" They hope to escape God's judgments as they escape men's, by violence and fraud, and the arts of injustice and treachery; but shall they escape? No, certainly, they shall not; the sin of sinners will never be their security; nor will either their impudence or their hypocrisy bring them off at God's bar; God will in his anger cast down, and cast out such people, Rom. ii. 3. None are raised so high, or settled so firm, but that the justice of God can bring them down, both from their dignities and from their confidences; "Who knows the power of God's anger," how high it can reach, and how home it can strike?

8 Thou tellest my wanderings:
Put thou my tears into thy bottle:

LACHRYMATORIES.

Are they not in thy book?
9 When I cry unto thee, then shall mine enemies turn [back:
This I know; for God is for me.
10 In God will I praise his word:
In the LORD will I praise his word
11 In God have I put my trust:
I will not be afraid what man can do unto me.
12 Thy vows are upon me, O God:
I will render praises unto thee.
13 For thou hast delivered my soul from death:
Wilt not thou deliver my feet from falling,
That I may walk before God in the light of the living?

Several things David here comforts himself with in the day of his distress and fear.

First. That God took particular notice of all his grievances and all his griefs, ver. 8. 1. Of all the inconveniences of his state; "Thou tellest my wanderings," 'my flittings,' so the old translation. David was now but a young man, (under thirty,) and yet he had had many removes from his father's house to the court, thence to the camp, and now driven out to sojourn where he could find a place, but not allowed to rest any where; "hunted like a partridge upon the mountains." Continual terrors and toils attended him; but this comforted him, that God kept a particular account of all his motions, and numbered all the weary steps he took by night or by day. Note, God takes cognizance of all the afflictions of his people, and those whom men have cast out from their converse he has not cast out from his care and love. 2. Of all the impressions those made upon his spirit. When he was wandering, he was often weeping; and therefore prays, "Put thou my tears into thy bottle," to be preserved and looked upon; nay, I know they are in thy book, the book of thy remembrance; God has a bottle and a book for his people's tears, both those for their sins and those for their afflictions. This intimates, 1st. That he observes them with compassion and tender concern; he is afflicted in their afflictions, and knows their souls in adversity. As the blood of his saints and their deaths are precious in the sight of the Lord, so are their tears, not one of them shall fall to the ground. "I have seen thy tears," 2 Kin. xx. 5; "I have heard Ephraim bemoaning himself," Jer. xxxi. 18. 2nd. That he will remember them, and review them, as we do the accounts we have booked. Paul was mindful of Timothy's tears, 2 Tim. i. 4; and God will not forget the sorrows of his people. The tears of God's persecuted people are bottled up, and sealed among God's treasures; and when these books come to be opened, they will be found vials of wrath which will be poured out upon their persecutors, whom God will surely reckon with for all the tears they have forced from his people's eyes; and they will be breasts of consolations to God's mourners, whose sackcloth will be turned into garments of praise. God will comfort his people according to the time wherein he has afflicted them, and give to them to reap in joy who sowed in tears. What was sown a tear will come up a pearl.

Secondly. That his prayers would be powerful for the defeat and discomfiture of the enemies, as well as for his own support and encouragement; ver. 9, "When I cry unto thee, then shall my enemies turn back;" I need no other weapons but prayers and tears; "this I know, for God is for me," to plead my cause, to protect and deliver me, and if God be for me, who can be against me so as to prevail? The saints have God for them, they may know it; and to him they must cry when they are surrounded with enemies, which if they do in faith they shall find a Divine power exerted and engaged for them; their enemies shall be made to turn back; their spiritual enemies, against whom we fight best upon our knees, Eph. vi. 19.

Thirdly. That his faith in God would set him above the fear of man, ver. 10, 11. Here he repeats with a strong pathos what he had said, ver. 4, "In God will I praise his word; that is, I will firmly depend upon the promise for the sake of him that made it, who is true and faithful, and has wisdom, power, and goodness enough to make it good. When we give credit to a man's bill we honour him that drew it. So when we do and suffer for God in a dependence upon his promise, not staggering at it, we give glory to God, we praise his word, and so give praise to him. Having thus put his trust in God, he looks with a holy contempt upon the threatening power of man. "In God have I put my trust," and in him only, and therefore, "I will not be afraid what man can do unto me," though I know very well what he would do if he could, ver. 1, 2. This triumphant word, so expressive of a holy magnanimity, the apostle puts into the mouth of every true believer, whom he makes a Christian hero, Heb. xiii. 6. We may each of us boldly say, "The Lord is my helper," and then "I will not fear what man shall do unto me;" for he has no power but what he has given him from above.

Fourthly. That he was in bonds to God; ver. 12, "Thy vows are upon me, O God." Not upon me as a burthen which I am loaded with, but as a badge which I glory in, as that by which I am known to be thy menial servant; not upon me as fetters that hamper me, (such are superstitious vows,) but upon me as a bridle that restrains me from what would be hurtful to me, and directs me in the way of my duty. "Thy vows," that is, the vows I have made to thee, to which thou art not only a witness but a party, and which thou hast commanded and encouraged me to make. It is probable, he means especially those vows which he had made to God in the day of his trouble and distress, which he would retain the remembrance of, and acknowledge the obligations of when his fright was over. Note, It ought to be the matter of our consideration and joy, that the vows of God are upon us; our baptismal vows renewed at the Lord's table, our occasional vows under convictions, under corrections. By these we are bound to live to God.

Fifthly. That he should still have more and more occasion to praise him; "I will render praises unto thee." This is part of the performances of his vows; for vows of thankfulness properly accompany prayers for mercy; and when the mercy is received must be made good. When we study what we shall render, this is the least we can resolve upon, to render praises to God. Poor returns for rich receiving. Two things he will praise God for:

1. For what he had done for him; ver. 13; "Thou hast delivered my soul," my life, "from death," which was just ready to seize me. If God have delivered us from sin, either from the commission of it by preventing grace, or from the punishment of it by pardoning mercy, we have reason to own that he has thereby delivered our souls from death, which is the wages of sin. If we who were by nature dead in sin are quickened together with Christ, and are made spiritually alive, we have reason to own that God has delivered our souls from death.

2. For what he would do for him; "Thou hast delivered my soul from death," and so hast given me a new life, and thereby hast given me an earnest of farther mercy, that thou wilt "deliver my feet from falling." Thou hast done the greater, and therefore thou wilt do the lesser; thou hast began a good work, and therefore thou wilt carry it on, and perfect it. This may be taken either as the matter of his prayer, pleading his experience, or as the matter of his praise, raising his expectations; and those that know how to praise in faith will give God thanks for mercies in promise and prospect as well as in possession. See here, 1st. What David hopes for, that God would deliver his feet from falling either into sin, which would wound his conscience, or into the appearance of sin, from which his enemies would take occasion to wound his good name. Those that think they stand must take heed lest they fall, because the best stand no longer than God is pleased to uphold them. We are weak, our way is slippery, many stumblingblocks are in it, our spiritual enemies are industrious to thrust us down; and therefore we are concerned by faith and prayer to commit ourselves to his care who keepeth the feet of his saints. 2nd. What he builds this hope upon; "Thou hast delivered my soul from death," and therein hast magnified thy power and goodness, and put me into a capacity of receiving farther mercy from thee; and now wilt thou not secure and crown thy own work? God never brought his people out of Egypt to slay them in the wilderness. He that in conversion delivers the soul from so great a death as sin is will not fail to preserve it to his heavenly kingdom. 3rd. What he designs in these hopes; "That I may walk before God in the light of the living," that is, First. That I may get to heaven, the only land of light and life; for in this world darkness and death reign. Secondly. That I may do my duty while this life lasts. Note, This we should aim at in all our desires and expectations of deliverance both from sin and trouble, that we may do God so much the better service; that, "being delivered out of the hands of our enemies, we may serve him without fear."

PSALM LVII.

This psalm is very like that which goes next before it; it was penned upon a like occasion, when David was both in danger of trouble and in temptation to sin. It begins as that did, "Be merciful to me;" the method also is the same. I. He begins with prayer and complaint, yet not without some assurance of speeding in his request, ver. 1—6. II. He concludes with joy and praise, ver. 7—11; so that from hence we may take direction and encouragement both in our supplications and in our thanksgivings, and may offer both to God in singing this psalm.

To the chief Musician, Al-taschith, Michtam of David, when he fled from Saul in the cave.

BE merciful unto me, O God, be merciful unto me:
For my soul trusteth in thee:
Yea, in the shadow of thy wings will I make my refuge,
Until these calamities be overpast.
2 I will cry unto God most high;
Unto God that performeth all things for me.
3 He shall send from heaven, and save me [Selah.
From the reproach of him that would swallow me up.
God shall send forth his mercy and his truth.
4 My soul is among lions:
And I lie even among them that are set on fire,
Even the sons of men, whose teeth are spears and arrows,
And their tongue a sharp sword.
5 Be thou exalted, O God, above the heavens:

a poem the sense may be incomplete, and we may very literally explain the words "dove of silence, far away;" to the tune of this poem the psalm was sung. The Greek, which is followed in the common Latin version, is obscure and incorrect. The Syriac is plain enough: "Of David; thanksgiving of the righteous man because he is delivered from the hand of the enemy, even from the hand of Saul; also concerning the Jews, and concerning the Messiah." The difficult words are here wholly omitted.

lvi. 2. The second clause is doubtfully rendered in our version, and it would be more natural to translate, "for they are many who fight against me loftily;" i.e., proudly, haughtily, as many critics have observed. The Greek and its imitators are still more inaccurate, but the Syriac is nearly correct.

lvi. 3. This verse and the one before it are thus rendered in the old Douay version: "Mine enemies have trodden upon me all the day; because they are many that war against me. From the height

Let thy glory be above all the earth.

6 They have prepared a net for my steps;
My soul is bowed down:
They have digged a pit before me,
Into the midst whereof they are fallen themselves. Selah.

The title of this psalm has one word new in it, Al-taschith,—'destroy not.' Some make it to be only some known tune to which this psalm was set; others apply it to the occasion and matter of the psalm. Destroy not, that is, David would not let Saul be destroyed, when now in the cave there was a fair opportunity of doing it, and his servants would fain have done it; No, saith David, "destroy him not," 1 Sam. xxiv. 4, 6; or rather, God would not let David be destroyed by Saul; he suffered him to persecute David, but still under this limitation, Destroy him not; as he permitted Satan to afflict Job, only save his life. David must not be destroyed, for a blessing is in him, Isa. lxv. 8; even Christ, the best of blessings. When David was in the cave in imminent peril, he here tells us what were the workings of his heart towards God; and happy they that have such good thoughts as these in their minds when they are in danger.

First. He supports himself with faith and hope in God, and prayer to him, ver. 1, 2. Seeing himself surrounded with enemies, he looks up to God with that suitable prayer, "Be merciful to me, O Lord;" which he again repeats, and it is no vain repetition, "Be merciful unto me." It was the publican's prayer, Lu. xviii. 13. It is pity any should use it slightly and profanely, should cry, 'God be merciful to us,' or 'Lord, have mercy upon us,' when they mean only to express their wonder, or surprise, or vexation; but God and his mercy are not in all their thoughts. It is with much devout affection that David here prays, "Be merciful unto me, O Lord;" look with compassion upon me, and in thy love and pity redeem me. To recommend himself to God's mercy, he here professeth,

1. That all his dependence is upon God. "My soul trusteth in thee," ver. 1. He did not only profess trust in God, but his soul did indeed rely on God only, with a sincere devotion, and self-dedication, and an entire complacency and satisfaction. He goes to God, and at the footstool of the throne of his grace humbly professeth his confidence in him, "In the shadow of thy wings will I make my refuge," as the chickens take shelter under the wings of the hen, when the birds of prey are ready to strike at them, "until these calamities be overpast." 1st. He was confident his troubles would end well in due time; these calamities will be overpast; the storm will blow over. Non si male nunc et olim sic erit,—'Though now distressed, I shall not always be so.' Our Lord Jesus comforted himself with this in his sufferings; Lu. xxii. 37, "The things concerning me have an end." 2nd. He was very easy under the Divine protection in the meantime. First. He comforted himself in the goodness of God's nature, by which he is inclined to succour and protect his people, as the hen is by instinct to shelter her young ones. God comes upon the wing to the help of his people, which notes a speedy deliverance, Ps. xviii. 10; and he takes them under his wing, which notes warmth and refreshment, even when the calamities are upon them: see Mat. xxiii. 37. Secondly. In the promise of his word, and the covenant of his grace; for it may refer to the outstretched wings of the cherubims, between which God is said to dwell, Ps. lxxx. 1; and from whence he gave his oracles. To God as the God of grace will I fly, and his promise shall be my refuge, and a sure passport it will be through all these dangers. God by his promise offers himself to us to be trusted, we by our faith must accept of him, and put our trust in him.

2. That all his desire is towards God; ver. 2, "I will cry unto God most high" for succour and relief; to him that is most high will I lift up my soul, and pray earnestly, even "unto God that performeth all things for me." Note, 1st. In every thing that befalls us we ought to see and own the hand of God. Whatever is done is of his performing, in it his counsel is accomplished, and the Scripture is fulfilled. 2nd. Whatever God performs concerning his people, it will appear in the issue to have been performed for them, and for their benefit. Though God be high, most high, yet he condescends so low as to take care that all things be made to work for good to them. 3rd. This is a good reason why we should in our straits and difficulties cry unto him; not only pray, but pray earnestly.

3. That all his expectation is from God; ver. 3, "He shall send from heaven and save me." They that make God their only refuge, and fly to him by faith and prayer, may be sure of salvation in his way and time. Observe here, 1st. Whence he expects the salvation. "From heaven." Look which way he will on this earth, and refuge fails, no help appears, but he looks for it "from heaven." They that lift up their hearts to things above, may from thence expect all good. 2nd. What the salvation is that he expects. He trusts God will save him from the reproach of those that would swallow up, that aimed to ruin him, and in the meantime did all they could to vex him. Some read it, 'He shall send from heaven and save me, for he hath put to shame him that would swallow me up;' he hath disappointed their designs against me hitherto, and therefore he will perfect my deliverance. 3rd. What he will ascribe his salvation to; "God shall send forth his mercy and truth." God is good in himself, and faithful to every word that he hath spoken, and so he makes it appear when he works deliverance for his people. We need no more to make us happy, but to have the benefit of the mercy and truth of God, Ps. xxv. 10.

Secondly. He represents the power and malice of his enemies; ver. 4, "My soul is among lions." So fierce and furious was Saul, and those about him against David, he might have been as safe in a den of lions as among such men, that were continually roaring against him, and ready to make a prey of him. They are set on fire, and breathe nothing but flame; they set on fire the course of nature, inflaming one another against David, and they were themselves set on fire of hell, Jas. iii. 6. They were sons of men, from whom one might have expected something of the reason and compassion of a man; but they were beasts of prey in the shape of men, their teeth which they gnashed upon him, and with which they hoped to tear him to pieces, and to eat him up, were spears and arrows fitted for mischiefs and murders; and their tongues, with which they cursed him and wounded his reputation, was as a sharp sword to cut and kill: see Ps. xlvii. 10. A spiteful tongue is a dangerous weapon wherewith Satan's instruments fight against God's people. He describes their malicious projects against him, ver. 6, and shews the issue of them: "They have prepared a net for my steps" in which to take me, that I might not again escape out of their hands; "They have digged a pit before me," that I might, ere I was aware, run headlong into it. See the policies of the church's enemies, see the pains they take to do mischief; but let us see what comes of it. 1. It is indeed some disturbance to David: "My soul is bowed down." It made him droop and hang the head to think that there should be those that bore him so much ill-will. But, 2. It was destruction to themselves; they digged a pit for David, "into the midst whereof they are fallen." The mischief they designed against David returned upon themselves, and they were themselves embarrassed in their counsels. Then when Saul was pursuing David, the Philistines were invading him; nay, in the cave, when Saul thought David should fall into his hands, he fell into the hands of David, and lay at his mercy.

Thirdly. He prays to God to glorify himself and his own great name; ver. 5, Whatever comes of me and my interest, "Be thou exalted, O God, above the heavens," he thou praised by the holy angels, those glorious inhabitants of the upper world; "and let thy glory be above," or over "all the earth;" let all the inhabitants of this earth be brought to know and praise thee. Thus God's glory should lie nearer our hearts, and we should be more concerned for that than for any particular interests of our own. When David was in the greatest distress and disgrace, he did not pray, Lord, exalt me, but, Lord, exalt thine own name. Thus the Son of David, when his soul was troubled, and he prayed, "Father, save me from this hour," presently withdrew that petition, and presented this in the room of it, "For this cause came I to this hour, Father, glorify thy name," Jno. xii. 27, 28. Or it may be taken as a plea to enforce his petition for deliverance: Lord, send from heaven to save me, and thereby thou wilt glorify thyself as the God both of heaven and earth. Our best encouragement in prayer is taken from the glory of God, and to that, therefore, more than our own comfort, we should have an eye in all our petitions for particular mercies; for this is made the first petition in the Lord's prayer, as that which regulates and directs all the rest, "Father in heaven, hallowed be thy name."

7 My heart is fixed, O God, my heart is fixed:
I will sing and give praise.
8 Awake up, my glory; awake, psaltery and harp:
I myself will awake early.
9 I will praise thee, O Lord, among the people:
I will sing unto thee among the nations.
10 For thy mercy is great unto the heavens,
And thy truth unto the clouds.
11 Be thou exalted, O God, above the heavens:
Let thy glory be above all the earth.

How strangely is the tune altered here! David's prayers and complaints, by the lively actings of faith, are here all of a sudden turned into praises and thanksgivings; his sackcloth is loosed, and he is girded with gladness, and his hallelujahs are as fervent as his hosannas. This should make us in love with prayer, that sooner or later it will be swallowed up in praise. Observe,

First. How he prepares himself for the duty of praise; ver. 7, "My heart is fixed, O God, my heart is fixed." My heart is erect, or lifted up, (so some,) which was bowed down, ver. 6. "My heart is fixed," 1. With reference to God's providences, it is prepared for every event, being stayed upon God, Ps. cxii. 7; Isa. xxvi. 3. "My heart is fixed," and then "none of these things move me," Acts xx. 24. If by the grace of God we be brought into this even composed frame of spirit, we have great reason to be thankful. 2. With reference to the worship of God; "My heart is fixed," to sing and give praise. It is implied that the heart is the main thing required in all acts of devotion; nothing is done to purpose in religion farther than it is done with the heart. The heart must be fixed; fixed for the duty, fitted and put in frame for it; fixed in the duty by a close application; "attending on the Lord without distraction."

Secondly. How he excites himself to the duty of praise; ver. 8, "Awake up my glory," that is, my tongue. Our tongue is our glory, and never more so than when it is employed in praising God. Or, my soul, that must be first awakened. Dull and sleepy devotions will never be acceptable to God; we must stir up ourselves and all that is within us to praise God; with a holy fire must that sacrifice be kindled, and ascend in a holy flame. David's tongue will lead, and his psaltery and harp will follow, in these hymns of praise. "I myself will awake," not only I will not be dead, and drowsy, and careless in this work, but I will be in the most lively frame that may be, as one newly awakened out of a refreshing sleep. He will awake early to this work, early in the morning, to begin the day with God; early in the beginnings of a mercy. When God is coming towards us with his favours, we must go forth to meet him with our praises.

Thirdly. How he pleaseth himself, and (as I may say) even prides himself in the work of praise. So far is he from being ashamed to own his obligations to God, and dependence upon him, that he resolves to praise him among the people, and to sing unto him among the nations, ver. 9. This intimates, 1. That his own heart was much affected and enlarged in praising God. He would even make the earth ring with his sacred songs, that all might take notice how much he thought himself indebted to the goodness of God. 2. That he desired to bring others in to join with him in praising God. He will publish God's praises among the people, that the knowledge, and fear, and love of God might be propagated, and the ends of the earth might see his salvation. When David was driven out into heathen lands, he would not only not worship their gods, but he would openly avow his veneration for the God of Israel, would take his religion along with him wherever he went, would endeavour to bring others in love with it, and leave the sweet savour of it behind im. David in his psalms, which fill the universal church, and will to the end of time, may be said to be still praising God among the people, and singing to him among the nations, for all good people make use of his words in praising God. Thus St. John in his writings is said to "prophesy again before many peoples and nations," Rev. x. 11.

Fourthly. How he furnisheth himself with matter for praise, ver. 10. That which was the matter of his hope and comfort, ver. 3, "God shall send forth his mercy and his truth," is here the matter of his thanksgiving: "Thy mercy is great unto the heavens," that is, it is great beyond conception and expression; "and thy truth unto the clouds," that is, it is great beyond discovery, for what eye can reach that which is wrapped up in the clouds? God's mercy and truth reach to the heavens, for they will bring all such to heaven as lay up their treasure in them, and build their hopes upon them. God's mercy and truth are praised even to the heavens, that is, by all the bright and blessed inhabitants of the upper world, who are continually raising God's praises to the highest, while David on earth is endeavouring to spread his praises to the farthest, ver. 9.

Fifthly. How he leaves it at last to God to glorify his own name; ver. 11, "Be thou exalted, O God." The same words which he had used, ver. 5, to sum up his prayers in, he here useth again (and no vain repetition) to sum up his praises in; Lord, I desire to exalt thy name, and that all the creatures may exalt it; but what can the best of us do towards it? Lord, take the work into thine own hands; do it thyself, "be thou exalted, O God." In the praises of the church triumphant thou art exalted to the heaven, and in the praises of the church militant thy glory is throughout all the earth; but thou art above all the blessing and praise of both, Neh. ix. 5, and therefore, Lord, exalt thyself "above the heavens, and above all the earth;" "Father, glorify thine own name; thou hast glorified it, glorify it yet again."

of the day I shall fear, but I will trust in thee." The Greek is, "My enemies have trodden me down all day, from the height of the day; for many who make war upon me shall fear, but I will hope in thee." Here, as in a great many other cases, the Hebrew text is altogether preferable to the majority of the ancient versions, which are, nevertheless, incidentally of the greatest value.

lvi. 8. We may translate this verse, "Thou determinest my wandering; put my tears in thy bottle; are they not in thy book?" It has been said that although the tears of mourners were collected in small bottles, called lachrymatories, among the Greeks and Romans, no such custom existed among the Hebrews. But in the presence of a passage like the one before us, the utmost we can say is that, although no clear record of such a custom among the Hebrews exists, there is proof in these words that they must have been acquainted with such a custom. Dr. Kitto says the modern Persians weep abundantly in their annual lamentations for Ali, and that "when at

PSALM LVIII.

It is the probable conjecture of some, Amyraldus particularly, that before Saul began to prosecute David by force of arms, and raised the militia to seize him, he formed a process against him by course of law; upon which he was condemned unheard, and attainted as a traitor by the great council, or supreme court of judicature, and then proclaimed an outlaw; qui caput gerit lupinum,—'an outlawed wolf,' whom any man might kill, and no man might protect. And upon occasion of passing this bill of attainder, which the elders did to curry favour with Saul, David penned this psalm, wherein, I. He describes their sin, and aggravates that, ver. 1—5. II. He imprecates and foretells their ruin, and the judgments which the righteous God would bring upon them for their injustice, ver. 6—9; which would redound, 1. To the comfort of the saints, ver. 10; 2. To the glory of God, ver. 11. Sin appears here both exceedingly sinful and exceedingly dangerous, and God a just avenger of wrong; with which we should be affected in singing this psalm.

To the chief Musician, Al-taschith, Michtam of David.

DO ye indeed speak righteousness, O congregation?
Do ye judge uprightly, O ye sons of men?
2 Yea, in heart ye work wickedness;
Ye weigh the violence of your hands in the earth.
3 The wicked are estranged from the womb:
They go astray as soon as they be born, speaking lies.
4 Their poison is like the poison of a serpent:
They are like the deaf adder that stoppeth her ear;
Which will not hearken to the voice of charmers,
Charming never so wisely.

SERPENT CHARMERS.

We have reason to think that this psalm refers to the malice of Saul and his janizaries against David, because it bears the same inscription (Al-taschith, and Michtam of David,) with that which goes before and that which follows, both which appear by the title to have been penned with reference to that persecution through which God preserved him that he was not destroyed, Al-taschith, 'destroy not;' and therefore the psalms he then penned were precious to him, Michtam, David's jewels, as Dr. Hammond translates it. In these verses David, not as a king, for he was not yet come to the throne, but as a prophet, in God's name arraigns and convicts his judges, with more authority and justice than they shewed in prosecuting him. Two things he chargeth them with:

First. The corruption of their government. They were a congregation, a bench of justices, nay, perhaps a congress or convention of the states, from whom one might have expected fair dealing, for they were men learned in the laws, had been brought up in the study of these statutes and judgments, which were so righteous, that those of other nations were not to be compared with them. One cannot think a congregation of such could be bribed and biassed with pensions, and yet it seems they were, because the son of Kish could do that for them which the son of Jesse could not, 1 Sam. xxii. 7. He had vineyards, and fields, and preferments to give them, and therefore to please him they would do any thing, right or wrong. Of all the melancholy views which Solomon took of this earth and its grievances, nothing vexed him so much as to see that in the place of judgment wickedness was there, Eccl. iii. 16. So it was in Saul's time.

1. The judges would not do right, would not protect or vindicate oppressed innocency; ver. 1, "Do ye indeed speak righteousness, or judge uprightly?" No, you are far from it, your own consciences cannot but tell you that you do not discharge the trust reposed in you as magistrates, by which you are obliged to be "a terror to evildoers, and a praise to them that do well." Is this the justice you pretend to administer? Is this the patronage, this the countenance which an honest man, and an honest cause, may expect from you; remember you are sons of men, mortal and dying, and that stand upon the same level before God with the meanest of those you trample upon, and must yourselves be called to an account and judged. You are sons of men, and therefore we may appeal to yourselves, and to that law of nature which is written in every man's heart, "Do ye indeed speak righteousness?" And will not your second thoughts correct what you have done? Note, It is good for us often to reflect upon what we say with this serious question, Do we indeed speak righteousness? That we may unsay what we have spoken amiss, and may proceed no farther in it.

2. They did a great deal of wrong; they used their power for the support of injury and oppression; ver. 2, "In heart you work wickedness." All the wickedness of the life is wrought in the heart. It intimates that they wrought with a great deal of plot and management, not by surprise, but with premeditation and design, and with a strong inclination to it, and resolution in it. The more there is of the heart in any act of wickedness the worse it is, Eccl. viii. 11. And what was their wickedness? It follows: "You weigh the violence of your hands in the earth," or in the land, the peace of which you are appointed to be the conservators of. They did all the violence and injury they could, either to enrich or revenge themselves, and they weighed it; that is, 1st. They framed it with a great deal of craft and caution; You frame it by rule and line, so the word signifies, that it may effectually answer your mischievous intentions; such masters are you of the art of oppression. 2nd. They did it under colour of justice. They held the balances (the emblem of justice) in their hands as if they designed to do right, and right is expected from them, but the result is violence and oppression, which is done the more effectually for being done under the umbrage of law and right.

Secondly. The corruption of their nature. This was the root of bitterness from which that gall and wormwood sprung; ver. 3, "The wicked," who in heart work wickedness, "are estranged from the womb," estranged from God, and all good, alienated from the Divine life, and its principles, powers, and pleasures, Eph. iv. 18. A sinful state is a state of estrangement from that acquaintance with God and service of him which we were made for. Let none wonder that these wicked men dare do such things, for wickedness is bred in the bone with them; they brought it into the world with them, they have in their natures a strong inclination to it, they learned it from their wicked parents, and have been trained up in it by a bad education; they are called, and not miscalled, transgressors from the womb, one can therefore expect no other but that they will deal very treacherously: see Isa. xlviii. 8. They go astray from God and their duty as soon as they be born, that is, as soon as possibly they can; the foolishness that is bound up in their hearts presently appears with the first operations of reason; as the wheat springs up, the tares spring up with it. Three instances are here given of the corruption of nature:

1. Falsehood. They soon learn to speak lies, and bend their tongues like their bow for that purpose, Jer. ix. 3. How soon will little children tell a lie to excuse a fault, or in their own commendation! no sooner can they speak but they speak to God's dishonour. Tongue sins are some of the first of our actual transgressions.

2. Malice. Their poison, that is, their ill-will, and the spite they bore to goodness and all good men, particularly to David, was like the poison of a serpent, innate, venomous, and very mischievous, and that which they can never be cured of. We pity a dog that is poisoned by accident, but hate a serpent that is poisonous by nature. Such was the cursed enmity in this serpent's brood against the Lord and his anointed.

3. Untractableness. They are malicious, and nothing will work upon them, no reason, no kindness, to mollify them, and bring them to a better temper. "They are like the deaf adder that stoppeth her ear," ver. 4, 5. The psalmist having compared these wicked men, whom he here complains of, to serpents, for their poisonous malice, takes occasion from thence upon another account to compare them to the deaf adder, or viper, concerning which there was then this vulgar tradition, that whereas by music, or some other art, they had a way of charming serpents, so as either to destroy them or at least disable them to do mischief, this deaf adder would lay one ear to the ground, and stop the other with her tail, so that she could not hear the voice of the enchantment, and so defeated the intention of it, and secured herself. The using of this comparison doth neither verify the story, nor, if it were true, justify the use of this enchantment; for it is only an allusion to the report of such a thing, to illustrate the obstinacy of sinners in a sinful way. God's design in his word and providence is to cure serpents of their malignity. To this end, how wise, how powerful, how well-chosen are the charms! How forcible the right words! But all in vain with the most of men; and what is the reason? It is because they will not hearken. None so deaf as those that will not hear. We have piped unto men, and they have not danced; how should they, when they have stopped their ears?

6 Break their teeth, O God, in their mouth:
Break out the great teeth of the young lions, O LORD.
7 Let them melt away as waters which run continually:
When he bendeth his bow to shoot his arrows, let them be as cut in pieces.
8 As a snail which melteth, let every one of them pass away:
Like the untimely birth of a woman, that they may not see the sun.
9 Before your pots can feel the thorns,
He shall take them away as with a whirlwind, both living, and in his wrath.
10 The righteous shall rejoice when he seeth the vengeance:
He shall wash his feet in the blood of the wicked.
11 So that a man shall say, Verily there is a reward for the righteous:
Verily he is a God that judgeth in the earth.

In these verses we have,

First. David's prayers against his enemies, and all the like enemies of God's church and people; for as such he looks upon them, and is acted by a public spirit in praying against them, and not by any private revenge.

1. He prays that they might be disabled to do any farther mischief; ver. 6, "Break their teeth, O God." Not so much that they might not feed themselves, as that they might not be able to make a prey of others, Ps. iii. 7. He doth not say, Break their necks; no, let them live to repent, "Slay them not, lest my people forget;" but break their teeth for they are lions, they are young lions that live by rapine.

2. That they might be disappointed in the plots they had already laid, and might not gain their point. "When he bendeth his bow," and takes aim "to shoot his arrows" at the upright in heart, "let them be as cut in pieces," ver. 7. Let them fall at his feet, and never come near the mark.

3. That they and their interest might waste and come to nothing; that they might "melt away as waters that run continually," that is, as the waters of a land-flood, which, though they seem formidable for a while, soon soak into the ground, or return to their channels. Or, in general, "as waters spilt upon the ground, which cannot be gathered up again," but gradually dries away and disappears. Such shall the floods of ungodly men be which make us afraid sometimes, Ps. xviii. 4; so shall the proud waters be reduced which threaten to go over our soul, Ps. cxxiv. 4, 5. Let us by faith then see what they shall be, and then we shall not fear what they are. He prays, ver. 8, that they might melt as a snail; which wastes by her own motion, in every stretch it makes, leaving some of its moisture behind, which by degrees must needs consume it, though it make a path to shine after it. He that like a snail in her house is plenus sui,—'full of himself;' that pleaseth himself, and trusts to himself, doth but consume himself, and will quickly bring himself to nothing. And he prays, the height of their grief a priest sometimes goes round to each person, and collects the tears with a piece of cotton, from which he presses them into a bottle, preserving them with the greatest care;" i.e., we suppose, he pretends to do so.

lvii. Title. The words "Al-taschith" signify "destroy not," and probably were the commencement of a song or hymn, to the tune of which this psalm was sung by the Jews.

lviii. 2. "Ye weigh the violence of your hands in the earth" may mean "ye weigh out, or distribute, in the land violence with your hands." They dealt violently and oppressively with men.

lviii. 3. For "estranged," i.e., alienated, some read, "they wander."

lviii. 4, 5. Many kinds of serpents are known in Western Asia, but very few are charmed. The practice of charming is, however, of very ancient origin, and is still prevalent in Asia and in Africa. Compare Eccles. x. 11; Jer. viii. 17. Verse 5 may be rendered, that they might be "like the untimely birth of a woman;" which dies as soon as it begins to live, and never sees the sun. Job in his passion wished himself had been such a one, Job iii. 16; but he knew not what he said. We may in faith pray against the designs of the church's enemies, as the prophet doth, Hos. ix. 14, "Give them, O Lord, what wilt thou give them? Give them a miscarrying womb, and dry breasts." Which explains this here.

Secondly. His predictions of their ruin; ver. 9, "Before your pots can feel the" heat of a fire of "thorns" made under them, which they will presently do,—for it is a quick fire, and violent while it lasts,—so speedily, with such a hasty and vehement flame, God shall hurry them away; as terribly and as irresistibly as with a whirlwind, as it were alive, as it were in fury. The proverbial expressions are somewhat difficult, but the sense is plain. 1. That the judgments of God oftentimes surprise wicked people in the midst of their jollity, and hurry them away of a sudden. When they are beginning to walk in the light of their own fire, and the sparks of their own kindling, they are made to lie down in sorrow, Isa. l. 11; and their laughter proves like the crackling of thorns under a pot, the comfort of which is soon gone, ere they can say, "Alas, I am warm," Eccl. vii. 6. 2. That there is no standing before the destruction that comes from the Almighty; for "Who knows the power of God's anger?" When God will take sinners away, dead or alive, they cannot contest with him. "The wicked is driven away in his wickedness." Now there are two things which the psalmist promiseth himself would be the good effects of sinners' destruction:

1st. That saints would be encouraged and comforted by it; ver. 10, "The righteous shall rejoice when he sees the vengeance." The pomp and power, the prosperity and success of the wicked is a discouragement to the righteous; it saddens their hearts, and weakens their hands, and is sometimes a strong temptation to them to question their foundations, Ps. lxxiii. 2, 13. But when they see the judgments of God hurrying them away, and just vengeance taken on them for all the mischief they have done to the people of God, they rejoice in the satisfaction thereby given to their doubts, and the confirmation thereby given to their faith in the providence of God, and his justice and righteousness in governing of the world. They shall rejoice in the victory thus gained over that temptation, by seeing their end, Ps. lxxiii. 17. "He shall wash his feet in the blood of the wicked;" that is, there shall be abundance of blood shed, Ps. lxviii. 23; and it shall be as great a refreshment to the saints to see God glorified in the ruin of sinners as it is to a weary traveller to have his feet washed. It shall likewise contribute to their sanctification; the sight of the vengeance shall make them tremble before God, Ps. cxix. 120, and shall convince them of the evil of sin, and the obligations they lie under to that God who pleads their cause, and will suffer no man to do them wrong, and go unpunished for it. The joy of the saints in the destruction of the wicked, is then a holy joy, and justifiable, when it helps to make them holy, and to purify them from sin.

2nd. That sinners would be convinced and converted by it, ver. 11. The vengeance God sometimes takes on the wicked in this world will bring men to say, "Verily, there is a reward for the righteous." Any man may draw this inference from such providences; and many a man shall, who before denied even these plain truths, or doubted of them. Some shall have this confession extorted from them; others shall have their minds so changed, that they shall willingly own it, and thank God who has given them to see it, and see it with satisfaction:—that God is; and, First. That he is the bountiful Rewarder of his saints and servants. 'Verily,' ('however it be,' so it may be read,) 'there is a fruit to the righteous;' whatever damage a man may sustain, whatever hazard he may run, and whatever hardship he may undergo for his religion, he shall not only be no loser, but an unspeakable gainer by it in the issue. Even in this world "there is a reward for the righteous;" they shall be recompensed in the earth. They shall be taken notice of; honoured and protected, that seemed slighted, despised, and abandoned. Secondly. That he is the righteous Governor of the world; and will surely reckon with the enemies of his kingdom. Verily, however it be, though wicked people prosper, and bid defiance to Divine justice, yet it shall be made to appear to their confusion, that the world is not governed by chance, but by a Being of infinite wisdom and justice; "there is a God that judgeth in the earth," though he has prepared his throne in the heavens. He presides in all the affairs of the children of men, and directs and disposeth them according to the counsel of his will to his own glory; and he will punish the wicked, not only in the world to come, but in the earth, where they have laid up their treasure, and promised themselves a happiness,—"In the earth" that the Lord may be known by the judgments which he executeth; and they may be taken as earnests of a judgment to come. "He is a God," so we read, not a weak man, not an angel, not a mere name, not (as the atheists suggest) a creature of men's fear and fancy; not a deified hero, not the sun and moon, as idolaters imagined, but a God, a self-existent, perfect Being; he it is that judgeth the earth. His favour, therefore, let us seek; from whom every man's judgment proceeds, and to him let all judgment be referred.

PSALM LIX.

This psalm is of the same nature and scope with six or seven foregoing psalms. They are all David's complaints of the malice of his enemies, and of their cursed and cruel designs against him; his prayers and prophecies against them; and his comfort and confidence in God as his God. The first is the language of nature, and may be allowed; the second of a prophetical spirit, looking forward to Christ, and the enemies of his kingdom, and therefore not to be drawn into a precedent; the third, of grace and a most holy faith, which ought to be imitated by every one of us. In this psalm, I. He prays to God to defend and deliver him from his enemies, representing them as very ill men, barbarous, malicious, and atheistical, ver. 1—7. II. He foresees and foretells the destruction of his enemies, which he would give to God the glory of, ver. 8—17. As far as it appears that any of the particular enemies of God's people fall under these characters, we may in singing this psalm read their doom, and foresee their ruin.

To the chief Musician, Al-taschith, Michtam of David; when Saul sent, and they watched the house to kill him.

DELIVER me from mine enemies, O my God:
Defend me from them that rise up against me
2 Deliver me from the workers of iniquity,
And save me from bloody men.
3 For, lo, they lie in wait for my soul:
The mighty are gathered against me;
Not for my transgression, nor for my sin, O LORD.
4 They run and prepare themselves without my fault:
Awake to help me, and behold
5 Thou therefore, O LORD God of hosts, the God of Israel,
Awake to visit all the heathen:
Be not merciful to any wicked transgressors. Selah.
6 They return at evening:
They make a noise like a dog,
And go round about the city.
7 Behold, they belch out with their mouth:
Swords are in their lips:
For who, say they, doth hear?

BANDITTI.—ver. 3.

The title of this psalm acquaints us particularly with the occasion on which it was penned; it was when Saul sent a party of his guards to beset David's house in the night, that they might seize him and kill him; we have the story 1 Sam. xix. 11. It was when his hostilities against David were newly begun; and he had but just before narrowly escaped Saul's javelin. These first eruptions of Saul's malice could not but put David into disorder, and be both grievous and terrifying; and yet he kept up his communion with God, and such a composure of mind as that he was never out of frame for prayer and praises. Happy they whose intercourse with Heaven is not intercepted or broken in upon by their cares, or griefs, or fears, or any of the hurries (whether outward or inward) of an afflicted state. In these verses,

First. David prays to be delivered out of the hands of his enemies, and that their cruel designs against him might be defeated; ver. 12, "Deliver me from mine enemies, O my God." Thou art God, and canst deliver me; my God, under whose protection I have put myself; and thou hast promised me to be a God all-sufficient, and therefore in honour and faithfulness thou wilt deliver me. Set me on high out of the reach of the power and malice of them that rise up against me, and above the fear of it. Let me be safe, and see myself so. safe and easy, safe and satisfied. O deliver me, and save me. He cries out as one ready to perish; and that had his eye to God only for salvation and deliverance. He prays, ver. 4, "Awake to help me;" take cognizance of my case, behold that with an eye of pity, and exert thy power for my relief. Thus the disciples in the storm awoke Christ, saying, "Master, save us, we perish;" and thus earnestly should we pray daily, to be defended and delivered from our spiritual enemies; the temptations of Satan, and the corruptions of our own hearts which war against our spiritual life.

Secondly. He pleads for deliverance. Our God gives us leave not only to pray, but to plead with him; "to order our cause before him, and to fill our mouth with arguments;" not to move him, but to move ourselves. David doth so here.

1. He pleads the ill character of his enemies. They are workers of iniquity and therefore not only his enemies, but God's enemies. They are bloody men, and therefore not only his enemies, but enemies to all mankind; Lord, let not the workers of iniquity prevail against one that is a worker of righteousness; nor bloody men against a merciful man.

2. He pleads their malice against him, and the imminent danger he was in from them, ver. 3. Their spite is great; They aim at my soul, my life, my better part; they are subtle and very politic, they lie in wait, taking an opportunity to do me a mischief. They are all mighty, men of honour and estates, and interest in court and country; they are in a confederacy, they are united by league, and actually gathered together against me; combined both in consultation and action. They are very ingenious in their contrivances, and very industrious in the prosecution of them; ver. 4, "They run and prepare themselves," with the utmost speed and fury to do me a mischief. He takes particular notice of the brutish carriage of the messengers that Saul sent to take him; ver. 6, "They return at evening" from the posts assigned them in the day, to apply themselves to their works of darkness, (their night work which may well be their day shame,) and then "they make a noise" like a hound in pursuit of the hare. Thus did David's enemies when they came to take him, raise an outcry against him as a rebel, and a traitor, and a man not fit to live; with this clamour "they went round about the city," to put David into an ill name, if possible, to set the mob against him, at least to prevent their being incensed against them; which otherwise they had reason to fear they would be, so much was David their darling. Thus the persecutors of our Lord Jesus, who are compared to lviii. 9. A difficult verse, and apparently addressed by the psalmist to his enemies. The first clause, "before your pots perceive the thorn," means, of course, "before your pots are heated by the thorn kindled under them." Here the word thorn is in the singular, and the phrase in which it stands may be figurative or proverbial. The second clause must be explained in connection with the first, and means that God will sweep away their "thorn," the means on which they relied, like a piece of green wood on fire. The words may be translated, "He shall sweep it away as if it were alive (green) and burning."

"which will not hearken to the voice of enchanters, and the cunning charmer with charms."

dogs, Ps. xxii. 16, ran him down with noise, for else they could not have taken him, at least "not on the feast day, lest there should be an uproar among the people." They belch out with their mouth the malice that boils in their hearts; ver. 7, "Swords are in their lips," that is, reproaches that wound my heart with grief, Ps. xlii. 10; and slanders that wound my reputation, and stab that. They were continually suggesting that which drew and whet Saul's sword against him, and the fault is laid upon the false accusers. The sword, perhaps, had not been in Saul's hand, if it had not been their lips.

3. He pleads his own innocency, not as to God, (he was never backward to own himself guilty before him,) but as to his persecutors; what they charged him with was utterly false, nor had he ever said or done any thing to deserve such treatment from them; ver. 3, "Not for my transgression, nor for my sin, O Lord;" thou knowest, who knowest all things. And again, ver. 4, "without my fault." Note, 1st. The innocency of the godly will not secure them from the malignity of the wicked. Those that are harmless like doves yet for Christ's sake are hated of all men, as if they were noxious like serpents, and obnoxious accordingly. 2nd. Though our innocency will not secure us from troubles, yet it will greatly support and comfort us under our troubles. The testimony of our conscience for us, that we have behaved ourselves well towards those that behave themselves ill towards us, will be very much our rejoicing in the day of evil. 3rd. If we are conscious to ourselves of our innocency, we may with humble confidence appeal to God, and beg of him to plead our injured cause, which he will do in due time.

4. He pleads that his enemies were profane and atheistical, and bolstered themselves up in their enmity to David with the contempt of God; "For who, say they, doth hear?" ver. 7. Not God himself, Ps. x. 11; xciv. 7. Note, It is not strange if those regard not what they say who have made themselves believe that God regards not what they say.

Thirdly. He refers himself and his cause to the just judgment of God, ver. 5. The Lord, the Judge, be judge between him and his persecutors. In this appeal to God he has an eye to him as the Lord of hosts, that has power to execute judgment, having all creatures, even hosts of angels, at his command; and as the God of Israel, to whom he was in a peculiar manner king and judge, and would appear on the behalf of those that are upright, that are Israelites indeed. When Saul's hosts persecuted him, he had recourse to God as the Lord of all hosts; when those maligned him who in spirit were strangers to the commonwealth of Israel, he had recourse to God as the God of Israel. He desires, that is, he is very sure, that God will awake to visit all the nations; will make an early and exact inquiry into the controversies and quarrels that are among the children of men. There will be a day of visitation, Isa. x. 3; and to that day David refers himself with this solemn appeal, "Be not merciful to any wicked transgressors, Selah;" mark that. 1. If David were conscious to himself that he was a wicked transgressor, he would not expect to find mercy. But as to his enemies he could say, he was no transgressor at all; ver. 3, 4, "Not for my transgression," and therefore thou wilt appear for me. As to God, he could say he was no wicked transgressor; for though he had transgressed, he was a penitent transgressor, and did not obstinately persist in what he had done amiss. 2. He knew his enemies were wicked transgressors; wilful, and malicious, and hardened in their transgressions, both against God and man; and therefore he sues for justice against them. "Judgment without mercy." Let not those expect to find mercy who never shewed mercy, for such are wicked transgressors.

8 But thou, O LORD, shalt laugh at them;
Thou shalt have all the heathen in derision.
9 Because of his strength will I wait upon thee:
For God is my defence.
10 The God of my mercy shall prevent me:
God shall let me see my desire upon mine enemies.
11 Slay them not, lest my people forget:
Scatter them by thy power;
And bring them down, O Lord our shield.
12 For the sin of their mouth and the words of their lips
Let them even be taken in their pride:
And for cursing and lying which they speak. [not be:
13 Consume them in wrath, consume them, that they may
And let them know that God ruleth in Jacob Unto the ends of the earth. Selah.
14 And at evening let them return;
And let them make a noise like a dog,
And go round about the city.
15 Let them wander up and down for meat,
And grudge if they be not satisfied.
16 But I will sing of thy power;
Yea, I will sing aloud of thy mercy in the morning:
For thou hast been my defence and refuge in the day of 17 Unto thee, O my strength, will I sing: [my trouble.
For God is my defence, and the God of my mercy.

David here encourageth himself in reference to the threatening power of his enemies with a pious resolution to wait upon God, and a believing expectation that he should yet praise him.

First. He resolves to wait upon God; ver. 9, "Because of his strength," either the strength of his enemies, the fear of which drove him to God, or because of God's strength, the hope of which drew him to God, "will I wait upon thee," with a believing dependence upon thee, and confidence in thee. It is our wisdom and duty in times of danger and difficulty to wait upon God for he is our defence, our high place, in whom we shall be safe. He hopes,

1. That God will be to him a God of mercy; ver. 10, "The God of my mercy shall prevent me" with the blessings of his goodness, and the gifts of his mercy; prevent my fears, prevent my prayers, and be better to me than my own expectations. It is very comfortable to us in prayer to eye God, not only as the God of mercy, but as the God of our mercy, the author of all good in us, and the giver of all good to us. Whatever mercy there is in God, it is laid up for us, and is ready to be laid out upon us. Justly doth the psalmist call God's mercy his mercy; for all the blessings of the new covenant are called the sure mercies of David, Isa. lv. 3; and they are sure to all the seed.

2. That he will be to his persecutors a God of vengeance. His expectation of this he expresseth partly by way of prediction, and partly by way of petition, which comes all to one; for his prayer that it might be so amounts to a prophecy that it shall be so. And so here are several things which he foretells concerning his enemies, or observers, that sought occasions against him, and opportunity to do him a mischief; in all which he should see his desire, not a passionate or revengeful desire, but a believing desire upon them, ver. 10.

1st. He foresees that God would expose them to scorn, as they had indeed made themselves ridiculous, ver. 8. They think God doth not hear them, doth not heed them, "but thou, O Lord, shalt laugh at them" for their folly, to think that he that planted the ear shall not hear; and thou shalt have, not them only, but all other such heathenish people that live without God in the world, in derision. Note, Atheists and persecutors are worthy to be laughed at, and had in derision: see Ps. ii. 4; Pr. i. 26; Isa. xxxvii. 22.

2nd. That God would make them standing monuments of his justice; ver. 11, "Slay them not," let them not be killed outright, "lest my people forget." If the execution be soon done, the impressions of it will not be deep, and therefore will not be durable, but will quickly wear off. Swift destructions startle men for the present, but they are soon forgotten; for which reason he prays that this might be gradual: "Scatter them by thy power," and let them carry about with them in their wanderings such tokens of God's displeasure as may spread the notice of their punishment to all parts of the country. Thus Cain himself, though a murderer, was not slain, lest the vengeance should be forgotten, but was sentenced to be a fugitive and a vagabond. Note, When we think God's judgments come slowly upon sinners, we must conclude that God has wise and holy ends in the gradual proceedings of his wrath. So scatter them, as that they may never again unite to do mischief, "bring them down, O Lord, our shield." If God have undertaken the protection of his people, as their shield, he will doubtless humble and abase all those that fight against them.

3rd. That they might be dealt with according to their deserts; ver. 12, "For the sin of their mouth, even for the words of their lips;" for every word they speak has sin in it. Let them for this be taken in their pride, even for their cursing others and themselves, (a sin Saul was subject to, 1 Sam. xiv. 28, 44,) and lying. Note, First. There is a great deal of malignity in tongue sins, more than is commonly thought of. Secondly. Cursing, and lying, and speaking proudly, are some of the worst of the sins of the tongue; and that man is truly miserable whom God deals with according to the desert of these, "making his own tongue to fall on him."

4th. That God would glorify himself as Israel's God and king in their destruction; ver. 13, "Consume them in wrath, consume them;" that is, follow them with one judgment after another till they be utterly ruined; let them be sensibly but gradually wasted, that they themselves, while they are in the consuming, may know, and that the standers-by may likewise draw this inference from it, "That God ruleth in Jacob unto the ends of the earth." Saul and his party think to rule and carry all before them, but they shall be made to know that there is a higher than they, that there is one who doth and will overrule them. The design of God's judgments is to convince men that the Lord reigns; that he fulfils his own counsels, gives law to all the creatures, and disposeth all things to his own glory; so that the greatest of men are under his check, and he makes what use he pleases of them. He rules in Jacob, for there he keeps his court, there he is known, and his name is great; but he rules to the end of the earth, for all nations are within the territories of his kingdom. 'He rules to the ends of the earth, even over those that know him not, but he rules for Jacob,' so it may be read; he has an eye to the good of his church in the government of the world; the administrations of that government, even to the ends of the earth, are "for Jacob his servant's sake, and Israel's his elect," Isa. xlv. 4.

5th. That he would make their sin their punishment, ver. 14; compare ver. 6. Their sin was hunting for David, to make a prey of him; their punishment should be, that they should be reduced to such extreme poverty, that they should hunt about for meat to satisfy their hunger, and should miss of it as they missed of David. Thus they should be not cut off at once, but scattered, ver. 11, and gradually consumed, ver. 13. They that die by famine die by inches, and feel themselves die, Lam. iv. 9. He foretells that they should be forced to beg their bread from door to door. First. That they should do it with the greatest regret and reluctancy imaginable. "To beg they are ashamed," (which makes it the greater punishment to them,) and therefore they do it at evening, when it begins to be dark, that they may not be seen; at the time when other beasts of prey creep forth, Ps. civ. 20. Secondly. That yet they should be very clamorous and loud in their complaints, which would proceed from a great indignation at their condition, which they cannot in the least degree reconcile themselves to. "They shall make a noise like a dog." When they were in quest of David they made a noise like an angry dog snarling and barking; now, when they are in quest of meat, they shall make a noise like a hungry dog howling and wailing. Those that repent of their sins, when they are in trouble, mourn like doves; those whose hearts are hardened, when they are in trouble, make a noise like dogs, "like a wild bull in a net, full of the fury of the Lord:" see Hos. vii. 14, "They have not cried unto me with their heart, when they howled on their beds for corn and wine." Thirdly. That they should meet with little relief, but the hearts of people should be very much hardened towards them, so that they should "go round about the city, and wander up and down for meat," ver. 15, and should get nothing but by dint of importunity, according to our marginal reading, 'if they be not satisfied they will tarry all night;' so that what people do give them is not with good will but only to be rid of them, lest by their continual coming they weary them. Fourthly. That they should be insatiable, which is the greatest misery of all in a poor condition. "They are greedy dogs which can never have enough," Isa. lvi. 11, "and they grudge if they be not satisfied." A contented man, if he has not what he would have, yet doth not grudge, doth not quarrel with Providence, nor fret within himself; but those whose god is their belly, if that be not filled, and its appetites gratified, fall out both with God and themselves. It is not poverty, but discontent, that makes a man unhappy.

Secondly. He expects to praise God, that God's providence would find him matter for praise, and that God's grace would work in him a heart for praise, ver. 16, 17. Observe,

1. What he would praise God for. 1st. He would praise his power, and his mercy; both should be the subject matter of his song. Power without mercy is to be dreaded; mercy without power is not what a man can expect much benefit from; but God's power by which he is able to help us, and his mercy by which he is inclined to help us, will justly be the everlasting praise of all the saints. 2nd. He would praise him because he had many a time and all along found him his defence and his refuge in the day of trouble. God brings his people into trouble, that they may experience his power and mercy in protecting and sheltering them, and may have occasion to praise him. 3rd. He would praise him because he had still a dependence upon him, and a confidence in him.

lix. 9. The Syriac is, 'O God, thee will I praise, for thou art my refuge." The Hebrew is abrupt, but may be translated, "As for his strength, I will wait upon thee, for God is my refuge." In verse 17 we have manifestly a repetition of this, but with some change, "Unto thee, O my strength, will I sing." Some copies here also read "my strength" for "his strength;" and a comparison of the Hebrew words in the two verses suggests that the reading followed by the Syriac translator, "thee will I praise," was the same in verse 9 as it is in verse 17. God is called the Strength of his people; and if the reading, "my strength," could be justified here, all difficulty would vanish, so far as translation is concerned.

lix. 11—13. The first and last of these petitions seem contradictory, but really are not so. The first is that the enemies may not be actually and suddenly slain, and the other that they may eventually be removed or brought to an end as his strength to support him and carry him on in his duty, his defence to keep him safe from evil, and the God of his mercy to make him happy and easy. He that is all this to us is certainly worthy of our best affections, praises, and services.

2. How he would praise God. 1st. He would sing. As that is a natural expression of joy, so it is an instituted ordinance for the exerting and exciting of holy joy and thankfulness. 2nd. He would sing aloud, as one much affected with the glory of God, that was not ashamed to own it, and that desired to affect others with it. He will sing of God's power, but he will sing aloud of his mercy; the consideration of that raises his affections more than any thing else. 3rd. He would sing aloud in the morning, when his spirits were most fresh and lively. God's compassions are new every morning, and therefore it is fit to begin the day with his praises. 4th. He would sing unto God, ver. 17, to his honour and glory, and with him in his eye. As we must direct our prayers to God, so to him we must direct our praises and must look up, making melody to the Lord.

PSALM LX.

After many psalms which David penned in a day of distress, this comes, which was calculated for a day of triumph; it was penned after he was settled on the throne, upon occasion of an illustrious victory which God blessed his forces with over the Syrians and Edomites. It was when David was in the zenith of his prosperity, and the affairs of his kingdom seem to have been in a better posture than ever they were either before or after: see 2 Sam. viii. 3, 13; 1 Chr. xviii. 3, 12. David in prosperity was as devout as David in adversity. In this psalm, I. He reflects upon the ill state of the public interests for many years, in which God had been contending with them, ver. 1—3. II. He takes notice of the happy turn lately given to their affairs, ver. 4. III. He prays for the deliverance of God's Israel from their enemies, ver. 5. IV. He triumphs in hope of their victories over their enemies, and begs of God to carry them on and complete them, ver. 6—12. In singing this psalm we may have an eye both to the acts of the church and to the state of our own souls, both which have their struggles.

To the chief Musician upon Shushan-eduth, Michtam of David, to teach; when he strove with Aram-naharaim and with Aram-zobah, when Joab returned, and smote of Edom in the valley of salt twelve thousand.

O GOD, thou hast cast us off, thou hast scattered us,
Thou hast been displeased; O turn thyself to us again.
2 Thou hast made the earth to tremble; thou hast broken it:
Heal the breaches thereof; for it shaketh.
3 Thou hast shewed thy people hard things:
Thou hast made us to drink the wine of astonishment.
4 Thou hast given a banner to them that fear thee,
That it may be displayed because of the truth. Selah.
5 That thy beloved may be delivered;
Save with thy right hand, and hear me.

The title gives us an account, 1. Of the general design of the psalm. It is Michtam, David's jewel, and it is to teach. The Levites must teach it the people, and by it teach them both to trust in God, and to triumph in him; we must in it teach ourselves and one another. In a day of public rejoicing, we have need to be taught to direct our joy to God, and to terminate it in him, to give none of that praise to the instruments of our deliverance which is due to him only, and to encourage our hopes with our joys. 2. Of the particular occasion of it. It was at a time, 1st. When he was in war with the Syrians, and still had a conflict with them, both those of Mesopotamia and those of Zobah. 2nd. When he had gained a great victory over the Edomites by his forces under the command of Joab, who had left twelve thousand of the enemy dead upon the spot. David has an eye to both these concerns in this psalm; he is in care about his strife with the Assyrians, and in reference to that he prays. He is rejoicing in his success against the Edomites, and with reference to that he triumphs, with a holy confidence in God, that he would complete the victory. We have our cares at the same time that we have our joys, and they may serve for a balance to each other, that neither may exceed. They may likewise furnish us with matter both for prayer and praise, for both must be laid before God with suitable affections and devotions. If one point be gained, yet in another we are still striving. The Edomites are vanquished, but the Syrians are not; therefore "let not him that girdeth on the harness boast as if he had put it off." In these verses, which begin the psalm, we have,

First. A melancholy memorial of the many disgraces and disappointments which God had for some years past put the people under. During the reign of Saul, especially in the latter end of it, and during David's struggle with the house of Saul, while he reigned over Judah only, the affairs of the kingdom were much perplexed, and the neighbour nations were vexatious to them. 1. He complains of hard things which they had seen, that is, which they had suffered, ver. 3, while the Philistines and other ill neighbours took all advantages against them. God sometimes shews even his own people hard things in this world, that they may not take up their rest in it, but may dwell at ease in him only. 2. He owns God's displeasure to be the cause of all the hardships they had undergone. "Thou hast been displeased" by us, displeased against us, ver. 1, and in thy displeasure hast cast us off, and scattered us; hast put us out of thy protection, else our enemies could not have prevailed thus against us. They had never picked us up and made a prey of us, if thou hadst not broke the staff of bands (Zec. xi. 14) by which we were united, and so scattered us. Whatever our trouble is, and whoever are the instruments of it, we must own the hand of God, his righteous hand, in it. 3. He laments the ill effects and consequences of the miscarriages of the late years. The whole nation was in a convulsion; "Thou hast made the earth to tremble," or the land. The generality of the people had dreadful apprehensions of the issue of these things; the good people themselves were in a consternation. "Thou hast made us to drink the wine of astonishment." We were like men intoxicated and at our wit's end, not knowing how to reconcile these dispensations with God's promises and his relation to his people. We are at a gaze, can do nothing, not know we what to do.

Now this is mentioned here 'to teach,' that is, for the instruction of the people. When God is turning his hand in our favours, it is good to remember our former calamities. 1st. That we may retain the good impressions they made upon us, and may have them revived. Our souls must still have the affliction and the misery in remembrance, that they may be humbled within us, Lam. iii. 19, 20. 2nd. That God's goodness to us in relieving us and raising us up may be the more magnified; for it is as life from the dead, so strange, so refreshing. Our calamities serve as foils to our joys. 3rd. That we may not be secure, but may always rejoice with trembling, as those that know not how soon we may be returned into the furnace again which we were lately taken out of, as the silver is when it is not thoroughly refined.

Secondly. A thankful notice of the encouragement God had given them to hope that, though things had been long bad, they would now begin to mend; ver. 4, "Thou hast given a banner to them that fear thee," (for, as bad as the times are, there is a remnant among us that desire to fear thy name, for whom thou hast a tender concern,) "that it may be displayed" by thee, "because of the truth" of thy promise, which thou wilt perform, and to be displayed by them in defence of truth and equity, Ps. xlv. 4. This banner was David's government, the establishment and enlargement of it over all Israel. The pious Israelites, who feared God, and had a regard to the Divine designation of David to the throne, took his elevation as a token for good, and like the lifting up of a banner to them. 1. It united them, as soldiers are gathered together to their colours. They that were scattered, ver. 1, divided among themselves, and so weakened and exposed, when he was fixed upon the throne, coalesced in him. 2. It animated them, and put life and courage into them, as the soldiers are heartened by the sight of their banner. 3. It struck a terror upon their enemies, to whom they could now hang out a flag of defiance. Christ, the Son of David, is given for an ensign of the people, Isa. xi. 10; for a banner to those that fear God. In him, as the centre of their unity, they are gathered together in one; to him they seek, in him they glory and take courage; his love is the banner over them, and in his name and strength they wage war with the powers of darkness, and under him the church becomes terrible as an army with banners.

Thirdly. An humble petition for seasonable mercy.

1. That God would be reconciled to them, though he had been displeased with them. In his displeasure their calamities began, and therefore in his favour their prosperity must begin; "O turn thyself to us again," ver. 1; smile upon us, and take part with us; be at peace with us, and in that peace we shall have peace. Tranquillus Deus tranquillat omnia,—'A God at peace with us spreads peace over all the scene.'

2. That they might be reconciled to one another, though they had been broken and wretchedly divided among themselves. "Heal the breaches of our land," ver. 2; not only the breaches made upon us by our enemies, but the breaches made among ourselves by our unhappy divisions. Those are breaches which the folly and corruption of man makes, and which nothing but the wisdom and grace of God can make up and repair, by pouring out a spirit of love and peace, by which only a shaken, shattered kingdom is set to rights, and saved from ruin.

3. That thus they might be preserved out of the hands of their enemies; ver. 3, "That thy beloved may be delivered," and not made a prey of, "save with thy right hand," with thine own power, and by such instruments as thou art pleased to make the men of thy right hand, "and hear me." They that fear God are his beloved; they are dear to him as the apple of his eye; they are often in distress, but they shall be delivered; God's own right hand shall save them, for they that have his heart have his hand. "Save them, and hear me." Note, God's praying people may take the general deliverances of the church as answers to their prayers in particular. If we improve what interest we have at the throne of grace for blessings for the public, and those blessings be bestowed, besides the share we have with others in the benefit of them, we may each of us say with a peculiar satisfaction, God has therein heard me, and answered me.

6 God hath spoken in his holiness;
I will rejoice, I will divide Shechem,
And mete out the valley of Succoth.
7 Gilead is mine, and Manasseh is mine;
Ephraim also is the strength of mine head;
Judah is my lawgiver;
8 Moab is my washpot;
Over Edom will I cast out my shoe:
Philistia, triumph thou because of me.
9 Who will bring me into the strong city?
Who will lead me into Edom?

EDOM.

lix. 15. For "and grudge if they be not satisfied," our translators put in the margin, "if they be not satisfied, then they will stay all night." We may translate the first clause either "let them wander about for meat" or "they will wander about for meat." The second clause is difficult in construction, and ambiguous in one of its principal words. It may mean, "Let them not be satisfied, and pass the night so," or "Let them abide unsatisfied," or "If they be not satisfied, they will murmur." The general sense of the verse may be, "They will wander about for meat, and will continue unsatisfied," or it may be a prayer for such to be the case.

lx. Title. For "upon Shushan-eduth" we may render "over Shushan-eduth," or "over the lily of witness," though some think "eduth" is the name of a place. A division of singers seems to have been so called. See Psa. lxxx., Title.

lx. 3. "Wine of astonishment" is wine causing confusion—a bitter draught.

10 Wilt not thou, O God, which hadst cast us off?
And thou, O God, which didst not go out with our

SHECHEM.—ver. 6.

David is here rejoicing in hope, and praying in hope. Such are the triumphs of the saints, not so much upon the account of what they have in possession, as of what they have in prospect; ver. 6, "God hath spoken in his holiness;" that is, he hath given me his word of promise, has "sworn by his holiness, and he will not lie unto David," Ps. lxxxix. 35; therefore "I will rejoice," and please myself with hopes of the performance of the promise, which was intended for more than a pleasing promise. Note, God's word of promise, being a firm foundation of hope, is a full fountain of joy to all believers.

First. Two things David here rejoiceth in the prospect of:

1. The perfecting of this revolution in his own kingdom. God, having spoken in his holiness, that David shall be king, he doubts not but the kingdom is all his own, as sure as if it were already in his hand. "I will divide Shechem," a pleasant city in mount Ephraim, "and mete out the valley of Succoth" as my own; ver. 7, "Gilead is mine, and Manasseh is mine," and both entirely reduced. Ephraim would furnish him with soldiers for his life-guards and his standing forces; Judah would furnish him with able judges for his courts of justice; and thus Ephraim would be the strength of his head, and Judah his lawgiver. Thus may an active believer triumph in the promises, and take the comfort of all the good contained in them; for they are all Yea and Amen in Christ. "God hath spoken in his holiness," and then pardon is mine, peace mine, grace mine, Christ mine, heaven mine, God himself mine; "All is yours, for you are Christ's," 1 Cor. iii. 22, 23.

2. The conquering of the neighbour nations that had been vexatious to Israel, were still dangerous, and opposed the throne of David; ver. 8, Moab shall be enslaved, and put to the meanest drudgery The Moabites became David's servants, 2 Sam. viii. 2. Edom shall be made a dunghill to throw old shoes upon; at least, David shall take possession of it as his own, which was signified by drawing off his shoe over it, Ru. iv. 7; and as for the Philistines, let them, if they dare, triumph over him as they had done, he will soon force them to change their note. Rather let those that know their own interest triumph because of him; for it would be the greatest kindness imaginable to them to be brought into subjection to David, and communion with Israel.

But the war is not yet brought to an end; there is a strong city (Rabbah perhaps) of the children of Ammon, which yet holds out; Edom is not yet subdued. Now, 1st. David is here inquiring for help to carry on the war. "Who will bring me into the strong city?" What allies, what auxiliaries can I depend upon to make me master of the enemies' country and their strongholds? They that have begun a good work cannot but desire to make a thorough work of it, and to bring it to perfection. 2nd. He is expecting it from God only. "Wilt not thou, O God?" for thou hast spoken in thine holiness; and wilt not thou be as good as thy word? He takes notice of the frowns of Providence they had been under; "Thou hadst," in appearance, "cast us off; thou didst not go forth with our armies" When they were defeated and met with disappointments, they owned it was because they wanted, that is, because they had forfeited, the gracious presence of God with them; yet they do not therefore fly off from him, but rather take so much the faster hold of him; and the less he had done for them of late the more they hoped he would do. At the same time that they own God's justice in what was past they hope in his mercy for what was to come. Though thou hadst cast us off, yet thou wilt not contend for ever, thou wilt not always chide; though thou hadst cast us off, yet thou hast begun to shew mercy, and wilt thou not perfect what thou hast begun? The Son of David in his sufferings seemed to be cast off by his Father, when he cried out, "Why hast thou forsaken me?" and yet even then he obtained a glorious victory over the powers of darkness and their strong city, a victory which will undoubtedly be completed at last; for he is gone forth conquering and to conquer. The Israel of God, his spiritual Israel, through him likewise are more than conquerors. Though sometimes they may be tempted to think that God has cast them off, and may be foiled in particular conflicts, yet God will bring them into the strong city at last. Vincimur in prœlio, sed non in bello,—'We are foiled in a battle, but not in the whole war.' A lively faith in the promise will assure us, not only that the God of peace shall tread Satan under our feet shortly, but that it is our Father's good pleasure to give us the kingdom.

Secondly. He prays in hope. His prayer is, "Give us help from trouble," ver. 11. Even in the day of their triumph they see themselves in trouble, because still in war, which is troublesome even to the prevailing side. None therefore can delight in war, but those that love to fish in troubled waters. The help from trouble they pray for is preservation from those they were at war with. Though now they were conquerors, yet (so uncertain are the issues of war) unless God gave them help in the next engagement, they might go by the worst; therefore, Lord, send us help from the sanctuary. Help from trouble is rest from war, which they prayed for, as those that contended for equity, not for victory. Sic quærimus pacem,—'Thus we seek for peace.'

The hope with which they support themselves in this prayer has two things in it: 1. A diffidence of themselves, and all their creature confidences. "Vain is the help of man;" and then only we are qualified to receive help from God when we are brought to own the insufficiency of all creatures to do that for us which we expect him to do. 2. A confidence in God, and in his power and promise; ver. 12, "Through God we shall do valiantly," and so we shall do victoriously; for he it is, and he only, that shall tread down our enemies, and shall have the praise of it. Note, 1st. Our confidence in God must be so far from superseding, that it must encourage and quicken our endeavours in the way of our duty. Though it is God that performeth all things for us, yet there is something to be done by us. 2nd. Hope in God is the best principle of true courage. Those that do their duty under his conduct may afford to do it valiantly; for what need they fear who have God on their side? 3rd. It is only through God, and by the influence of his grace, that we do valiantly. It is he that puts strength into us, and inspires us, who of ourselves are weak and timorous, with courage and resolution. 4th. Though we do never so valiantly, the success must be attributed entirely to him; for "he it is that shall tread down our enemies," and not we ourselves. All our victories, as well as our valour, are from him, and therefore at his feet all our crowns must be cast.

PSALM LXI.

David in this psalm, as in many others, begins with a sad heart, but concludes with an air of pleasantness; begins with prayers and tears, but ends with songs of praise. Thus the soul by being lifted up to God returns to the enjoyment of itself. It should seem David was driven out and banished when he penned this psalm, whether by Saul or Absalom is uncertain; some think by Absalom, because he calls himself the king, ver. 6, but that refers to the King Messiah. David in this psalm resolves to persevere in his duty, encouraged thereto both by his experience and by his expectations. I. He will call upon God, because God had protected him, ver. 1—3. II. He will call upon God, because God had provided well for him, ver. 4, 5. III. He will praise God, because he had an assurance of the continuance of God's favour to him, ver. 6—8. So that in singing this psalm we may find that which is very expressive both of our faith and of our hope, of our prayers and of our praises. And some passages in this psalm are very peculiar.

To the chief Musician upon Neginah, A Psalm of David.

HEAR my cry, O God;
Attend unto my prayer.
2 From the end of the earth will I cry unto thee, when my heart is overwhelmed:
Lead me to the rock that is higher than I
3 For thou hast been a shelter for me,
And a strong tower from the enemy.
4 I will abide in thy tabernacle for ever:
I will trust in the covert of thy wings. Selah.

In these verses we may observe,

First. David's close adherence and application to God by prayer in the day of his distress and trouble. Whatever comes, "I will cry unto thee," ver. 2; not cry to other gods, but to thee only; not fall out with thee because thou afflictest me, but still look unto thee, and wait upon thee; not speak to thee in a cold and careless manner, but cry to thee with the greatest importunity and fervency of spirit, as one that will not let thee go except thou bless me. This he will do, 1. Notwithstanding his distance from the sanctuary, the house of prayer, where he used to attend, as in the court of requests: "From the end of the earth," or of the land, from the most remote and obscure corner of the country, "will I cry unto thee." Note, Wherever we are we may have liberty of access to God, and may find a way open to the throne of grace. Undique ad cœlos tantundem est viæ,—'Heaven is equally accessible from all places.' Nay, because I am here in the end of the earth, in sorrow and solitude, therefore I will cry unto thee. Note, That which separates us from our other comforts should drive us so much the nearer to God, the fountain of all comfort. 2. Notwithstanding the dejection and despondency of his spirit. Though my heart is overwhelmed, it is not so sunk, so burthened, but that it may be lifted up to God in prayer. If it is not capable of being thus raised, it is certainly too much cast down. Nay, because my heart is ready to be overwhelmed, therefore I will cry unto thee, for by that means it will be supported and relieved. Note, Weeping must quicken praying, and not deaden it. "Is any afflicted? let him pray," Jas. v. 13; Ps. cii., title.

Secondly. The particular petition he put up to God when his heart was overwhelmed, and he was ready to sink. "Lead me to the rock that is higher than I;" that is, 1. To the rock which is too high for me to get up to, unless thou help me to it; Lord, give me such an assurance and satisfaction of my own safety as I can never attain to but by thy special grace working such a faith in me. 2. To the rock, on the top of which I shall be set farther out of the reach of my troubles, and nearer the serene and quiet region, than I can be by any power or wisdom of my own. God's power and promise is a rock that is higher than we this rock is Christ. They are safe that are in him. We cannot get upon this rock unless God by his power lead us. "I will put thee in the clift of the rock," Ex. xxxiii. 22. We should therefore, by faith and prayer, put ourselves under a Divine conduct, that we may be taken under a Divine direction.

Thirdly. His desire and expectation of an answer of peace. He begs in faith, ver. 1, "Hear my cry, O God, attend unto my prayer;" that is, let me have the present comfort of knowing that I am heard, Ps. xx. 6, and in due time let me have that which I pray for.

Fourthly. The ground of this expectation, and the plea he useth to enforce his petition; ver. 3, "Thou hast been a shelter for me," I have found in thee a rock higher than I, therefore I trust thou wilt still lead me to that rock. Note, Past experiences of the benefit of trusting in God, as they should engage us still to keep close to him, so they should encourage us to hope that it will not be in vain. "Thou hast been my strong tower from the enemy," and thou art as strong as ever, and thy name as much a refuge to the righteous as ever it was, Pr. xviii. 10.

Fifthly. His resolution to continue in the way of duty to God, and dependence on him, ver. 4. 1. The service of God shall be his constant work and business. All those must make it so who expect to find God their shelter and strong tower; none but his menial servants have the benefit of his protection: "I will abide in my tabernacle for ever." David was now banished from the tabernacle, which was his greatest grievance, but he is assured that God by his providence would bring him back to his tabernacle, because he had by his grace wrought in him such a kindness for the tabernacle, as that he was resolved to make it his perpetual residence, Ps. xxvii. 4. He speaks of abiding in it for ever, because lx. 8. "Moab is my washpot," i.e., for ignoble uses. To cast the shoe over Edom is to subjugate it, hold it in subjection.

lxi. 2. "From the end of the earth" is "from the extremity of the land" of Israel. The psalm has been ascribed to the time when David was a fugitive during the revolt of Absalom.

lxi. 6. The expression, "Thou wilt prolong the king's life," is understood of King Messiah by the Chaldee interpreter, with whom many agree in regarding the psalm as Messianic.

lxi. 7. The Syriac translates, "He shall be established for ever before God: grace and truth, who shall keep it?" The Hebrew may be rendered, "He shall abide before God for ever: prepare grace and truth, that they may preserve him." The second clause merely means "cause that grace and truth may preserve him," and it may be so translated.

lxii. 3. The Hebrew word for "will ye imagine mischief" only occurs here, and has been interpreted in a variety of ways. The that tabernacle was a type and figure of heaven Heb. ix. 8, 9, 24, and those that dwell in God's tabernacle, as it is a house of duty, during their short ever on earth, shall dwell in that tabernacle which is the house of glory during an endless ever. 2. The grace of God, and the covenant of grace, shall be his constant comfort: "I will make my refuge in the covert of his wings," as the chickens seek both warmth and safety under the wings of the hen. Those that have found God a shelter to them ought still to have recourse to him in all their straits. This advantage they have that abide in God's tabernacle, that in the time of trouble he shall there hide them.

5 For thou, O God, hast heard my vows: [name.
Thou hast given me the heritage of those that fear thy 6 Thou wilt prolong the king's life:
And his years as many generations.
7 He shall abide before God for ever:
O prepare mercy and truth, which may preserve him
8 So will I sing praise unto thy name for ever,
That I may daily perform my vows.

In these verses we may observe,

First. With what pleasure David looks back upon what God had done for him formerly; ver. 5, "Thou, O God, hast heard my vows;" that is, 1. The vows themselves which I made, and with which I bound my soul. Thou hast taken notice of them; thou hast accepted them because made in sincerity, and been well pleased with them; thou hast been mindful of them, and put me in mind of them. God put Jacob in mind of his vows, Gen. xxxi. 13; xxxv. 1. Note, God is a witness to all our vows, all our good purposes, and all our solemn promises of new obedience. He keeps an account of them, which should be a good reason with us, as it was with David here, why we should perform our vows, ver. 8; for he that hears the vows we made will make us hear from them if they be not made good. 2. The prayers that went along with those vows; those thou hast graciously heard and answered, which encouraged him now to pray, "O God, hear my cry." He that never did say to the seed of Jacob, Seek ye me in vain, will not now begin to say so. Thou hast heard my vows, and given a real answer to them; for "thou hast given me the heritage of those that fear thy name." Note, 1st. There is a peculiar people in the world that fear God's name,—that with a holy awe and reverence accept of, and accommodate themselves to, all the discoveries he is pleased to make of himself to the children of men. 2nd. There is a heritage peculiar to that peculiar people,—present comforts, earnests of their future bliss. God himself is their inheritance, their portion for ever. The Levites, that had God for their inheritance, must take up with him, and not expect a lot like their brethren. So those that fear God have enough in him, and therefore must not complain if they have but little of the world. 3rd. We need desire no better heritage than that of those which fear God. If God deal with us as he uses to deal with those that love his name, we need not desire to be any better dealt with.

Secondly. With what assurance he looks forward to the continuance of his life; ver. 6, "Thou wilt prolong the king's life." This may be understood either, 1. Of himself. If it were penned before he came to the crown, yet, being anointed by Samuel, and knowing what God had spoken in his holiness, he could in faith call himself the king, though now persecuted as an outlaw. Or, perhaps it was penned when Absalom sought to unking him, and forced him into exile. There were those that aimed to shorten his life, but he trusted to God to prolong his life, which he did to the age of man set by Moses, namely, seventy years, which, spent in serving his generation according to the will of God, (Acts xiii. 36,) might be reckoned as many generations, because many generations would be the better for him. His resolution was to abide in God's tabernacle for ever, ver. 4, in a way of duty; and now his hope is, that he shall abide before God for ever in a way of comfort. Those abide to good purpose in this world that abide before God, that is, that serve him, and walk in his fear; and they that do so shall abide before him for ever. He speaks of himself in the third person, because the psalm was delivered to the chief musician, for the use of the church, and he would have the people in singing of it to be encouraged with an assurance that, notwithstanding the malice of his enemies, their king, as they wished, should live for ever. Or, 2. Of the Messiah, the king of whom he was a type. It was a comfort to David to think, whatever became of him, the years of the Lord's anointed should be as many generations, and of the increase of his government and peace there shall be no end. The Mediator shall abide before God for ever, for he always appears in the presence of God for us, and ever lives making intercession; and because he lives we shall live also.

Thirdly. With what importunity he begs of God to take him and keep him always under his protection; "O prepare mercy and truth, which may preserve him." God's promises, and our faith in them, are not to supersede, but to quicken and encourage prayer. David is sure that God will prolong his life, and therefore prays that he would preserve it; not that he would prepare him a strong life-guard, or a well fortified castle, but that he would prepare mercy and truth for his preservation; that is, that God's goodness would provide for his safety according to the promise. We need not desire to be better secured than under the protection of God's mercy and truth. This may be applied to the Messiah; let him be sent in the fulness of time in "performance of the truth to Jacob, and the mercy to Abraham," Mic. vii. 20; Lu. i. 72, 73.

Fourthly. With what cheerfulness he vows the grateful returns of duty to God; ver. 8, "So will I sing praise unto thy name for ever." Note, God's preserving us calls upon us to praise him; and therefore we should desire to live that we may praise him; "Let my soul live, and it shall praise thee." We must make praising God the work of our time, even to the last. As long as our lives are prolonged, we must continue praising God; and then it shall be made the work of our eternity, and we shall be praising him for ever. "That I may daily perform my vows." His praising God was itself the performance of his vows, and it disposed his heart to the performance of his vows in other instances. Note, 1. The vows we have made we must conscientiously perform. 2. Praising God and paying our vows to him must be our constant daily work. Every day we must be doing something towards it, because it is all but little in comparison with what is due; because we daily receive fresh mercies, and because if we think much to do it daily we cannot expect to be doing it eternally.

PSALM LXII.

This psalm has nothing in it directly either of prayer or praise; nor doth it appear upon what occasion it was penned, nor whether upon any particular occasion, whether mournful or joyful. But in it, I. David with a great deal of pleasure professeth his own confidence in God, and dependence upon him, and encourageth himself to continue waiting on him, ver. 1—7. II. With a great deal of earnestness he excites and encourageth others to trust in God likewise, and not in any creature, ver. 8—12. And in singing it we should stir up ourselves to wait on God.

To the chief Musician, to Jeduthun, A Psalm of David.

TRULY my soul waiteth upon God:
From him cometh my salvation.
2 He only is my rock and my salvation;
He is my defence; I shall not be greatly moved.
3 How long will ye imagine mischief against a man?
Ye shall be slain all of you:
As a bowing wall shall ye be, and as a tottering fence.
4 They only consult to cast him down from his excellency
They delight in lies:
They bless with their mouth, but they curse inwardly.
5 My soul, wait thou only upon God; [Selah.
For my expectation is from him.
6 He only is my rock and my salvation:
He is my defence; I shall not be moved
7 In God is my salvation and my glory:
The rock of my strength, and my refuge, is in God

In these verses we have,

First. David's profession of dependence upon God, and upon him only, for all good; ver. 1, "Truly my soul waiteth upon God." 'Nevertheless,' so some, or 'however it be;' whatever difficulties or dangers I may meet with, though God frown upon me, and I meet with discouragements in my attendance on him, yet still "my soul waiteth upon God;" or, is silent to God, as the word is; saith nothing against what he doth, but quietly expects what he will do. We are in the way both of duty and comfort when our souls wait upon God, that is, when we cheerfully refer ourselves and the disposal of all our affairs to his will and wisdom; when we acquiesce in, and accommodate ourselves to, all the dispensations of his providence; and patiently expect a doubtful event with an entire satisfaction in his righteousness and goodness, however it be. "Is not my soul subject to God?" so the Seventy; so it is, certainly so it ought to be; our wills must be melted into his will. My soul hath respect to God; for "from him cometh my salvation." He doubts not but his salvation will come, though now he was threatened and in danger; and he expects it to come from God, and from him only; for in vain is it hoped for from hills and mountains, Jer. iii. 23; Ps. cxxi. 1, 2. From him I know it will come, and therefore on him will I patiently wait till it doth come; for his time is the best time. We may apply it to our eternal salvation, which is called the salvation of God, Ps. l. 23. From him that comes; he prepared it for us; he prepares us for it, and preserves us to it; and therefore let our souls wait on him, to be conducted through this world to that eternal salvation in such a way as he thinks fit.

Secondly. The ground and reason of this dependence; ver. 2, "He only is my rock and my salvation, he is my defence." 1. He hath been so many a time, in him I have found shelter, and strength, and succour; he hath by his grace supported me, and borne me up under my troubles, and by his providence defended me from the insults of my enemies, and delivered me out of the troubles into which I was plunged; and therefore "I trust he will deliver me," 2 Cor. i. 10. 2. He only can be my rock and my salvation. Creatures are insufficient; they are nothing without him, and therefore I will look above them to him. 3. He hath by covenant undertaken to be so. Even he that is the Rock of ages is my rock, that is the God of salvation is my salvation, that is the Most High is my high place; and therefore I have all the reason in the world to confide in him.

Thirdly. The improvement he makes of his confidence in God.

1. Trusting in God, his heart is fixed. If God is my strength and mighty deliverer, "I shall not be greatly moved;" that is, I shall not be undone and ruined; I may be shocked, but I shall not be sunk; or, I shall not be much disturbed and disquieted in my own breast. I may be put into some fright, but I shall not be afraid with any amazement, nor so as to be put out of the possession of my own soul. I may be perplexed, but not in despair, 2 Cor. iv. 8. This hope in God will be an anchor of the soul sure and stedfast.

2. His enemies are slighted, and all their attempts against him looked upon with contempt, ver. 3, 4. If God be for us, we need not fear what man can do against us, though never so mighty and malicious. He here, 1st. Gives a character of his enemies. They imagine mischief, design it with a great deal of the serpent's venom, and contrive it with a great deal of the serpent's subtlety; and this against a man, one of their own kind,—against one single man that is not an equal match for them, for they are many. They continued their malicious prosecution though Providence had often defeated their mischievous designs. How long will ye do it? Will ye never be convinced of your error? Will your malice never have spent itself? They are unanimous in their consultations to cast an excellent man down from his excellency,—to draw an honest man from his integrity, to entangle him in sin,—which is the only thing that can effectually cast us down from our excellency: to thrust a man whom God has exalted down from his dignity, and so to fight against God. Envy was at the bottom of their malice. They were grieved at David's advancement, and therefore plotted, by diminishing his character and blackening that, which was casting him down from his excellency, to baulk his preferment. In order to this they belie him, and love to hear such ill characters given of him, and such ill reports raised and spread concerning him, as they themselves know to be false; "they delight in lies." And as they make no conscience of lying concerning him, to do him a mischief, so they make no conscience of lying to him, to conceal the mischief they design, and accomplish it the more effectually; "They bless with their mouth," they compliment David to his face, "but they curse inwardly;" that is, in their hearts they wish him all mischief, and privately they are plotting against him, and in their cabals carrying on some ill design or other by which they hope to ruin him. It is dangerous putting our trust in men who are thus false; but God is faithful. 2nd. He reads their doom; pronounceth a sentence of death upon them, not as a king, but as a prophet; "Ye shall be slain, all of you," by the righteous judgments of God. Saul and his servants were slain by the Philistines on mount Gilboa, according to this prediction. Whoever seeks the ruin of God's chosen are but preparing ruin for themselves. God's church is built upon a rock which will stand, but they that fight against it, and its patrons, and protectors, shall be "as a bowing

Syriac has, "How long will ye be provoked against a man?" The Greek has, "How long do ye assail a man?" and the Chaldee and Latin give the same sense, to which Fürst and Gesenius give in their assent. In the opinion of some it signifies to plot against, while others make it to cry out against, but the idea of the Greek seems preferable. The word rendered "ye shall be slain" is taken actively by the ancient interpreters, and by some others, as Gesenius, "ye will slay," or "ye will crush." Many take the form as a passive, like our translators. We cannot decide which the psalmist intended, but we prefer to construe it as an active verb; in which case we may translate the whole verse, "How long do you assail a man? All of you would crush him like a bowing wall and a tumbling fence." The next verse seems to favour this explanation.

lxii. 9. "To be laid in the balance" is as much as to say, "when they are laid in the balance." For "altogether" read "alike;" the one and the other.

wall, and a tottering fence," which, having a rotten foundation, sinks with its own weight, falls of a sudden, and buries those in the ruins of it that put themselves under the shadow and shelter of it. David, having put his confidence in God, thus foresees the overthrow of his enemies, and in effect sets them at defiance, and bids them do their worst.

3. He is himself encouraged to continue waiting upon God; ver. 5—7, "My soul, wait thou only upon God." Note, The good we do we should stir up ourselves to continue doing, and to do yet more and more, as those that have through grace experienced the comfort and benefit of it. We have found it good to wait upon God, and therefore should charge our souls, and even charm them into such a constant dependence upon him, as may make us always easy. He had said, ver. 1, "From him cometh my salvation;" he saith, ver. 5, "My expectation is from him." His salvation was the principal matter of his expectation; let him have that from God and he expects no more. His salvation being from God, all his other expectations are from him. If God will save my soul, as to every thing else let him do what he pleaseth with me, and I will acquiesce in his disposals, knowing they shall all turn to my salvation, Phil. i. 19. He repeats, ver. 6, what he had said concerning God, ver. 2, as one that was not only assured of it, but greatly well pleased with it, and dwelt much upon it in his thoughts. "He only is my rock and my salvation, he is my defence;" I know he is; but there he adds, "I shall not be greatly moved;" here, "I shall not be moved" at all. Note, The more faith is acted the more active it is; crescit eundo,—'it grows by being exercised.' The more we meditate upon God's attributes and promises, and our own experience, the more ground we get of our fears, which, like Haman, when they begin to fall, shall fall before us, and we shall be kept in perfect peace, Isa. xxvi. 3. And as David's faith in God advanceth to an unshaken staidness, so his joy in God improves itself into a holy triumph; ver. 7, "In God is my salvation and my glory." Where our salvation is, there our glory is; for what is our salvation but the glory to be revealed,—the eternal weight of glory? and there our glorifying must be. In God let us boast all the day long. "The rock of my strength," that is, my strong rock, on which I build my hopes, and stay myself, "and my refuge" to which I flee for shelter when I am pursued, "is in God," and in him only. I have no other to flee to, no other to trust to; the more I think of it the better satisfied I am in the choice I have made. Thus doth he delight himself in the Lord, and then ride upon the high places of the earth, Isa. lviii. 14.

8 Trust in him at all times; ye people,
Pour out your heart before him:
God is a refuge for us. Selah.
9 Surely men of low degree are vanity,
And men of high degree are a lie:
To be laid in the balance,
They are altogether lighter than vanity
10 Trust not in oppression,
And become not vain in robbery:
If riches increase, set not your heart upon them.
11 God hath spoken once;
Twice have I heard this;
That power belongeth unto God.
12 Also unto thee, O Lord, belongeth mercy:
For thou renderest to every man according to his work

Here we have David's exhortation to others to trust in God, and wait upon him as he had done. Those that have found the comfort of the ways of God themselves will invite others into those ways. There is enough in God for all the saints to draw from, and we shall have never the less for others sharing with us.

First. He counsels all to wait upon God as he did, ver. 8. Observe, 1. To whom he gives this good counsel; "Ye people," that is, all people, all shall be welcome to trust in God, for he is "the confidence of all the ends of the earth," Ps. lxv. 5; 'ye people of the house of Israel,' so the Chaldee. They are especially engaged and invited to trust in God, for he is the God of Israel; and "should not a people seek unto their God?" 2. What the good counsel is which he gives. 1st. To confide in God; "Trust in him;" deal with him, and be willing to deal upon trust; depend upon him to perform all things for you, —upon his wisdom and goodness, his power and promise, his providence and grace. Do this "at all times," that is, we must have an habitual confidence in God always; must live a life of dependence upon him; must so trust in him at all times as not at any time to put that confidence in ourselves or in any creature which is to be put in him only. And we must have an actual confidence in God upon all occasions; trust in him upon every emergency to guide us when we are in doubt; to protect us when we are in danger; to supply us when we are in want; to strengthen us for every good word and work. 2nd. To converse with God; "Pour out your heart before him." The expression seems to allude to the pouring out of the drink-offerings before the Lord. When we make a penitent confession of sin, our hearts are therein poured out before God, 1 Sam. vii. 31; but here it is meant of prayer, which, if it be as it should be, is the pouring out of the heart before God. We must lay our grievances before him, offer up our desires to him with all humble freedom, and then entirely refer ourselves to his disposal, patiently submitting our wills to his. This is pouring out our hearts. 3rd. What encouragement he gives us to take this good counsel. "God is a refuge for us;" not only my refuge, ver. 7, but a refuge for us all, even as many as will flee to him, and take shelter in him.

Secondly. He cautions us to take heed of misplacing our confidence, in which, as much as in any thing, "the heart is deceitful," Jer. xvii. 5—9. They that trust in God truly, ver. 1, will trust in him only, ver. 5.

1. Let us not trust in the men of this world, for they are broken reeds; ver. 9, "Surely men of low degree are vanity," utterly unable to help us, "and men of high degree are a lie," that will deceive us if we trust to them. Men of low degree, one would think, might be relied on for their multitude and number, their bodily strength and service; and men of high degree for their wisdom, power, and influence: but they are neither to be depended upon; nay, of the two, men of high degree are under the worse character,—for they are a lie, which notes not only vanity but iniquity. We are not so apt to depend upon men of low degree as upon the king and captain of the host, who, by the figure they make, tempt us to trust in them, and so when they fail us prove a lie; but lay them in the balance, the balance of the Scripture,—or rather make trial of them,—see how they will prove, whether they will answer your expectations from them or no; and you will write Tekel upon them, they are alike lighter than vanity. There is no depending upon their wisdom to advise us, their power to act for us; upon their goodwill to us, no, nor upon their promises, in comparison with God, nor otherwise than in subordination to him.

2. Let us not trust in the wealth of this world, let not that be made our strong city; ver. 10, "Trust not in oppression," that is, not in riches got by fraud and violence, because where there is a great deal it is commonly got by indirect scraping or saving,—our Saviour calls it the mammon of unrighteousness, Lu. xvi. 9; or, not in the arts of getting riches. Think not that, either because you have got abundance or are in the way of getting, that therefore you are safe enough; for this is becoming vain in robbery, that is, cheating yourselves while you think to cheat others. He that "trusted in the abundance of his riches, strengthened himself in his wickedness." Ps. lii. 7; but at his end he will be a fool, Jer. xvii. 11. Let none be so stupid as to think of supporting themselves in their sin, much less of supporting themselves in this sin; nay, because it is hard to have riches and not to trust in them, if they increase, though by lawful and honest means, we must take heed lest we let out our affections inordinately towards them. Set not your heart upon them; that is, be not eager for them, do not take a complacency in them as the rest of your souls, nor put a confidence in them as your portion; be not over solicitous about them; do not value yourselves and others by them; make not the wealth of the world your chief good and highest end; in short, do not make an idol of it. This we are most in danger of doing when they increase; when the grounds of the rich man brought forth plentifully, then he said to his soul, Take thine ease in these things, Lu. xii. 19. It is a smiling world that is most likely to draw the heart away from God, on whom only it should be set.

Thirdly. He gives a very good reason why we should make God our confidence, because he is a God of infinite power, mercy, and righteousness, ver. 11, 12. This he himself was well assured of, and would have us be assured of it: "God hath spoken once, twice have I heard this;" that is, 1. God hath spoken it, and I have heard it, once, yea twice. He hath spoken it, and I have heard it by the light of reason, which easily infers it from the nature of the infinitely-perfect Being, and from his works both of creation and providence. He has spoken it and I have heard once, yea twice; that is, many a time, by the events that have been concerning me in particular, and by the light of revelation; by dreams and visions, Job iv. 15; by the glorious manifestation of himself upon mount Sinai, to which some think it doth especially refer, and by the written Word. God has often told us what a great and good God he is, and we ought as often to take notice of what he told us. Or, 2. Though God spoke it but once, I heard it twice; heard it diligently, not only with my outward ears, but with my soul and mind. To some God speaks twice, and they will not hear once; but to others he speaks but once, and they hear twice. Compare Job xxxiii. 14. Now what is it which is thus spoken and thus heard?

1st. That the God with whom we have to do is infinite in power. "Power belongs to God;" he is almighty, and can do every thing; with him nothing is impossible; all the powers of all the creatures are derived from him, and depend upon him, and are used by him as he pleaseth. His is the power, and to him we must ascribe it. This is a good reason why we should "trust in him at all times," and live in a constant dependence upon him; for he is able to do all that for us which we trust in him for.

2nd. That he is a God of infinite goodness. Here he turns his speech to God himself, as being desirous to give him the glory of his goodness, which is his glory: "Also unto thee, O Lord, belongeth mercy." God is not only the greatest, but the best of beings. Mercy is with him, Ps. cxxx. 4, 7. He is merciful in a way peculiar to himself; he is the Father of mercies, 2 Cor. i. 3. This is a farther reason why we should trust in him, and answers the objections of our sinfulness and unworthiness,—though we deserve nothing but his wrath, yet we may hope for all good from his mercy, which is over all his works.

3rd. That he never did, nor ever will do, any wrong to any of his creatures; "For thou renderest to every man according to his work." Though he doth not always do this visibly in this world, yet he will do it in the day of recompence. No service done him shall go unrewarded, nor any affront given him unpunished, unless it be repented of. By this it appears that power and mercy belong to him. If he were not a God of power, there are sinners that would be too big to be punished; and if he were not a God of mercy, there are services that would be too worthless to be rewarded. This seems especially to speak the justice of God in judging upon appeals made to him by wronged innocency. He will be sure to judge according to truth, in righting the injured, and revenging them on those that have been injurious to them, 1 Kin. viii. 32. Let those therefore that are wronged commit their cause to him, and trust to him to plead it.

PSALM LXIII.

This psalm has in it as much of warmth and lively devotion as any of David's psalms in so little a compass. As the sweetest of Paul's epistles were those that bore date out of a prison, so some of the sweetest of David's psalms were those that were penned, as this was, in a wilderness. That which grieved him most in his banishment was, the want of public ordinances; these he here longs to be restored to the enjoyment of; and the present want did but whet his appetite. Yet it is not the ordinances, but the God of the ordinances, that his heart is upon. And here we have, I. His desire towards God, ver. 1, 2. II. His esteem of God, ver. 3, 4. III. His satisfaction in God, ver. 5; IV. His secret communion with God, ver. 6. V. His joyful dependence upon God, ver. 7, 8. VI. His holy triumph in God, over his enemies, and in the assurance of his own safety, ver. 9—11. A devout and pious soul has little need of direction how to sing this psalm, so naturally doth it speak its own genuine language; and an unsanctified soul, that is unacquainted and unaffected with Divine things, is scarce capable of singing it with understanding.

A Psalm of David, when he was in the wilderness of Judah.

O GOD, thou art my God; early will I seek thee:
My soul thirsteth for thee, my flesh longeth for thee
In a dry and thirsty land, where no water is;
2 To see thy power and thy glory,
So as I have seen thee in the sanctuary.

The title tells us when the psalm was penned, when David was in the wilderness of Judah; that is, in the forest of Hareth, 1 Sam. xxii. 5; or in the wilderness of Ziph, 1 Sam. xxiii. 15. 1. Even in Canaan, though a fruitful land, and the people numerous, yet there were wildernesses, places less fruitful and less inhabited than other places. It will be so in the world, in the church, but not in heaven. There it is all city, all paradise, and no desert ground. The wilderness there shall blossom as the rose. 2. The best and dearest of God's saints and servants may sometimes have their lot cast in a wilderness, which speaks them lonely and solitary, desolate and afflicted, wanting, wandering, and unsettled, and quite at a loss what to do with themselves. 3. All the straits and difficulties of a wilderness must not put us out of tune for sacred songs; but even then it is our duty and interest to keep up a cheerful communion with lxii. 10. This may be rendered, "Trust not in oppression and robbery: be not vain; if riches increase, set not your heart upon them," i.e., do not love them.

lxii. 11. It is to be noticed that, according to the Targum, "once" here means "one law," and that when the psalmist says what our version gives as "twice have I heard this," we must explain it, "these two things have I heard," or gathered from God's law —viz., the might and mercy of God.

lxiii. Title. It is uncertain to what precise period this title refers the composition of the psalm. Some understand it of the time when David fled from Saul, in order to avoid his persecutions; but others think there is no doubt it was written when David withdrew in order to escape during the rebellion of Absalom. The latter is, upon the whole, the preferable opinion, because the second verse implies a familiar acquaintance with the privileges of the sanctuary now denied him.

God. There are psalms proper for a wilderness, and we have reason to thank God it is the wilderness of Judah we are in, not the wilderness of Sin. David in these verses stirs up himself to take hold on God,

First. By a lively, active faith. "O God, thou art my God." Note, In all our addresses to God we must eye him as God, and our God, and this will be our comfort in a wilderness state. We must acknowledge that God is, that we speak to one that really exists, and is present with us when we say, O God, which is a serious word,—pity it should ever be used as a byword; and we must own his authority over us, and propriety in us, and our relation to him. "Thou art my God;" mine by creation, and therefore my rightful owner and ruler; mine by covenant and my own consent. We must speak it with the greatest pleasure to ourselves and thankfulness to God, as those that are resolved to abide by it. "O God, thou art my God."

Secondly. By pious and devout affections, pursuant to the choice he had made of God, and the covenant he had made with him.

1. He resolves to seek God, and his favour and grace. "Thou art my God," and therefore "I will seek thee;" for "should not a people seek unto their God?" Isa. viii. 20. We must seek him, that is, we must covet his favour as our chief good, and consult his glory as our highest end. We must seek acquaintance with him by his word, and seek mercy from him by prayer. We must seek him, 1st. Early; that is, with the utmost care, as those that are afraid of missing him; we must begin our days with him, begin every day with him. "Early will I seek thee." 2nd. Earnestly; "My soul thirsteth for thee, and my flesh longeth for thee;" that is, my whole man is affected with this pursuit here "in a dry and thirsty land." Observe, First. His complaint in the want of God's favourable presence. He was "in a dry and thirsty land," so he reckoned it; not so much because it was a wilderness as because it was at a distance from the ark, from the word and sacraments. This world is 'a weary land,' so the word is; it is so to the worldly, that have their portion in it, it will yield them no true satisfaction; it is so to the godly, that have their passage through it, it is a valley of Baca, they can promise themselves little from it. Secondly. His importunity for that presence of God. "My soul thirsteth, longeth for thee." His want quickened his desires, which were very intense; he thirsted as the hunted hart for the waterbrooks; he would take up with nothing short of it. And they were very impatient; he longed, he languished till he should be restored to the liberty of God's ordinances. Note, Gracious souls look down upon the world with a holy disdain, and look up to God with a holy desire.

2. He longs to enjoy God. What is it he doth so passionately wish for? What is his petition, and what is his request? It is this; ver. 2, "To see thy power and thy glory, so as I have seen thee in the sanctuary." That is, 1st. To see it here in this wilderness, as I have seen it in the tabernacle; to see it in secret, as I have seen it in the solemn assembly. Note, When we want the benefit of public ordinances, we should desire and endeavour to keep up the same communion with God in our retirements that we have had in the great congregation. A closet may be turned into a little sanctuary. Ezekiel had the visions of the Almighty in Babylon, and John in the isle of Patmos. When we are alone we may have the Father with us, and that is enough. 2nd. To see it again in the sanctuary as I have formerly seen it there. He longs to be brought out of this wilderness, not that he might see his friends again, and be restored to the pleasures and gaieties of the court, but that he might have access to the sanctuary, not to see the priests there, and the ceremony of the worship, but "to see thy power and glory," that is, thy glorious power, or thy powerful glory, which is put for all God's attributes and perfections; that I may increase in my acquaintance with them, and have the agreeable impressions of them made upon my heart. So to behold the glory of the Lord, as to be changed into the same image; 2 Cor. iii. 18, "That I may see thy power and glory." He doth not say, as I have seen them, but, as I have seen thee. We cannot see the essence of God, but we see him in seeing by faith his attributes and perfections. These sights David here pleaseth himself with the remembrance of. Those were precious minutes which he spent in communion with God; he loved to think them over again. These he lamented the loss of, and longed to be restored to. Note, That which has been the delight, and is the desire, of gracious souls in their attendance on solemn ordinances is, to see God and his power and glory in them.

3 Because thy lovingkindness is better than life,
My lips shall praise thee.
4 Thus will I bless thee while I live:
I will lift up my hands in thy name.
5 My soul shall be satisfied as with marrow and fatness;
And my mouth shall praise thee with joyful lips:
6 When I remember thee upon my bed,
And meditate on thee in the night watches.

How soon are David's complaints and prayers turned into praises and thanksgivings! After two verses that speak his desire in seeking God, here are some that speak his joy and satisfaction in having found him. Faithful prayers may presently be turned into joyful praises, if it be not our own fault. "Let the hearts of those rejoice that seek the Lord," Ps. cv. 3, and let them praise him for working those desires in them, and giving them assurance that he will satisfy them. David was now in a wilderness, and yet had his heart much enlarged in blessing God. Even in affliction we need not want matter for praise, if we have but a heart to it. Observe,

First. What David will praise God for; ver. 3, "Because thy lovingkindness is better than life," than lives. Life, and all the comforts of life; life in its best estate; long life and prosperity. God's lovingkindness is in itself, and in the account of all the saints, better than life. It is our spiritual life, and that is better than temporal life, Ps. xxx. 5. It is better a thousand times to die in God's favour than to live under his wrath. David in the wilderness finds by comfortable experience that God's lovingkindness is better than life; and therefore," saith he, "my lips shall praise thee." Note, Those that have their hearts refreshed with the tokens of God's favour ought to have them enlarged in his praises. A great deal of reason we have to bless God we have better provisions and better possessions than the wealth of this world can afford us; and that in the service of God, and in communion with him, we have better employments and better enjoyments than we can have in the business and converse of this world.

Secondly. How he will praise God, and how long, ver. 4. He resolves to live a life of thankfulness to God, and dependence on him. Observe, 1. His manner of blessing God: "Thus will I bless thee." "Thus," as I have now begun; the present devout affections shall not pass away like the morning cloud, but shine more and more, like the morning sun. Or "thus," that is, I will bless thee with the same earnestness and fervency with which I have prayed to thee. 2. His continuance and perseverance therein: "I will bless thee while I live." Note, Praising God must be the work of our whole lives. We must always retain a grateful sense of his former favours, and repeat our thanksgivings for them; we must every day give thanks to him for the benefits with which we are daily loaded. We must in every thing give thanks; and not be put out of frame for this duty by any of the afflictions of this present time. Whatever days we live to see, how dark and cloudy soever, though the days come of which we say we have no pleasure in them; yet still every day must be a thanksgiving day, even to our dying day. In this work we must spend our time, because in this work we hope to spend a blessed eternity. 3. His constant regard to God upon all occasions, which should accompany his praises of him. "I will lift up my hands in thy name." We must have an eye to God's name, that is, to all that by which he has made himself known, in all our prayers and praises, which we are taught to begin with "hallowed be thy name," and to conclude with "thine is the glory." This we must have an eye to in our work and warfare; we must lift up our hands to our duty, and against our spiritual enemies in God's name, that is, in the strength of his Spirit and grace, Ps. lxxi. 16; Zec. x. 12. We must make all our vows in God's name, to him we must engage ourselves, and in a dependence upon his grace. And when we lift up the hands that hang down, in comfort and joy, it must be in God's name; from him our comforts must be fetched, and to him they must be devoted. In thee do we boast all the day.

Thirdly. With what pleasure and delight he would praise God, ver. 5. 1. With inward complacency. "My soul shall be satisfied as with marrow and fatness." Not only as with bread, which is nourishing, but as with marrow, which is pleasant and delicious, Isa. xxv. 6. David hopes he shall return again to the enjoyment of God's ordinances, and then he shall thus be satisfied, and the more for his having been for a time under restraint. Or, if not, yet in God's lovingkindness, and in conversing with him in solitude, he shall be thus satisfied. Note, There is that in a gracious God, and in communion with him, which gives abundant satisfaction to a gracious soul, Ps. xxxvi. 8; lxv. 4. And there is that in a gracious soul which takes abundant satisfaction in God, and communion with him. The saints have a contentment with God, they desire no more than his favour to make them happy; and they have a transcendent complacency in God, in comparison with which all the delights of sense are sapless and without relish; as puddle water in comparison with the wine of this consolation. 2. With outward expressions of this satisfaction. He will praise God with joyful lips. He will praise him, 1st. Openly. His mouth and lips shall praise God. When with the heart man believeth, and is thankful, with the mouth confession must be made of both, to the glory of God. Not that the performances of the mouth are accepted without the heart, Mat. xv. 8; but out of the abundance of the heart the mouth must speak, Ps. xlv. 1, both for the exciting of our own devout affections and for the edification of others. 2nd. Cheerfully. We must praise God with joyful lips; we must address ourselves to that and other duties of religion with great cheerfulness, and speak forth the praises of God from a principle of holy joy. Praising lips must be joyful lips.

Fourthly. How he would entertain himself with thoughts of God when he was most retired, ver. 6. I will praise thee "when I remember thee upon my bed." We must praise God upon every remembrance of him. Now David was shut out from public ordinances, he abounded the more in secret communion with God, and so did something towards making up his loss. Observe here,

1. How David employed himself in thinking of God. God was in all his thoughts, which is the reverse of the wicked man's character, Ps. x. 4. The thoughts of God were ready to him: "I remember thee;" that is, when I go to think, I find thee at my right hand present to my mind. This subject should first offer itself as that which we cannot forget or overlook. And they were fixed in him: "I meditate on thee." Thoughts of God must not be transient thoughts, passing through the mind, but abiding thoughts, dwelling in the mind.

2. When David employed himself thus. Upon his bed, and in the night-watches. David was now wandering and unsettled, but wherever he came he brought his religion along with him. 'Upon my beds,' so some. Being hunted by Saul, he seldom lay two nights together in the same bed; but wherever he lay, if, as Jacob, upon the cold ground, and with a stone for his pillow, yet good thoughts of God lay down with him. David was so full of business all day, shifting for his own safety, that he had scarce leisure to apply himself solemnly to religious exercises, and therefore, rather than want time for them, he denied himself his necessary sleep. He was now in continual peril of his life, so that we may suppose care and fear many a time held his eyes waking, and gave him wearisome nights; but then he entertained and comforted himself with thoughts of God. Sometimes we find David in tears upon his bed, Ps. vi. 6, but thus he wiped away his tears. When sleep departeth from our eyes through pain or sickness of body, or any disturbance in the mind, our souls by remembering God may be at ease and repose themselves. Perhaps an hour's pious meditation will do us more good than an hour's sleep would have done: see Ps. iv. 4; xvi. 7; xvii. 3; cxix. 62. There were night watches kept in the tabernacle for praising God, Ps. cxxxiv. 1, which it is probable David when he had liberty joined with the Levites in; but, now he could not keep place with them, he kept time with them, and wished himself among them.

7 Because thou hast been my help,
Therefore in the shadow of thy wings will I rejoice.
8 My soul followeth hard after thee:
Thy right hand upholdeth me.
9 But those that seek my soul, to destroy it,
Shall go into the lower parts of the earth.
10 They shall fall by the sword:
They shall be a portion for foxes.
11 But the king shall rejoice in God;
Every one that sweareth by him shall glory:
But the mouth of them that speak lies shall be stopped.

David having expressed his desires towards God, and his praises of him, here speaks his confidence in him, and his joyful expectations from him; ver. 7, "In the shadow of thy wings I will rejoice," alluding either to the wings of the cherubims stretched out over the ark of the covenant, between which God is said to dwell,—I will rejoice in thine oracles, and in covenant and communion with thee; or to the wings of a fowl, under which the helpless young ones have shelter, as the eagles' young ones, Ex. xix. 4, Deu xxxii. 11, which speaks the Divine power; and the young ones of the common hen, Mat. xxiii. 37, which speaks more of Divine tenderness. It is a phrase often used in the psalms, Ps. xvii. 8; xxxvi. 7; lvii. 1; lxi. 4; xci. 4; and nowhere else in this sense, except Ru. ii. 12, where Ruth, when she became a proselyte, is said to trust under the wings of the God of Israel. It is our duty to rejoice in the shadow lxiii. 6. "In the night watches," or, literally, "in the watches." The Hebrews divided the night into three watches, the first of which is referred to in Lam. ii. 19, "the beginning of the watches," i.e., the first watch; the second is called "the middle watch" (Judg. vii. 19); and the third is "the morning watch" (1 Sam. xi. 11).

lxiii. 8. For "followeth hard after thee," the Hebrew is "cleaveth after thee," which may be explained to be close behind one's leader.

lxiii. 9. "The lower parts of the earth" is as much as to say "underground;" although, in Psa. cxxxix. 15, it is simply equivalent to "out of sight," in an unseen place.

lxiii. 10. The words, "they shall be a portion for foxes," are an unfortunate rendering, because men do not usually become the prey of foxes. The psalmist alludes to the jackal, which, it is well known, is wont to prey on dead bodies, and will scratch them out of their graves for that purpose. The Hebrew word is comprehensive enough to comprise both foxes and jackals, but the latter are meant here.

of God's wings, which notes our recourse to him by faith and prayer, as naturally as the chickens when they are cold or frightened run by instinct under the wings of the hen. It intimates also our reliance upon him as able and ready to help us, and our refreshment and satisfaction in his care and protection. Having committed ourselves to God, we must be easy and pleased, and quiet from the fear of evil. Now let us see farther,

First. What were the supports and encouragements of David's confidence in God. Two things were as props to that hope, which the word of God was the only foundation of:

1. His former experiences of God's power in relieving him. "Because thou hast been my help," when other helps and helpers failed me, therefore I will still rejoice in thy salvation, will trust in thee for the future, and will do it with delight and holy joy. Thou hast been not only my helper, but my help; for we could never have helped ourselves, nor could any creature have been helpful to us, but by him. Here we may set up our Ebenezer, saying, "Hitherto the Lord has helped us," and must therefore resolve that we will never desert him, never distrust him, nor ever droop in our walking with him.

2. The present sense he had of God's grace carrying him on in these pursuits; ver. 8, "My soul follows hard after thee," which speaks a very earnest desire, and a serious, vigorous endeavour to keep up communion with God. If we cannot always have God in our embraces, yet we must always have him in our eye, reaching forth towards him as our prize, Phil. iii. 14. To press hard after God, is to follow him close, as those that are afraid of losing the sight of him, and to follow him fast, as those that long to be with him. This David did, and he owns to the glory of God, "Thy right hand upholds me." God upholds him, 1st. Under his afflictions, that he might not sink under him. "Underneath are the everlasting arms." 2nd. In his devotions. God upheld him in his holy desires and pursuits, that he might not grow weary in well doing. Those that follow hard after God would soon fail and give off if God's right hand did not uphold them. It is he that strengthens us in the pursuit of him, quickens our good affections, and comforts us while we have not yet attained what we are in the pursuit of. It is by the power of God, that is his right hand, that we are kept from falling. Now this was a great encouragement to the psalmist to hope that he would in due time give him that which he so earnestly desired, because he had by his grace wrought in him those desires, and kept them up.

Secondly. What it was that David triumphed in the hopes of.

1. That his enemies should be ruined, ver. 9, 10. There were those that sought his soul to destroy it. Not only his life, which they struck at, both to prevent his coming to the crown, and because they envied and hated him for his wisdom, piety, and usefulness, but his soul; they sought to destroy that by banishing him from God's ordinances, which are the nourishment and support of the soul, and so doing what they could to starve it; and by sending him to serve other gods, and so doing what they could to poison it, 1 Sam. xxvi. 19. But he foresees and foretells, 1st. That they shall go into the lower parts of the earth—to the grave—to hell. Their enmity to David would be their death, and their damnation; their ruin, their eternal ruin. 2nd. That they shall fall by the sword—by the sword of God's wrath and his justice—by the sword of man, Job xix. 18, 29. They shall die a violent death, Rev. xiii. 10. This was fulfilled in Saul; he fell by the sword, his own sword. David foretold this, yet he would not execute it when it was in the power of his hand, once and again; for precepts, not prophecies, are our rule. 3rd. That "they shall be a portion for foxes." Either their dead bodies shall be a prey to ravenous beasts, (Saul lay a good while unburied,) or their houses and estates shall be a habitation for wild beasts, Isa. xxxiv. 14. Such as this will be the doom of Christ's enemies, that oppose his kingdom and interest in the world. "Bring them forth and slay them before me," Lu. xix. 27.

2. That he himself should gain his point at last, ver. 11. That he should be advanced to the throne to which he had been anointed. "The king shall rejoice in God." 1st. He calls himself the king, because he knew himself to be so in the Divine purpose and designation. Thus Paul, while yet in the conflict, writes himself more than a conqueror, Rom. viii. 37. Believers are made kings, though they are not to have the dominion till the morning of the resurrection. 2nd. He doubts not but that though he was now sowing in tears, yet he should reap in joy. "The king shall rejoice." 3rd. He resolves to make God the alpha and omega of all his joys; he shall rejoice in God. Now this is applicable to the glories and joys of the exalted Redeemer. Messiah the prince shall rejoice in God; he is already entered into the joy set before him, and his glory will be completed at his second coming.

Two things would be the good effect of his advancement. First. It would be the consolation of his friends. Every one that swears to him, that is, to David, that comes into his interest, and takes an oath of allegiance to him, shall glory in his success; or, that swears by him, that is, by the blessed name of God, and not by any idol, Deu. vi. 13. And then it means all good people, that make a sincere and open profession of God's name. They shall glory in God; they shall glory in David's advancement. "They that fear thee will be glad when they see me." They that heartily espouse the cause of Christ, shall glory in its victory at last. "If we suffer with him we shall reign with him." Secondly. It would be the confutation of his enemies. "The mouth of them that speak lies," of Saul, and Doeg, and others that misrepresented David, and insulted over him as if his cause was desperate, "shall be" quite "stopped;" they shall not have one word more to say against him, but will be for ever silenced and shamed. Apply this to Christ's enemies, those that speak lies to him, as all hypocrites do, that tell him they love him, but their hearts are not with him; their mouth shall be stopped with that word, "I know you not whence you are," they shall be for ever speechless, Mat. xxii. 12. Those that speak lies against him, who "pervert the right ways of the Lord," and speak ill of his holy religion, their mouths will be stopped too, in that day when the Lord shall come to reckon for all the hard speeches which ungodly sinners have spoken against him. Christ's second coming will be the everlasting triumph of all his faithful friends and followers, who may therefore now triumph in the believing hopes of it.

PSALM LXIV.

The whole psalm has reference to David's enemies, persecutors, and slanderers; many such there were, and a great deal of trouble they gave him, almost all his days, so that we need not guess at any particular occasion of penning this psalm. I. He prays to God to preserve him from their malicious designs against him, ver. 1, 2. II. He gives a very ill character of them, as men marked for ruin by their own wickedness, ver. 3—6. III. By the Spirit of prophecy he foretells their destruction, which would redound to the glory of God, and the encouragement of his people, ver. 7—10. In singing this psalm we must observe the effect of the old enmity that is in the seed of the woman against the seed of the serpent; and assure ourselves that the serpent's head will be broken at last to the honour and joy of the holy seed.

To the chief Musician, A Psalm of David.

HEAR my voice, O God, in my prayer:
Preserve my life from fear of the enemy.
2 Hide me from the secret counsel of the wicked;
From the insurrection of the workers of iniquity:
3 Who whet their tongue like a sword,
And bend their bows to shoot their arrows, even bitter words:
4 That they may shoot in secret at the perfect:
Suddenly do they shoot at him, and fear not.
5 They encourage themselves in an evil matter:
They commune of laying snares privily;
They say, Who shall see them?
6 They search out iniquities;
They accomplish a diligent search:
Both the inward thought of every one of them, and the heart, is deep.

David in these verses puts in before God a representation of his own danger, and of his enemies' character, to enforce his petition that God would protect him and punish them.

First. He earnestly begs of God to preserve him; ver. 1, 2, "Hear my voice, O God, in prayer;" that is, grant me the thing I pray for; and this is it, "Lord, preserve my life from fear of the enemy," that is, from the enemy that I am in fear of. He makes request for his life, which is in a particular manner dear to him, because he knows it is designed to be very serviceable to God and his generation. When his life is struck at, it cannot be thought he should altogether hold his peace: allude to Est. vii. 3, 4. And if he plead his fear of the enemy, it is no disparagement to his courage; his father Jacob, that prince with God, did so before him, Gen. xxxii. 11, "Deliver me from the hand of Esau, for I fear him." "Preserve my life from fear," that is, not only from the thing itself which I fear, but from the disquieting fear of it. And this is in effect the preservation of the life; for fear has torment, particularly the fear of death, by reason of which some are all their lifetime subject to bondage. He prays, "Hide me from the secret counsel of the wicked," that is, from the mischief which they secretly consult among themselves to do against me; and "from the insurrection of the workers of iniquity," who join forces as they join counsels to do me a mischief. Observe, the secret counsel ends in an insurrection. Treasonable practices begin in treasonable confederacies and conspiracies. Hide me from them, that they may not find me, that they may not reach me. Let me be safe under thy protection.

Secondly. He complains of the great malice and wickedness of his enemies. Lord, hide me from them, for they are the worst of men, not fit to be connived at; they are dangerous men, that will stick at nothing; so that I am undone, if thou do not take my part.

1. They are very spiteful in their calumnies and reproaches, ver. 3, 4. They are described as military men, with their sword and bow; archers, that take aim exactly, secretly, and suddenly shoot at the harmless bird, that apprehends not herself in any danger. But, 1st. Their tongues are their swords, flaming swords, two-edged swords, drawn swords, drawn in anger, with which they cut, and wound, and kill the good name of their neighbour. The tongue is a little member, but like the sword, it boasts great things, Jas. iii. 5. It is a dangerous weapon. 2nd. Bitter words are their arrows. Scurrilous reflections, opprobrious nicknames, false representations, slanders and calumnies, the fiery darts of the wicked one, set on fire of hell. For these their malice bends their bows, to send out these arrows with so much the more force. 3rd. The upright man is their mark. Against him their spleen is, and they cannot speak peaceably either of him or to him. The better any man is, the more he is envied by those that are themselves bad, and the more ill is said of him. 4th. They manage it with a great deal of art and subtlety. They shoot in secret, that those they shoot at may not discover them and avoid the danger, for "in vain is the net spread in the sight of any bird." And suddenly do they shoot, without giving a man lawful warning, or any opportunity to defend himself. "Cursed be he that" thus "smiteth his neighbour secretly," in his reputation, Deu. xxvii. 24. There is no guard against a pass made by a false tongue. 5th. Herein they fear not; that is, they are confident of their success, and doubt not but by these methods they shall gain the point which their malice aims at. Or, rather, they fear not the wrath of God, which will be the portion of a false tongue. They are impudent and daring in the mischief they do to good people, as if they must never be called to an acount for it.

2. They are very close, and very resolute in their malicious projects, ver. 5. 1st. They strengthen and corroborate themselves and one another in this evil matter, and by joining together in it they make one another the more bitter and the more bold; Fortiter calumniari, aliquid adhærebit,—'Lay on an abundance of reproach, for it will be sure to stick.' It is bad to do an ill thing, but worse to encourage ourselves and one another in it; that is doing the devil's work for him. It is a sign the heart is hardened to the highest degree, when it is thus fully set to do evil, and fears no colours. It is the office of conscience to discourage men in an evil matter, but when that is baffled the case is desperate. 2nd. They consult with themselves and one another how to do the most mischief, and most effectually; "They commune of laying snares privily." All their communion is in sin; and all their communication is how to sin securely. They hold councils of war for finding out the most effectual expedient to do mischief; every snare they lay was talked of before, and was laid with all the contrivance of their wicked wits combined. 3rd. They please themselves with an atheistical conceit that God himself takes no notice of their wicked practices; "They say, Who shall see them?" A practical disbelief of God's omniscience is at the bottom of all the wickedness of the wicked.

3. They are very industrious in putting their projects in execution; ver. 6, "They search out iniquity," that is, they take a great deal of pains to find out some iniquity or other to lay to my charge; they dig deep, and look far back, and put things to the utmost stretch, that they may have something to accuse me of. Or, they are industrious to find out new arts of doing mischief to me; in this "they accomplish a diligent search;" they go through with it, and spare neither cost nor labour, "evil men dig up mischief." Half the pains that many take to damn their souls would serve to save them. They are masters of all the arts of mischief and destruction; for "the inward thought of every one of them, and the heart is deep," deep as hell, desperately wicked, who can know it? By the unaccountable wickedness of their wit, and of their will, they shew themselves to be both in subtlety and malignity the genuine offspring of the old serpent.

lxiv. Title. This is one of the psalms composed by David in his troubles. Rosenmüller, &c., refer it to the time of Saul's persecutions.

lxiv. 2. The word sod does mean something secret in Hebrew, occasionally, but there is no need to depart here from its ordinary sense of "counsel." The wicked counselled David's ruin, and from that he sought to be protected. For "insurrection" Gesenius gives "crowd," and Bythner "a tumultuous crowd;" but as another form of the word occurs in Psa. lv. 14 ("company"), where only a most orderly assembly can be meant, the same word "company" seems preferable here: "from the company of doers of iniquity."

lxiv. 3. The second clause is abrupt—"aim their arrows, bitter speech;" indeed, the word "aim" originally meant "tread," and refers to the practice of placing a foot against a bow while bending it; but, by a roundabout process common to all languages, it came to signify "aim," towards which it was literally the first step. For "bitter words," or "speech," we may understand "a bitter thing."

7 But God shall shoot at them with an arrow;
Suddenly shall they be wounded. [selves:
8 So they shall make their own tongue to fall upon them-
All that see them shall flee away.
9 And all men shall fear, and shall declare the work of God;
For they shall wisely consider of his doing.
10 The righteous shall be glad in the LORD, and shall trust
And all the upright in heart shall glory. [in him;

We may observe here,

First. The judgments of God which should certainly come upon these malicious persecutors of David. Though they encouraged themselves in their wickedness, here is that which, if they would believe and consider it, was enough to discourage them. And it is observable how the punishment answers the sin. 1. They shot at David secretly and suddenly to wound him; but "God shall shoot at them;" for he "ordaineth his arrows against the persecutors," Ps. vii. 13; "against the face of them," Ps. xxi. 12. And God's arrows will hit surer, and fly swifter, and pierce deeper than theirs do or can. They have many arrows, but they are only bitter words, and words are but wind; the curse causeless shall not come. But God has one arrow that will be their death; his curse which is never causeless, and therefore shall come. With it they shall be suddenly wounded, that is, their wound by it will be a surprise upon them, because they were secure, and not apprehensive of any danger. 2. Their tongues fell upon him, but God shall "make their own tongues to fall upon themselves;" they do it by the desert of their sin, God doth it by the justice of his wrath, ver. 8. When God deals with men according to the desert of their tongue-sins, and brings those mischiefs upon them which they have passionately and maliciously imprecated upon others, then he makes their own tongues to fall upon them; and it is weight enough to sink a man to the lowest hell, like a talent of lead. Many have cut their own throats, and many more have damned their own souls with their tongues, and it will be an aggravation of their condemnation; "O Israel, thou hast destroyed thyself," art "snared in the words of thy mouth." "If thou scornest, thou alone shalt bear it." They that love cursing it shall come unto them. Sometimes men's secret wickedness is brought to light by their own confession; and then their own tongue falls upon themselves.

Secondly. The influence which these judgments should have upon others; for it is done "in the open sight of all," Job xxxiv. 26.

1. Their neighbours shall shun them, and shift for their own safety; they shall flee away, for fear of partaking in their plagues, and being involved in their ruin. So dreadful will it be, and such a noise will it make in the country, they shall flee away as the men of Israel did from the tents of Korah, Dathan, and Abiram, Num. xvi. 27. Some think this was fulfilled in the death of Saul; when not only his army was dispersed, but the inhabitants of the neighbouring country were so terrified with the fall, not only of their king, but of his three sons, that they quitted their cities and fled, 1 Sam. xxxi. 7.

2. Spectators shall reverence the providence of God therein, ver. 9. 1st. They shall understand and observe God's hand in all; and unless we do so we are not likely to profit by the dispensations of Providence, Hos. xiv. 9, "They shall wisely consider his doing." There is need of consideration and serious thought rightly to take the matter of fact, and need of wisdom to put a true interpretation upon it. God's doing is well worth our considering, Eccl. vii. 13; but it must be considered wisely, that we put not a corrupt gloss upon a pure text. 2nd. They shall be affected with a holy awe of God upon the consideration of it. All men (all that have any thing of the reason of a man in them) shall fear, and tremble because of God's judgments, Ps. cxix. 120. They shall fear to do the like, fear being found persecutors of God's people; smite the scorner, and the simple shall beware. 3rd. They shall declare the work of God; they shall speak to one another, and to all about them of the justice of God in punishing persecutors. What we wisely consider ourselves, we should wisely declare to others, for their edification and the glory of God; "This is the finger of God."

3. Good people shall in a special manner take notice of it, and it shall affect them with a holy pleasure, ver. 10. 1st. It shall increase their joy. "The righteous shall be glad in the Lord," not glad of the misery and ruin of their fellow-creatures, but glad that God is glorified; and his word fulfilled, and the cause of injured innocency pleaded effectually. 2nd. It shall encourage their faith. They shall commit themselves to him in the way of duty, and be willing to venture for him with an entire confidence in him. 3rd. Their joy and faith shall both express themselves in a holy boasting. "All the upright in heart," that keep a good conscience, and approve themselves to God, "shall glory," not in themselves, but in the favour of God; in his righteousness and goodness, their relation to him, and interest in him. "Let him that glories glory in the Lord."

PSALM LXV.

In this psalm we are directed to give to God the glory of his power and goodness, which appears, I. In the kingdom of grace, ver. 1; hearing prayer, ver. 2; pardoning sin, ver. 3; satisfying the souls of the people, ver. 4; protecting and supporting them, ver. 5. II. In the kingdom of providence: fixing the mountains, ver. 6; calming the sea, ver. 7; preserving the regular succession of day and night, ver. 8; and making the earth fruitful, ver. 9—13. These are blessings we are all indebted to God for, and therefore may easily accommodate this psalm to ourselves in singing of it.

To the chief Musician, A Psalm and Song of David.

PRAISE waiteth for thee, O God, in Sion:
And unto thee shall the vow be performed.
2 O thou that hearest prayer,
Unto thee shall all flesh come.
3 Iniquities prevail against me:
As for our transgressions, thou shalt purge them away.
4 Blessed is the man whom thou choosest,
And causest to approach unto thee, that he may dwell in thy courts:
We shall be satisfied with the goodness of thy house,
Even of thy holy temple.
5 By terrible things in righteousness wilt thou answer us,
O God of our salvation;
Who art the confidence of all the ends of the earth.
And of them that are afar off upon the sea:

The psalmist here has no particular concern of his own at the throne of grace; but begins with an address to God, as the master of an assembly, and the mouth of a congregation; and observe,

First. How he gives glory to God, ver. 1. 1. By humble thankfulness. "Praise waiteth for thee, O God, in Zion;" waits in expectation of the mercy desired, waits till it arrives, that it may be received with thankfulness at its first approach. When God is coming towards us with his favours, we must go forth to meet him with our praises, and wait till the day dawn. Praise waits with an entire satisfaction in thy holy will, and dependence on thy mercy; when we stand ready in every thing to give thanks, then praise waits for God. Praise waits thine acceptance; the Levites by night stood in the house of the Lord, ready to sing their songs of praise at the hour appointed, (Ps. cxxxiv. 1, 2,) and thus their praise waited for him. 'Praise is silent unto thee,' so the word is, as wanting words to express the great goodness of God, and being struck with a silent admiration at it. As there are holy groanings which cannot be uttered, so there are holy aderings which cannot be uttered; and yet shall be accepted by Him that searcheth the heart, and knoweth what is the mind of the spirit. Our praise is silent, that the praises of the blessed angels, who excel in strength, may be heard. Let it not be told him that I speak; for if a man offer to speak forth all God's praise, "surely he shall be swallowed up," Job xxxvii. 20. 'Before thee, praise is reputed as silence,' so the Chaldee; so far exalted is God above all our blessing and praise. Praise is due to God from all the world, but it waits for him in Zion only, in his church, among his people. All his works praise him, that is, they minister matter for praise, but his saints only bless him by actual adorations. The redeemed church sing their new song upon mount Zion, Rev. xiv. 1, 3; in Zion was God's dwelling-place, Ps. lxxvi. 2. Happy they who dwell with him there, for they will be still praising him. 2. By sincere faithfulness. "Unto thee shall the vow be performed;" that is, the sacrifice shall be offered up, which was vowed. We shall not be accepted in our thanksgivings to God for the mercies we have received, unless we make conscience of paying the vows which we made when we were in pursuit of the mercy; for better it is not to vow than to vow and not to pay.

Secondly. What he gives him glory for.

1. For hearing prayer; ver. 2, "Praise waits for thee;" and why is it so ready? 1st. Because thou art ready to grant our petitions. "O thou that hearest prayer;" thou canst answer every prayer, for thou art able to do for us more than we are able to ask or think, Eph. iii. 20; and thou wilt answer every prayer of faith either in kind or kindness. It is much for the glory of God's goodness, and the encouragement of ours, that he is a God hearing prayer, and has taken it among the titles of his honour to be so; and we are much wanting to ourselves if we do not take all occasions to give him his title. 2. Because for that reason we are ready to run to him when we are in our straits. Therefore, because thou art a God hearing prayer, "unto thee shall all flesh come." Justly doth every man's praise wait for thee, because every man's prayer waits on thee, when he is in want or distress, whatever he doth at other times. Now only the seed of Israel come to thee, and the proselytes to their religion; but when thy "house shall be called a house of prayer to all people," then unto thee shall all flesh come, and be welcome, Rom. x. 12, 13. To him let us come, and come boldly, because he is a God that hears prayer.

2. For pardoning sin. In this who is a God like unto him? Mic. vii. 18; by this he proclaims his name, Ex. xxxiv. 7; and, therefore, upon this account, praise waits for him, ver. 3. Our sins reach to the heavens; "inquities prevail against us," and appear so numerous, so heinous, that when they are set in order before us we are full of confusion, and ready to fall into despair. They prevail so against us, that we cannot pretend to balance them with any righteousness of our own; so that when we appear before God our own consciences accuse us, and we have no replication to make; and yet, "as for our transgressions, thou shalt" of thine own free mercy, and for the sake of a righteousness of thine own providing, "thou shalt purge them away," so that we shall not come into condemnation for them. Note, The greater our danger is by reason of sin, the more cause we have to admire the power and riches of God's pardoning mercy, which can invalidate the threatening force of our manifold transgressions and our mighty sins.

3. For the kind entertainment he gives to those that attend upon him; and the comfort they have in communion with him. Iniquity must first be purged away, ver. 3, and then we are welcome to compass God's altars, ver. 4. They that come into communion with God shall certainly find true happiness and full satisfaction in that communion.

1st. They are blessed. Not only blessed is the nation, Ps. xxxiii. 12; but "blessed is the man," the particular person, how mean soever, "whom thou choosest, and causest to approach unto thee, that he may dwell in thy courts." He is a happy man, for he hath the surest token of the Divine favour, and the surest pledge and earnest of everlasting bliss. Observe here, First. What it is to come into communion with God, in order to this blessedness. 1*st.* It is to approach to him by laying hold on his covenant, setting our best affections upon him, and letting out our desires towards him; it is to converse with him as one we love and value. 2*nd.* It is to dwell in his courts, as the priests and Levites did that were at home in God's house; it is to be constant in the exercises of religion, and apply ourselves closely to them as we do to that which is the business of our dwelling-place. Secondly. How we come into communion with God. Not recommended by any merit of our own, or brought in by any management of our own, but by God's free choice; "Blessed is the man whom thou choosest," and so distinguishest from others who are left to themselves; and it is by his effectual special grace pursuant to that choice. Whom he chooseth, he causeth to approach; not only invites them, but inclines and enables them to draw nigh to him. He draws them, Jno. vi. 44.

2nd. They shall be satisfied. Here the psalmist changeth the person; not, he shall be satisfied, the man whom thou choosest, but we shall; which teacheth us to apply the promises to ourselves, and by an active faith to put our own names into them. "We shall be satisfied with the goodness of thy house, even of thy holy temple." Note, First. God's holy temple is his house; there he dwells where his ordinances are administered. Secondly. God keeps a good house; there is abundance of goodness in his house, righteousness and grace, and all the comforts of the everlasting covenant. There is enough for all enough for each; it is ready, always ready, and all on free cost; "without money, and without price." Thirdly. In those things there is that which is satisfying to a soul, and with which all gracious souls will be satisfied. Let them have the pleasure of communion with God and that sufficeth them: they have enough, they desire no more.

lxiv. 5. "They confirm themselves in an evil word (or thing); they reckon to hide snares." The second clause means that they calculate how to hide snares, which they think nobody will see.

lxiv. 6. "They search after wicked devices; we have accomplished" (say they) "diligent search; and the inward part of a man and the heart is deep." This seems to be the real sense of the Hebrew; but the old translation, "they accomplish," for "we have accomplished," is still upheld by some. (Compare Jer. xvii. 9.)

lxv. Title. The title of this psalm, in some Greek copies and in the Latin, as represented by the revised Douay version, is, "To the end, a Psalm of David. The Canticle of Jeremias and Ezekiel to the People of the Captivity, when they began to go out." It is palpable that this is not all correct, and a Romish commentator thus speaks of it:—"In this title the psalm, which in fact is David's, is ascribed to Jeremiah and Ezekiel, not because they sang it when the people began to go out of the Babylonian captivity (for neither of

4. For the glorious operations of his power on their behalf; ver. 5, "By terrible things in righteousness wilt thou answer us, O God of our salvation." This may be understood of the rebukes which God in his providence sometimes gives to his own people. He often answers them by terrible things, for the awakening and quickening of them, but always in righteousness. He neither doth them any wrong nor means them any hurt, for even then he is the God of their salvation: see Isa. xlv. 15. But it is rather to be understood of his judgments upon their enemies. God answers his people's prayers by the destructions made for their sakes among the heathen, and the recompence he renders to their proud oppressors, as a righteous God, the God to whom vengeance belongs, and as the God that protects and saves his people. By wonderful things, so some read it; things which are very surprising, and which we looked not for, Isa. lxiv. 3. Or, by things which strike an awe upon us, thou wilt answer us. The holy freedom that we are admitted to in God's courts, and the nearness of our approach to him, must not at all abate our reverence and godly fear of him; for he is terrible in his holy places.

5. For the care he takes of all his people, howsoever distressed, and whithersoever dispersed. "He is the confidence of all the ends of the earth;" that is, of all the saints all the world over, and not theirs only that were of the seed of Israel, for he is the God of the Gentiles as well as of the Jews; the confidence of them that are afar off from his holy temple, and the courts of that, that dwell in the islands of the Gentiles, or that are in distress upon the sea. They trust in thee, and cry to thee when they are at their wits' end, Ps. cvii. 27, 28. By faith and prayer we may keep up our communion with God, and fetch in comfort from him wherever we are, not only in the solemn assemblies of his people, but afar off upon the sea.

6 Which by his strength setteth fast the mountains;
Being girded with power:
7 Which stilleth the noise of the seas,
The noise of their waves, and the tumult of the people.
8 They also that dwell in the uttermost parts are afraid at thy tokens: [to rejoice.
Thou makest the outgoings of the morning and evening
9 Thou visitest the earth, and waterest it:
Thou greatly enrichest it with the river of God, which is Thou preparest them corn, [full of water:
When thou hast so provided for it.
10 Thou waterest the ridges thereof abundantly:
Thou settlest the furrows thereof:
Thou makest it soft with showers:
Thou blessest the springing thereof
11 Thou crownest the year with thy goodness;
And thy paths drop fatness.
12 They drop upon the pastures of the wilderness:
And the little hills rejoice on every side.
13 The pastures are clothed with flocks;
The valleys also are covered over with corn;
They shout for joy, they also sing.

That we may be the more affected with the wonderful condescensions of the God of grace, it is of use to observe his power and sovereignty as the God of nature; the riches and bounty of his providential kingdom.

First. He establisheth the earth, and it abideth, Ps. cxix. 90; ver. 6, by his own strength he setteth fast the mountains; did set them fast at first, and still keeps them firm, though they are sometimes shaken by earthquakes.

——— Feriuntque summos Fulmina montes.
'The lightning blasts the loftiest hills.'

Hence they are called everlasting mountains, Hab. iii. 6. Yet God's covenant with his people is said to stand more firm than they, Isa. liv. 10.

Secondly. He stills the sea, and it is quiet, ver. 7. The sea in a storm makes a great noise, which adds to its threatening terror; but when God pleaseth he commands silence among the waves and billows, and lays them to sleep; turns the storm into a calm presently, Ps. cvii. 29. And by this change in the sea, as well as by the former instance of the unchangeableness of the earth, it appears that He whose the sea and the dry land are is girded with power. And by this our Lord Jesus gave a proof of his Divine power, that he commanded the winds and waves, and they obeyed him. To this instance of the quieting of the sea, he adds, as a thing much of the same nature, that he "stills the tumult of the people," the common people. Nothing more unruly and disagreeable than the insurrections of the mob, the insults of the rabble; yet even these God can pacify in secret ways, and which they themselves are not aware of. Or, it may be meant of the outrage of the people that were enemies to Israel, Ps. ii. 1. God has many ways to still them, and will for ever silence their tumults.

Thirdly. He renews the morning and evening, and their revolution is constant, ver. 8. This regular succession of day and night may be considered, 1. As an instance of God's great power; and so it strikes an awe upon all. "They that dwell in the uttermost parts" of the earth "are afraid at thy signs," or tokens; they are by them convinced that there is a supreme Numen, a sovereign monarch, before whom they ought to fear and tremble; for in these things the invisible things of God are clearly seen, and therefore they are said to be set for signs, Gen. i. 14. Many of them that dwelt in the remote and dark corners of the earth were so afraid at these tokens that they were driven to worship them, Deu. iv. 19; not considering that they were God's tokens, undeniable proofs of his power and godhead, and therefore they should have been led by them to worship him. 2. As an instance of God's great goodness; and so it brings comfort to all. "Thou makest the outgoings of the morning," before the sun riseth, "and of the evening," before the sun sets, "to rejoice." As it is God that scatters the light of the morning, and draws the curtains of the evening, so he doth both in favour to man, and makes both to rejoice; that is, gives occasion to us to rejoice in both; so that how contrary soever light and darkness are to each other, and how inviolable soever the partition between them, Gen. i. 4, both are equally welcome to the world in their season. It is hard to say which is more welcome to us, the light of the morning which befriends the business of the day, or the shadows of the evening which befriend the repose of the night. Doth the watchman wait for the morning? so doth the hireling earnestly desire the shadow. Some understand it of the morning and evening sacrifice, which good people greatly rejoiced in, and in which God was constantly honoured. Thou makest them to sing, so the word is; for every morning and every evening songs of praise were sung by the Levites; it was that which the duty of every day required. And we are to look upon our daily worship, alone and with our families, to be both the most needful of our daily business and the most delightful of our daily comforts; and if therein we keep up our communion with God, the outgoings both of the morning and of the evening are thereby made truly to rejoice.

Fourthly. He watereth the earth, and maketh it fruitful. On this instance of God's power and goodness he enlarges very much; the psalm being probably penned upon occasion either of a more than ordinary plentiful harvest or of a seasonable rain after long drought. How much the fruitfulness of this lower part of the creation depends upon the influence of the upper is easy to observe; if the heavens be as brass, the earth is as iron; which is a sensible intimation to a stupid world, that every good and perfect gift is from above, omnia desuper,—'all from above;' that we must lift up our eyes above the hills, lift them up to the heavens, where the original springs of all blessings are, out of sight; and thither must our praises return. As the firstfruits of the earth were in the heave-offerings lifted up towards heaven by way of acknowledgment that thence they were derived. All God's blessings, even spiritual ones, are expressed by his raining righteousness upon us. Now observe how the common blessing of rain from heaven and fruitful seasons is here described.

1. How much there is in it of the power and goodness of God; which is here set forth by a great variety of lively expressions. 1st. God that made the earth hereby visits it, sends to it, gives proof of his care of it, ver. 9. It is a visit in mercy, which the inhabitants of the earth ought to return in praises. 2nd. God that made it dry land hereby waters it, in order to its fruitfulness. Though the products of the earth flourished before God had caused it to rain, yet even then there was a mist which answered the intention, and "watered the whole face of the ground," Gen. ii. 5, 6. Our hearts are dry and barren, unless God himself be as the dew to us, and water us; and the plants of his own planting he will water, and make them to increase. 3rd. Rain is the river of God, which is full of water; the clouds are the springs of this river, which do not flow at random, but in the channel which God cuts out for it. The showers of rain, as the rivers of water, he turneth which way soever he pleaseth. 4th. This river of God enricheth the earth, which without it would quickly be a poor thing. The riches of the earth which are produced out of its surface are every jot as valuable, and abundantly more useful and serviceable to man, than those which are hid in its bowels. We might live well enough without silver and gold, but not without corn and grass.

2. How much benefit and advantage comes by it to the earth, and to man upon it.

1st. To the earth itself. The rain in season gives it a new face; nothing more reviving, more refreshing, than the rain upon the new-mown grass, Ps. lxxii. 6. Even the ridges of the earth, off which the rain seems to slide, are watered abundantly, for they drink in the rain which comes often upon them; the furrows of it which are turned up by the plough, in order to the seedness, are settled by the rain, and made fit to receive the seed, ver. 10; they are settled by being made soft. That which makes the soil of the heart tender settles it; for the heart is established with that grace. Thus the springing of the year is blessed; and if the spring, that first quarter of the year, be blessed, that is an earnest of a blessing upon the whole year, which God is therefore said to crown with his goodness, ver. 11; to compass it on every side, as the head is compassed with a crown; and to complete the comforts of it, as the end of a thing is said to crown it. And his paths are said to drop fatness; for whatever fatness there is in the earth which impregnates its products, it comes from the outgoings of the Divine goodness. Wherever God goes, he leaves the tokens of his mercy behind him, Joel ii. 13, and makes his path thus to shine after him. These communications of God's goodness to this lower world are very extensive, and diffusive; ver. 12, "They drop upon the pastures of the wilderness," and not only upon the pastures of the inhabited land. The deserts, which man takes no care of, and receives no profit from, yet are under the care of the Divine providence, and the profits of them redound to the glory of God, as the great benefactor of the whole creation, though not immediately to the benefit of man; and we ought to be thankful not only for that which serves us, but for that which serves any part of the creation, because thereby it turns to the honour of the Creator. The wilderness, which makes not such returns as the cultivated grounds doth, yet receives as much of the rain of heaven as the most fruitful soil; for God doth good to the evil and unthankful. So extensive are the gifts of God's bounty, that in them the hills, "the little hills rejoice on every side," even the north side, that lies most from the sun. Hills are not above the need of God's providence; little hills are not below the cognizance of it. But as when he pleaseth he can make them tremble, Ps. cxiv. 6, so when he pleaseth he can make them rejoice.

2nd. To man upon the earth. God, by providing rain for the earth, prepareth corn for man, ver. 9. "As for the earth, out of it cometh bread," Job xxviii. 5, for out of it cometh corn; but every grain of corn that comes out of it God himself prepared; and therefore he provides rain for the earth, that thereby he may prepare corn for man, under whose feet he has put the rest of the creatures, and for whose use he has fitted them. When we consider that the yearly produce of the corn is not only an operation of the same power that raiseth the dead, but an instance of that power not much unlike it, as appears by that of our Saviour, Jno. xii. 24, and that the constant benefit we have by it is an instance of that goodness which endureth for ever, we shall have reason to think, it is no less than a God that prepares corn for us. Corn and cattle are the two staple commodities with which the husbandman that deals immediately in the fruits of the earth is enriched; and both are owing to the Divine goodness in watering the earth, ver. 13. To this it is owing that "the pastures are clothed with flocks," ver. 13. So well stocked are the pastures that they seem to be covered over with the cattle that are laid in them; and yet the pasture not overcharged; so well fed are the cattle, that they are the ornament and the glory of the pastures in which they are fed. The valleys are so fruitful, that they seem to be covered over with corn, in the time of harvest. The lowest parts of the earth are commonly the most fruitful, and one acre of the humble valleys is worth five of the lofty mountains. But both corn-ground and pasture-ground, answering the end of their creation, are said to shout for joy, and sing; because they are serviceable to the honour of God, and the comfort of man, and because they furnish us with matter for joy and praise. As there is no earthly joy above the joy of harvest, so there was none of the feasts of the Lord among the Jews solemnized with greater expressions of thankfulness than the feast of ingathering at the end of the year, Ex. xxiii. 16. Let all these common gifts of the Divine bounty which we yearly and daily partake of increase our love to God as the best of beings, and engage us to glorify him with our bodies, which he thus provides so well for.

them was then, probably, alive), but because these two prophets predicted the return of the people from Babylon to Jerusalem; and so the psalm is feigned to have been sung by these prophets at the beginning of the departure of the Hebrews out of captivity. So, nearly, Bellarmine." In any case the title is spurious, like the next.

lxv. 1. The beautiful phrase with which this psalm opens will scarcely bear the test of close criticism. As often remarked, the word rendered "waiteth" is, in reality, equivalent to "silent," and hence very edifying conclusions have been drawn in favour of silent worship. There is an elegant antithesis in the clause, as we view it—"For thee are silence and praise, O God, in Zion"—yet we do not think that the silence means other than that silent acquiescence in the arrangements of Providence which is opposed to a complaining and grumbling spirit, and which, in New Testament language, might be called contentment. Such was the inward grace of which praise was the outward exponent.

PSALM LXVI.

This is a thanksgiving psalm; and it is of such a general use and application, that we need not suppose it penned upon any particular occasion. All people are here called upon to praise God, I. For the general instances of his sovereign dominion and power in the whole creation, ver. 1—7. II. For the special tokens of his favour to the church, his peculiar people, ver. 8—12. And then, III. The psalmist praiseth God for his own experiences of his goodness to him in particular, especially in answering his prayers, ver. 13—20. If we have learned in every thing to give thanks for ancient and modern mercies, public and personal mercies, we shall know how to sing this psalm with grace and understanding.

To the chief Musician, a Song or Psalm.

MAKE a joyful noise unto God, all ye lands:
2 Sing forth the honour of his name:
Make his praise glorious.
3 Say unto God, How terrible art thou in thy works!
Through the greatness of thy power shall thine enemies submit themselves unto thee.
4 All the earth shall worship thee, [Selah.
And shall sing unto thee; they shall sing to thy name.
5 Come and see the works of God:
He is terrible in his doing toward the children of men.
6 He turned the sea into dry land:
They went through the flood on foot:
There did we rejoice in him.
7 He ruleth by his power for ever;
His eyes behold the nations:
Let not the rebellious exalt themselves. Selah.

First. In these verses the psalmist calls upon all people to praise God. "All lands," 'all the earth,' ver. 1, all the inhabitants of the world that are capable of praising God. 1. This speaks the glory of God, that he is worthy to be praised by all, for he is good to all, and furnisheth every nation with matter for praise. 2. The duty of man; that all are obliged to praise God. It is part of the law of creation, and therefore is required of every creature. 3. A prediction of the conversion of the Gentiles to the faith of Christ. The time should come when all lands should praise God, and this incense should in every place be offered to him. 4. A hearty good-will which the psalmist had to this good work of praising God. He will abound in it himself, and wishes that God might have his tribute paid him by all the nations of the earth, and not by the land of Israel only. He excites all lands, 1st. To make a joyful noise to God. Holy joy is that devout affection which should animate all our praises; and though it is not making a noise in religion that God will accept of, (hypocrites are said to cause their voice to be heard on high, Isa. lviii. 4,) yet, in praising God, First, We must be hearty and zealous, and what we do must do with all our might, with all that is within us. Secondly, We must be open and public, as those that are not ashamed of our Master; and both these are implied in making a noise, a joyful noise. 2nd. To sing with pleasure, and to sing forth, for the edification of others, the honour of his name; that is, of all that whereby he has made himself known, ver. 2. That which is the honour of God's name ought to be the matter of our praise. 3rd. To make his praise glorious as far as we can. In praising God we must do it so as to glorify him, and that must be the scope and drift of all our praises. Reckon it your greatest glory to praise God; so some. It is the highest honour the creature is capable of, to be to the Creator for a name and a praise.

Secondly. He had called upon all lands to praise God, ver. 1, 4; he foretells that they shall do so, "All the earth shall worship thee;" some in all parts of the earth, even the remotest regions, for the everlasting Gospel shall be preached to every nation and kindred; and this is the purport of it, "Worship him that made heaven and earth," Rev. xiv. 6, 7. And being thus sent forth, it shall not return void, but shall bring all the earth, more or less, to worship God and sing unto him. In gospel times God should be worshipped by singing of psalms. They shall sing to God; that is, sing to his name; for it is only to his declarative glory,—that by which he has made himself known,—not to his essential glory, that we can contribute any thing by our praises.

Thirdly. That we may be furnished with matter for praise, we are here called upon to come and see the works of God; for his own works praise him, whether we do or not; and the reason why we do not praise him more and better is, because we do not duly and attentively observe them. Let us, therefore, see God's works, and observe the instances of his wisdom, power, and faithfulness in them, ver. 5; and then speak of them, and speak of them to him; ver. 3, "Say unto God, How terrible art thou in thy works! terrible in thy doings!"

1. God's works are wonderful in themselves, and such as, when duly considered, may justly fill us with amazement. God is terrible; that is, admirable in his works through the greatness of his power; which is such, and shines so bright, so strong in all he doth, that it may be truly said, there are not any works like unto his works. Hence he is said to be fearful in praises, Ex. xv. 11. In all his doings towards the children of men he is terrible, and to be eyed with a holy awe. Much of religion lies in a reverence for the Divine providence.

2. They are formidable to his enemies, and have many a time forced and frightened them into a feigned submission; ver. 3, "Through the greatness of thy power," before which none can stand, "shall thine enemies submit themselves unto thee." They shall lie unto thee, so the word is; that is, they shall be compelled sore against their wills to make their peace with thee upon any terms. Subjection extorted by fear is seldom sincere, and therefore force is no proper means of propagating religion; nor can there be much joy of such proselytes to the church as will in the end be found liars unto it. Deu. xxxiii. 29.

3. They are comfortable and beneficial to his people, ver. 6. When Israel came out of Egypt, "he turned the sea into dry land" before them, which encouraged them to follow God's conduct through the wilderness; and when they were to enter Canaan, for their encouragement in their wars, Jordan was divided before them, and they "went through that flood on foot;" and such foot, so signally owned by Heaven, might well pass for cavalry rather than infantry in the wars of the Lord. There did the enemies tremble before them, Ex. xv. 14, 15; Jos. v. 1; but "there did we rejoice him;" both trust his power (for relying on God is often expressed by rejoicing in him) and sing his praise, Ps. cvi. 12. There did we rejoice, that is, our ancestors did, and we in their loins. The joys of our fathers were our joys, and we ought to look upon ourselves as sharers in them.

4. They are commanding to all. God by his works keeps up his dominion in the world; ver. 7, "He rules by his power for ever, his eyes behold the nations." 1st. God has a commanding eye. From the height of heaven his eye commands all the inhabitants of the world, and he has a clear and full view of them all. His eyes run to and fro through the earth; the most remote and obscure nations are under his inspection. 2nd. He has a commanding arm. His power rules, rules for ever, and is never weakened, never obstructed; "Strong is his hand, and high is his right hand." From hence he infers, "Let not the rebellious exalt themselves;" let not those that have revolting and rebellious hearts dare to rise up in any overt acts of rebellion against God, as Adonijah exalted himself, saying, "I will be king." Let not those that are in rebellion against God exalt themselves, as if there were any probability that they should gain their point; no, let them be still, for God hath said, I will be exalted, and man cannot gainsay it.

8 O bless our God, ye people,
And make the voice of his praise to be heard:
9 Which holdeth our soul in life,
And suffereth not our feet to be moved.
10 For thou, O God, hast proved us:
Thou hast tried us, as silver is tried.
11 Thou broughtest us into the net;
Thou laidst affliction upon our loins.
12 Thou hast caused men to ride over our heads;
We went through fire and through water:
But thou broughtest us out into a wealthy place.

In these verses the psalmist calls upon God's people in a special manner to praise him; let all lands do it, but Israel's land particularly. "Bless our God;" bless him as ours, a God in covenant with us, and that takes care of us as his own. Let them "make the voice of his praise to be heard," ver. 8; for from whom should it be heard, but from those who are his peculiar favourites and select attendants? Two things we have reason to bless God for:

First. Common protection, ver. 9. He "holdeth our soul in life," that it may not drop away of itself; for, being continually in our hands, it is apt to slip through our fingers. We must own that it is the good providence of God that keeps life and soul together, and his visitation that preserves our spirit; he puts our soul in life, so the word is. He that gave us our being, by a constant renewed act upholds us in our being, and his providence is a continued creation. When we are ready to faint and perish, he restoreth our soul, and so puts it as it were into a new life, giving new comforts; Non est vivere, sed valere vita, —'It is not existence, but happiness, that deserves the name of life.' But we are apt to stumble and fall, and are exposed to many destructive accidents, killing disasters as well as killing diseases, and therefore as to these also we are guarded by the Divine power; he "suffereth not our feet to be moved," preventing many unforeseen evils, which we ourselves were not aware of our danger from. To him we owe it that we have not long ere this fallen into endless ruin. "He will keep the feet of his saints."

Secondly. Special deliverance from great distress. Observe,

1. How grievous the distress and danger was, ver. 11, 12. What particular trouble of the church this refers to doth not appear; it might be the trouble of some private persons or families only; but, whatever it was, they were surprised with it, as a bird with a snare, enclosed and entangled in it as a fish in a net. They were pressed down with it, and kept under as with a load upon their loins, ver. 11; but they own the hand of God in it. We are never in the net, but God brings us into it; never under affliction, but God lays it upon us. Is any thing more dangerous than fire and water? we went through both, that is, afflictions of different kinds. The end of one trouble was the beginning of another; when we had got clear of one sort of dangers, we found ourselves involved in dangers of another sort. Such may be the troubles of the best of God's saints; but he has promised, "When thou passest through the waters, through the fire, I will be with thee," Isa. xliii. 2. Yet proud and cruel men may be as dangerous as fire and water, and more so; "Beware of men," Mat. x. 17. When men rose up against us, that was fire and water, and all that is threatening, Ps. cxxiv. 2—4; and that was the case here. "Thou hast caused men to ride over our heads," that is, to trample upon us, and insult over us; to hector and abuse us; nay, and to make perfect slaves of us. They have said to our souls, "Bow down that we may go over," Isa. li. 23. While it is the pleasure of good princes to rule in the hearts of their subjects, it is the pride of tyrants to ride over their heads; yet the afflicted church in this also owns the hand of God, Thou hast caused them thus to abuse us; for the most furious oppressor has no power but what is given him from above.

2. How gracious God's design was in bringing them into this distress and danger. See what the meaning of it is; ver. 10, "Thou, O God, hast proved us and tried us." Then we are likely to get good by our afflictions when we look upon them under this notion, for then we may see God's grace and love at the bottom of them, and our own honour and benefit in the end of them. By afflictions we are proved as silver in the fire. 1st. That our graces by being tried may be made more evident, and so we may be approved, as silver when it is touched and marked sterling; and this will be to our praise at the appearing of Jesus Christ, 1 Pet. i. 7; and perhaps in this world. Job's integrity and constancy were manifested by his afflictions. 2nd. That our graces by being exercised may be made more strong and active, and so we may be improved, as silver when it is refined by the fire, and made more clear from its dross; and this will be to our unspeakable advantage, for thus we are made partakers of God's holiness, Heb. xii. 10. Public troubles are for the purifying of the church, Dan. xi. 35; Rev. ii. 10; Deu. viii. 2.

3. How glorious the issue was at last. The troubles of the church will certainly end well; these do so. For, 1st. The outlet of the trouble is happy. They are in fire and water, but they get through them; "We went through fire and water," and did not perish in the flames or floods. Whatever the troubles of the saints are, blessed be God there is a way through them. 2nd. The inlet to a better state is much more happy. "Thou broughtest us out into a wealthy place," into a well-watered place, for the word is, 'like the gardens of the Lord,' and therefore fruitful. God brings his people into trouble, that their comforts afterwards may be the sweeter, and that their affliction may thus yield the peaceable fruit of righteousness, which will make the poorest place in the world a wealthy place.

13 I will go into thy house with burnt offerings:
I will pay thee my vows,

lxv. 9. "Thou visitest the earth" signifies taking watchful care of the earth; the verb "to visit" very frequently denoting such active attention and looking after. "The river," or stream of water, may be understood of the supply of rain, which is unfailing, but cannot refer to any special stream, as the Jordan. If the clouds are meant, it is as reservoirs. "Provided for it:" rather translate "prepared it," the verb being the same as in the clause before.

lxvi. Title. The ancient Hebrews do not seem to have ascribe this psalm to David. Rosenmüller, after Rudinger, thinks it was written to celebrate the consecration of the second Temple. The Syriac calls it anonymous, and the Greek and Latin copies make it refer to the resurrection.

lxvi. 3. Translate simply, "Say unto God, How fearful are thy works!" which is the sense given by the Greek and Syriac and the Chaldee Targum. For "submit themselves" some understand "feign submission," or render a submission which is real in act, but 14 Which my lips have uttered,

And my mouth hath spoken, when I was in trouble.
15 I will offer unto thee burnt sacrifices of fatlings, with the incense of rams;
I will offer bullocks with goats. Selah.
16 Come and hear, all ye that fear God,
And I will declare what he hath done for my soul.
17 I cried unto him with my mouth,
And he was extolled with my tongue.
18 If I regard iniquity in my heart,
The Lord will not hear me:
19 But verily God hath heard me;
He hath attended to the voice of my prayer.
20 Blessed be God, which hath not turned away my prayer,
Nor his mercy from me

The psalmist having before stirred up all people, and all God's people in particular, to bless the Lord, here stirs up himself, and engageth himself to do it.

First. In his devotions to his God, ver. 13—15. He had called upon others to sing God's praises, and to make a joyful noise with them; but for himself his resolutions go farther, and he will praise God,

1. By costly sacrifices, which under the law were offered to the honour of God. All people had not wherewithal to offer these sacrifices, or wanted zeal to be at such an expense in praising God; but David, for his part, being able, is as willing in this chargeable way to pay his homage to God; ver. 13, "I will go into thy house with burnt offerings." His sacrifices should be public in the place which God had chosen; I will go into thy house with them. Christ is our temple, to whom we must bring our spiritual gifts, and by whom they are sanctified. They should be the best of the kind; burnt sacrifices, which were wholly consumed upon the altar to the honour of God, and of which the offerer had no share; and burnt sacrifices of fatlings, not the lame or the lean, but the best fed, and such as would be most acceptable at his own table. God that is the best must be served with the best we have. The feast God makes for us is a feast of fat things full of marrow, Isa. xxv. 6; and such sacrifices should we bring to him. He will offer bullocks with goats, so liberal would he be in his return of praise, and not strait-handed. He would not offer that which cost him nothing, but that which cost him a great deal; and this with the incense of rams, that is, with the fat of rams, which being burnt upon the altar, the smoke of it would ascend like the smoke of incense. Or, rams with incense. The incense typifies Christ's intercession, without which the fattest of our sacrifices will not be accepted.

2. By a conscientious performance of his vows. We do not acceptably praise God for our deliverances out of trouble, unless we make conscience of paying the vows we made when we were in trouble. This was the psalmist's resolution; ver. 13, 14, "I will pay thee my vows, which my lips have uttered when I was in trouble." Note, 1st. It is very common and very commendable when we are under the pressure of any affliction, or in the pursuit of any mercy, to make vows, and solemnly to speak them before the Lord, to bind ourselves out from sin, and bind ourselves more closely to our duty; not as if this were an equivalent, or valuable consideration, for the favour of God, but a qualification of us to receive the tokens of that favour. 2nd. The vows which we made when we were in trouble must not be forgotten when the trouble is over, but be carefully performed, for "better it is not to vow than to vow and not pay."

Secondly. In his declarations to his friends, ver. 16. He calls together a congregation of good people to hear his thankful narrative of God's favours to him; "Come and hear, all ye that fear God," for, 1. You will join with me in my praises, and help me in giving thanks; and we should be as desirous of the assistance of those that fear God in returning thanks for the mercies we have received as in praying for those we want. 2. You will be edified and encouraged by that which I have to say; "The humble shall hear of it and be glad," Ps. xxxiv. 2. "They that fear thee will be glad when they see me," Ps. cxix. 74; and therefore let me have their company, "and I will declare" to them, not to vain carnal people that will banter it and make a jest of it, (pearls are not to be cast before swine,) but to them that fear God, and will make a good use of it. "I will declare what God hath done for my soul;" not in pride and vainglory, that he might be thought more a favourite of Heaven than other people, but for the honour of God, to which we owe this as a just debt, and for the edification of others. Note, God's people should communicate their experiences to each other; we should take all occasions to tell one another of the great and kind things which God has done for us, especially which he has done for our souls, the spiritual blessings with which he hath blessed us in heavenly things. These we should be most affected with ourselves, and therefore with these we should be desirous to affect others. Now what was it that God had done for his soul?

1st. He had wrought in him a love to the duty of prayer, and had by his grace enlarged his heart in that duty; ver. 17, "I cried unto him with my mouth;" but if God, among other things done for our souls, had not given us the spirit of adoption, teaching and enabling us to cry, Abba, father, we should never have done it. That God has given us leave to pray, a command to pray, encouragements to pray, and, to crown all, a heart to pray, is what we have reason to mention with thankfulness to his praise; and the more if when we cried to him with our mouth he was extolled with our tongue, that is, if we were enabled by faith and hope to give glory to him then when we were seeking for mercy and grace from him; and to praise him for mercy in prospect, though it be not yet in possession. By crying to him we do indeed extol him. He is pleased to reckon himself honoured by the humble believing prayers of the upright, and this is a great thing which he has done for our souls, that he has been pleased so far to twist interests with us, as that in seeking our own welfare we seek his glory. 'His exaltation was under my tongue,' so it may be read; that is, I was considering in my mind how I might exalt and magnify his name. When prayers are in our mouths, praises must be in our hearts.

2nd. He had wrought in him a dread of sin, as an enemy to prayer; ver. 18, "If I regard iniquity in my heart," I know very well "the Lord will not hear me." The Jewish writers, some of them that have the leaven of the Pharisees which is hypocrisy, put a very corrupt gloss upon these words; "If I regard iniquity in my heart," that is, say they, if I allow myself only in heart-sins, and iniquity doth not break out in my words and actions, "God will not hear me," that is, he will not be offended with me, will take no notice of it, so as to lay it to my charge; as if heart-sins were no sins in God's account. The falsehood of this our Saviour has shewn in his spiritual exposition of the law, Mat. v. But the sense of this place is plain; "If I regard iniquity in my heart," that is, if I have favourable thoughts of it; if I love it, indulge it, and allow myself in it; if I treat it as a friend, and bid it welcome; make provision for it, and am loath to part with it; if I roll it under my tongue as a sweet morsel, though it be but a heart sin, that is thus countenanced and made much of; if I delight in it after the inward man;—"God will not hear" my prayer, will not accept it, or be pleased with it, nor can I expect an answer of peace to it. Note, Iniquity regarded in the heart will certainly spoil the comfort and success of prayer; for "the sacrifice of the wicked is an abomination to the Lord." They that continue in love and league with sin have no interest either in the promise or in the Mediator; and therefore cannot expect to speed in prayer.

3rd. He had graciously granted him an answer of peace to his prayers; ver. 19, "But verily God hath heard me." Though, being conscious to myself of much amiss in me, I began to fear that my prayers would have been rejected, yet to my comfort I found that God was pleased to regard them. This God did for his soul: by answering his prayer, he gave him a token of his favour, and an evidence that he had wrought a good work in him; and therefore he concludes, ver. 20, "Blessed be God." The two foregoing verses are the major and minor propositions of a syllogism. "If I regard iniquity in my heart, God will not hear my prayers," that is the proposition; "but verily God hath heard me," that is the assumption, from which he might have rationally inferred, Therefore I do not regard iniquity in my heart. But, instead of taking the comfort to himself, he gives the praise to God, "Blessed be God;" whatever are the premises, God's glory must always be the conclusion. "God has heard me," and therefore, "Blessed be God." Note, What we win by prayer we must wear with praise. Mercies in answer to prayer do in a special manner oblige us to be thankful. "He hath not turned away my prayer, nor his mercy;" lest it should be thought that the deliverance was granted for the sake of some worthiness in his prayer, he ascribes it to God's mercy. That he adds by way of correction: It was not my prayer that fetched the deliverance, but his mercy that sent it; therefore God doth not turn away our prayer, because he doth not turn away his own mercy, for that is the foundation of our hopes, and the fountain of our comforts, and therefore ought to be the matter of our praises.

PSALM LXVII.

This psalm relates to the church, and is calculated for the public. Here is, I. A prayer for the prosperity of the church of Israel, ver. 1. II. A prayer for the conversion of the Gentiles, and the bringing of them into the church, ver. 2—5. III. A prospect of happy and glorious times when God shall do this, ver. 6, 7. Thus was the psalmist carried out by the spirit of prophecy to foretell the glorious estate of the Christian church, in which Jews and Gentiles should unite into one flock, the beginning of which blessed work ought to be the matter of our joy and praise, and the completing of it of our prayer and hope in singing this psalm.

To the chief Musician on Neginoth, A Psalm or Song.

GOD be merciful unto us, and bless us;
And cause his face to shine upon us. Selah.
2 That thy way may be known upon earth,
Thy saving health among all nations.
3 Let the people praise thee, O God;
Let all the people praise thee.
4 O let the nations be glad and sing for joy:
For thou shalt judge the people righteously,
And govern the nations upon earth. Selah
5 Let the people praise thee, O God;
Let all the people praise thee.
6 Then shall the earth yield her increase;
And God, even our own God, shall bless us
7 God shall bless us;
And all the ends of the earth shall fear him.

The composure of this psalm is such as speaks the penman's affections very warm and lively; by which spirit of devotion he was elevated to receive the spirit of prophecy concerning the enlargement of God's kingdom.

First. He begins with a prayer for the welfare and prosperity of the church then in being, in the happiness of which he should share, and think himself happy, ver. 1. Our Saviour, in teaching us to say, Our Father, has intimated that we ought to pray with and for others; so the psalmist here prays not, God be merciful to me and bless me, but to us, and bless us, for we must make supplication for all saints, and be willing and glad to take our lot with them. We are here taught, 1. That all our happiness comes from God's mercy, and takes rise in that; and therefore the first thing prayed for is, "God be merciful to us," to us sinners, and pardon our sins, Lu. xviii. 13; to us miserable sinners, and help us out of our miseries. 2. That it is conveyed by God's blessing, and secured in that. God bless us, that is, give us an interest in his promises, and confer upon us all the good contained in them. God's speaking well to us amounts to his doing well for us. God bless us, is a comprehensive prayer; it is pity such excellent words should ever be used slightly and carelessly, and as a byword. 3. That it is completed in the light of his countenance; "God cause his face to shine upon us," that is, God by his grace qualify us for his favour, and then give us the tokens of his favour. We need desire no more to make us happy than to have God's face shine upon us, to have God love us, and let us know that he loves us. 'To shine with us,' so the margin reads it; with us doing our endeavour, and let it crown that endeavour with success. If we by faith walk with God, we may hope that his face will shine with us.

Secondly. He passeth from this to a prayer for the conversion of the Gentiles; ver. 2, "That thy way may be known upon earth." Lord, I pray not only that thou wilt be merciful to us, and bless us, but that thou wilt be merciful to all mankind, "that thy way may be known upon earth." Thus public spirited must we be in our prayers, "Father in heaven, hallowed be thy name, thy kingdom come." We shall have never the less of God's mercy, and blessing, and favour, for others coming in to share with us. Or it may be taken thus: 'God be merciful to us Jews, and bless us, that thereby thy way may be known upon earth;' that by the peculiar distinguishing tokens of thy favour to us others may be allured to come and join themselves to us, saying, "We will go with you, for we have heard that God is with you," Zec. viii. 23. These verses which point at the conversion of the Gentiles, may be taken, 1. As a prayer; and so it speaks the desire of the Old Testament saints. So far were they from wishing to monopolize the privileges of the church, that they desired nothing insincere. Perhaps the rendering "shall flatter thee" is as appropriate as any. It is needless to adopt the sense, or, at all events, the phraseology, of the Greek version: "In the greatness of thy power thine enemies shall tell lies unto thee."

lxvi. 11. The affliction here referred to is that of constraint and oppression. They had been treated as pack-horses by their oppressors. In this verse, and in verses 10 and 12, God is said to have done or caused what he allowed or permitted.

lxvi. 12. The phrase "hast caused men to ride over our heads" rather means, "Thou hast caused men to ride at our heads;" the idea being, that as a man rules and guides a horse by sitting on it and holding the bridle at its head, so the Hebrews had been domineered over, and driven through fire and water, like miserable horses.

lxvi. 17. For "he was extolled with my tongue" some render, "and praise was under my tongue." We say "upon" the tongue.

lxvii. Title. The date and authorship of this psalm are quite more than the throwing down of the enclosure, and the laying open of the advantages. See then how the spirit of the Jews in the days of Christ and his apostles differed from the spirit of their fathers. The Israelites indeed that were of old desired that God's name might be known among the Gentiles; those counterfeit Jews were enraged at the preaching of the Gospel to the Gentiles; nothing in Christianity exasperated them so much as that did. 2. As a prophecy; that it shall be as he here prays. Many Scripture prophecies and promises are wrapped up in prayers, to intimate that the answer of the church's prayer is as sure as the performance of God's promises. Three things are here prayed for with reference to the Gentiles:

1st. That Divine revelation might be sent among them, ver. 2. Two things he desires might be known upon earth, even among all nations, and not to the nation of the Jews only: First. God's way; that is, the rule of duty. Let them all know as well as we do what is good, and what the Lord our God requires of them; let them be blessed and honoured with the same righteous statutes and judgments which are so much the praise of our nation, and the envy of all its neighbours, Deu. iv. 8. Secondly. His saving health, or his salvation. The former is wrapped up in his law, this in his Gospel. If God makes known his way to us, and we walk in it, he will shew us his saving health, Ps. l. 23. They that have themselves experimentally known the pleasantness of God's ways, and the comforts of his salvation, cannot but desire and pray that they may be known to others, even among all nations. All upon earth are bound to walk in God's way, all need his salvation, and there is in it enough for all; and therefore we should pray that both the one and the other may be made known to all.

2nd. That Divine worship may be set up among them, as it will be where Divine revelation is received and embraced; ver. 3, "Let the people praise thee, O God," let them have matter for praise, let them have hearts for praise; yea, "let" not only some, but "all the people praise thee," all nations in their national capacity, some of all nations. It is again repeated, ver. 5, as that which the psalmist's heart was very much upon. They that delight in praising God themselves cannot but desire that others also may be brought to praise him; that he may have the honour of it, and they may have the benefit of it. It is a prayer, First. That the Gospel might be preached to them, and then they would have cause enough to praise God, as for the day-spring after a long and dark night. Ortus est sol,—'The sun has risen,' Acts viii. 8. Secondly. That they might be converted and brought into the church, and then they would have a disposition to praise God; the living and true God, and not the dumb and dunghill deities they had worshipped, Dan. v. 4. Then their hard thoughts of God would be silenced, and they should see him in the gospel-glass to be love itself, and the proper object of praise. Thirdly. That they might be incorporated into solemn assemblies, and might praise God in a body; that they might all, altogether, praise him with one mind, and one mouth. Thus a face of religion appears upon a land, when God is publicly owned, and the ordinances of religious worship duly celebrated in religious assemblies.

3rd. That the Divine government may be acknowledged and cheerfully submitted to; ver. 4, "O let the nations be glad and sing for joy." Holy joy, joy in God, and in his name, is the heart and soul of thankful praise. That all the people may praise thee; Let the nations be glad. They that rejoice in the Lord always will in every thing give thanks. The joy he wisheth to the nations is holy joy, for it is joy in God's dominion; joy that God has taken to himself his great power and has reigned, which the unconverted nations are angry at, Rev. xi. 17, 18. Let them be glad, First. That the kingdom is the Lord's, Ps. xxii. 28. That he, as an absolute sovereign, shall govern the nations upon earth. That by the kingdom of his providence he shall overrule the affairs of kingdoms according to the counsel of his will, though they neither know him nor own him; and that in due time he shall disciple all nations by the preaching of his Gospel, Mat. xxviii. 18, and set up the kingdom of his grace among them upon the ruin of the devil's kingdom. That he shall make them a willing people in the day of his power, and even the kingdoms of this world shall become the kingdoms of the Lord and of his Christ. Secondly. That "every man's judgment proceedeth from the Lord." Let them be glad that "thou shalt judge the people righteously," that is, that thou shalt give a law and gospel which shall be a righteous rule of judgment, and pass an unerring sentence according to that rule upon all the children of men, against which there will lie no exception. Let us all be glad that we are not to be one another's judges, but that he that judgeth us is the Lord, whose judgment we are sure is according to truth.

Thirdly. He concludes with a joyful prospect of all good, when God shall do this, when the nations shall be converted, and brought to praise God.

1. The lower world shall smile upon them, and they shall have the fruits of that; ver. 6, "Then shall the earth yield her increase." Not but that God gave rain from heaven and fruitful seasons to the nations when they sat in darkness, Acts xiv. 17; but when they were converted the earth yielded its increase to God; the meat and the drink then became a meat offering and a drink offering to the Lord our God, Joel ii. 13, and then it was fruitful to some good purpose. Then it yielded its increase more than before to the comfort of men, who through Christ acquired a covenant title to the fruits of it, and had a sanctified use of it. Note, The success of the Gospel brings outward mercies along with it sometimes; righteousness exalts a nation: see Isa. iv. 2; lxii. 9.

2. The upper world shall smile upon them, and they shall have the favours of that, which is much better. "God, even our own God, shall bless us," ver. 6; and again, ver. 7, "God shall bless us." Note, 1st. There are a people in the world that can upon good ground call God their God. 2nd. Believers have reason to glory in their relation to God, and the interest they have in him. It is here spoken with an air of triumph, "God, even our own God." 3rd. Those who through grace call God their own may with an humble confidence expect a blessing from him. If he be our God, he shall bless us with special blessings. 4th. The blessing of God, as ours in covenant, is that which sweetens all our creature comforts to us, and makes them comforts indeed; then we receive the increase of the earth as a mercy indeed, when with it God, even our own God, gives us his blessing.

3. All the world shall hereby be brought to do like them. "The ends of the earth shall fear him," that is, worship him, which is to be done with a godly fear. The blessings God bestows upon us call upon us not only to love him, but to fear him, to keep up high thoughts of him, and to be afraid of offending him. When the Gospel begins to spread it shall get ground more and more till it reach to the ends of the earth. The leaven hid in the meal shall diffuse itself till the whole be leavened; and the many blessings which they will own themselves to have received that are brought into the church invite others to join themselves to them. It is good to cast in our lot with those that are the blessed of the Lord.

PSALM LXVIII.

This is a most excellent psalm, but in many places the genuine sense is not easy to come at; for in this, as in some other Scriptures, there are things dark and hard to be understood. It doth not appear when or upon what occasion David penned this psalm; but probably it was when, God having given him rest from all his enemies round about, he brought the ark (which was both the token of God's presence and a type of Christ's mediation) from the house of Obed-edom, to the tent he had pitched for it in Zion; for the first words are the prayer which Moses used at the removing of the ark, Num. x. 35. From this he is led by the spirit of prophecy to speak glorious things concerning the Messiah, his ascension into heaven, and the setting up of his kingdom in the world. I. He begins with prayer, both against God's enemies ver. 1, 2; and for his people, ver. 3. II. He proceeds to praise, which takes up the rest of the psalm, calling upon all to praise God, ver. 4, 26, 32, and suggesting many things as matter of praise: 1. The greatness and goodness of God, ver. 4—6; 2. The wonderful works God had wrought for his people formerly, bringing them through the wilderness, ver. 7, 8, settling them in Canaan, ver. 9, 10, giving them victory over their enemies, ver. 11, 12, and delivering them out of the hands of their oppressors, ver. 13, 14; 3. The special presence of God in his church, ver. 5—17; 4. The ascension of Christ, ver. 18, and the salvation of his people by him, ver. 19, 20; 5. The victories which Christ would obtain over his enemies, and the favours he would bestow upon his church, ver. 21—28; 6. The enlargement of the church by the accession of the Gentiles to it, ver. 29—31; and so he concludes the psalm with an awful acknowledgment of the glory and grace of God, ver. 32—35. With all these great things we should endeavour to be duly affected in singing this psalm.

To the chief Musician, A Psalm or Song of David.

LET God arise, let his enemies be scattered:
Let them also that hate him flee before him.
2 As smoke is driven away, so drive them away:
As wax melteth before the fire,
So let the wicked perish at the presence of God.
3 But let the righteous be glad;
Let them rejoice before God:
Yea, let them exceedingly rejoice.
4 Sing unto God, sing praises to his name:
Extol him that rideth upon the heavens by his name JAH,
And rejoice before him.
5 A father of the fatherless, and a judge of the widows,
Is God in his holy habitation.
6 God setteth the solitary in families:
He bringeth out those which are bound with chains:
But the rebellious dwell in a dry land.

In these verses, First. David prays to God to appear in his glory,

1. For the confusion of his enemies, ver. 1, 2. Let God arise as a judge, to pass sentence upon them; as a general, to take the field and do execution upon them; and let them be scattered, and flee before him, as unable to keep their ground, much less to make head against him. "Let God arise," as the sun when he goes forth in his strength, and the children of darkness shall be scattered, as the shadows of the evening flee before the rising sun. Let them be driven away as smoke by the wind, which ascends as if it would eclipse the sun, but is presently dispelled, and there appears no remainder of it; "Let them melt as wax before the fire," which is presently dissolved. Thus doth David comment upon Moses' prayer, and not only repeat it with application to himself and his own times, but enlarge upon it, to direct us how to make use of Scripture prayers. Nay, it looks farther, to the Redeemer's victories over the enemies of his kingdom, for he was the angel of the covenant that guided Israel through the wilderness. Note, 1st. There are, and have been, and ever will be, such as are enemies to God, and hate him; that join in with the old serpent against the kingdom of God among men, and against the seed of the woman. 2nd. They are the wicked, and none but they that are enemies to God; the children of the wicked one. 3rd. Though we are to pray for our enemies as such, yet we are to pray against God's enemies as such, against their enmity to him, and all their attempts upon his kingdom. 4th. If God but arise, all his impenitent, implacable enemies, that will not repent, to give him glory, will certainly and speedily be scattered, and driven away, and made to perish at his presence; for none ever hardened his heart against God and prospered. The day of judgment will be the day of the complete and final perdition of ungodly men, 2 Pet. iii. 7, who shall melt like wax before that flaming fire in which the Lord shall then appear, 2 Thes. i. 8

2. For the comfort and joy of his own people; ver. 3, "Let the righteous be glad," that are now in sorrow; "let them rejoice before God," in his favourable presence. God is the joy of his people, let them rejoice whenever they come before God, yea, let them exceedingly rejoice, let them rejoice with gladness. Note, Those who rejoice in God have reason to rejoice with exceeding joy; and this joy we ought to wish to all the saints, for it belongs to them. "Light is sown for the righteous."

Secondly. He praiseth God for his glorious appearances, and calls upon us to praise him, to sing to his name, and extol him.

1. As a great God, infinitely great; ver. 4, he "rides upon the heavens by his name Jah." He is the spring of all the motions of the heavenly bodies, directs and manageth them, as he that rides in the chariot sets it agoing; has a supreme command of the influences of heaven. He rides upon the heavens for the help of his people, Deu. xxxiii. 26, so swiftly, so strongly, and so much above the reach of opposition. These he rules by his name Jah, or Jehovah, a self-existent, self-sufficient being, the fountain of all beings, power, motion, and perfection: this is his name for ever. When we thus extol God we must rejoice before him; holy joy in God will very well consist with that reverence and godly fear wherewith we ought to worship him.

2. As a gracious God, a God of mercy and tender compassion. He is great, but he despiseth not any, no not the meanest; nay, being a God of great power, he useth his power for the relief of those that are distressed, ver. 5, 6. The fatherless, the widows, the solitary, find him a God all-sufficient to them. Observe how much God's goodness is his glory. He "that rides on the heavens by his name Jah" one would think should immediately have been adored as King of kings, and Lord of lords, and the sovereign director of all the affairs of states and nations; he is so, but this he rather glories in, that he is "a Father of the fatherless." "Though God be high, yet hath he respect unto the lowly." Happy they that have an interest in such a God as this; he that "rides upon the heavens" is a Father worth having: thrice "happy is the people whose God is the Lord." 1st. When families are beheaded, God takes care of them, and is himself their head, and the widows and fatherless children shall find that in him which they have lost in the relation that is removed, and infinitely more and better. He is a Father of the fatherless, to pity them, and bless them, and unknown; the Greek and Latin refer it to David, the Syriac calls it uncertain, and the Chaldee is silent.

lxviii. Title. The Syriac says David wrote this when the kings prepared to make war upon him. The Septuagint leaves the occasion undetermined. Critics are divided in opinion. Some think David wrote it when the ark was removed from the house of Obed-edom to Zion; some think it commemorated a successful return from war.

lxviii. 4. For "Extol him that rideth upon the heavens" the Greek is, "Prepare a way for him that is gone up to the west." Jerome renders, "Prepare a way for him who cometh up through the deserts." Fürst says the Hebrew means "Cast up (a way) for him who rideth through the deserts." Similarly many other critics. Our translators have been influenced by rabbinical opinions, which Pagninus, Montanus, and other older critics adopted in this passage. We translate, "Prepare (a way) for him who rideth through the deserts; Jah is his name."

teach them, to provide for them, and portion them. He will preserve them alive, Jer. xlix. 11; and with him they shall find mercy, Hos. xiv. 3. They have liberty to call him Father, and to plead their relation to him as their guardian, Ps. cxlvi. 9; x. 14, 18. He is a judge, or patron, of the widows, to give them counsel, and to do them right; to own them and plead their cause, Pr. xxii. 23. He has an ear open to all their complaints, and a hand open to all their wants. He is so in his holy habitation; which may be understood either of the habitation of his glory in heaven,—there he has prepared his throne of judgment, which the fatherless and widow have free recourse to, and are taken under the protection of, Ps. ix. 4, 7,—or of the habitation of his grace on earth, and so it is a direction to the widows and fatherless how to apply themselves to God; let them go to his holy habitation, to his word and ordinances, there they may find comfort in him. 2nd. When families are to be built up he is the founder of them; "God setteth the solitary in families," brings them into comfortable relations that were lonely, gives them a convenient settlement that were unsettled, Ps. cxiii. 9. He makes those dwell at home that were forced to seek for relief abroad, (so Dr. Hammond,) putting them that were destitute into a way of getting their livelihood, which is a very good way for man's charity, as it is of God's bounty.

3. As a righteous God, 1st. In relieving the oppressed. He "bringeth out those that are bound with chains," and sets them at liberty who were unjustly imprisoned, and brought into servitude. No chains can detain those whom God will make free. 2nd. In reckoning with the oppressors. "The rebellious dwell in a dry land," and have no comfort in that which they have got by fraud and injury. The best land will be a dry land to those that by their rebellion have forfeited the blessing of God, which is the juice and fatness of all our enjoyments. Israel was brought out of Egypt into a wilderness, but were there better provided for than the Egyptians themselves, whose land, if Nilus failed them, as it sometimes did, was a dry land.

7 O God, when thou wentest forth before thy people,
When thou didst march through the wilderness; Selah:
8 The earth shook, the heavens also dropped at the presence of God: [God of Israel.
Even Sinai itself was moved at the presence of God, the 9 Thou, O God, didst send a plentiful rain, Whereby thou didst confirm thine inheritance, when it was weary.
10 Thy congregation hath dwelt therein:
Thou, O God, hast prepared of thy goodness for the poor.
11 The Lord gave the word:
Great was the company of those that published it
12 Kings of armies did flee apace:
And she that tarried at home divided the spoil 13 Though ye have lien among the pots,

EGYPTIAN DRESSER AND POTS.

Yet shall ye be as the wings of a dove covered with silver,
And her feathers with yellow gold
14 When the Almighty scattered kings in it,
It was white as snow in Salmon

The psalmist here, having occasion to give God thanks for the great things he had done for him and his people of late, takes occasion from thence to praise him for what he had done for their fathers in the days of old. Fresh mercies should put us in mind of former mercies, and revive our grateful sense of them. Let it never be forgotten,

First. That God himself was the guide of Israel through the wilderness. When he had brought them out of their chains, he did not leave them in the dry land, but himself went before them in a march through the wilderness, ver. 7. It was not a journey, but a march, for they went as soldiers, as an army with banners. The Egyptians promised themselves that the wilderness had shut them in, but they were deceived; God's Israel, having him for their leader, marched through the wilderness, and were not lost in it. Note, If God bring his people into a wilderness, he will be sure to go before them in it, and bring them out of it, Cant. viii. 5.

Secondly. That he manifested his glorious presence with them at mount Sinai, ver. 8. Never did any people see the glory of God, nor hear his voice, as Israel did, Deu. iv. 32, 33. Never had any people such an excellent law given them; so expounded, so enforced. Then the earth shook, and the neighbouring countries, it is likely, felt the shock; terrible thunders there were, accompanied, no doubt, with thunder showers, in which the heavens seemed to drop; while the Divine doctrine dropped as the rain, Deu. xxxii. 2. Sinai itself, that vast mountain, that long ridge of mountains, was moved at the presence of God: see Jud. v. 4, 5; Deu. xxxiii. 2; Hab. iii. 3. This terrible appearance of the Divine majesty, as it would possess them with a fear and dread of him, so it would encourage their faith in him, and dependence upon him. Whatever mountains of difficulty lay in the way of their happy settlement, He that could move Sinai itself could remove them, could get over them.

Thirdly. That he provided very comfortably for them, both in the wilderness and in Canaan; ver. 9, 10, "Thou didst send a plentiful rain, and hast prepared of thy goodness for the poor." This may refer, 1. To the victualling of their camp with manna in the wilderness, which was rained upon them, as were also the quails, Ps. lxxviii. 24, 27; and it might be fitly called a rain of liberality, or munificence, for it was a memorable instance of the Divine bounty. This confirmed the camp of Israel, (here called God's inheritance, because he had chosen them to be a peculiar treasure to himself,) when it was weary, and ready to perish; this confirmed their faith, and was a standing proof of God's power and goodness. Even in the wilderness God found a comfortable dwelling for Israel, which was his congregation. Or, 2. To the seasonable supplies granted them in Canaan, that land flowing with milk and honey, which is said to drink water of the rain of heaven, Deu. xi. 11. When sometimes that fruitful land was ready to be turned into barrenness for the iniquity of them that dwelt therein, God in judgment remembered mercy, and sent them a plentiful rain, which refreshed it again, so that the congregation of Israel dwelt therein, and there was provision enough even to satisfy their poor with bread. This looks farther to the spiritual provision made for God's Israel; the Spirit of grace, and the Gospel of grace are the plentiful rain with which God confirms his inheritance, and from which their fruit is found. Isa. xlv. 8. Christ himself is this rain; Ps. lxxii. 6, "He shall come as showers that water the earth."

Fourthly. That he often gave them victory over their enemies. Armies and kings of armies appeared against them, from their first coming into Canaan, and all along in the times of the judges, till David's days, but, first or last, they gained their point against them, ver. 11, 12, 14. Observe here, 1. That God was their commander in chief. "The Lord gave the word," as general of their armies; he raised up judges for them, gave them their commissions and instructions, and assured them of success. God spoke in his holiness, and then Gilead is mine. 2. That they had prophets as God's messengers to make known his mind to them. God gave them his word, ('the word of the Lord came' unto them,) and then "great was the company of the preachers," prophets and prophetesses, for the word is feminine. When God has messages to send, he will not want messengers. Or perhaps it may allude to the women's joining in the triumph when the victory was obtained, as was usual, Ex. xv. 20, 1 Sam. xviii. 7, in which they took notice of the word of God, triumphing in that as much as in his works. 3. That their enemies were defeated and put to confusion. "Kings of armies did flee, did flee" with the greatest terror and precipitation imaginable: did not fight and flee, but flee and flee, retired without striking a stroke; they fled apace, fled and never rallied again. 4. That they were enriched with the plunder of the field: "She that tarried at home divided the spoil." Not only the men, the soldiers that abode by the stuff, who were by a statute of distribution to share the prey, 1 Sam. xxx. 24, but even the women that tarried at home had a share, which intimates the abundance of spoil that should be taken. 5. That these great things which God did for them were sanctified to them, and contributed to their reformation; ver. 14, "When the Almighty scattered kings for her," for the church, "she was white as snow in Salmon," purified and refined by the mercies of God. When the host went forth against the enemy, they kept themselves from every wicked thing, and so the host returned victorious, and Israel by the victory was confirmed in their purity and piety. This account of Israel's victories is applicable to the victories obtained by the exalted Redeemer for those that are his, over death and hell. By the resurrection of Christ our spiritual enemies were made to flee, their power was broken, and they were for ever disabled to hurt any of God's people. This victory was first notified by the women (the she-publishers) to the disciples, Mat. xxviii. 7, and by them it was preached to all the world, whilst believers that tarry at home, that did not themselves contribute any thing towards it, enjoy the benefit of it, and divide the spoil.

Fifthly. That from a low and despised condition they had been advanced to splendour and prosperity. When they were bond-slaves in Egypt, and afterwards when they were oppressed, sometimes by one potent neighbour, and sometimes by another, they did as it were lie among the pots, or rubbish, as despised broken vessels, or as vessels in which there was no pleasure; they were black and dirty, and discoloured. But God at length delivered them from the pots, Ps. lxxxi. 6, and in David's time they were in a fair way to be one of the most prosperous kingdoms in the world; amiable in the eyes of all about them, "like the wings of a dove covered with silver," ver. 13. 'And so,' saith Dr. Hammond, 'under Christ's kingdom, the heathenish idolaters that were brought to the basest and most despicable condition of any creatures, worshipping wood and stone, and given up to the vilest lusts, should from that detestable condition be advanced to the service of Christ, and the practice of all Christian virtues, the greatest inward beauties in the world.' It may be applied also to the deliverance of the church out of a suffering state, and the comforts of particular believers after their despondencies.

lxviii. 6. "God setteth the solitary in families" should rather be, "God causeth the deserted to dwell at home." The solitary are those who are homeless and forsaken.

lxviii. 12. The Greek and Vulgate quite miss the meaning of this verse, of which the Douay version is unintelligible: "The king of hosts, the beloved of the beloved: and to the beauty of the house to divide the spoils." There are other extraordinary translations of portions of this psalm.

lxviii. 13. For "pots" Gesenius gives "stalls" for cattle, in which other eminent critics agree with him. Rosenmüller translates, "If ye lie among the stalls," i.e., in peace and quiet. The notion of "pots" and all the inferences therefrom must, we believe, be abandoned.

SINAI.—ver. 17.

David, having given God praise for what he had done for Israel in general, as the God of Israel, ver. 8, here comes to give him praise as Zion's God in a special manner; compare Ps. ix. 11, "Sing praises to the Lord which dwelleth in Zion," for which reason Zion is called the hill of God.

First. He compares it with the hill of Bashan, and other high and fruitful hills, and prefers it before them, ver. 15, 16. It is true Zion was but little and low in comparison with them, and was not covered over with flocks and herds as they were; yet upon this account it has the preeminence above them all, that it is the hill of God, the hill which he desireth to dwell in, and where he chooseth to manifest the tokens of his peculiar presence, Ps. cxxxii. 13, 14. Note, It is much more honourable to be holy to God than to be high and great in the world. "Why leap ye, ye high hills?" why do ye insult over poor Zion, and boast of your own height? This is the hill which God has chosen, and therefore, though you exceed it in bulk, and be first-rates, because on this the royal flag is hoisted, you must all strike sail to it. Zion was especially honourable because it was a type of the gospel church, which is therefore called mount Zion, Heb. xii. 22; and this is intimated here when he said, "the Lord will dwell in it for ever," which must have its accomplishment in the gospel Zion. There is no kingdom in the world comparable to the kingdom of the Redeemer, no city to that which is incorporated by the gospel charter, for there God dwells, and will dwell for ever.

Secondly. He compares it with mount Sinai, of which he had spoken, ver. 8, and shews that it has the Shechinah, or Divine presence, in it, as really, though not as sensibly, as Sinai itself had, ver. 17. Angels are the chariots of God, his chariots of war, which he makes use of against his enemies; his chariots of conveyance, which he sends for his friends, as he did for Elijah, and Lazarus is said to be carried by the angels; and chariots of state, in the midst of which he shews his glory and power. They are vastly numerous; twenty thousands, even thousands multiplied. There is an innumerable company of angels in the heavenly Jerusalem, Heb. xii. 22. The enemies David fought with had chariots, 2 Sam. viii. 4; but what were they for number or strength to the chariots of God? which while David had on his side he needed not fear those that trusted in chariots and horses, Ps. xx. 7. God appeared on mount Sinai attended with myriads of angels, by whose disposition the law was given, Acts vii. 53; "He comes with ten thousands of saints," Deu. xxxiii. 2. And still in Zion God manifests his glory, and is really present with a numerous retinue of his heavenly hosts, signified by the cherubims between which God is said to dwell. So that, as some read the last words of the verse, 'Sinai is in the sanctuary;' that is, the sanctuary was to Israel instead of mount Sinai, whence they received Divine oracles. Our Lord Jesus has these chariots at command. When the First-begotten was brought into the world, it was with this charge, "Let all the angels of God worship him," Heb. i. 6; they attended him upon all occasions, and he is now among them, "angels, principalities, and powers being made subject to him," 1 Pet. iii. 22. And it is intimated in the New Testament, that the angels are present in the solemn religious assemblies of Christians; 1 Cor. xi. 10, "Let the woman have a veil on her head, because of the angels;" and see Eph. iii. 10.

Thirdly. The glory of mount Zion was the King which God set on that holy hill, Ps. ii. 6; who came to the daughter of Zion, Mat. xxi. 5. Of his ascension the psalmist here speaks, and to it it is expressly applied, Eph. iv. 8, "Thou hast ascended on high," ver. 18; compare Ps. xlvii. 5, 6. Christ's ascending on high is here spoken of as a thing past, so sure was it, and spoken of to his honour, so great was it; it may include his whole exalted state, but points especially at his ascension into heaven, to the right hand of the Father, which was as much our advantage as his advancement. For, 1. He then triumphed over the gates of hell. He led captivity captive; that is, he led his captives in triumph, as great conquerors used to do, making a show of them openly, Col. ii. 15. He led those captives who had led us captives, and, if he had not interposed, would have held us captives for ever. Nay, he led captivity itself captive, having quite broken the power of sin and Satan; as he was the death of death, so he was the captivity of captivity, Hos. xii. 14. This speaks the complete victory which Jesus Christ obtained over our spiritual enemies, such as that through him we also are more than conquerors, that is, triumphers, Rom. viii. 37. 2. He then opened the gates of heaven to all believers; "Thou hast received gifts for men." "He gave gifts to men," so the apostle reads it, Eph. iv. 8; for he received that he might give; on his head the anointing of the Spirit was poured, that from him it might descend to the skirts of his garments. And he gave what he had received; having received power to give eternal life, he doth bestow it upon as many as were given him, Jno. xvii. 2. "Thou hast received gifts for men," not for angels; fallen angels were not to be made saints, nor standing angels made gospel ministers, Heb. ii. 5; not for Jews only, but for all men. Whoever will, may reap the benefit of these gifts. The apostle tells us what these gifts were, Eph. iv. 11; prophets, apostles, evangelists, pastors, and teachers, the institution of a gospel ministry, and the qualification of men for it, both which are to be valued as the gifts of heaven, and the fruits of Christ's ascension. 'Thou hast received gifts in man,' so the margin; that is, in the human nature which Christ was pleased to clothe himself with, "that he might be a merciful and faithful high priest in things pertaining to God." In him, as Mediator, all fulness dwells, that from his fulness we might receive. To magnify the kindness and love of Christ to us in receiving these gifts for us, the psalmist observes, 1st. The forfeiture we had made of them. He received them for the rebellious also; that is, for those that had been rebellious: so all the children of men had been in their fallen state. Perhaps it is especially meant of the Gentiles, that had been enemies in their minds by wicked works, Col. i. 21; for them these gifts are received, to them they are given, that they might lay down their arms, their enmity might be slain, and they might return to their allegiance. This magnifies the grace of Christ exceedingly, that through him rebels are, upon their submission, not only pardoned, but preferred. They have commissions given them under Christ, which some say in our law amounts to the reversion of an attainder. Christ came to a rebellious world, not to condemn it, but that through him it might be saved. 2nd. The favour designed us in them. "He received gifts for the rebellious, that the Lord God might dwell among them;" that he might set up a church in a rebellious world, in which he would dwell by his word and ordinances as of old in the sanctuary, that he might set up his throne, and Christ might dwell in the hearts of particular persons that had been rebellious. The gracious intention of Christ's undertaking was to rear up the tabernacle of God among men, that he might dwell with them, and they might themselves be living temples to his praise, Eze. xxxvii. 27.

Fourthly. The glory of Zion's King is, that he is a Saviour and benefactor to all his willing people, and a consuming fire to all those that persist in rebellion against him, ver. 19—21. We have here good and evil, life and death, the blessing and the curse set before us, like that Mar. xvi. 16, "He that believes shall be saved; he that believes not shall be damned."

1. They that take God for their God, and so give up themselves to him to be his people, shall be loaded with his benefits; and to them he will be the God of salvation. He that is our God, if in sincerity we avouch him to be so, and seek to him as our God, 1st. He will continually do us good, and furnish us with occasion for praise. Having mentioned the gifts Christ received for us, ver. 18, fitly doth he subjoin in the next words, "Blessed be the Lord," for it is owing to the mediation of Christ that we live, and live comfortably, and are "daily loaded with benefits." So many, so weighty, are the gifts of God's bounty to us, that he may be truly said to load us with them; he pours out blessings till there be no room to receive them, Mal. iii. 10. So constant are they, and so unwearied is he in doing us good, that he daily loads us with them, according as the necessity of every day requires. 2nd. He will at length be unto us the God of salvation, of everlasting salvation, the salvation of God, which he will shew to them that order their conversation aright, Ps. l. 23, the salvation of the soul. He that daily loads us with benefits will not put us off with present things for a portion, but he will be the God of our salvation; and what he gives us now he gives as the God of salvation, pursuant to the great design of our salvation. He is our God, and therefore he will be the God of eternal salvation to us; for that only will answer the vast extent of his covenant-relation to us as our God. But hath he power to complete this salvation? Yes, certainly; "for unto God the Lord belong the issues from death," that is, the keys of hell and death are put into the hand of the Lord Jesus, Rev. i. 18. He having made an escape from death himself in his resurrection, he has both authority and power to rescue those that are his from the dominion of death, by altering the property of it to them when they die, and giving them a complete victory over it when they shall rise again; for "the last enemy that shall be destroyed is death." And to those that shall thus for ever escape death, and shall find such an outlet from it as not to be hurt of the second death, to them surely deliverances from temporal death are mercies indeed, and come from God as the God of their salvation: see 2 Cor. i. 10.

2. They that persist in their enmity to him, it will certainly be their ruin; ver. 21, "God shall wound the head of his enemies;" of Satan, the old serpent, of whom it was by the first promise foretold, that the seed of the woman should break his head, Gen. iii. 16; of all the powers of the nations, whether Jews or Gentiles, that oppose him and his kingdom among men, (Ps. cx. 6, "He shall wound the heads over many countries;") of all those, whoever they are, that will not have him to reign over them, for those he accounts his enemies, and they shall be brought forth and slain before him, Lu. xix. 27. He will "wound the hairy scalp of such an one as goeth on still in his trespasses." Note, Those who go on still in their trespasses, and hate to be reformed, God looks upon as his enemies, and will treat them accordingly. In calling the head the hairy scalp, perhaps there is an allusion to Absalom, whose bushy hair was his halter; or, it notes either the most fierce and barbarous of his enemies, that let their hair grow to make themselves look the more frightful, or the most fine and delicate of his enemies, that are nice about their hair. Neither the one nor the other can secure themselves from the fatal wounds which Divine justice will give to the heads of those that go on in their sins.

22 The Lord said, I will bring again from Bashan,
I will bring my people again from the depths of the sea:
23 That thy foot may be dipped in the blood of thine enemies,
And the tongue of thy dogs in the same.
24 They have seen thy goings, O God;
Even the goings of my God, my King, in the sanctuary.
25 The singers went before, the players on instruments followed after;
Among them were the damsels playing with timbrels.
26 Bless ye God in the congregations,
Even the Lord, from the fountain of Israel.
27 There is little Benjamin with their ruler,
The princes of Judah and their council,
The princes of Zebulun, and the princes of Naphtali.
28 Thy God hath commanded thy strength:
Strengthen, O God, that which thou hast wrought for us.
29 Because of thy temple at Jerusalem casioned much uncertain and conflicting criticism. Verse 15 should be rendered, "A mount of God," or a lofty mount, "is Mount Bashan; a mount with summits is Mount Bashan." The phrase "mount of God" often refers to Sinai; but here it means that the mount of Bashan, or the range of Antilibanus, is elevated. Verse 16 may be translated, "Why tremble ye, mountains with summits? The mountain God chooses to dwell in; yea, the Lord will inhabit it for ever." The word "angels" in verse 17 is by no means certainly correct, and it may only signify a vast number; and the second clause may be translated, "The Lord is among them, as in Sinai, his holy place." For the last words some translate, "Sinai is in the holy place," which may be justified, if we understand the psalmist to mean that the glory of Sinai was in the sanctuary. The mountain in verse 16 will then be Zion, which has the pre-eminence over Bashan, and inherits the privileges of Sinai as the mount of God.

lxviii. 22, 23. These verses are by some understood to mean that Shall kings bring presents unto thee.

30 Rebuke the company of spearmen,
The multitude of the bulls, with the calves of the people,
Till every one submit himself with pieces of silver:
Scatter thou the people that delight in war.
31 Princes shall come out of Egypt;
Ethiopia shall soon stretch out her hands unto God.

In these verses we have three things:

First. The gracious promise which God makes of the redemption of his people, and their victory over his and their enemies; ver. 22, 23, "The Lord said," in his own gracious purpose and promise, I will do great things for my people, as the God of their salvation, ver. 20. God will not fail the expectations of those who by faith take him for their God. It is promised, 1. That he will set them in safety from their danger, as he had done formerly; "I will again bring them from the depths of the sea," as he did Israel, when he brought them out of the slavery of Egypt into the ease and liberty of the wilderness. And "I will again bring them from Bashan," as he did Israel, when he brought them from their wants and wanderings in the wilderness into the fulness and settlement of the land of Canaan: for the land of Bashan was on the other side Jordan, where they had wars with Sihon and Og, and from whence their next remove was into Canaan. Note, The former appearances of God's power and goodness for his people should encourage their faith and hope in him for the future, that what he has done he will do again. He will set his hand again the second time to recover the remnant of his people, Isa. xi. 11; and we may perhaps see repeated all the wonders which our fathers told us of. But this is not all. 2. That he will make them victorious over their enemies; ver. 23, "That thy feet may be dipped," as thou passest along, "in the blood of thine enemies," shed like water in great abundance, "and the tongue of thy dogs" may lap "in the same." Dogs licked the blood of Ahab; and in the destruction of the antichristian generation we read of blood up to the horse-bridles, Rev. xiv. 20. The victories with which God blessed David's forces over the enemies of Israel are here prophesied of, but as types of Christ's victories over death and the grave, for himself and for all believers in his resurrection (and theirs by virtue of his) out of the earth; and of the destruction of the enemies of Christ and his church, who shall have blood given them to drink, for they are worthy.

Secondly. The welcome entertainment which God's own people shall give to these glorious discoveries of his grace, both in his word and in his works. Has he spoken in his holiness? Has he said, he will bring again from Bashan? What then is required of us in return to this?

1. That we observe his motions; ver. 24, "They have seen," thy people have seen, "thy goings, O God." While others regard not the work of the Lord, nor the operation of his hands, "they have seen the goings of my God, my King, in the sanctuary." See here, 1st. How an active faith appropriates God. He is God and King; but that is not all, he is my God and my King; and those who thus take him for theirs may see him in all his outgoings, acting as their God, as their King, for their good, and in answer to their prayers. 2nd. Where God's most remarkable outgoings are, even in the sanctuary, in and by his word and ordinances; and among his people in the gospel church especially, in and by which is made known the manifold wisdom of God. These outgoings of his in the sanctuary far outshine the outgoings of the morning and the evening, and more loudly proclaim his eternal power and godhead. 3rd. What is our duty in reference to these outgoings, which is to observe them. "This is the finger of God;" surely "God is with us of a truth."

2. That we give him glory in the most devout and solemn manner. When we see his goings in his sanctuary. 1st. Let those that are immediately employed in the service of the temple praise him, ver. 25; the Levites, that were some of them singers, and others of them players on instruments, that have the nearest views of his outgoings in his sanctuary, and from whom it is expected that they should lead in his praises. And, it being a day of extraordinary triumph, "among them were damsels playing with timbrels" to complete the concert. 'Thus,' saith Dr. Hammond, 'when Christ is gone up to heaven, the apostles shall celebrate and publish it to all the world; and even the women that were witnesses of it shall affectionately join with them in divulging it.' And, 2nd. Let all the people of Israel, in their solemn religious assembly, give glory to God. "Bless ye God," not only in temples, but in the synagogues, or schools of the prophets; or, wherever there is a congregation of those that come forth from the fountain of Israel, that are of the seed of Jacob, let them concur in blessing God. Public mercies, which we jointly share in, call for public thanksgivings, which all should join in. 'Thus,' saith Dr. Hammond, 'all Christians shall be obliged solemnly to magnify the name of the Messiah, and to that end frequently to assemble together in congregations.' And, 3rd. Let those among them that upon any account are most eminent, and make a figure, go before the rest in praising God; ver. 27, "There was little Benjamin," (that was the royal tribe in Saul's time,) "with their rulers, the princes of Judah" (that was the royal tribe in David's time,) "and their council,"—their captains or leaders. In the beginning of David's reign there had been long war between Judah and Benjamin, but now they both join in praises for success against the common enemy. But why are the tribes of Zebulun and Naphtali particularly mentioned? Perhaps because those tribes, lying towards the north, lay most exposed to the incursions of the Syrians, and other their neighbours that molested them, and therefore should be in a particular manner thankful for these victories over them. Dr. Hammond gives another reason,—that these were the two learned tribes; "Naphtali giveth goodly words," Gen. xliv. 21, and Zebulun had those that handle the pen of the writer, Jud. v. 14. These shall join in praising God; their princes especially. It is much for the honour of God when those that are above others in dignity, power, and reputation, go before them in the worship of God; and are forward to use their influence and interest for the advancing of any service that is to be done to him. Dr. Hammond notes from hence, that the kingdom of the Messiah should at length be submitted to by all the potentates and learned men in the world.

3. That we seek unto him, and depend upon him, for the perfecting of what he has begun, ver. 28. In the former part of the verses the psalmist speaks to Israel; "Thy God hath commanded thy strength," that is, whatever is done for thee, or whatever strength thou hast to help thyself, it comes from God, his power and grace, and the word which he has commanded. Thou hast no reason to fear while thou hast strength of God's commanding, and no reason to boast while thou hast no strength but what is of his commanding. In the latter part he speaks to God, encouraged by his experiences; "Strengthen, O God, that which thou hast wrought for us." Lord, confirm what thou hast commanded, and perform what thou hast promised, and bring to a happy end that good work which thou hast so gloriously begun. What God has wrought he will strengthen; where he has given true grace he will give more grace. Some make this whole verse to be a believer's address to the Messiah, whom David calls God, as he had done, Ps. xlv. 6, 8, "Thy God," that is, God the Father, has commanded thy strength, that is, has made thee strong for himself, as the man of his right hand, Ps. lxxx. 17; has treasured up strength in thee for us; therefore we pray, that thou, O God the Son, wilt strengthen what thou hast wrought for us, that is, wilt accomplish thine undertaking for us, by finishing thy good work in us.

Thirdly. The powerful invitation and inducement which would hereby be given to those that are without to come in and join themselves to the church, ver. 29—31. This was in part fulfilled by the accession of many proselytes to the Jewish religion in the days of David and Solomon; but it was to have its full accomplishment in the conversion of the Gentile nations to the faith of Christ, and the making them fellow-heirs, and of the same body with the seed of Israel, Eph. iii. 6.

1. Some shall submit for fear; ver. 30, "the company of spearmen," that stand it out against Christ and his Gospel, that are not willing to be ruled by him, that persecute the preachers and professors of his name, that are furious and outrageous as a multitude of bulls, fat and wanton as the calves of the people, (which is a description of those Jews and Gentiles that opposed the Gospel of Christ, and did what they could to prevent the setting up of his kingdom in the world,) Lord, rebuke them, abate their pride, assuage their malice, and confound their devices, till conquered by the convictions of their consciences, and the many checks of providence, they be every one of them brought at length to submit themselves with pieces of silver, as being glad to make their peace with the church upon any terms. Even Judas submitted himself with pieces of silver, when he returned them with this confession, "I have betrayed innocent blood:" and see Rev. iii. 9. Many by being rebuked have been happily saved from being ruined. But as for those that will not submit, notwithstanding these rebukes, he prays for their dispersion, which amounts to a prophecy of it; "Scatter thou the people that delight in war," who take such a pleasure in opposing Christ, that they will never be reconciled to him. This may refer to the unbelieving Jews, who delighted in making war upon the holy seed, and would not submit themselves, and were therefore scattered over the face of the earth. David had himself been a man of war, but could appeal to God that he never delighted in war and bloodshed for its own sake; as for those that did, and therefore would not submit to the fairest terms of peace, he doth not doubt but God would scatter them. Those are lost to all the sacred principles of humanity, as well as Christianity, that can delight in war, and take pleasure in contention; but let them expect that sooner or later they shall have enough of it, Isa. xxxiii. 1; Rev. xiii. 10.

2. Others shall submit willingly; ver. 29, 31, "Because of thy temple at Jerusalem," (this David speaks of in faith, for the temple of Jerusalem was not built in his time, only the materials and model were prepared,) "kings shall bring presents unto thee," that is, rich presents shall be brought, such as are fit for kings to bring; and even kings themselves, that stand much upon the punctilios of honour and prerogative, yet shall court the favour of Christ at a great expence. There is that in God's temple, that beauty and benefit in the service of God, and in communion with him, and in the Gospel of Christ, which went forth from Jerusalem, that is enough to invite kings themselves to bring presents to God, to present themselves to him as living sacrifices, and with themselves the best performances. He instanceth in Egypt and Ethiopia, two countries out of which subjects and supplicants were least to be expected; ver. 31, princes shall come out of Egypt, as ambassadors to seek God's favour, and submit to him; and they shall be accepted, for the Lord of hosts shall thereupon bless them, saying, "Blessed be Egypt my people," Isa. xix. 25. And even Ethiopia, that had stretched out her hands against God's Israel, 2 Chr. xiv. 9, should now stretch out her hands unto God, in prayer, in presents, and to take hold on him; and that soon: "Agree with thine adversary quickly." Out of all nations some shall be gathered in to Christ, and be owned by him.

32 Sing unto God, ye kingdoms of the earth;
O sing praises unto the Lord; Selah:
33 To him that rideth upon the heavens of heavens, which were of old;
Lo, he doth send out his voice, and that a mighty voice.
34 Ascribe ye strength unto God:
His excellency is over Israel,
And his strength is in the clouds.
35 O God, thou art terrible out of thy holy places:
The God of Israel is he that giveth strength and power
Blessed be God. [unto his people.

The psalmist having prayed for, and prophesied of, the conversion of the Gentiles, here invites them to come in and join with the devout Israelites in praising God, intimating that their accession to the church would be the matter of their joy and praise, ver. 32. Let the kingdoms of the earth sing praises to the Lord; they all ought to do it, and when they become the kingdoms of the Lord and of his Christ they will do it. God is here proposed to them as the proper object of praise upon several accounts.

First. Because of his supreme and sovereign dominion. "He rides upon the heavens of heavens which were of old," ver. 33: compare ver. 4. He has from the beginning, nay, from before all time, prepared his throne. He sits on the circuit of heaven; guides all the motions of the heavenly bodies, and from the highest heavens, which are the residence of his glory, he dispenseth the influences of his power and goodness to this lower world.

Secondly. Because of his awful and terrible majesty. "He sends out his voice, and that a mighty voice;" which may refer either generally to the thunder, which is called the voice of the Lord, and is said to be powerful and full of majesty, Ps. xxix. 3, 4, or in particular to that thunder in which God spake to Israel at mount Sinai.

Thirdly. Because of his mighty power. "Ascribe ye strength unto God," ver. 34. Acknowledge him to be a God of such irresistible power, that it is folly to contend with him, and wisdom to submit to him; acknowledge that he has power sufficient both to protect his faithful subjects and to destroy his stubborn adversaries, and give him the glory of all the instances of his omnipotence. "Thine is the kingdom and power," and therefore "thine is the glory." We must acknowledge his power, 1. In the kingdom of grace. "His excellency is over Israel;" he shews his sovereign care in protecting and governing his church. That is the excellency of his power which is employed for the good of his people. 2. In the kingdom of providence. "His strength is in the clouds," whence comes the thunder of his power, the small rain, and the great rain of the Lord will bring from Bashan and from the sea-coast the enemies of his people to destruction. So Schnurrer, Boothroyd, and others.

lxviii. 27. "There," that is, in the congregation before mentioned. Representatives of the tribes, far and near, were present.

lxviii. 30. The words rendered "Rebuke the company of spearmen" do not correctly represent the Hebrew, the ordinary sense of which would be, "Rebuke (or restrain) the animal in the reeds." The words are a metaphor, but both its exact origin and application are disputed. The crocodile, the hippopotamus, the wild boar, and the lion have been thought of, because they all haunt the reedy coverts of river banks. The psalmist may not have had any one kind in view, but the whole class of such dangerous animals. In general, it is certain that the enemies of God's people are meant, but whether as mere banditti, who lie in wait for honest men, or as nations like the Egyptians, we know not. The words following are also figurative, and therefore the "bulls" and "calves" may denote his strength. Though God has his strength in the clouds, yet he condescends to gather his Israel under the shadow of his wings, Deu. xxxiii. 26.

Fourthly. Because of the glory of his sanctuary, and the wonders wrought there; ver. 35, "O God, thou art terrible out of thy holy places." God is to be admired and adored with reverence and godly fear by all those that attend him in his holy places, that receive his oracles, that observe his operations according to them, and that pay their homage to him. He displays that out of his holy places which speaks aloud that he will be sanctified in those that come nigh unto him. Out of heaven, his holy place above, he doth and will shew himself a terrible God. Nor is any attribute of God more dreadful to sinners than his holiness.

Fifthly. Because of the grace bestowed upon his people. "The God of Israel is he that giveth strength and power unto his people," which the gods of the nations, that were vanity and a lie, could not give to their worshippers; how should they help them when they could not help themselves? All Israel's strength against their enemies came from their God; they owned they had no might of their own, 2 Chr. xx. 12; and all our sufficiency for our spiritual work and warfare is from the grace of God. It is through Christ strengthening us that we can do all things, and not otherwise; and therefore he must have the glory of all we do, Ps. cxv. 1, and our humble thanks for enabling us to do it, and accepting the work of his own hands in us. If it be the God of Israel that gives strength and power unto his people, they ought to say, "Blessed be God." If all be from him, let all be to him.

PSALM LXIX.

David penned this psalm when he was in affliction; and in it, I. He complains of the great distress and trouble he was in, and earnestly begs of God to relieve and succour him, ver. 1—21. II. He imprecates the judgments of God upon his persecutors, ver. 22—29. III. He concludes with the voice of joy and praise, in an assurance that God would help and succour him, and would do well for the church, ver. 30—36. Now in this David was a type of Christ, and divers passages in this psalm are applied to Christ in the New Testament, and are said to have their accomplishment in him, ver. 4, 9, 21, and ver. 22, refers to the enemies of Christ; so that, like the 22nd psalm, it begins with the humiliation, and ends with the exaltation of Christ; one branch of which was the destruction of the Jewish nation for persecuting him, which the imprecations here are predictions of. And in singing this psalm, we must have an eye to the sufferings of Christ, and the glory that followed; not forgetting the sufferings of Christians too, and the glory that shall follow them, for it may lead us to think of the ruin reserved for the persecutors, and the rest reserved for the persecuted.

To the chief Musician upon Shoshannim, A Psalm of David.

SAVE me, O God;
For the waters are come in unto my soul.
2 I sink in deep mire, where there is no standing:
I am come into deep waters, where the floods overflow
3 I am weary of my crying: my throat is dried: [me.
Mine eyes fail while I wait for my God.
4 They that hate me without a cause
Are more than the hairs of mine head:
They that would destroy me, being mine enemies wrongfully, are mighty:
Then I restored that which I took not away.
5 O God, thou knowest my foolishness;
And my sins are not hid from thee.
6 Let not them that wait on thee, O Lord GOD of hosts,
Be ashamed for my sake:
Let not those that seek thee be confounded for my sake,
O God of Israel.
7 Because for thy sake I have borne reproach;
Shame hath covered my face.
8 I am become a stranger unto my brethren,
And an alien unto my mother's children.
9 For the zeal of thine house hath eaten me up;
And the reproaches of them that reproached thee are fallen upon me.
10 When I wept, and chastened my soul with fasting,
That was to my reproach.
11 I made sackcloth also my garment;
And I became a proverb to them.
12 They that sit in the gate speak against me;
And I was the song of the drunkards.

In these verses David complains of his troubles, intermixing with those complaints some requests for relief.

First. His complaints are very sad; and he pours them out before the Lord as one that hoped thus to ease himself of a burthen that lay very heavy upon him.

1. He complains of the deep impressions that his troubles made upon his spirit, ver. 1, 2. The waters of affliction, those bitter waters, are come unto my soul; not only threaten my life, but disquiet my mind. They fill my head with perplexing cares, and my heart with oppressive grief, so that I cannot enjoy God and myself as I used to do. We shall do pretty well if we can but keep troubles from our hearts: but when they put us out of the possession of our own souls, our case is bad. "The spirit of a man will sustain his infirmity;" but what shall we do when the spirit is wounded? That was David's case here; his thoughts sought for something to confide in, and with which to support his hope; but he found nothing. He sunk in deep mire, where there was no standing, no firm footing; the considerations that used to support and encourage him now failed him, or were out of the way, and he was ready to give up himself for gone. He sought for something to comfort himself with, but found himself in deep waters that did overflow him, overwhelm him. He was like a sinking, drowning man, in such confusion and consternation. This points at Christ's sufferings in his soul, and the inward agony he was in when he said, "Now is my soul troubled;" and, "My soul is exceeding sorrowful;" for it was his soul that he made an offering for sin. And it instructs us, when we are in affliction, to commit the keeping of our souls to God, that they may be neither soured with discontent nor sunk into despair.

2. He complains of the long continuance of his troubles; ver. 3, "I am weary of my crying." Though he could not keep his head above water, yet he cried to his God; and the more death was in his view the more life was in his prayers: yet he had not presently an answer of peace given in, no, nor so much of that support and comfort in praying which God's people used to have; so that he was almost weary of crying, grew hoarse, and his throat so dried that he could cry no more. Nor had he his wonted satisfaction in believing, hoping, and expecting relief; "Mine eyes fail, while I wait for my God." He had almost looked his eyes out in expectation of deliverance; and yet his pleading this with God is an indication that he is resolved not to give off from believing and praying. His throat is dried, but his heart is not; his eyes fail, but his faith doth not. Thus our Lord Jesus on the cross cried out, "Why hast thou forsaken me?" and yet at the same time kept hold of his relation to him, "My God, my God."

3. He complains of the malice and multitude of his enemies, their injustice and cruelty, and the hardships they put upon him, ver. 4. They hated him, they would destroy him; for hatred aims at the destruction of the person hated. But what was his iniquity? what was his sin? what provocation had he given them, that they were so spiteful towards him? None at all; "They hate me without cause;" I never did them an ill turn, that they should bear me such an ill-will. Our Saviour applies this to himself, Jno. xv. 25, "They hated me without a cause." We are apt to use this in justification of our passion against those that hate us, that we never gave them cause to hate us. But it is rather an argument why we should bear it patiently, because then we suffer as Christ did, and may then expect that God will right us. "They are mine enemies wrongfully;" for I have been no enemy to them. In a world where unrighteousness reigns so much, we must not wonder if we meet with those that are our enemies wrongfully. Let us take care that we never do wrong, and then we may the better bear it if we receive wrong. These enemies were not to be despised, but were very formidable, both for their number, "They are more than the hairs of mine head," (Christ's enemies were numerous; they that came to seize him were a great multitude: how were they increased that troubled him?) and for their strength, They are mighty, in authority and power. We are weak, but our enemies are strong; for "we wrestle against principalities and powers." "Then I restored that which I took not away." Applying this to David, 1st. It was what his enemies compelled him to. They made him suffer for that offence which he had never been guilty of. 2nd. It was what he consented to, that if possible he might pacify them, and make them to be at peace with him. He might have insisted upon the laws of justice and honour, the former not requiring, and the latter commonly thought to forbid, the restoring of that which we took not away; for that is to wrong ourselves both in our wealth and in our reputation. Yet the case may be such sometimes as that it may become our duty. Blessed Paul, though free from all men, yet, for the honour of Christ and the edification of the church, made himself a servant to all. But, applying it to Christ, it is an observable description of the satisfaction which he made to God for our sin by his blood; "Then he restored that which he took not away;" that is, he underwent the punishment that was due to us, paid our debt, suffered for our offences. God's glory, in some instances of it, was taken away by the sin of men; man's honour, and peace, and happiness, were taken away. It was not He that took them away; and yet, by the merit of his death, he restored them.

4. He complains of the unkindness of his friends and relations; and this is a grievance which, with an ingenuous mind, cuts as deep as any other; ver. 8, "I am become a stranger to my brethren," they make themselves strange to me, and use me as a stranger; are shy of conversing with me, and ashamed to own me. This was fulfilled in Christ, whose brethren did not believe on him, Jno. vii. 5; who came to his own, and his own received him not, Jno. i. 11, and who was forsaken by his disciples, whom he had been free with as his brethren.

5. He complains of the contempt that was put upon him, and the reproach with which he was continually loaded. And in this, especially, his complaint points at Christ, who for our sakes submitted to the greatest disgrace, and made himself of no reputation; we having, by sin, injured God in his honour, Christ made him satisfaction, not only by divesting himself of the honours due to an incarnate Deity, but by submitting to the greatest dishonours that could be done to any man. Two things David here takes notice of as aggravations of the indignities done him: 1st. The ground and matter of the reproach, ver. 10, 11. They ridiculed him for that by which he both humbled himself and honoured God. When men lift up themselves in pride and vainglory, they are justly laughed at for it. But David chastened his soul, and clothed himself with sackcloth; and from his abasing himself they took occasion to trample upon him. When men dishonour God, it is just that it turn to their dishonour; but when David, purely in devotion to God, and to testify his respect to him, wept and chastened his soul with fasting, and made sackcloth his garment, as humble penitents used to do, instead of commending his devotion, and recommending it as a great example of piety, they did all they could both to discourage him in it and to prevent others from following his good example, for that was to his reproach. They laughed at him as a fool for mortifying himself thus, and even for this he became a proverb to them; they made him the common subject of their banter. We must not think it strange if we be ill-spoken of for that which is well done, and in which we have reason to hope that we are accepted of God. Our Lord Jesus was stoned for his good works, Jno. x. 32; and when he cried, "Eli, Eli, my God, my God!" was bantered as if he called for Elias. 2nd. The persons that reproached him, ver. 12. First. Even the gravest, and the most honourable, from whom better was expected; "They that sit in the gate speak against me," and their reproaches pass for the dictates of senators, and the decrees of judges, and are credited accordingly. Secondly. The meanest, and the most despicable; the abjects, Ps. xxxv. 15; the scum of the country, the children of fools, yea, the children of base men, Job xxx. 8. Such drunkards as they make themselves vile; and he was the song of the drunkards, they made themselves and their companions merry with him. See the ill consequence of the sin of drunkenness,—it makes men despisers of those that are good, 2 Tim. iii. 3. When the king was made sick with bottles of wine, he stretched out his hand with scorners, Hos. vii. 5. The bench of the drunkards is the seat of the scornful. See what is commonly the lot of the best of men; they that are the praise of the wise are the song of fools. But it is easy to those that rightly judge of things to despise being thus despised.

Secondly. His confessions of sin are very serious; ver. 5, "O God, thou knowest my foolishness," both what is, and what is not; "my sins" that I am guilty of "are not hid from thee," and therefore thou knowest how innocent hostile generals and armies. The idea is that the enemies of the Church should submit and bring their offerings.

lxviii. 31. For "princes shall come out of Egypt" the Syriac has "ambassadors shall come out of Egypt," but the true sense appears to be that men of exalted station and dignity, or nobles, should come.

lxix. 1. Dr. Morison says this psalm "is referred to at least seven times as a prophecy of Christ and the times of the Gospel; see John ii. 17; xv. 25; xix. 28, 29; Luke xxiii. 34—38; Acts i. 16, 20; Rom. xi. 9, 10; xv. 3." Notwithstanding the title, some have maintained that the composition belongs to the Babylonian captivity. Others think David wrote it during the usurpation of Absalom. The Greek and Latin titles are unmeaning, though David is made the author of the psalm. An anonymous Roman Catholic critic says that this psalm "plainly predicts the sufferings of Christ to the letter, also the overthrow of the Jews, and the building up of the Church."

I am of those crimes which they charge upon me. Note, Even then as to men's unjust accusations we plead 'Not guilty,' yet before God we must acknowledge ourselves to have deserved all that is brought upon us, and much worse. This is the genuine confession of a penitent, who knows that he cannot prosper in covering his sin, and that therefore it is his wisdom to acknowledge it, because it is naked and open before God. 1. He knows the corruption of our nature. Thou knowest the foolishness that is bound up in my heart. All our sins take rise from our foolishness. 2. He knows the transgressions of our lives. They are not hid from him, no, not our heart sins, no, not those that are committed most secretly. They are all done in his sight, and are never cast behind his back till they are repented of and pardoned. This is apt to be applied to Christ, for he knew no sin, yet he was made sin for us; and God knew it, nor was it hid from him, when "it pleased the Lord to bruise him, and put him to grief."

Thirdly. His supplications are very earnest. For himself; ver. 1, "Save me, O God," save me from sinking, from despairing. Thus Christ was heard in that he feared, for he was saved from letting fall his undertaking, Heb. v. 7. For his friends; ver. 6, "Let not them that wait on thee, O Lord God of hosts, and that seek thee, O God of Israel," (under these two characters we ought to seek God, and in seeking him to wait on him as the God of hosts who has all power to help, and as the God of Israel in covenant with his people, whom therefore he is engaged in honour and truth to help,) let not them be ashamed and confounded for my sake. This intimates his fear that, if God did not appear for him, it would be a discouragement to all other good people, and would give their enemies occasion to triumph over them; and his earnest desire that, whatever became of him, all that seek God, and wait upon him, might be kept in heart, and kept in countenance, and might neither be discouraged in themselves nor exposed to contempt from others. If Jesus Christ had not been owned and accepted of his Father in his sufferings, all that seek God and wait for him had been ashamed and confounded; but they have confidence towards God, and in his name come boldly to the throne of grace.

Fourthly. His plea is very powerful, ver. 7, 9. Reproach was one of the greatest of his burthens. Lord, roll away the reproach, and plead my cause; for, 1. It is for thee that I am reproached, for serving thee and trusting in thee; "For thy sake I have borne reproach." Those that are evil spoken of for well-doing may with an humble confidence leave it to God to bring forth their righteousness as the light. 2. It is with thee that I am reproached; "The zeal of thine house hath eaten me up;" that is, has made me forget myself, and do that which they wickedly turn to my reproach. They that hate thee and thy house for that reason hate me, because they know how zealously affected I am to it. that is it that has made them ready to eat me up, and has eaten up all the love and respect I had among them. They that blasphemed God, and spoke ill of his word and ways, did therefore reproach David for believing in his word and walking in his ways. Or it may be construed as an instance of David's zeal for God's house, that he resented all the indignities done to God's name, as if they had been done to his name. He laid to heart all the dishonour done to God, and the contempt cast upon religion. These he laid nearer to his heart than any outward troubles of his own; and therefore he had reason to hope God would interest himself in the reproaches cast upon him, because he had always interested himself in the reproaches cast upon God. Both the parts of this verse are applied to Christ; 1st. It was an instance of his love to his Father, that the zeal of his house did even eat him up, when he whipped the buyers and sellers out of the temple, which minded his disciples of this text, Jno. ii. 17. 2nd. It was an instance of his self-denial, and that he pleased not himself that the reproaches of them that reproached God fell upon him, Rom. xv. 3; and therein he set us an example.

13 But as for me, my prayer is unto thee, O LORD, in an acceptable time:
O God, in the multitude of thy mercy hear me, in the truth of thy salvation.
14 Deliver me out of the mire, and let me not sink:
Let me be delivered from them that hate me, and out of 15 Let not the waterflood overflow me, [the deep waters.
Neither let the deep swallow me up,
And let not the pit shut her mouth upon me.
16 Hear me, O LORD; for thy lovingkindness is good:
Turn unto me according to the multitude of thy tender
17 And hide not thy face from thy servant; [mercies.
For I am in trouble: hear me speedily.
18 Draw nigh unto my soul, and redeem it:
Deliver me because of mine enemies. [dishonour:
19 Thou hast known my reproach, and my shame, and my Mine adversaries are all before thee.
20 Reproach hath broken my heart;
And I am full of heaviness:
And I looked for some to take pity, but there was none;
And for comforters, but I found none.
21 They gave me also gall for my meat;
And in my thirst they gave me vinegar to drink.

David had been speaking before of the spiteful reproaches which his enemies cast upon him; "But as for me, my prayer is unto thee." They spoke ill of him for his fasting and praying, and for that he was made the song of the drunkards; but, notwithstanding that, he resolves to continue praying. Note, Though we may be jeered for well-doing, we must never be jeered out of it. Those can bear but little for God, and their confessing of his name before men, that cannot bear a scoff and a hard word rather than quit their duty. David's enemies were very abusive to him; but this was his comfort, that he had a God to go to, with whom he would lodge his cause. They think to carry their cause by insolence and calumny, but I use other methods; whatever they do, "as for me, my prayer is unto thee, O Lord," and it is "in an acceptable time." Not the less acceptable for being a time of affliction,—God will not drive us from him, though it is need that drives us to him; nay, it is the more acceptable, because the misery and distress of God's people makes them so much the more the objects of his pity. It is seasonable for him to help them when all other helps fail; and they are undone, and see themselves so, if he do not help them. We find this expression used concerning Christ, Isa. xlix. 8, "In an acceptable time have I heard thee." Now observe,

First. What his requests are. 1. That he might have a gracious audience given to his complaints, the cry of his affliction, and the desire of his heart. "Hear me," ver. 13; and again, "Hear me, O Lord," ver. 16; "hear me speedily," ver. 17; not only hear what I say, but grant what I ask. Christ knew that the Father heard him always, Jno. xi. 42. 2. That he might be rescued out of his troubles, might be saved from sinking under the load of grief; "Deliver me out of the mire;" let me not stick in it, so some; but help me out, and set my feet on a rock, Ps. xl. 2;—might be saved from his enemies, that they might not swallow him up, nor have their will against him; "Let me be delivered from them that hate me," as a lamb from the paw of the lion, ver. 14. Though I am come into deep waters, ver. 2, where I am ready to conclude that the floods will overflow me, yet let my fears be prevented, and silenced; "let not the waterflood," though it flow upon me, "overflow me," ver. 15. Let me not fall into the gulf of despair, let not that deep swallow me up, let not that pit shut her mouth upon me, for then I am undone. He gave himself up for lost in the beginning of the psalm, yet now he has his head above water, and is not so weary of crying as he thought himself. 3. That God would turn to him, ver. 16; that he would smile upon him, and not hide his face from him, ver 17. The tokens of God's favour to us, and the light of his countenance shining upon us, is enough to keep our spirits from sinking in the deepest mire of outward troubles, nor need we desire any more to make us safe and easy; ver. 18, "Draw nigh to my soul," to manifest thyself to it, and that shall redeem it.

Secondly. What his pleas are to enforce these petitions.

1. He pleads God's mercy and truth; ver. 13, "In the multitude of thy mercy hear me." There is mercy in God, a multitude of mercies, all kinds of mercy, inexhaustible mercy, mercy enough for all, enough for each; and hence we must take our encouragement in praying. And the truth of his salvation; that is, the truth of all those promises of salvation which he has made to those that trust in him, is a farther encouragement. He repeats his argument taken from the mercy of God; ver. 16, "Hear me, for thy lovingkindness is good;" it is so in itself, it is rich, and plentiful, and abundant; it is so in the account of all the saints; it is very precious to them, it is their life, their joy, their all. O let me have the benefit of it! "Turn to me according to the multitude of thy tender mercies," ver. 16. See how highly he speaks of the goodness of God; in him there are mercies, tender mercies, and a multitude of them. If we think well of God, and continue to do so under the greatest hardships, we need not fear but God will do well for us; for he taketh pleasure in those that hope in his mercy, Ps. cxlvii. 11.

2. He pleads his own distress and affliction. "Hide not thy face from me, for I am in trouble," ver. 17, and therefore need thy favour; therefore it will come seasonably, and therefore I shall know how to value it. He pleads particularly the reproach he was under, and the indignities that were done him; ver. 19, "Thou hast known my reproach, my shame, and my dishonour." See what a stress is laid upon this; for, in the sufferings of Christ for us, perhaps nothing contributed more to the satisfaction he made for sin, which had been so injurious to God in his honour, than the reproach, and shame, and dishonour he underwent, which God took notice of, and accepted of as more than an equivalent for the everlasting shame and contempt which our sins had deserved, who therefore must by repentance take shame to ourselves, and bear the reproach of our youth. And if at any time we be called out to suffer reproach, and shame, and dishonour for his sake, this may be our comfort that he knows it; and, as he is beforehand with us, so he will not be behindhand with us. The psalmist speaks the language of an ingenuous nature, when he saith, ver. 20, "Reproach hath broken my heart; I am full of heaviness;" for it bears hard upon one that knows the worth of a good name to be put under an ill character: but when we consider what an honour it is to be dishonoured for God, and a favour if we be counted worthy to suffer shame for his name, (as they deemed it, Acts v. 41,) we shall see there is no reason at all why it should sit so heavy, or be any heart-breaking to us.

3. He pleads the insolence and cruelty of his enemies; ver. 18, "Deliver me because of mine enemies," because they were such as he had before described them, ver. 4. "Mine adversaries are all before thee," ver. 19; that is, thou knowest what sort of men they are, what danger I am in from them, what enemies they are to thee, and how much thou art reflected upon in what they do and design against me. One instance of their barbarity is given; ver. 21, "They gave me gall for my meat," (the word signifies a bitter herb, and is often joined with wormwood,) "and in my thirst they gave me vinegar to drink." This was literally fulfilled in Christ, and did so directly point to him, that he would not say, "It is finished," till this was fulfilled; and on purpose that his enemies might have occasion to fulfil it he said, "I thirst," Jno. xix. 28, 29. And some think the hyssop which they put to his mouth with the vinegar was the bitter herb which they gave him with the vinegar for his meat. See how particularly the sufferings of Christ were foretold, which proves the Scripture to be the word of God; and how exactly the predictions were fulfilled in Jesus Christ, which proves him to be the true Messiah. This is he that should come, and we are to look for no other.

4. He pleads the unkindness of his friends, and his disappointment in them; ver. 20, "I looked for some to take pity, but there was none." They all failed him like the brooks in summer. This was fulfilled in Christ, for in his sufferings "all his disciples forsook him and fled." We cannot expect too little from men,—miserable comforters are they all,—nor can we expect too much from God, for he is "the Father of mercy, and the God of all comfort and consolation."

22 Let their table become a snare before them:
And that which should have been for their welfare, let it become a trap.
23 Let their eyes be darkened, that they see not;
And make their loins continually to shake.
24 Pour out thine indignation upon them,
And let thy wrathful anger take hold of them.
25 Let their habitation be desolate;
And let none dwell in their tents.
26 For they persecute him whom thou hast smitten;
And they talk to the grief of those whom thou hast
27 Add iniquity unto their iniquity: [wounded.
And let them not come into thy righteousness.

---

lxix. 3. "I am weary of my crying" should rather be "I am weary through my crying," or "I am wearied by my calling."

lxix. 4. "What I plundered not, I then restored;" that is, "I surrendered what others falsely accused me of having stolen."

lxix. 5. "Foolishness" is rather "simplicity," or "inexperience." The same word is represented in Isa. xxxv. 8, where it is said that the wayfarer and the simple, inexperienced, or uninstructed should not go astray. The word conveys no idea of blame or moral insincerity; at least, not necessarily so. In this case the object of the writer may be to assert both his prudence and his innocence, and to say in effect, "God knows whether I am so foolish and full of wickedness as my enemies say I am."

lxix. 9. "The zeal of thine house," that is, zeal or jealousy on behalf of thine house, has consumed me.

lxix. 10. The first clause may be rendered, "And when I wept, and my soul" (i.e., I) "was fasting."

28 Let them be blotted out of the book of the living,
And not be written with the righteous.
29 But I am poor and sorrowful:
Let thy salvation, O God, set me up on high.

These imprecations are not David's prayers against his enemies, but prophecies of the destruction of Christ's persecutors, especially the Jewish nation, which our Lord himself foretold with tears, and which was accomplished about forty years after the death of Christ. The first two verses of this paragraph are expressly applied to the judgments of God upon the unbelieving Jews by the apostle, Rom. xi. 9, 10, and therefore the whole must look that way. The rejection of the Jews for rejecting Christ, as it was a signal instance of God's justice, and an earnest of the vengeance which God will at last take on all that are obstinate in their infidelity, so it was, and continues to be, a convincing proof of the truth of the Christian religion. One great objection against it first was, that it set aside the ceremonial law; but its doing so was effectually justified, and that objection removed, when God set it aside with a witness, by the utter destruction of the temple, and the sinking of those with the Mosaic economy that obstinately adhered to it in opposition to the Gospel of Christ. Let us observe here,

First. What the judgments are which should come upon the crucifiers of Christ. Not upon all of them, for there were those who had a hand in his death, and yet repented and found mercy, Acts ii. 23; iii. 14, 15; but upon those of them, and their successors, who justified it by an obstinate infidelity, and rejection of his Gospel, and by an inveterate enmity to his disciples and followers: see 1 Thes. ii. 15, 16. It is here foretold,

1. That their sacrifices and offerings should be mischief and prejudice to them; ver. 22, "Let their table become a snare." The altar of the Lord, which is called his table and theirs, because in feasting upon the sacrifices they were partakers of the altar. This should have been for their welfare or peace, for they were peace offerings, but it became a snare and a trap to them; for by their affection and adherence to the altar they were held fast in their infidelity, and hardened in their prejudices against Christ, that altar which they had no right to eat of, who continued to serve the tabernacle, Heb. xiii. 10. Or, it may be understood of their common creature comforts, even their necessary food. They had given Christ gall and vinegar, and therefore justly shall their meat and drink be made gall and vinegar to them. When the supports of life, and delights of sense, through the corruption of our nature become an occasion of sin to us, and are made the food and fuel of our sensuality, then our table is a snare, which is a good reason why we should never feed ourselves without fear, Jude 12.

2. That they should never have the comfort either of that knowledge or of that peace which believers are blessed with in the Gospel of Christ, ver. 23. That they should be given up. 1st. To a judicial blindness. "Let their eyes be darkened that they see not" the glory of God in the face of Christ. Their sin was that they would not see, but shut their eyes against the light, loving darkness rather; their punishment was, that they should not see, but be given up to their own hearts' lusts which were hardening, and the God of this world should be permitted to blind their minds, 2 Cor. iv. 4. This was foretold concerning them, Isa. vi. 10, and Christ ratified it, Mat. xiii. 14, 15; Jno. xii. 40. 2nd. To a judicial terror. There is a gracious terror which opens the way to comfort, such as that of Paul, Acts ix. 6; he trembled and was astonished. But this is a terror that shall never end in peace, "make their loins continually to shake" through horror of conscience, as Belshazzar, when the joints of his loins were loosed. Let them be driven to despair, and filled with constant confusion. This was fulfilled in the desperate counsels of the Jews when the Romans came upon them.

3. That they should fall and lie under God's anger and fiery indignation; ver. 24, "Pour out thine indignation upon them." Note, Those who reject God's great salvation proffered to them may justly fear his indignation to be poured out upon them; for they that submit not to the Son of his love will certainly be made the generation of his wrath. It is the doom passed on those who believe not in Christ, that the wrath of God abideth on them, Jno. iii. 36; it takes hold of them, and will never let them go. Salvation itself will not save those that are not willing to be ruled by it. "Behold the goodness and severity of God!"

4. That their place and nation should be utterly taken away, the very thing they were afraid of, and to prevent which, as they pretended, they persecuted Christ, Jno. xi. 48; ver. 25, "Let their habitation be desolate," which was fulfilled when their country was laid waste by the Romans, and "Zion for their sakes was ploughed as a field," Mic. iii. 12. The temple was the house which they were in a particular manner proud of, but this was left unto them desolate, Mat. xxiii. 38. Yet that is not all: it ought to be some satisfaction to us, if we be cut off from the enjoyment of our possessions, that others will have the benefit of them when we are dislodged; but it is here added, "Let none dwell in their tents," which was remarkably fulfilled in Judah and Jerusalem; for, after the destruction of the Jews, it was long ere the country was inhabited to any purpose. But this is applied particularly to Judas by St. Peter, Acts i. 20; for he being felo de se,—'a suicide,' we may suppose his estate was confiscated, so that his habitation was desolate, and no man of his own kindred dwelt therein.

5. That their way to ruin should be down hill, and nothing should stop them, nor interpose to prevent it, ver. 27. Lord, leave them to themselves to add iniquity to iniquity; and those that are bad, if they be given up to their own heart's lusts, will certainly be worse. They will add sin to sin; nay, they will add rebellion to their sin, Job xxxiv. 37. It is said of the Jews that they filled up their sin always, 1 Thes. ii. 16; 'add the punishment of iniquity to their iniquity,' so some read it, for the same word signifies both sin and punishment, so close is their connection. If men will sin, God will reckon for it; but those that have multiplied to sin may yet find mercy, for God multiplies to pardon, through the righteousness of the Mediator; and therefore, that they might be precluded from all hopes of mercy, he adds, "Let them not come into thy righteousness," to receive the benefit of the righteousness of God, which is by faith in a Mediator, Phil. iii. 9. Not that God shuts out any from that righteousness, for the Gospel excludes none that do not by their unbelief exclude themselves; but let them be left to take their own course, and they will never come into this government; for, being ignorant of the demands of God's righteousness, and going about to establish the merit of their own, they "have not submitted themselves to the righteousness of God," Rom. x. 3; and those that are so proud and self-willed that they will not come into God's righteousness, so shall their doom be, themselves have decided it, they shall not come into his righteousness. Let not them expect any benefit by it that are not willing and glad to be beholden to it.

6. That they should be cut off from all hopes of happiness; ver. 28, "Let them be blotted out of the book of the living," that is, let them not be suffered to live any longer, who the longer they live the more mischief they do. Multitudes of the unbelieving Jews fell by sword and famine, and none of those who had embraced the Christian faith perished among them. The nation as a nation was blotted out, and became not a people. Many understand it of their rejection from God's covenant, and all the privileges of it; that is, the book of the living. Let the commonwealth of Israel itself, Israel according to the flesh, now become alienated from that covenant of promise, which hitherto it has had the monopoly of. Let it appear that they were never written in the Lamb's book of life; but "reprobate silver, let men call them, because the Lord has rejected them." Let them "not be written with the righteous;" that is, let them not have a place in the congregation of the saints, when they shall all be gathered in the general assembly of those whose names are written in heaven, Ps. i. 5.

Secondly. What the sin is for which these dreadful judgments should be brought upon them; ver. 26, "They persecute him whom thou hast smitten, and talk to the grief of thy wounded." 1. Christ was he whom God had smitten, for it pleased the Lord to bruise him, and he was esteemed stricken, smitten of God and afflicted; and therefore men hid their faces from him. Isa. liii. 4, 5. They persecuted him with a rage reaching up to heaven; they cried, "Crucify him, crucify him." Compare that of St. Peter with this, Acts ii. 23; though he was delivered by the counsel and foreknowledge of God, it was with wicked hands that they crucified and slew him. They talked to the grief of the Lord Jesus when he was upon the cross, saying, "He trusted in God, let him deliver him," than which nothing could be said more grieving. 2. The suffering saints were God's wounded, wounded in his cause, and for his sake, and them they persecuted, and talked to their grief; and for these things wrath came upon them to the uttermost, 1 Thes. ii. 16; and see Mat. xxiii. 34, &c. This may be understood more generally, and it teacheth us, that nothing is more provoking to God than to insult over those whom he hath smitten, and to add affliction to the afflicted; upon which it justly follows here, "Add iniquity to iniquity:" see Zec. i. 15. Those that are of a wounded spirit, under trouble and fear about their spiritual state, ought to be very tenderly dealt with, and care must be taken not to talk to their grief, and not to make the heart of the righteous sad.

Thirdly. What the psalmist thinks of himself in the midst of all; ver. 29, "But I am poor and sorrowful;" that is the worst of my case: under outward afflictions, yet written among the righteous, and not under God's indignation as they are. It is better to be poor and sorrowful with the blessing of God, than rich and jovial, and under his curse; for they who come into God's righteousness shall soon see an end of their poverty and sorrow, and his salvation shall set them up on high, which is the thing that David here prays for, Isa. lxi. 10. This may be applied to Christ. He was in his humiliation poor and sorrowful, a man of sorrows, and that had not where to lay his head; but God highly exalted him: the salvation wrought for him, the salvation wrought by him, set him up on high, far above all principalities and powers.

30 I will praise the name of God with a song,
And will magnify him with thanksgiving.
31 This also shall please the LORD better than an ox
Or bullock that hath horns and hoofs.
32 The humble shall see this, and be glad:
And your heart shall live that seek God.
33 For the LORD heareth the poor,
And despiseth not his prisoners.
34 Let the heaven and earth praise him,
The seas, and every thing that moveth therein.
35 For God will save Zion, and will build the cities of Judah:
That they may dwell there, and have it in possession.
36 The seed also of his servants shall inherit it:
And they that love his name shall dwell therein

The psalmist here, both as a type of Christ, and as an example to Christians, concludes a psalm with holy joy and praise, which he began with complaints and remonstrances of his griefs.

First. He resolves to praise God himself, not doubting but that therein he should be accepted of him; ver. 30, 31, "I will praise the name of God," not only with my heart, but "with my song, and magnify him with thanksgiving," for he is pleased to reckon himself magnified by the thankful praises of his people. It is intimated that all Christians ought to glorify God with their praises, "in psalms and hymns and spiritual songs;" and, "this shall please the Lord," through Christ, the Mediator of our praises as well as of our prayers, "better than" the most valuable of the legal sacrifices; ver. 31, "an ox or bullock." This is a plain intimation that in the days of the Messiah an end should be put not only to the sacrifices of atonement, but to those of praise and acknowledgment, which were instituted by the ceremonial law; and instead of them spiritual sacrifices of praise and thanksgiving are accepted; the calves of our lips, not the calves of the stall, Heb. xiii. 15. It is a great comfort to us that humble thankful praises are more pleasing to God than the most costly pompous sacrifices are or ever were.

Secondly. He encourageth other good people to rejoice in God, and continue seeking him; ver. 32, 33, "The humble shall see this and be glad." They shall observe to their comfort, 1. The experiences of the saints. They shall see how ready God is to hear the poor, when they cry to him, and to give them that which they call upon him for; how far he is from despising his prisoners, though men despise them, but he favours them with his gracious visits, and will find a time to enlarge them. "The humble shall see this and be glad," not only because when "one member is honoured all the members rejoice with it,' but because it is an encouragement to them in their straits and difficulties to trust in God. It shall revive the hearts of those who seek God to see more seals and subscriptions to this truth, that Jacob's God never said to Jacob's seed, Seek ye me in vain. 2. The exaltation of the Saviour, for of him the psalmist had been speaking, and of himself as a type of him. When his sorrows are over, and he enters into the joy that was set before him,—when he is heard, and discharged from his imprisonment in the grave,—the humble shall look upon it and be glad, and they that seek God through Christ shall live and be comforted; concluding that, if they suffer with him, they shall also reign with him.

Thirdly. He calls upon all the creatures to praise God. The heaven and earth, and sea, and the inhabitants of each, ver. 34. Heaven and earth, and the hosts of both, were made by him; and therefore "let the heaven and earth praise him." Angels in heaven and saints on earth; they may each of them in their respective habitations furnish themselves with matter enough for constant praise. Let the fishes of the sea, though mute to a proverb, praise the Lord, for "the sea is his, and he made it." The praises of the world must be offered for God's favours to his church, ver. 35, 36. For God will save lxix. 12. "They that sit in the gate" are usually persons invested with magisterial powers; but here we rather understand idlers and gossips, who loiter about the gate of the city.

lxix. 21. "Gall:" the Hebrew word thus rendered often means venom or poison, but the Greek here translates it "gall."

lxix. 22. A more literal rendering would be, "Let their table before them be for a snare, and be to secure ones for a trap;" i.e., "Let their feasts in their fancied security turn to their ruin."

lxix. 26. "They talk to the grief:" rather, "they talk of the grief" (or suffering) "of those whom thou hast wounded." The Greek has, "they add to the pain of my wounds;" and the Syriac, "they add to the sorrow of him that is slain," or smitten.

lxix. 27. The sense may be, "Let them add fault, or sin, to sin, and remain without pardon and acceptance." However consonant such language may be with the spirit of the Old Testament dispensation, it is very hard to reconcile it with the opinion that Christ uttered it

Zion, the holy mountain, where his service was kept up. He will save all that are sanctified, and set apart to him all that employ themselves in his worship, and all those over whom Christ reigns, for he was King upon the holy hill of Zion. He has mercy in store for the cities of Judah, of which tribe Christ was. God will do great things for the gospel church, in which let all that wish well to it rejoice. For, 1. It shall be peopled and inhabited. There shall be added to it such as shall be saved. The cities of Judah shall be built, particular churches shall be formed, and incorporated according to the Gospel model, that there may be a remnant to dwell there, and to have it in possession; to enjoy the privileges conferred upon it, and to pay the tributes and services required from it. They that love his name, that have a kindness for religion in general, shall embrace the Christian religion, and take their place in the Christian church; they shall dwell therein as citizens, and of the household of God. 2. It shall be perpetuated and inherited. Christianity was not to be res unius ætatis,—a transitory thing;' no, "The seed of his servants shall inherit it." God will secure and raise up for himself a seed to serve him; and they shall inherit the privileges of their fathers; for the promise is to you and your children, as it was of old, "I will be a God to thee, and thy seed after thee." The land of promise shall never be lost for want of heirs, for God can out of stones raise up children unto Abraham, and will do it rather than the entail shall be cut off. David shall never want a man to stand before him. The Redeemer shall see his seed, and prolong his days in them, till the mystery of God shall be finished, and the mystical body completed; and since the holy seed is the substance of the world, and if that were all gathered in it would be at an end quickly, it is just that for this assurance of the preservation of it heaven and earth should praise him.

PSALM LXX.

This psalm is adapted to a state of affliction. It is copied almost word for word from another psalm, and some think, for that reason, is entitled a psalm to bring to remembrance; for it may be of use sometimes to pray over the prayers we have formerly made to God upon the like occasions, which may be done with new affections. David here prays that God would send, I. Help to himself, ver. 1—5. II. Shame to his enemies, ver. 2, 3. III. Joy to his friends, ver. 4. These five verses were the five last verses of Ps. xl. He seems to have intended this short prayer to be both for himself and us, a salve for every sore, and therefore to be always in mind, and in singing we may apply it to our particular troubles, whatever they are.

To the chief Musician, A Psalm of David, to bring to remembrance.

MAKE haste, O God, to deliver me;
Make haste to help me, O LORD.
2 Let them be ashamed and confounded
That seek after my soul:
Let them be turned backward, and put to confusion,
That desire my hurt.
3 Let them be turned back for a reward of their shame
That say, Aha, aha.
4 Let all those that seek thee
Rejoice and be glad in thee:
And let such as love thy salvation
Say continually, Let God be magnified
5 But I am poor and needy:
Make haste unto me, O God:
Thou art my help and my deliverer;
O LORD, make no tarrying.

The title tells us that this psalm was designed "to bring to remembrance:" to put God in remembrance of his mercy and promise; for so we are said to do when we pray to him, and plead with him, Isa. xliii. 26, "Put me in remembrance." Not that the Eternal Mind needs a remembrancer, but this honour he is pleased to put upon the prayer of faith. It was rather to put himself and others in remembrance of former afflictions, that we may never be secure, but always in expectation of troubles; and of former devotions, that when the clouds return after the rain we may have recourse to the same means which we have formerly found effectual for fetching in comfort and relief. We may in prayer use the same words we have often used before. Our Saviour in his agony prayed thrice, saying the same words; so David here useth the same words he had used before, yet not without some alterations, to shew that he did not design to tie himself or others to them as a form. God looks at the heart, not at the words.

First. David here prays that God would make haste to relieve and succour him; ver. 1, 5, "I am poor and needy," in want and distress, and much at a loss within myself. Poverty and necessity is a very good plea in prayer to a God of infinite mercy, who despiseth not the sighing of a contrite heart, and hath pronounced a blessing upon the poor in spirit; who "filleth the hungry with good things." He prays, 1. That God would appear for him to deliver him out of his troubles in due time. 2. That in the meantime he would come in to him to help him under his troubles, that he might not sink and faint. 3. That he would do this quickly; "Make haste," ver. 1; and again, ver. 5, "Make haste, make no tarrying." Sometimes God seems to delay helping his own people, that he may excite such earnest desires as these. "He that believeth doth not make haste," so as to anticipate or outrun the Divine counsels, so as to force a way of escape, or take any unlawful methods of relief; but he may make haste by going forth to meet God in humble prayer, that he would hasten the desired succour. "Make haste unto me," for the longing desire of my soul is towards thee; I shall perish if I be not speedily helped; I have no other to expect relief from: "Thou art my help and my deliverer." Thou hast engaged to be so to all that seek thee, I depend upon thee to be so to me; I have often found thee so, and thou art sufficient, all-sufficient to be so. Therefore make haste to me.

Secondly. He prays that God would fill the faces of his enemies with shame, ver. 2, 3. Observe, 1. How he describes them. They sought after his soul, his life, to destroy that; his mind, to disturb that, to draw him from God to sin and to despair. They desired his hurt, his ruin. When any calamity befell him, or threatened him, they said, "Aha, aha:" so would we have it, we shall gain our point now, and see him ruined. Thus spiteful, thus insolent were they. 2. What his prayer is against them: "Let them be ashamed," that is, let them be brought to repentance; so filled with shame as that they may seek thy name, Ps. lxxxiii. 16. Let them see their fault and folly, in fighting against those whom thou dost protect, and be ashamed of their envy, Isa. xxvi. 11. However, let their designs against me be frustrated, and their measures broken; let them be turned back from their malicious pursuits, and then they will be ashamed and confounded, and, like the enemies of the Jews, much cast down in their own eyes, Neh. vi. 16.

Thirdly. He prays that God would fill the hearts of his friends with joy, ver. 4; that all those that seek God, and love his salvation,—that desire it, delight in it, and depend upon it,—may have continual matter for joy and praise, and hearts for both; and then he doubts not but himself to put in for a share of the blessing he prays for; and so may we, if we answer the character. 1. Let us make the service of God our great business, and the favour of God our great delight and pleasure, for that is seeking him, and loving his salvation. Let the pursuit of a happiness in God be our great care, and the enjoyment of it our great satisfaction. A heart to love the salvation of the Lord, and to prefer it before any secular advantages whatsoever, so as cheerfully to quit all rather than hazard our salvation, is a good evidence of our interest in it, and title to it. 2. Let us, then, be assured that, if it be not our own fault, the joy of the Lord shall fill our minds, and the high praises of the Lord shall fill our mouths. Those that seek God, if they seek him early and seek him diligently, shall rejoice and be glad in him; for their seeking him is an evidence of his good-will to them, and an earnest of their finding him, Ps. cv. 3. There is pleasure and joy even in seeking God, for it is one of the fundamental principles of religion that God is the rewarder of all those that diligently seek him. Those that love God's salvation shall say with pleasure, with constant pleasure, (for praising God, if we make it our continual work, it will be our continual feast,) "Let God be magnified," as he will be to eternity in the salvation of his people. All that wish well to the comfort of the saints, and to the glory of God, cannot but say a hearty Amen to this prayer, that those who "love God's salvation may say continually, Let God be magnified."

PSALM LXXI.

David penned this psalm in his old age, as appears by several passages in it, which makes many think that it was penned at the time of Absalom's rebellion, for that was the great trouble of his latter days. It might be occasioned by Sheba's insurrection, or some trouble that happened to him in that part of his life, of which it was foretold, that the sword should not depart from his house. But he is not over particular in representing his case, because he intended it for the general use of God's people in their affliction, especially those they meet with in their declining years; for this psalm, above any other, is fitted for the use of the old disciples of Jesus Christ. I. He begins the psalm with believing prayers, with prayers that God would deliver him and save him, ver. 2, 4; and not cast him off, ver. 9; or be far from him, ver. 12; and that his enemies might be put to shame, ver. 13. He pleads his confidence in God, ver. 1, 3, 5, 7; the experience he had had of help from God, ver. 6; and the malice of his enemies against him, ver. 10, 11. II. He concludes the psalm with believing praises, ver. 14, &c.; never was his hope more established, ver. 16, 18, 20, 21; never were his joys and thanksgivings more enlarged, ver. 15, 19, 22—24. He is in an extacy of joyful praise, and in the singing of it we should have our faith in God encouraged, and our hearts raised in blessing his holy name.

IN thee, O LORD, do I put my trust:
Let me never be put to confusion.
2 Deliver me in thy righteousness, and cause me to escape:
Incline thine ear unto me, and save me.
3 Be thou my strong habitation, whereunto I may continually resort:
Thou hast given commandment to save me;
For thou art my rock and my fortress
4 Deliver me, O my God, out of the hand of the wicked,
Out of the hand of the unrighteous and cruel man.
5 For thou art my hope, O Lord GOD:
Thou art my trust from my youth.
6 By thee have I been holden up from the womb:
Thou art he that took me out of my mother's bowels:
My praise shall be continually of thee.
7 I am as a wonder unto many;
But thou art my strong refuge.
8 Let my mouth be filled with thy praise
And with thy honour all the day
9 Cast me not off in the time of old age;
Forsake me not when my strength faileth.
10 For mine enemies speak against me;
And they that lay wait for my soul take counsel together,
11 Saying, God hath forsaken him:
Persecute and take him; for there is none to deliver him.
12 O God, be not far from me:
O my God, make haste for my help.
13 Let them be confounded and consumed
That are adversaries to my soul:
Let them be covered with reproach and dishonour
That seek my hurt.

Two things in general David here prays for—that he might not be confounded, and that his enemies and persecutors might be confounded.

First. He prays that he might never be made ashamed of his dependence upon God, nor disappointed in his believing expectations from him. And with this petition every true believer may come boldly to the throne of grace; for God will never dash the hope that is of his own raising. Now observe here, in the person of David. The prayer of Christ on the cross was for the pardon of his enemies. It is not enough to say that these imprecations are simply prophecies of what should befall the Jews after their rejection of the Saviour.

lxix. 32. Several versions of this verse are extant. The Greek is, "Let the poor see and rejoice: seek God and ye shall live;" the Latin, "Let the poor see and rejoice: seek God and your soul shall live;" the Prayer-Book version, "The humble shall consider this, and be glad: seek ye after God, and your soul shall live;" the old version of the Bible, "The humble shall see this, and they that seek God shall be glad, and your heart shall live;" the ancient Syriac, "Behold, ye poor, and rejoice, and your heart shall live." It may be rendered, "The miserable shall see, and they shall rejoice who seek after God; and your heart shall revive."

lxix. 33—36. Unless this psalm was written during the captivity, these verses were added to its original form, as some critics assert.

PSALM LXXI.

1. How David professeth his confidence in God; and with what pleasure and grateful variety of expression he repeats his profession of that confidence, still presenting the profession of it to God, and pleading it with him. We praise God, and so please him by telling him, if it be indeed true, what an entire confidence we have in him; ver. 1, "In thee, O Lord," and in thee only, "do I put my trust." Whatever others do, I choose the God of Jacob for my help. They that are entirely satisfied in God's all-sufficiency, and the truth of his promise, and in dependence upon that as sufficient to make them amends,—are freely willing to do and suffer, to lose and venture for him,—may truly say, "In thee, O Lord, do I put my trust." Those that will deal with God, must deal upon trust; if we are shy of dealing with him, it is a sign we do not trust him. "Thou art my rock and my fortress," ver. 3; and again, "Thou art my refuge, my strong refuge," ver. 7; that is, I fly to thee, and am sure to be safe in thee, and under thy protection. If thou secure me, none can hurt me; "Thou art my hope and my trust," ver. 5; that is, thou hast proposed thyself to me in thy Word as the proper object of my hope and trust; I have hoped in thee, and never found it in vain to do so.

2. How his confidence in God is supported and encouraged by his experiences; ver. 5, 6, "Thou hast been my trust from my youth;" that is, ever since I was capable of discerning between my right hand and my left I stayed myself upon thee; and saw a great deal of reason to do so, for "by thee have I been holden up from the womb." Ever since he had the use of his reason he had been a dependent upon God's goodness, because ever since he had a being he had been a monument of it. Note, The consideration of the gracious care which the Divine providence took of us in our birth and infancy should engage us to an early piety, and constant devotedness to his honour. He that was our help from our birth ought to be our hope from our youth. If we received so much mercy from God before we were capable of doing him any service, we should lose no time when we are capable. This comes in here as a support to the psalmist in his present distress; not only that God had given him his life and being, bringing him out of his mother's bowels into the world, and providing that he should not die from the womb, nor give up the ghost when he came out of the belly, but that he had betimes made him one of his family; "Thou art he that took me out of my mother's bowels" into the arms of thy grace, under the shadow of thy wings, into the bond of thy covenant; thou tookest me into thy church, as a son of thine handmaid, and born in thine house, Ps. cxvi. 16. And, therefore, 1st. I have reason to hope that thou wilt protect me; thou that hast held me up hitherto wilt not let me fall now. Thou that madest me wilt not forsake the work of thine own hands; that helpedst me when I could not help myself wilt not abandon me now I am upon the matter as helpless as I was then. 2nd. Therefore I have reason to resolve, that I will devote myself unto thee; "My praise shall therefore be continually of thee," that is, I will make it my business every day to praise thee, and will take all occasions to do it.

3. What his requests to God are in this confidence.

1st. That he might never be put to confusion, ver. 1; that is, that he might not be disappointed of the mercy he expected, and so made ashamed of his expectation. Thus we may all pray in faith, that our confidence in God may not be our confusion. Hope of the glory of God is hope that maketh not ashamed.

2nd. That he might be delivered out of the hand of his enemies; ver. 2, "Deliver me in thy righteousness," that is, as thou art the righteous judge of the world, pleading the cause of the injured, and punishing the injurious; cause me some way or other to escape. God uses with the temptation to make a way to escape, 1 Cor. x. 13; "Incline thine ear unto my prayers," and in answer to them save me out of my troubles, ver. 4. "Deliver me, O my God, out of the hands" of those that are ready to pull me in pieces. Three things he pleads for deliverance: First. The encouragement God had given him to expect it. "Thou hast given commandment to save me," ver. 3; that is, thou hast promised to do it, and such efficacy is there in God's promises, that they are often spoken of as commands; like that, "Let there be light, and there was light." He speaks, and it is done. Secondly. The character of his enemies. They are wicked, unrighteous, cruel men, and it will be for the honour of God to appear against them, ver. 4; for he is a holy, just, and good God. Thirdly. The many eyes that were upon him; ver. 7, "I am as a wonder unto many." Every one waits to see what will be the issue of such extraordinary troubles as I am fallen into, and such extraordinary confidence as I profess to have in God. Or, I am looked upon as a monster, am one whom everybody shuns; and therefore am undone if the Lord be not my refuge. Men abandon me, but God will not.

3rd. That he might always find rest and safety in God; ver. 3, "Be thou my strong habitation." Be thou to me a rock of repose, "whereto I may continually resort." They are at home in God that live a life of communion with him, and confidence in him; that continually resort unto him by faith and prayer, having their eyes ever towards him, may promise themselves a strong habitation in him, such as will never fall of itself, nor can ever be broken through by any invading power. And they shall be welcome to resort to him continually upon all occasions, and not be upbraided as coming too often.

4th. That he might have continual matter for thanksgiving to God, and might be continually employed in that pleasant work; ver. 8, "Let my mouth be filled with thy praise," as now it is with complaints, and then I shall not be ashamed of my hope, but my enemies will be ashamed of their insolence. They that love God love to be praising him, and desire to be doing it all the day; not only in their morning and evening devotions, not only seven times a day, Ps. cxix. 164, but all the day; to intermix with all they say something or other that may redound to the honour and praise of God. They resolve to do it while they live; they hope to be doing it eternally in a better world.

5th. That he might not be neglected now in his declining years; ver. 9, "Cast me not off now in the time of my old age, forsake me not when my strength fails." Observe here, First. The natural sense he had of the infirmities of age; "my strength fails." Where there was strength of body, and vigour of mind, strong sight, strong voice, strong limbs, alas! in old age they fail; the life is continued, but the strength is gone, or that which is is labour and sorrow, Ps. xc. 10. Secondly. The gracious desire he had of the continuance of God's presence with him under these infirmities. Lord, cast me not off, do not then forsake me. This intimates that he should look upon himself as undone if God should abandon him. To be cast off and forsaken of God is a thing to be dreaded at any time, especially in the time of old age, and when our strength fails us; for it is God that is the strength of our heart. But it intimates that he had reason to hope God would not desert him. The faithful servants of God may be comfortably assured that he will not cast them off in old age, nor forsake them when their strength fails them. He is a master that doth not use to cast off old servants. In this confidence David here prays again, ver. 12, "O God, be not far from me;" let me not be under the apprehension of thy withdrawings, for then I am miserable; "O my God," a God in covenant with me, "make haste for my help," lest I perish before help come.

Secondly. He prays that his enemies might be made ashamed of their designs against him. Observe, 1. What it was which they unjustly said against him, ver. 10, 11. Their plot was deep and desperate, it was against his life; "They lay wait for my soul," ver. 10; and are adversaries to that, ver. 13. Their powers and policies were combined; "They take counsel together." And very insolent they were in their carriage; "They say, God has forsaken him; persecute and take him." Here their premises are utterly false; that because a good man was in great trouble, and had continued long in it, and was not so soon delivered as perhaps he expected, that therefore God had forsaken him, and would have no more to do with him. All are not forsaken of God who think so themselves, or whom others think to be so. And as their premises were false, so their inference was barbarous. If God has forsaken him, then persecute and take him; and doubt not but to make a prey of him. This is talking to the grief of one whom God hath smitten, Ps. lxix. 26. But thus they endeavour to discourage David, as Sennacherib endeavoured to intimidate Hezekiah, by suggesting that God was his enemy, and fought against him: "Am I now come up without the Lord against this city to destroy it?" Isa. xxxvi. 10. It is true, if God has forsaken a man, there is none to deliver him; but therefore to insult over him ill becomes those who are conscious to themselves that they deserve to be for ever forsaken of God. But "rejoice not against me, O mine enemy, though I fall I shall rise." He that seems to forsake for a small moment will gather with everlasting kindness. 2. What it was which he justly prayed for, from a spirit of prophecy, not a spirit of passion; ver. 13, "Let them be confounded and consumed that are adversaries to my soul." If they will not be confounded by repentance and so saved, let them be confounded with everlasting dishonour, and so ruined. They that turn the glory of God and his people into shame, God will turn their glory into shame.

14 But I will hope continually,
And will yet praise thee more and more.
15 My mouth shall shew forth thy righteousness
And thy salvation all the day;
For I know not the numbers thereof
16 I will go in the strength of the Lord GOD: [only.
I will make mention of thy righteousness, even of thine
17 O God, thou hast taught me from my youth:
And hitherto have I declared thy wondrous works.
18 Now also when I am old and greyheaded,
O God, forsake me not;
Until I have shewed thy strength unto this generation,
And thy power to every one that is to come.
19 Thy righteousness also, O God, is very high, [thee!
Who hast done great things: O God, who is like unto 20 Thou, which hast shewed me great and sore troubles,
Shalt quicken me again,
And shalt bring me up again from the depths of the earth.
21 Thou shalt increase my greatness,
And comfort me on every side.
22 I will also praise thee with the psaltery,
Even thy truth, O my God:
Unto thee will I sing with the harp,
O thou Holy One of Israel.
23 My lips shall greatly rejoice when I sing unto thee;
And my soul, which thou hast redeemed. [long:
24 My tongue also shall talk of thy righteousness all the day
For they are confounded, for they are brought unto shame,
that seek my hurt.

David is here in a holy transport of joy and praise, arising from his faith and hope in God. We have both together, ver. 14, where there is a sudden and remarkable change of his voice; his fears are all silenced, his hopes raised, and his prayers turned into thanksgivings. Let mine enemies say what they will to drive me to despair, "I will hope continually;" hope in all conditions, in the most cloudy and dark day; I will live upon hope, and will hope to the end. Since we hope in one that will never fail us, let not our hope in him fail us; and then we shall "praise him yet more and more." The more they reproach me the more closely will I cleave to thee; I will praise thee more and better than ever I have done yet. The longer we live the more expert we should grow in praising God, and the more we should abound in it. 'I will add over and above all thy praise;' that is, all the praise I have hitherto offered, for it is all too little. When we have said all we can to the glory of God's grace, there is still more to be said; it is a subject that can never be exhausted, and therefore we should never grow weary of it. Now observe in these verses,

First. How his heart is established in faith and hope, and it is a good thing that the heart be so established. Observe,

1. What he hopes in, ver. 16. 1st. In the power of God; "I will go in the strength of the Lord God;" not sit down in despair, but stir up myself to, and exert myself in, my work and warfare; will go forth and go on, not in any strength of my own, but in God's strength; disclaiming my own sufficiency, and depending on him only as all-sufficient, in the strength of his providence, and in the strength of his grace. We must always go about God's work in his strength, having our eyes up unto him to work in us both to will and to do. 2nd. In the promise of God; "I will make mention of thy righteousness," that is, thy faithfulness to every word which thou hast spoken, the equity of thy disposals, and thy kindness to thy people that trust in thee. This I will make mention of as my plea in prayer for thy mercy. We may very fitly apply it to the righteousness of Christ, which is called the righteousness of God by faith, and which is witnessed by the law and the prophets; we must depend upon God's strength for assistance, and upon Christ's righteousness for acceptance. "In the Lord have I righteousness and strength," Isa. xlv. 24.

2. What he hopes for.

1st. He hopes that God will not leave him in his old age, but will be the same lxx. Title. This psalm is almost verbally a repetition of Psa. xl. 13—17, from which it seems to have been extracted for some special occasion in the Temple service. The verbal differences resemble such as occur in similar cases. There are several Hebrew copies in which this psalm forms the commencement of Psa. lxxi.

lxxi. 1. The Hebrew text has no title. The Greek ascribes it to David, but calls it a psalm "of the sons of Jonadab, and of the first who were made captive." The Syriac also refers it to David, "when Saul was fighting with the house of David;" and adds, "also a prophecy concerning the suffering and resurrection of the Messiah." These titles merely embody the suggestions of editors.

lxxi. 6. For the rendering, "Thou art he that took me," &c., it has been proposed to substitute "Thou hast been my benefactor" (or helper) "from my mother's womb." The Greek, and the versions which follow it, have "protector;" the Syriac gives "my confidence." A better rendering than either would be, "Thou art my refuge," &c.

to him to the end that he had been all along, ver. 17, 18. Observe here, First. What God had done for him when he was young. "Thou hast taught me from my youth." The good education and good instructions which his parents gave him when he was young, he owns himself obliged to give God thanks for as a great favour. It is a blessed thing to be taught of God from our youth, from our childhood to know the holy Scriptures; and it is what we have reason to bless God for. Secondly, What he had done for God when he was middle-aged. He had declared all God's wondrous works. Those that have got good when they are young must be doing good when they are grown up; and must continue to communicate what they have received. We must own all the works of God's goodness to us are wondrous works; admiring he should do so much for us that are so undeserving; and we must make it our business to declare them to the glory of God, and the good of others. Thirdly. What he desired of God now he was old. "Now I am old and greyheaded," dying to this world, and hastening to another, "O God, forsake me not." This is what he earnestly desires, and confidently hopes for. Those that have been taught of God from their youth, and have made it the business of their lives to honour him, may be sure he will not leave them when they are old and greyheaded, will not leave them helpless and comfortless; but will make the evil days of old age their best days, and such as they shall have occasion to say they have pleasure in. Fourthly. What he designed to do for God in his old age. "I will shew thy strength," by my own experience of it, not only "to this generation," but I will leave my observations upon record for the benefit of posterity, and so shew it "to every one that is to come." As long as we live we should be endeavouring to glorify God, and edify one another; and those that have had the largest and longest experience of the goodness of God to them should improve their experiences for the good of their friends. It is a debt which the old disciples of Christ owe to the succeeding generations, to leave behind them a solemn testimony to the power, and pleasure, and advantage of religion, and the truth of God's promises.

2nd. He hopes that God would revive him, raise him up out of his present low and disconsolate condition; ver. 20, "Thou which hast made me to see and feel great and sore troubles," above most men, "shalt quicken me again." Note, First. The best of God's saints and servants are sometimes exercised with great and sore troubles in this world. Secondly. God's hand is to be eyed in all the troubles of the saints; and that will help to extenuate them, and make them seem light. He doth not say, Thou hast burthened me with those troubles, but shewed them me, as the tender father shews the child the rod to keep him in awe. Thirdly. Though God's people be brought never so low, he can revive them, and raise them up. Are they dead? he can quicken them again: see 2 Cor. i. 9. Are they buried, as dead men out of mind? he can bring them up again from the depths of the earth; can cheer the most drooping spirit, and raise the most sinking interest. Fourthly. If we have a due regard to the hand of God in our troubles, we may promise ourselves in due time a deliverance out of them. Our present troubles, though great and sore, shall be no hindrance to our joyful resurrection from the depths of the earth; witness our great Master, to whom this may have some reference: his Father shewed him great and sore troubles, but quickened him and brought him up from the grave.

3rd. He hopes that God would not only deliver him out of his troubles, but would advance his honour and joy more than ever; ver. 21, Thou shalt not only restore me to my greatness again, but shalt increase it, and give me a better interest after this shock than before. Thou shalt not only comfort me, but "comfort me on every side," so that I shall see nothing black or threatening on any side. Note, Sometimes God makes his people's troubles contribute to the increase of their greatness; and their sun shines the brighter for having been under a cloud. If he makes them contribute to the increase of their goodness, that will prove in the end their greatness, their glory; and if he comfort them on every side, according to the time and degree wherein he has afflicted them on every side, they will have no reason to complain. When our Lord Jesus was quickened again, and brought back from the depths of the earth, his greatness was increased, and he entered on the joy set before him.

4th. He hopes that all his enemies would be put to confusion, ver. 24. He speaks of it with the greatest assurance as a thing done, and triumphs in it accordingly; "They are confounded, they are brought to shame, that seek my hurt." His honour would be their disgrace, and his comfort their vexation.

Secondly. Let us now see how his heart is enlarged in joy and praises; how he rejoiceth in hope, and sings in hope, for we are saved by hope.

1. He will speak of God's righteousness and his salvation as great things; things which he was well acquainted with, and much affected with, which he desired God might have the glory of, and others might have the comfortable knowledge of; ver. 15, "My mouth shall shew forth thy righteousness, and thy salvation." And again, ver. 24, "My tongue shall talk of thy righteousness," and this "all the day." God's righteousness, which David seems here to be in a particular manner affected with, includes a great deal: the rectitude of his nature, the equity of his providential disposals, the righteous laws which he hath given us to be ruled by, the righteous promises he has given us to depend upon, and the everlasting righteousness which his Son hath brought in for our justification. God's righteousness and his salvation are here joined together, let no man think to put them asunder, nor expect salvation without righteousness, Ps. l. 23. If these two are made the objects of our desire, let them be made the subjects of our discourse all the day; for they are subjects that can never be drawn dry.

2. He will speak of them with wonder and admiration; as one astonished at the dimensions of Divine love and grace, the height and depth, the length and breadth of it. "I know not the numbers thereof," ver. 15. Though I cannot give a particular account of thy favours to me, they are so many, so great, if "I would count them they are more in number than the sand," Ps. xl. 5, yet knowing them to be numberless I will be still speaking of them; for in them I shall find new matter, ver. 19. The righteousness that is in God is very high, that which is done by him for his people is very great; put both together, and we shall say, "O God, who is like unto thee?" This is praising God, acknowledging his perfections and peformances to be, 1st. Above our conception. They are very high and great; so high that we cannot apprehend them; so great that we cannot comprehend them. 2nd. Without any parallel. No being like him, no works like his; "O God, who is like unto thee?" None in heaven, none on earth; no angel, no king. God is a nonsuch; we do not rightly praise him, if we do not own him to be so.

3. He will speak of them with all the expressions of joy and exultation, ver. 22, 23. Observe, 1st. How he would eye God in praising him. First. As a faithful God; "I will praise thee, even thy truth." God is made known by his Word; if we praise that, and the truth of that, we praise him. By faith we set to our seal that God is true; and so we praise his truth. Secondly. As a God in covenant with him; O my God, whom I have consented to, and avouched for mine. As in our prayers, so in our praises, we must look up to God as our God, and give him the glory of our interest in him, and relation to him. Thirdly. As the Holy One of Israel; Israel's God in a peculiar manner, glorious in his holiness among that people, and faithful to his covenant with them. It is God's honour that he is a Holy One; it is his people's honour that he is the Holy One of Israel. 2nd. Observe how he will express his joy and exultation. First. With his hand; in sacred music, with the psaltery, with the harp. At these David was an artist, and the best of his skill shall be employed in setting forth God's praises to such advantage as might affect others. Secondly. With his lips in sacred songs. "Unto thee will I sing," to thine honour, and with a desire to be accepted of thee; "My lips shall greatly rejoice when I sing unto thee," knowing they cannot be better employed. Thirdly. In both, with his heart; "My soul shall rejoice, which thou hast redeemed." Note, 1*st.* Holy joy is the very heart and life of thankful praise. 2*nd.* We do not make melody to the Lord in singing his praises, if we do not do it with our hearts. "My lips shall rejoice," but that is nothing. Lip-labour, though never so well laboured, if that be all, is but lost labour in serving God. The soul must be at work, and with all that is within us we must bless his holy name; else all about us is worth little. 3*rd.* Redeemed souls ought to be joyful, thankful souls. The work of redemption ought above all God's works to be celebrated by us in our praises. The Lamb that was slain, and has redeemed us to God, must therefore be counted worthy of all blessing and praise.

PSALM LXXII.

The foregoing psalm was penned by David when he was old, and it should seem so was this too, for Solomon was now standing fair for the crown; that was his prayer for himself, this for his son and successor; and with these two, "the prayers of David the son of Jesse are ended," as we find in the close of this psalm. If we have but God's presence with us while we live, and good hopes concerning those that shall come after us, that they shall be praising God on earth when we are praising him in heaven, it is enough. This is entitled, "a psalm for Solomon." It is probable David dictated it, or rather it was by the blessed Spirit dictated to him, when, a little before he died, by Divine direction he settled the succession, and gave orders to proclaim Solomon king 1 Kin. i. 30. But, though Solomon's name is here made use of, Christ's kingdom is here prophesied of under the type and figure of Solomon's. David knew what the Divine oracle was, "that of the fruit of his loins, according to the flesh, he would raise up Christ to sit on his throne," Acts ii. 30; and to him he here bare witness, and with the prospect of the glories of his kingdom he comforted himself in his dying moments, when he foresaw that his house would not be so with God, not so great, not so good, as he wished. David, in spirit, I. Begins with a short prayer for his successor, ver. 1. II. He passeth immediately into a long prediction of the glories of his reign, ver. 2—17. And, III. He concludes with praise to the God of Israel, ver. 18—20. In singing this psalm we must have an eye to Christ, praising him as a king, and pleasing ourselves with our happiness as his subjects.

A Psalm for Solomon.

GIVE the king thy judgments, O God,
And thy righteousness unto the king's son.

This verse is a prayer for the king, even the king's son.

First. We may apply it to Solomon; "Give him thy judgments, O God, and thy righteousness," make him a man, a king; make him a good man, a good king. 1. It is the prayer of a father for his child; a dying blessing, such as the patriarchs bequeathed to their children. The best thing we can ask of God for our children is that God will give them wisdom and grace to know and do their duty. That is better than gold. Solomon learned to pray for himself, as his father had prayed for him, not that God would give him riches and honour, but a wise and understanding heart. It was a comfort to David that his own son was to be his successor; but more so that he was likely to be both judicious and righteous. David had given him a good education, Pr. iv. 3; had taught him good judgment and righteousness, yet that would not do unless God gave him his judgments. Parents cannot give grace to their children, but may by prayer bring them to the God of grace, and shall not seek him in vain; for their prayer shall either be answered or it shall return with comfort into their own bosom. 2. It is the prayer of a king for his successor. David had executed judgment and justice during his reign, and now he prays that his son might do so too. Such a concern as this we should have for posterity, desiring and endeavouring that those who come after us may do God more and better service in their day than we have done in ours. Those have little love either to God or man, and are of a very narrow selfish spirit, who care not what becomes of the world and the church when they are gone. 3. It is the prayer of subjects for their king. It should seem David penned this psalm for the use of the people, that they in singing might pray for Solomon. Those who would live quiet and peaceable lives must pray for kings and all in authority, that God would give them his judgments and righteousness.

Secondly. We may apply it to Christ; not that he who intercedes for us needs us to intercede for him, but, 1. It is a prayer of the Old Testament church for sending the Messiah, as the church's King, King on the holy hill of Zion, of whom the King of kings had said, "Thou art my son," Ps. ii. 6, 7. Hasten his coming to whom all judgment is committed; and we must thus hasten the second coming of Christ, when he shall judge the world in righteousness. 2. It is an expression of the satisfaction which all true believers take in the authority which the Lord Jesus has received from the Father. Let him have all power both in heaven and earth, and be the Lord our righteousness; let him be the great trustee of Divine grace for all that are his: give it him, that he may give it us.

2 He shall judge thy people with righteousness,
And thy poor with judgment.
3 The mountains shall bring peace to the people,
And the little hills, by righteousness.
4 He shall judge the poor of the people,
He shall save the children of the needy,
And shall break in pieces the oppressor.
5 They shall fear thee as long as the sun and moon endure,
Throughout all generations.
6 He shall come down like rain upon the mown grass:
As showers that water the earth.
7 In his days shall the righteous flourish;
And abundance of peace so long as the moon endureth.
8 He shall have dominion also from sea to sea,
And from the river unto the ends of the earth.

lxxi. 15. The words, "I know not the numbers thereof," mean that the psalmist cannot declare all the praises or all the benefits of God, the extent of which is boundless.

lxxi. 20. For "hast showed me" the text reads "us," but "me" is the reading of the Greek and Syriac. The Chaldee has "us," understanding it of the nation. The expression, "the depths of the earth," signifies deep humiliation and affliction.

lxxii. Title. This title may be explained either "of" or "for" Solomon. The ancient Jews understood the psalm to be prophetic of the Messiah, as the Chaldee Targum shows, and they thought it was by Solomon. The Syriac ascribes it to David when he made Solomon king; this is a very probable opinion.

lxxii. 3. Righteousness and justice, peace and prosperity, shall be conspicuous, and prevail throughout the land.

lxxii. 6. As rain upon the new-mown grass causes it to grow, so the influence of this gracious king shall cause the people to revive.

9 They that dwell in the wilderness shall bow before him;
And his enemies shall lick the dust.
10 The kings of Tarshish and of the isles shall bring presents:
The kings of Sheba and Seba shall offer gifts.
11 Yea, all kings shall fall down before him:
All nations shall serve him.
12 For he shall deliver the needy when he crieth;
The poor also, and him that hath no helper.
13 He shall spare the poor and needy,
And shall save the souls of the needy.
14 He shall redeem their soul from deceit and violence:
And precious shall their blood be in his sight.
15 And he shall live, and to him shall be given of the gold of Sheba:
Prayer also shall be made for him continually;
And daily shall he be praised.
16 There shall be an handful of corn in the earth upon the top of the mountains;
The fruit thereof shall shake like Lebanon:
And they of the city shall flourish like grass of the earth
17 His name shall endure for ever:
His name shall be continued as long as the sun:
And men shall be blessed in him:
All nations shall call him blessed

This is a prophecy of the prosperity and perpetuity of the kingdom of Christ under the shadow of the reign of Solomon. It comes in, 1. As a plea to enforce the prayer; Lord, give him thy judgments and thy righteousness, and then he shall judge thy people with righteousness, and so shall answer the end of his elevation, ver. 2. Give him thy grace, and then thy people committed to his charge will have the benefit of it. Because God loved Israel, he made him king over them to do judgment and justice, 2 Chr. ix. 8. We may in faith wrestle with God for that grace which we have reason to think will be of common advantage to his church. 2. As an answer of peace to the prayer. As by the prayer of faith we return answers to God's promises of mercy, so by the promises of mercy God returns answers to our prayers of faith. That this prophecy must refer to the kingdom of the Messiah is plain, because there are many passages in it which cannot be applied to the reign of Solomon. There was indeed a great deal of righteousness and peace at first in the administration of his government; but before the end of his reign there was both trouble and unrighteousness. The kingdom here spoken of is to last as long as the sun, but Solomon's was soon extinct. Therefore even the Jewish expositors understand it of the kingdom of the Messiah. Let us observe the many great and precious promises here made, which were to have their full accomplishment only in the kingdom of Christ; and yet some of them were in part fulfilled in Solomon's reign.

First. That it should be a righteous government; ver. 2, "He shall judge thy people with righteousness:" compare Isa. xi. 4. All the laws of Christ's kingdom are consonant to the eternal rules of equity; the chancery it erects to relieve against the rigours of the broken law is indeed a court of equity, and against the sentence of his last judgment there will lie no exception. The peace of his kingdom shall be supported by righteousness, ver. 3; for then only is the peace like a river, when the righteousness is as the waves of the sea. The world will be judged in righteousness, Acts xvii. 31.

Secondly. That it should be a peaceable government. "The mountains shall bring peace, and the little hills," ver. 3; that is, (saith Dr. Hammond,) both the superior and the inferior courts of judicature in Solomon's kingdom. There shall be abundance of peace, ver. 7. Solomon's name signifies peaceable, and such was his reign; for in it Israel enjoyed the victories of the foregoing reign, and preserved the tranquillity and repose of that reign. But peace is in a special manner the glory of Christ's kingdom, for as far as it prevails it reconciles men to God, to themselves, and to one another, and slays all enmities; "for he is our peace."

Thirdly. That the poor and needy should be in a particular manner taken under the protection of this government; "He shall judge thy poor," ver. 2. Those are God's poor that are impoverished by keeping a good conscience, and those shall be provided for with a distinguishing care, shall be judged for with judgment, with a particular cognizance taken of their case, and a particular vengeance taken for their wrongs. The poor of the people, and the children of the needy, he will be sure so to judge as to save, ver. 4. This is insisted upon again, ver. 12, 13, intimating that Christ will be sure to carry his cause on behalf of his injured poor. He will deliver the needy that lie at the mercy of their oppressors, the poor also; both because they have no helper and it is for his honour to help them, and because they cry unto him and he has promised in answer to their prayers to help them; they by prayer commit themselves unto him, Ps. x. 14. He will spare the needy that throw themselves on his mercy, and will not be rigorous and severe with them; he will save their souls, and that is all they desire. "Blessed are the poor in spirit, for theirs is the kingdom of heaven." Christ is the poor man's king.

Fourthly. That proud oppressors shall be reckoned with. He shall break them in pieces, ver. 4, shall take away their power to hurt, and punish them for all the mischief they have done. This is the office of a good king, Parcere subjectis, et debellare superbos,—'To spare the vanquished, and debase the proud.' The devil is the great oppressor whom Christ will break in pieces, and of whose kingdom he will be the destruction; with the breath of his mouth shall he slay that wicked one, Isa. xi. 4, and shall deliver the souls of his people from deceit and violence, ver. 14. He shall save them from the power of Satan, both as an old serpent, working by deceit to ensnare them, and as a roaring lion, working by violence to terrify and devour them. Thus precious shall their blood be unto him, that not a drop of it shall be shed by the deceit or violence of Satan or his instruments, but it shall be reckoned for. Christ is a King who, though he calls his subjects sometimes to resist unto blood for him, yet is not prodigal of their blood, nor will ever have it parted with, but upon a valuable consideration, to his glory and theirs, and the filling up of the measure of their iniquity.

Fifthly. That religion shall flourish under Christ's government; ver. 5, "They shall fear thee as long as the sun and moon endure." Solomon indeed built the temple, and the fear and worship of God was well kept up for some time under his government, but it did not last long. This therefore must point at Christ's kingdom, all the subjects of which are brought to and kept in the fear of God; for the Christian religion has a direct tendency to, and a powerful influence upon, the support and advancement of natural religion. Faith in Christ will set up, and keep up, the fear of God; and therefore this is the everlasting Gospel that is preached, "Fear God, and give honour to him," Rev. xiv. 7. And as Christ's government promotes devotion towards God, so it promotes both justice and charity among men, ver. 7, "In his days shall the righteous flourish;" righteousness shall be practised, and those that practise righteousness shall be preferred. Righteousness shall abound and be in reputation; shall command and be in power. The law of Christ written in the heart disposeth men to be honest and just, and to render to all their due; it likewise disposeth men to live in love, and so it produceth abundance of peace, and beats swords into ploughshares. Both holiness and love shall be perpetual in Christ's kingdom, and shall never go to decay, for the subjects of it shall "fear God as long as the sun and moon endure;" that is, Christianity, in the profession of it having got footing in the world, shall keep its ground till the end of time, and having in the power of it got footing in the heart, it will continue there till by death the sun and the moon and the stars, that is, the bodily senses, are darkened. Through all the changes of the world, and all the changes of life, Christ's kingdom will support itself; and, if the fear of God continues as long as the sun and moon, abundance of peace will. The peace of the church, the peace of the soul, shall run parallel with its purity and piety, and last as long as these last.

Sixthly. That Christ's government shall be very comfortable to all his faithful loving subjects; ver. 6, "He shall," by the graces and comforts of his Spirit, "come down like rain upon the mown grass;" not on that which is cut down, but that which is left growing, that it may spring again though it was beheaded. The Gospel of Christ distils as the rain, which softens the ground that was hard, moistens that which was dry, and so makes it green and fruitful, Isa. lv. 10. Let our hearts drink in the rain, Heb. vi. 7.

Seventhly. That Christ's kingdom shall be extended very far, and greatly enlarged. Considering,

1. The extent of his territories; ver. 8, "He shall have dominion from sea to sea," from the south sea to the north, or from the Red sea to the Mediterranean; and from the river Euphrates, or Nile, to the ends of the earth. Solomon's dominion was very large, 1 Kin. iv. 21, according to the promise, Gen. xv. 18. But no sea, no river, is named, that it might by these proverbial expressions speak the universal monarchy of the Lord Jesus. His Gospel has been, or shall be, preached to all nations, Mat. xxiv. 14; and the kingdoms of the world shall become his kingdoms, Rev. xi. 15, when the fulness of the Gentiles shall be brought in. His territories shall be extended to those countries, 1st. That were strangers to him. "They that dwell in the wilderness," out of all high roads, that seldom hear news, yet shall hear the glad tidings of the Redeemer, and redemption by him, shall bow before him, that is, shall believe in him, accept of him, worship him, and take his yoke upon them. Before the Lord Jesus we must all either bow or break; if we break we are ruined, if we bow we are certainly made for ever. 2nd. That were enemies to him, and had fought against him. They shall lick the dust; that is, they shall be brought down and laid in the dust, shall bite the ground for vexation, and be so hunger-bitten that they shall be glad of dust, the serpent's meat, Gen. iii. 15; for of his seed they are. And over whom shall not he rule, when his enemies themselves are thus humbled and brought low?

2. The dignity of his tributaries. He shall not only reign over them that dwell in the wilderness, the peasants and cottagers, but over them that dwell in the palaces; ver. 10, the kings of Tarshish, and of the isles that lie most remote from Israel, and are the isles of the Gentiles, Gen. ix. 5. These shall bring presents to him as their sovereign Lord, by and under whom they hold their crowns, and all their crown lands. They shall court his favour, and make an interest in him, that they may hear his wisdom. This was literally fulfilled in Solomon; for "all the kings of the earth sought the wisdom of Solomon, and brought every man his present," 2 Chr. ix. 23, 24; and in Christ too, when the wise men of the East, who probably were men of the first rank in their own country, came to worship him, and brought him presents, Mat. ii. 11. They shall present themselves to him; that is the best present we can bring to Christ, and without that no other present is acceptable, Rom. xii. 1. They shall offer gifts, that is, spiritual sacrifices of prayer and praise; offer them to Christ as their God, on Christ as their altar, which sanctifies every gift. Their conversion to God is called the offering up, or sacrificing of the Gentiles, Rom. xv. 16; and so is their devotion to God, Heb. xiii. 15, 16. Yea, "all kings shall" sooner or later "fall down before him," either to do their duty to him, or to receive their doom from him, ver. 11. They shall fall before him either as his willing subjects or as his conquered captives; as supplicants for his mercy or expectants of his judgment. And when the kings submit the people come in of course, "All nations shall serve him;" all shall be invited into his service; some of all nations shall come into it, and in every nation incense shall be offered to him, and a pure offering, Mal. i. 11; Rev. vii. 9.

Eighthly. That he shall be honoured and beloved by all his subjects; ver. 15, "He shall live;" his subjects shall desire his life, "O King, live for ever," and with good reason; for he hath said, "Because I live, you shall live also," and "of him it is witnessed, that he liveth, ever liveth making intercession," Heb. vii. 8, 25. "He shall live," and live prosperously: and, 1. Presents shall be made to him. Though he shall be able to live without them, for he needs neither the gifts nor the services of any, yet "to him shall be given of the gold of Sheba;" gold, the best of metals, gold of Sheba, which probably was the finest gold; for he that is best must be served with the best. They that have abundance of the wealth of this world, that have gold at command, must give it to Christ, that is, must serve him with it, do good with it; "Honour the Lord with thy substance." 2. "Prayer shall be made for him," and that "continually." The people prayed for Solomon, and that helped to make him and his reign so great a blessing to them. It is the duty of subjects to make "prayers, intercessions, and giving of thanks for kings, and all in authority;" not in compliment to them, as it is too often done, but in concern for the public welfare. But how is this applied to Christ? He needs not our prayers, nor can have any benefit by them. But the Old Testament saints prayed for his coming, prayed continually for it; for they called him, "He that should come." And now he is come we must pray for the success of his Gospel, and the advancement of his kingdom, which he calls praying for him, "Hosanna to the Son of David," prosperity to his reign; and we pray for his second coming. It may be read, 'Prayer shall be made through him,' or for his sake; that is, whatsoever we ask of the Father shall be in his name, and in dependence upon his intercession. 3. Praises shall be made of him, and high encomiums given of his wisdom, justice, and goodness; "daily shall he be praised." By praying daily in his name we give him honour. Subjects ought to speak well of the govern-lxxii. 8. These expressions may literally signify from the eastern branch of the Red Sea to the Mediterranean, and from the Euphrates to the borders of the south and the confines of the desert. In their higher application they must be interpreted more extensively of the general spread of Messiah's kingdom.

lxxii. 16. The sense intended by our version seems to be that from a handful of corn, sown in a most unfavourable place, there shall be a vast crop, and that the people shall similarly multiply. Another explanation, however, is that there shall be an abundance of corn, even on the mountain tops. The more modern critics, and some ancient ones, favour the latter view.

lxxii. 17. The second clause, "His name shall be continued as long as the sun," might be rendered, "His name shall be propagated as long as the sun;" but our version is well supported. The marginal note, "shall be as a son to continue his father's name for ever," is not quite correct.

ment that is a blessing to them; and much more ought all Christians to praise Jesus Christ, daily to praise him; for they owe their all to him, and to him they lie under the highest obligations.

Ninthly. That under his government there shall be a wonderful increase both of meat and mouths, both of the fruits of the earth in the country and of the people inhabiting the cities, ver. 16. 1. The country shall grow rich; sow but "a handful of corn on the top of the mountains," whence one would expect but little, and yet "the fruit of it shall shake like Lebanon," it shall come up like a wood, so thick, and tall, and strong, like the cedars of Lebanon. Even upon the tops of the mountains the earth shall bring forth by handfuls; that is an expression of great plenty, Gen. xli. 47, as the grass upon the housetop is said to be that wherewith the mower filleth not his hand. This is applicable to the wonderful products of the seed of the Gospel in the days of the Messiah: a handful of that seed, sown in the mountainous and barren soil of the Gentile world, produced a wonderful harvest, gathered in to Christ, fruit that shook like Lebanon; the fields were white to the harvest, Jno. iv. 35; Mat. ix. 37. The grain of mustardseed grew up to a great tree. 2. The towns shall grow populous; "they of the city shall flourish like grass," for number, for verdure. The Gospel church, the city of God among men, shall have all the marks of prosperity, many shall be added to it, and those that are, shall be happy in it.

Tenthly. That his government shall be perpetual, both to his honour and to the happiness of his subjects. The Lord Jesus shall reign for ever, and of him only this must be understood, and not at all of Solomon. It is Christ only that "shall be feared throughout all generations," ver. 5; "and as long as the sun and moon endure," ver. 7. 1. The honour of the prince is immortal, and shall never be sullied; ver. 17, "His name shall endure for ever," in despite of the malicious attempts and endeavours of the powers of darkness to eclipse the lustre of it, and to cut off the line of it; it shall be preserved, it shall be perpetuated, and in a manner propagated. As the names of earthly princes are continued in their posterity, so Christ's in himself, filiabitur nomen ejus,—'his name shall descend to posterity.' All nations while the world stands shall call him blessed; shall bless God for him, and continually speak well of him, and think themselves happy in him. To the end of time, and to eternity, his name shall be celebrated, shall be made use of; every tongue shall confess it, and every knee shall bow before it. 2. The happiness of the people is universal too, it is complete and everlasting; "men shall be blessed," truly and for ever blessed, "in him." This plainly refers to the promise made unto the fathers that in the Messiah all the nations of the earth should be blessed, Gen. xii. 3.

18 Blessed be the LORD God, the God of Israel,
Who only doeth wondrous things.
19 And blessed be his glorious name for ever:
And let the whole earth be filled with his glory; Amen, and Amen.
20 The prayers of David the son of Jesse are ended.

Such an illustrious prophecy as is in the foregoing verses of the Messiah and his kingdom may fitly be concluded, as it is here, with hearty prayers and praises.

First. The psalmist is here enlarged in thanksgivings for the prophecy and promise, ver. 18, 19. So sure is every word of God, and with so much satisfaction may we rely upon it, that we have reason enough to give thanks for what he hath said, though it be not yet done. We must own that for all the great things he has done for the world, for the church, for the children of men, for his own children, in the kingdom of providence, in the kingdom of grace, for all the power and trust lodged in the hands of the Redeemer, God is worthy to be praised; we must stir up ourselves and all that is within us to praise him after the best manner, and desire that all others may do it. "Blessed be the Lord," that is, "blessed be his glorious name;" for it is only in his name that we can contribute any thing to his glory and blessedness, and yet that is also "exalted above all blessing and praise." Let it be blessed for ever; it shall be blessed for ever, it deserves to be blessed for ever, and we hope to be for ever blessing it. We are here taught to bless the name of Christ, and to bless God in Christ for all that which he has done for us by him. We must bless him, 1. As the Lord God, as a self-existent, self-sufficient being, and our sovereign Lord. 2. As the God of Israel, in covenant with that people, and worshipped by them. and who doth this in performance of the truth unto Jacob and the mercy to Abraham. 3. As the God "who only doth wondrous things," in creation and providence, and especially this work of redemption, which excelleth them all. Men's works are little, common, trifling things, and which without him they could not do. But God doth all by his own power, and they are wondrous things which he doth. and such as will be the eternal admiration of saints and angels.

Secondly. He is earnest in prayer for the accomplishment of this prophecy and promise; "Let the whole earth be filled with his glory;" as it will be when "the kings of Tarshish and the isles shall bring presents to him." It is sad to think how empty the earth is of the glory of God, how little service and honour he has from a world to which he is such a bountiful benefactor. And therefore all that wish well to the honour of God, and the welfare of mankind, cannot but desire that the earth may be filled with the discoveries of his glory, suitably returned in thankful acknowledgments of his glory. Let every heart, and every mouth, and every assembly, be filled with the high praises of God. We shall see how earnest David is in this prayer, and how much his heart is in it, if we observe, 1. How he shuts up the prayer with a double seal; "Amen, and Amen," again and again I say, I say it, and let all others say the same, so be it. Amen to my prayer; Amen to the prayers of all the saints to this purpose; "Hallowed be thy name, thy kingdom come." 2. How he even shuts up his life with this prayer, ver. 20. This was the last psalm that ever he penned, though not placed last in this collection: he penned it when he lay on his death-bed, and with this he breathes his last: Let God be glorified; let the kingdom of the Messiah be set up, and kept up in the world, and I have enough, I desire no, more. With this let the prayers of David the son of Jesse be ended; even so, come, Lord Jesus, come quickly.

PSALM LXXIII.

This psalm, and the ten that next follow it, carry the name of Asaph in the titles of them. If he was the penman of them, as many think, we rightly call them psalms of Asaph; if he was only the chief musician, to whom they were delivered, our marginal reading is right, which calls them psalms for Asaph. It is probable he penned them, for we read of the words of David and of Asaph the seer, which were used in Hezekiah's time, 2 Chr. xxix. 30. Though the spirit of prophecy by sacred songs descended chiefly on David, who is therefore styled the sweet psalmist of Israel, yet God put some of that spirit upon those about him. This is a psalm of great use; it gives us an account of the conflict which the psalmist had with a strong temptation to envy the prosperity of wicked people. He begins his account with a sacred principle, which he held fast, and by the help of which he kept his ground and carried his point, ver. 1; and then tells us. I. How he got into the temptation, ver. 2—14. II. How he got out of the temptation, and gained a victory over it, ver. 15—20. III. How he got by the temptation, and was the better for it, ver. 21—28. And if in singing this psalm we fortify ourselves against the like temptation, we do not use it in vain. The experiences of others should be our instructions.

A Psalm of Asaph.

TRULY God is good to Israel,
Even to such as are of a clean heart.
2 But as for me, my feet were almost gone;
My steps had well nigh slipped.
3 For I was envious at the foolish,
When I saw the prosperity of the wicked.
4 For there are no bands in their death:
But their strength is firm.
5 They are not in trouble as other men;
Neither are they plagued like other men.
6 Therefore pride compasseth them about as a chain;
Violence covereth them as a garment.
7 Their eyes stand out with fatness:
They have more than heart could wish.
8 They are corrupt, and speak wickedly concerning oppression:
They speak lofily.
9 They set their mouth against the heavens,
And their tongue walketh through the earth.
10 Therefore his people return hither:
And waters of a full cup are wrung out to them.
11 And they say, How doth God know?
And is there knowledge in the most High?
12 Behold, these are the ungodly, who prosper in the world;
They increase in riches
13 Verily I have cleansed my heart in vain,
And washed my hands in innocency
14 For all the day long have I been plagued,
And chastened every morning.

The psalm begins somewhat abruptly; 'Yet God is good to Israel,' so the margin reads it. He had been thinking of the prosperity of the wicked; and while he was thus musing the fire burned, and at last he spake by way of check to himself for what he had been thinking of, 'However it be, yet God is good. Though wicked people receive many of the gifts of his providential bounty, yet we must own that he is in a peculiar manner good to Israel; they have favours from him which others have not. The psalmist designs an account of a temptation he was strongly assaulted with to envy the prosperity of the wicked; a common temptation, which has tried the graces of many of the saints. Now in this account,

First. He lays down, in the first place, that great principle which he is resolved to abide by, and not to quit while he was parleying with this temptation, ver. 1. Job, when he was entering into such a temptation, fixed for his principle, the omniscience of God; "Times are not hidden from the Almighty," Job xxiv. 1. Jeremiah's principle is the justice of God; "Righteous art thou, O God, when I plead with thee," Jer. xii. 1. Habakkuk's principle is the holiness of God; "Thou art of purer eyes than to behold iniquity," Hab. i. 13. The psalmist's here is the goodness of God. These are truths that cannot be shaken, and which we must resolve to live and die by. Though we may not be able to reconcile all the disposals of Providence with them, we must believe they are reconcilable. Note, Good thoughts of God will fortify us against many of Satan's temptations. "Truly God is good." He had had many thoughts in his mind concerning the providences of God, but this word at last settled him: For all this, God is good, "good to Israel, even to such as are of a clean heart." Note, 1. Those are the Israel of God that are of a clean heart, purified by the blood of Christ, cleansed from the pollutions of sin, and entirely devoted to the glory of God. An upright heart is a clean heart; cleanliness is truth in the inward part. 2. God, who is good to all, is, in a special manner, good to his church and people, as he was to Israel of old. God was good to Israel in redeeming them out of Egypt, taking them into covenant with himself, giving them his laws and ordinances, and in the various providences that were concerning them; and he is in like manner good to all them that are of a clean heart; and, whatever happens, we must not think otherwise.

Secondly. He comes now to relate the shock that was given to his faith in God's distinguishing goodness to Israel, by a strong temptation to envy the prosperity of the wicked, and therefore to think that the Israel of God are no happier than other people, and that God is no kinder to them than to others. He speaks of it as a very fair escape that he had not been quite foiled and overthrown by this temptation; ver. 2, "But as for me," though I was so well satisfied in the goodness of God to Israel, yet "my feet were almost gone," the tempter had almost tripped up my heels, "my steps had well nigh slipped;" I had like to have quitted my religion, and given up all my expectations of benefit by it, "for I was envious at the foolish." Note, 1. The faith even of strong believers may sometimes be sorely shaken, and ready to fail them. There are storms that will try the firmest anchors. 2. Those that shall never be quite undone are sometimes very near it, and in their own apprehension as good as gone. Many a precious soul that shall live for ever had once a very narrow turn for its life; almost and well nigh ruined, but a step between it and a fatal apostacy, and yet snatched as a brand out of the burning, which will for ever magnify the riches of Divine grace in the nations of them that are saved. Now let us take notice of the process of the psalmist's temptation; what he was tempted with, and tempted to.

lxxii. 20. This verse is probably a note appended to one of the earliest collections of the psalms. The Syriac version omits it, and puts instead, "end of the second book," because it ended the second of the five books into which the psalms were anciently divided. We cannot say this was the last psalm David wrote.

lxxiii. Title. The Hebrew and Greek ascribe this psalm to Asaph. The Syriac title is, "Ascribed to Asaph the recorder, concerning the death of Absalom: and again, a confession of human frailty, and concerning the prosperity of the wicked and the long-suffering of God."

lxxiii. 4. For "there are no bands in their death," rather translate "they are without agonies until their death." The psalmist describes not how they die, but how they live. The second clause, "their strength is firm," means that their strength, or body, is vigorous.

lxxiii. 7. The Syriac version has here, "And their iniquity cometh

1. He observed that foolish, wicked people have oftentimes a very great share of outward prosperity. He saw, with grief, the prosperity of the wicked, ver. 3. Wicked people are really foolish people, and act against reason and their true interest, and yet every stander-by sees their prosperity.

1st. They seem to have the least share of the troubles and calamities of this life; ver. 5, "They are not in trouble as other men," even of wise and good men, "neither are they plagued with other men," but seem as if, by some special privilege, they were exempted from the common lot of sorrows. If they meet with some little trouble, it is nothing to what others endure, that are less sinners, and yet greater sufferers.

2nd. They seem to have the greatest share of the comforts of this life. They live at ease, and bathe themselves in pleasures, so that "their eyes stand out with fatness," ver. 7. See what the excess of pleasure is; the moderate use of it enlightens the eyes, but they that indulge themselves inordinately in the delights of sense have their eyes ready to start out of their heads. Epicures are really their own tormentors, by putting a force upon nature, while they pretend to gratify it. And well may they feed themselves to the full who "have more than heart could wish," more than they themselves ever thought of, or expected to be masters of. They have at least more than an humble, quiet, contented heart could wish, yet not so much as they themselves wish for. There are many who have a great deal of this life in their hands, but nothing of the other life in their hearts. They are ungodly, live without the fear and worship of God, and yet they prosper and come on in the world, and not only are rich, but increase in riches, ver. 12. They are looked upon as thriving men, and while others have much ado to keep what they have they are still adding more, more honour, power and pleasure, by increasing in riches. They are the prosperous of the age; so some read it.

3rd. Which is most strange of all, and therefore is first mentioned, their end seems to be peace. This was ever thought to be the peculiar privilege of the godly, Ps. xxxvii. 37; and yet, to outward appearance, it is oftentimes the lot of the ungodly; ver. 4, "There are no bands in their death." They are not taken off by a violent death; they are foolish, and yet die not as fools die; for "their hands are not bound, nor their feet put into fetters," 2 Sam. iii. 33, 34 They are not taken off by an untimely death, like the fruit forced from the tree before it is ripe, but are left to hang on till, through old age, they gently drop of themselves. They do not die of sore and painful diseases, there are no pangs, no agonies in their death; but "their strength is firm" to the last, so that they scarce feel themselves die. They are of those who "die in their full strength, being wholly at ease and quiet;" not of those that "die in the bitterness of their souls, and never eat with pleasure," Job xxi. 23, 25. Nay, they are not bound by the terrors of conscience in their dying moments, they are not frightened either with the remembrance of their sins or the prospect of their misery, but die securely. We cannot judge of men's state on the other side death, either by the manner of their death or the frame of their spirits in dying. Men may die like lambs, and yet have their place with the goats.

2. He observed that they made a very ill use of their outward prosperity, and were hardened by it in their wickedness, which very much strengthened the temptation he was in to grudge at it. If it had done them any good, if it had made them less provoking to God, or less oppressive to man, it would never have vexed him; but it had a quite contrary effect upon them.

1st. It made them very proud and haughty, because they live at ease; "Pride compasseth them as a chain," ver. 6. They shew themselves to all that see them to be puffed up with their prosperity, as men shew their ornaments. "The pride of Israel testifies to his face," Hos. v. 5; Isa. iii. 9. 'Pride ties on their chain,' or necklace, so Dr. Hammond reads it. It is no harm to wear a chain or necklace; but when pride ties it on, when it is worn to gratify a vain mind, it ceaseth to be an ornament. It is not so much what the dress or apparel is, (though we have rules for that, 1 Tim. ii. 9,) as what principle ties it on, and with what spirit it is worn. And as the pride of sinners appears in their dress, so it doth in their talk; "they speak loftily," ver. 8. They affect great swelling words of vanity, 2 Pet. ii. 18, bragging of themselves, and disdaining all about them. Out of the abundance of the pride that is in their heart they speak big.

2nd. It made them oppressive to their poor neighbours; ver. 6, "Violence covereth them as a garment." What they have got by fraud and oppression they keep and increase by the same wicked methods, and care not what injury they do to others, nor what violence they use, so they may but enrich and aggrandize themselves. "They are corrupt," like the giants, the sinners of the old world, when "the earth was filled with violence through them," Gen. vi. 11, 13. They care not what mischief they do, either for mischief sake or for their own advantage sake; "they speak wickedly concerning oppression;" they oppress, and justify themselves in it. They that speak well of sin speak wickedly of it. "They are corrupt;" that is, dissolved in pleasures, and every thing that is luxurious, so some; and then they deride and speak maliciously; they care not whom they wound with the poisoned darts of calumny; 'from on high they speak oppression.'

3rd. It made them very insolent in their carriage, both towards God and man; ver. 9, "They set their mouth against the heavens;" putting contempt upon God himself and his honour, bidding defiance to him and his power and justice; they cannot reach the heavens with their hands to shake God's throne, else they would; but they shew their ill-will by setting their mouth against the heavens. "Their tongue also walks through the earth," and they take a liberty to abuse all that come in their way. No man's greatness or goodness can secure him from the scourge of the virulent tongue; they take a pride and pleasure in bantering all mankind; they are pests of the country, for they neither fear God nor regard man.

4th. In all this they were very atheistical and profane. They could not have been thus wicked if they had not learned to say, ver. 11, "How doth God know? and is there knowledge in the most High?" So far were they from desiring the knowledge of God, who gave them all the good things they had, and would have taught them to use them well, that they were not willing to believe God had any knowledge of them, that he took any notice of their wickedness, or would ever call them to an account. As if, because he is most high, he could not, or would not, see them, Job xxii. 11. Whereas, because he is most high, therefore he can and will take cognizance of all the children of men, and of all they do, or say, or think. What an affront is it to the God of infinite knowledge, from whom all knowledge is, to ask, Is there knowledge in him? Well may he say, ver. 12, "Behold these are the ungodly."

3. He observed that while wicked men thus prospered in their impiety, and were made more impious by their prosperity, good people were in great affliction, and he himself in particular; which very much strengthened the temptation he was in to quarrel with Providence.

1st. He looked abroad, and saw many of God's people greatly at a loss, ver. 10. Because the wicked are so very daring, "therefore his people return hither;" that is, they are at the same pause, the same plunge that I am at; they know not what to say to it no more than I do, and the rather, because "waters of a full cup are wrung out to them;" they are not only made to drink, and to drink deep, of the bitter cup of affliction, but to drink all. Care is taken that they lose not a drop of that unpleasant potion; the waters are wrung out unto them, that they may have the dregs of the cup. They pour out abundance of tears when they hear wicked people blaspheme God, and speak profanely, as David did, Ps. cxix. 136. These are the waters wrung out to them.

2nd. He looked at home, and felt himself under the continual frowns of providence, while the wicked were sunning themselves in its smiles, ver. 14. For my part, saith he, "all the day long have I been plagued" with one affliction or other, "and chastened every morning," as duly as the morning comes. His afflictions were great, he was chastened and plagued; the returns of them were constant, every morning with the morning; and they continued without intermission, "all the day long." This he thought was very hard, that, when those who blasphemed God were in prosperity, he that worshipped God was under such great affliction. He spoke feelingly when he spoke of his own troubles; no disputing against sense, except by faith.

4. From all this arose a very strong temptation to cast off his religion. 1st. Some that observed the prosperity of the wicked, especially comparing it with the afflictions of the righteous, were tempted to deny a providence, and to think that God had forsaken the earth. In this sense some take ver. 11, "There are those even among God's professing people that say, "How doth God know?" Sure all things are left to blind fortune, and not disposed of by an all-seeing God. Some of the heathen, upon such a remark as this, have asked, Quis putet esse deos? — 'Who will believe that there are gods?' 2nd. Though the psalmist's feet were not thus far gone, as to question God's omniscience, yet he was tempted to question the benefit of religion, and to say, ver. 13, "Verily I have cleansed my heart in vain, and" have to no purpose, "washed my hands in innocency." See here what it is to be religious; it is to cleanse our hearts in the first place, by repentance and regeneration, and then to wash our hands in innocency, by an universal reformation of our lives. It is not in vain to do this, not in vain to serve God and keep his ordinances; but good men have been sometimes tempted to say, It is in vain; and that religion is a thing that there is nothing to be got by, because they see wicked people in prosperity. But, however the thing may appear now, when the pure in heart, those blessed ones, shall see God, Mat. v. 8, they will not say that they cleansed their hearts in vain.

15 If I say, I will speak thus;
Behold, I should offend against the generation of thy [children.
16 When I thought to know this,
It was too painful for me;
17 Until I went into the sanctuary of God;
Then understood I their end.
18 Surely thou didst set them in slippery places;
Thou castedst them down into destruction.

They are utterly consumed with terrors.

So, O Lord, when thou awakest, thou shalt despise their

We have seen what a strong temptation the psalmist was in to envy prospering profaneness; now here we are told how he kept footing, and got the victory.

First. He kept up a respect for God's people, and with that he restrained himself from speaking what he had thought amiss, ver. 15. He got the victory by degrees; and this was the first point he gained. He was ready to say, "Verily I have cleansed my heart in vain," and thought he had reason to say it; but he kept his mouth with this consideration, "If I say I will speak thus, behold I should" myself revolt and apostatize from, and so give the greatest offence imaginable, "to the generation of thy children." Observe here, 1. Though he thought amiss, he took care not to utter that evil thought which he had conceived. Note, It is bad to think ill, but it is worse to speak it, for that is giving the evil thought an imprimatur; it is allowing it, giving consent to it, and publishing it for the infection of others. But it is a good sign we repent of the evil imagination of the heart, if we suppress it, and the error remaineth with ourselves. If, therefore, thou hast been so foolish as to think evil, be so wise as to lay thy hand upon thy mouth, and let it go no farther, Pr. xxx. 32. "If I say I will speak thus." Observe, though his corrupt heart made this inference from the prosperity of the wicked, yet he did not mention it to those about him till he had debated within himself whether it were fit to be mentioned or no. Note, We must think twice before we speak once; both because some things may be thought which yet may not be spoken, and because the second thoughts may correct the mistakes of the first. 2. The reason why he would not speak it was, for fear of giving offence to those whom God owned for his children. Note, 1st. There is a people in the world that are the generation of God's children, a set of men that fear and love God as their Father. 2nd. We must be very careful not to say or do any thing which may justly offend any of these little ones, Mat. xviii. 6, especially that may offend the generation of them, may sadden their hearts, or weaken their hands, or shake their interest. 3rd. There is nothing that can give more general offence to the generation of God's children than to say that we have cleansed our heart in vain, or that it is vain to serve God; for there is nothing more contrary to their universal sentiment and experience, nor any thing that grieves them more than to hear God thus reflected on. 4th. Those that wish themselves in the condition of the wicked do in effect quit the tents of God's children.

Secondly. He foresaw the ruin of wicked people; and by this he baffled the temptation, as by the former he gave some check to it. Because he durst not speak what he had thought, for fear of giving offence, he began to consider whether he had any good reason for that thought, ver. 16. I endeavoured to understand the meaning of this unaccountable dispensation of Providence; but "it was too painful for me," I could not conquer it by the strength of my own reasoning. It is a problem not to be solved by the mere light of nature; for if there were not another life after this we could not fully reconcile the prosperity of the wicked with the justice of God; but, ver. 17, he "went into the sanctuary of God," he applied himself to his devotions, meditated upon the attributes of God, and "the things revealed which belong to us and to our children;" he consulted the Scriptures, and the priests' lips who attend the sanctuary; he prayed to God to make this matter plain to him, and to help him over this difficulty; and at length he understood the wretched end of wicked people, which he plainly foresaw to be such, that even in the height of their prosperity they were rather to be pitied than envied, for they were but ripening for ruin. Note, 1st. There are many great things, and needful to be known, which will not be known otherwise than by going into the sanctuary of God, by the word and prayer. That therefore must be the resort of a tempted soul. 2nd. We must judge of persons and things as they appear by the light of Divine revelation, and then we shall judge righteous judgment; particularly we must judge by the end. All is well that ends well, everlastout like fatness, and they do according to the counsel of their heart." The Greek is somewhat similar. The Hebrew corresponds with our translation in the first clause, but the second literally means "they surpass the thoughts of the heart;" i.e., either they have more than they expected, or more than might seem possible.

lxxiii. 8. "They are corrupt:" translate, "They mock, and talk oppression wickedly, they talk loftily."

lxxiii. 10. His people return to them, or go back to the society of the prosperous wicked, and receive abundance of this world's good. Fürst renders the latter clause, "And waters in abundance are greedily swallowed by them." The Greek version is, "And full days shall be found in them;" but the present Hebrew text will not bear that translation.

lxxiii. 15. "I should offend;" rather, "I should betray," or "be faithless to."

lxxiii. 18. The Greek renders the second clause, "Thou didst cast ingly well: but nothing well that ends ill, everlastingly ill. The righteous man's afflictions end in peace, and therefore he is happy; the wicked man's enjoyments end in destruction, and therefore he is miserable.

1. The prosperity of the wicked is short and uncertain. The high places in which Providence sets them are slippery places, ver. 18, where they cannot long keep footing; but when they offer to climb higher that very attempt will be the occasion of their sliding and falling. Their prosperity has no firm ground, it is not built upon God's favour or his promise; and they have not the satisfaction of feeling any firm ground it has.

2. Their destruction is sure and sudden, and very great. This cannot be meant of any temporal destruction, for they were supposed to spend all their days in wealth, and their death itself had no bands in it, "in a moment they go down to the grave;" so that even that could scarce be called their destruction. It must therefore be meant of eternal destruction on the other side death; hell and destruction. They flourish for a time, but are undone for ever. 1st. Their ruin is sure and inevitable. He speaks of it as a thing done; they are cast down, for their destruction is as certain as if it were already accomplished. He speaks of it as God's doing, and therefore it cannot be resisted: "Thou castest them down." It is destruction from the Almighty, Joel i. 15; from the glory of his power, 2 Thes. i. 9. Who can support those whom God will cast down, whom God will lay load upon? 2nd It is swift and sudden. Their damnation slumbereth not; for "how are they brought into desolation as in a moment?" ver. 19. It is easily effected, and will be a mighty surprise to themselves and all about them. 3rd. It is severe and very dreadful. It is a total, final ruin; "they are utterly consumed with terrors." It is the misery of the damned, that the terrors of the Almighty, whom they have made their enemy, fasten upon their guilty consciences, which can neither shelter themselves from them nor strengthen themselves under them; and therefore, not their being, but their bliss, must needs be utterly consumed by them. Not the least degree of comfort or hope remains to them; the higher they were lifted up in their prosperity, the sorer will their fall be when they are cast down into destructions, (for the word is plural,) and suddenly brought into desolation.

3. Their prosperity is therefore not to be envied at all, but despised rather; quod erat demonstrandum,—'which was the point to be established;' ver. 20, "As a dream when one awaketh, so, O Lord, when thou awakest," or 'when they awake' (so some read it) "thou shalt despise their image," their shadow, and make it to vanish. 'In the day of the great judgment,' (so the Chaldee paraphrase reads it,) when they are awaked out of their graves, thou shalt in wrath despise their image; for "they shall rise to shame and everlasting contempt." See here, 1st. What their prosperity now is. It is but an image, a vain show, a fashion of the world that passeth away; it is not real, but imaginary, and it is only a corrupt imagination that makes it a happiness; it is not substance, but a mere shadow, not what it seems to be, nor will it prove what we promise ourselves from it; it is a dream, which may please us a little while we are asleep, yet even then disturbs our repose; but, how pleasing soever it is, it is all but a cheat, all false, when we awake we find it so. A hungry man dreams that he eats, but he wakes and his soul is empty, Isa. xxix. 8. A man is never the more rich or honourable for dreaming he is so. Who, therefore, will envy a man the pleasure of a dream? 2nd. What will be the issue of it. God will awake to judgment, to plead his own and his people's injured cause. They shall be made to awake out of the sleep of their carnal security, and then God shall despise their image; that is, he shall make it to appear to all the world how despicable it is; so that the righteous shall laugh at them, Ps. lii. 6, 7. How did God despise that rich man's image, when he said, "Thou fool, this night thy soul shall be required of thee," Lu. xii. 19, 20. We ought to be of God's mind, for his judgment is according to truth; and not to admire and envy that which he despiseth, and will despise; for sooner or later he will bring all the world to be of his mind.

21 Thus my heart was grieved,
And I was pricked in my reins.
22 So foolish was I, and ignorant:
I was as a beast before thee.
23 Nevertheless I am continually with thee:
Thou hast holden me by my right hand.
24 Thou shalt guide me with thy counsel,
And afterward receive me to glory.
25 Whom have I in heaven but thee?
And there is none upon earth that I desire beside thee.
26 My flesh and my heart faileth: [for ever.
But God is the strength of my heart, and my portion 27 For, lo, they that are far from thee shall perish:
Thou hast destroyed all them that go a whoring from 28 But it is good for me to draw near to God: [thee.
I have put my trust in the Lord GOD,
That I may declare all thy works.

Behold Samson's riddle again unriddled, "Out of the eater came forth meat, and out of the strong sweetness;" for we have here an account of the good improvement which the psalmist made of that sore temptation with which he had been assaulted, and by which he was almost overcome. He that stumbles and doth not fall, by recovering himself takes so much the longer steps forwards. It was so with the psalmist here; divers good lessons he learned from his temptation, his struggles with it, and his victories over it. Nor would God suffer his people to be tempted, if his grace was not sufficient for them, not only to save them harmless, but to make them gainers by it; even this shall work for good.

First. He learned to think very humbly of himself, and to abase and accuse himself before God, ver. 21, 22. He reflects with shame upon the disorder and danger he was in, and the vexation he gave himself by entertaining the temptation, and parleying with it; "My heart was grieved, and I was pricked in my reins," as one afflicted with the acute pain of the stone in the region of the kidneys. If ill thoughts at any time enter into the mind of a good man, he doth not roll them under his tongue as a sweet morsel, but they are grievous and painful to him. Temptation was to Paul as a thorn in the flesh, 2 Cor. xii. 7. This particular temptation, the working of envy and discontent, is as painful as any other; where it constantly rests, it is the rottenness of the bones, Pr. xiv. 30; where it doth but occasionally come, it is the pricking of the reins Fretfulness is a corruption that is its own correction.

Now, in the reflection upon it, 1. He owns it was his folly thus to vex himself: "So foolish was I" to be my own tormentor. Let peevish people thus reproach themselves for, and shame themselves out of, their discontents. What a fool am I thus to make myself uneasy without a cause. 2. He owns it was his ignorance to vex himself at this. So ignorant of that which I might have known and which, if I had known it aright, would have been sufficient to have silenced the fret. "I was as a beast," behemoth, 'a great beast,' "before thee." Beasts mind present things only, and never look before at what is to come; and so did I. If I had not been a great fool, I should never have suffered such a senseless temptation to have prevailed over me so far. What! to envy wicked men upon account of their prosperity! to be ready to wish myself one of them, and to think of changing conditions with them! "so foolish was I." Note, If good men do at any time, through the surprise and strength of temptation, think, or speak, or act amiss, when they see their error they will reflect upon it with sorrow, and shame, and self-abhorrence; will call themselves fools for it; "Surely I am more brutish than any man," Pr. xxx. 2; Job xlii. 5, 6. Thus David, 2 Sam. xxiv. 10.

Secondly. He took occasion from hence to own his dependence and obligations to the grace of God; ver. 23, "Nevertheless," as foolish as I am, "I am continually with thee," and in thy favour, "thou hast holden me by my right hand." This may refer either, 1. To the care God had taken of him, and the kindness he had shewed him all along from his beginning hitherto. He had said in the hour of temptation, ver. 14, "All the day long have I been plagued;" but here he corrects himself for that passionate complaint. Though God has chastened me, he has not cast me off; notwithstanding all the crosses of my life "I have been continually with thee;" I have had thy presence with me, and thou hast been nigh unto me in all that which I have called upon thee for; and therefore, "though perplexed, yet not in despair." Though God has sometimes written bitter things against me, yet he has still "holden me by my right hand," both to keep me that I should not desert him, or fly off from him, and to prevent my sinking and fainting under my burthens, or losing my way in the wildernesses through which I have walked. If we have been kept in the way with God, kept close to our duty, and upheld in our integrity, we must own ourselves indebted to the free grace of God for our preservation; "Having obtained help of God, I continue hitherto." And if he has thus maintained the spiritual life, the earnest of eternal life, we ought not to complain, whatever calamities of this present time we have met with. Or, 2. To the late experience he had had of the power of Divine grace in carrying him through this strong temptation, and bringing him off a conqueror. I was foolish and ignorant, and yet thou hast had compassion on me and taught me, Heb. v. 2, and kept me under thy protection; for the unworthiness of man is no bar to the free grace of God. We must ascribe our safety in temptation, and our victory over it, not to our own wisdom, for we are foolish and ignorant, but to the gracious presence of God with us, and the prevalency of Christ's intercession for us, that our faith may not fail. "My feet were almost gone," and they had quite gone past recovery but that thou hast holden me by my right hand, and so kept me from falling.

Thirdly. He encouraged himself to hope that the same God who had delivered him from this evil work would preserve him to his heavenly kingdom, as St. Paul doth, 2 Tim. iv. 18. I am now upheld by thee, therefore "thou shalt guide me with thy counsel," leading me as thou hast done hitherto by many a difficult step; and being now continually with thee, thou shalt "afterwards receive me to glory," ver. 24. This completes the happiness of the saints, so that they have no reason to envy the worldly prosperity of sinners. Note, 1. All those who commit themselves to God's conduct he will guide with his counsel, with the counsel both of his Word and of his Spirit, the best counsellors. The psalmist had like to have paid dear for following his own counsels in this temptation, and therefore resolves for the future to take God's advice, which shall never be wanting to those that duly seek it with a resolution to follow it. 2. All those that are guided and led by the counsel of God in this world shall be received to his glory in another world. If we make God's glory in us the end we aim at, he will make our glory with him the end we shall for ever be happy in. Upon this consideration let us never envy sinners, but rather bless ourselves in our own blessedness. If God direct us in the way of our duty, and prevent our turning aside out of it, he will afterwards, when our state of trial and preparation is over, receive us to his kingdom and glory, the believing hopes and prospects of which will reconcile us to all the dark providences that now puzzle and perplex us, and ease us of the pain we have been put into by some threatening temptations.

Fourthly. He was hereby quickened to cleave the closer to God, and very much confirmed and comforted in the choice he had made of him, ver. 25, 26. His thoughts here dwell with delight upon his own happiness in God, as much greater than the happiness of the ungodly that prospered in the world. He saw little reason to envy them what they had in the creature, when he found how much more and better, surer and sweeter, comforts he had in the Creator, and what cause he had to please himself with that. He had complained of his afflictions, ver. 14, but this makes them very light and easy. 'All is well, if God be mine.' We have here the breathings of a sanctified soul towards God, and its repose in him, as that to a godly man really which the prosperity of a worldly man is to him in conceit and imagination. "Whom have I in heaven but thee?" There is scarce a verse in all the psalms more expressive than this of the pious and devout affections of a soul to God; here it soars up towards him, follows hard after him, and yet at the same time has an entire satisfaction and complacency in him.

1. It is here supposed that God alone is the felicity and chief good of man. He, and none but he, that made the soul can make it happy. There is none in heaven, none in earth, that can pretend to do it but he.

2. Here are expressed the workings and breathings of a soul towards God accordingly. If God be our felicity,

1st. Then we must have him, ("Whom have I but thee?") we must choose him, and make sure to ourselves an interest in him. What will it avail us that he is the felicity of souls, if he be not the felicity of our souls, and if we do not by a lively faith make him ours, by joining ourselves to him in an everlasting covenant?

2nd. Then our desire must be towards him, and our delight in him. The word signifies both we must delight in what we have of God and desire what we yet farther hope for. Our desires must not only be offered up to God, but they must all terminate in him, desiring nothing more than God, but still more and more of him. This includes all our prayers, Lord give us thyself, as that includes all the promises, "I will be to them a God." "The desire of our souls is to thy name."

3rd. We must prefer him in our choice and desire before any other. First. "There is none in heaven but thee," none to seek to, or trust in, none to court or covet acquaintance with, but thee. God is in himself more glorious than any celestial being, Ps. lxxxix. 6, and must be in our eyes infinitely more desirable. Excellent beings there are in heaven, but God only can make us happy. His favour is infinitely more to us than the refreshments of the dews of heaven, or them down in their exaltation;" the Syriac is, "Thou wilt cast them down when they are exalted." These versions followed a slightly various reading.

lxxiii. 19. The word for "terrors" is otherwise explained "suddenly," or "by sudden death."

lxxiii. 20. For "when thou awakest" the Chaldee has "in wrath," and the Syriac "in the city," but our translation is better.

lxxiii. 21. His heart was moved or troubled, and he was inwardly tormented, before he understood that the prosperity of bad men is the prelude to their ruin.

lxxiii. 22. "As a beast," i.e., stupid.

lxxiii. 23. This verse is omitted from the Syriac in its proper place, but the words "thou hast holden me by my right hand" are added to verse 25. It translates verse 24, "Comfort me with thy counsel, and lead me after thy glory." There seems to have been some fault in the copy.

the benign influence of the stars of heaven; more than the friendship of the saints in heaven, or the good offices of the angels there. Secondly. "I desire none on earth beside thee." Not only none in heaven, a place at a distance, which we have but little acquaintance with, but none on earth neither, where we have many friends, and where much of our present interest and concern lies. Earth carries away the desires of the most of men, and yet none on earth, no persons, no things, no possessions, no delights that I desire besides thee, or with thee, in comparison or competition with thee. We must desire nothing besides God but what we desire for him, (nil præter te, nisi propter te,—'nothing besides thee except for thy sake,) nothing but what we desire from him, and can be content without, so that it be made up in him. We must desire nothing besides God as needful to be a partner with him in making us happy.

4th. Then we must repose ourselves in God with an entire satisfaction, ver. 26. Observe here, First. Great distress and trouble supposed; "My flesh and my heart fails." Note, Others have experienced, and we must expect, the failing both of flesh and heart. The body will fail by sickness, age, and death; and that which touches the bone and the flesh touches us in a tender part, that part of ourselves which we have been but too fond of. When the flesh fails, the heart is ready to fail too; the conduct, and courage, and comfort fails. Secondly. Sovereign relief provided in this distress; But "God is the strength of my heart, and my portion for ever." Note, Gracious souls in their greatest distresses rest upon God as their spiritual strength, and their eternal portion. 1st. "He is the strength of my heart." The rock of my heart, a firm foundation which will bear my weight, and not sink under it. "God the strength of my heart." I have found him so, I do so still, and hope ever to find him so. In the distress supposed, he had put the case of a double failure, both flesh and heart fail, but in the relief he fastens on a single support; he leaves out the flesh and the consideration of that, it is enough that God is the strength of his heart. He speaks as one careless of the body,—let that fail, there is no remedy; but concerned about the soul,—to be strengthened in the inner man. 2nd. He is "my portion for ever." He will not only support me while I am here, but make me happy when I go hence. The saints choose God for their portion, they have him for their portion, and it is their happiness that he will be their portion, a portion that will last as long as the immortal soul lasts.

Fifthly. He was fully convinced of the miserable estate of all wicked people. This he learned in the sanctuary upon this occasion, and he would never forget it; ver. 27, "Lo, they that are far from thee," in a state of distance and estrangement, that desire the Almighty to depart from them, they shall certainly perish; so shall their doom be; they choose to be far from God, and they shall be far from him for ever. "Thou shalt" justly "destroy all them that go a whoring from thee," that is, all apostates that in profession have been betrothed to God, but forsake him, their duty to him, and their communion with him, to embrace the bosom of a stranger. The doom is severe, no less than perishing and being destroyed. It is universal, they shall all be destroyed, without exception; it is certain, "thou hast destroyed;" it is as sure to be done as if done already; and the destruction of some is an earnest of the perdition of all ungodly men. God himself undertakes to do it, into whose hands it is a fearful thing to fall; "Thou," though infinite in goodness, yet wilt reckon for thine injured honour and abused patience, and "wilt destroy them that go a whoring from thee."

Sixthly. He was mightily encouraged to cleave to God, and to confide in him; ver. 28, if "they that are far from God shall perish," then 1. Let this oblige us to communion with God. If it fare so ill with those that live at a distance from him, then it is good, very good, the chief good,—that good for a man in this life which he should most carefully pursue and secure,—it is best for me to draw near to God, and to have God draw near to me. The original may take in both; 'But for my part,' (so I would read it,) 'the approach of God is good for me.' Our drawing near to God takes rise from his drawing near to us; and it is the happy meeting that makes the bliss. Here is a great truth laid down, that it is good to draw near to God; but the life of it lies in the application: "it is good for me." Those are wise who know what is good for themselves. Why, saith he, (and every good man agrees with him in it,) "it is good for me to draw near to God;" it is my duty, it is my interest. 2. Let us therefore live in a continual dependence upon him; "I have put my trust in the Lord God," and will never go a whoring from him after any créature confidences. If wicked men, notwithstanding all their prosperity, shall perish and be destroyed, then let us trust in the Lord God; in him, not in them: see Ps. cxlvi. 3—5; in him, and not in our worldly prosperity. Let us trust in God, and neither fret at them nor be afraid of them; let us trust in him for a better portion than theirs is. 3. While we do so, let us not doubt but that we shall have occasion to praise his name. Let us trust in the Lord, that we may declare all his works. Note, Those that with an upright heart put their trust in God shall never want matter for thanksgiving to him.

PSALM LXXIV.

This psalm doth so particularly describe the destruction of Jerusalem and the temple by Nebuchadnezzar, and the army of the Chaldeans, and can so hardly be applied to any other event we meet with in the Jewish history, that interpreters incline to think either it was penned by David, or Asaph in David's time, with a prophetical reference to that sad event, which yet is not so probable; or that it was penned by another Asaph that lived at the time of the captivity, or by Jeremiah, (for it is of a piece with his Lamentations,) or some other prophet, and after the return out of captivity was delivered to the sons of Asaph, who were called by his name, for the public service of the church; and that was the most eminent family of the singers in Ezra's time: see Ezr. ii. 41; iii. 10; Neh. xi. 17, 22; xii. 35, 46. The deplorable case of the people of God at that time is here spread before the Lord, and left with him. The prophet, in the name of the church, I. Puts in complaining pleas of the miseries they suffered, for the quickening of their desire in prayer, ver. 1—11. II. He puts in comfortable pleas for the encouraging of their faith in prayer, ver. 12—17. III. He concludes with divers petitions to God for deliverances, ver. 18—23. In singing it we must be affected with the former desolations of the church, for we are members of the same body, and may apply it to any present distresses or desolations of any part of the Christian church.

Maschil of Asaph.

O GOD, why hast thou cast us off for ever?
Why doth thine anger smoke against the sheep of thy pasture? [of old;

2 Remember thy congregation, which thou hast purchased
The rod of thine inheritance, which thou hast redeemed;
This mount Zion, wherein thou hast dwelt.

3 Lift up thy feet unto the perpetual desolations;
Even all that the enemy hath done wickedly in the sanctuary.

4 Thine enemies roar in the midst of thy congregations;
They set up their ensigns for signs

5 A man was famous according as he had lifted up
Axes upon the thick trees.

FELLING TREES IN LEBANON.

6 But now they break down the carved work thereof at once
With axes and hammers.

7 They have cast fire into thy sanctuary,
They have defiled by casting down the dwelling place of thy name to the ground.

8 They said in their hearts, Let us destroy them together:
They have burned up all the synagogues of God in the land.

9 We see not our signs:
There is no more any prophet:
Neither is there among us any that knoweth how long.

10 O God, how long shall the adversary reproach?
Shall the enemy blaspheme thy name for ever?

11 Why withdrawest thou thy hand, even thy right hand?
Pluck it out of thy bosom.

This psalm is entitled, Maschil, a psalm to give instruction; for it was penned in a day of affliction, which is intended for instruction; and this instruction in general it gives us, that when we are upon any account in distress it is our wisdom and duty to apply ourselves to God by faithful and fervent prayer, and we shall not find it in vain to do so. Three things they here complain of:

First. The displeasure of God against them, as that which was the cause and bitterness of all their calamities. They look above the instruments of their trouble, who they knew could have no power against them, unless it were given them from above, and keep their eye upon God, by whose determined counsel they were delivered up into the hands of wicked and unreasonable men. Observe, The liberty they take to expostulate with God, ver. 1: and, we hope, not too great a liberty; for Christ himself upon the cross, cried out, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" so the church here, "O God, why hast thou forsaken us for ever?" Here they speak according to their present dark and melancholy apprehensions; for otherwise. "Hath God cast away his people? God forbid," Rom. xi. 1. The people of God must not think that, because they are cast down, they are therefore cast off; that because men cast them off therefore God doth; and that because he seems to cast them off for a time, therefore they are really cast off for ever: yet this expostulation intimates that they dreaded God's casting them off more than any thing,—that they desired to be owned of him, whatever they suffered from men; and were desirous to know wherefore he thus contended with them; "Why doth thine anger smoke?" that is, why doth it rise up to such a degree that all about us take notice of it, and ask, "What meaneth the heat of this great anger?" Deu. xxix. 24. Compare ver. 20, where the anger of the Lord and his jealousy are said to smoke against sinners. Observe what they plead with God, now they lay under the tokens and apprehensions of his wrath.

1. They plead their relation to him; "We are the sheep of thy pasture," the sheep wherewith thou hast been pleased to stock thy pasture; thy peculiar people whom thou art pleased to set apart for thyself, and design for thine own glory. That the wolves worry the sheep is not strange, but was ever any shepherd thus displeased at his own sheep? "Remember, we are thy congregation," ver. 2; incorporated by thee, and for thee, and devoted to thy praise; we are "the rod," or tribe "of thine inheritance," whom thou hast been pleased to claim a special property in, above other people, Deu. xxxii. 9, and from whom thou hast received the rents and issues of praise and worship more than from the neighbour nations. Nay, a man's inheritance may lie at a great distance, but we are pleading for mount Zion, wherein thou hast dwelt, which has been the place of thy peculiar delight and residence, thy demesne and mansion.

2. They plead the great things God had done for them, and the vast expence he had been at upon them. It is thy congregation, which thou hast not only made with a word's speaking, but purchased of old, by many miracles of mercy, when they were first formed into a people. It is "thine inheritance which thou hast redeemed." When they were sold into servitude, God gave Egypt to ruin lxxiii. 27. The second clause is spoken of individuals, "thou rootest out every one who apostatises from thee." Apostacy from God is continually represented as adultery.

lxxiv. Title. This psalm was manifestly written during a time of national calamity. Some have referred it to the profanations and persecutions of Antiochus Epiphanes. By others it has been ascribed to the Babylonian captivity. Theodoret regards it as prophetic of the final overthrow of the Jews by the Romans. The psalm has also been considered to foreshadow the calamities of the Church. The principal objection to its being referred to the captivity at Babylon is founded on the statement of verse 9, that there are no prophets, whereas at that time there were several. That the writer dwelt at Jerusalem may be fairly inferred from verse 2: "this mount Zion." The reference to the burning of "the synagogues," or sanctuaries, in verse 8, suggests a later date than the time of Asaph, and one as late as the return of the captives for their ransom, gave men for them, and people for their life, Isa. xliii. 3, 4. Now, Lord, wilt thou now abandon a people that cost thee so dear, and has been so dear to thee? And if the redemption of Israel out of Egypt was an encouragement to hope that he would not cast them off, much more reason have we to hope that God will not cast off any whom Christ has redeemed with his own blood; but the people of his purchase shall be for ever the people of his praise.

3. They plead the calamitous state that they were in; ver. 3, "Lift up thy feet," that is, come with speed to repair the desolations that are made in thy sanctuary, which otherwise will be perpetual and irreparable. It has been sometimes said that the Divine vengeance strikes with iron hands, yet it comes with leaden feet; and then those who wait for the day of the Lord cry, "Lord, lift up thy feet," exalt thy steps; that is, magnify thyself in the outgoing of thy providence. When the desolations of the sanctuary have continued long, we are tempted to think they will be perpetual. But it is a temptation; for God will avenge his own elect, will avenge them speedily, though he bear long with their oppressors and persecutors.

Secondly. They complain of the outrage and cruelty of their enemies. Not so much, no, not at all, of what they had done to the prejudice of their secular interests,—here are no complaints of the burning of their cities, and ravaging of their country,—but only what they had done against the sanctuary, and the synagogue. The concerns of religion should lie nearer our hearts, and affect us more, than any worldly concern whatsoever. The desolation of God's house should grieve us more than the desolation of our own houses; for the matter is not great what comes of us and our families in this world, provided God's name may be sanctified, his kingdom may come, and his will be done.

1. He complains of the desolations of the sanctuary, as Daniel, ch. ix. 17. The temple at Jerusalem was the dwelling-place of God's name, and therefore the sanctuary or holy place, ver. 7. In this the enemies did wickedly, ver. 3; for they destroyed it in downright contempt of God, and affront to him. 1st. They roared in the midst of God's congregations. There, where God's faithful people attended on him with an humble, reverent silence, or softly speaking, they roared in a riotous, revelling manner; being very jovial that they had made themselves masters of that sanctuary which they had sometimes heard formidable things of. 2nd. "They set up their ensigns for signs." The banners of their army they set up in the temple (Israel's strongest castle, as long as they kept close to God,) as trophies of their victory. There, where the signs of God's presence used to be, now the enemy had set up their ensigns. This daring defiance of God and his power touched his people in a tender part. 3rd. They took a pride in destroying the carved work of the temple. As much as formerly men thought it an honour to lend a hand to the building of the temple, and he was thought famous that helped to fell timber for that work, so much now they valued themselves upon their agency in destroying it, ver. 5, 6. Thus, as when time was those were celebrated for wise men that did service to religion, so now they are cried up for wits that help to run it down. Some read it thus, 'They shew themselves, as one that lifts up axes on high in a thicket of trees;' for so do they break down the carved work of the temple. They make no more scruple of breaking down the rich wainscot of the temple than wood-cutters do of hewing trees in the forest; such indignation have they at the sanctuary, that the most curious carving that ever was seen is beaten down by the common soldiers, without any regard had to it either as a dedicated thing or as a piece of exquisite art. 4th. They set fire to it, and so violated or destroyed it to the ground, ver. 7. The Chaldeans burnt the house of God, that stately, costly fabric, 2 Chr. xxxvi. 19; and the Romans left not there one stone upon another, Mat. xxiv. 2; razing it, razing it even to the foundations, till Zion, the holy mountain, was by Titus Vespasian ploughed as a field.

2. He complains of the desolations of the synagogues, or schools of the prophets, which before the captivity were in use, though much more after. There God's Word was read and expounded, and his name praised and called upon, without altars or sacrifices. These also they had a spite to; ver. 8, "Let us destroy them together," not only the temple, but all the places of religious worship, and the worshippers with them; "Let us destroy them together," let them be consumed in the same flame. Pursuant to this impious resolve, "they burnt up all the synagogues of God in the land," and laid them all waste. So great was their rage against religion, that the religious houses, because religious, were all levelled with the ground, that God's worshippers might not glorify God, and edify one another, by meeting in solemn assemblies.

Thirdly. The great aggravation of all these calamities was, that they had no prospect at all of relief, nor could they foresee an end of them, ver. 9. We see our enemy's sign set up in the sanctuary, but "we see not our signs," none of the tokens of God's presence, no hopeful indications of approaching deliverance; there is no more any prophet to tell us how long the trouble will last, and when things concerning us shall have an end, that the hopes of an issue at last may support us under our troubles. In the captivity in Babylon they had prophets, and had been told how long the captivity should continue, but the day was cloudy and dark, Eze. xxxiv. 12, and they had not as yet the comfort of these gracious discoveries. God spoke once, yea twice, good words, and comfortable words, but they perceived them not. Observe, They do not complain, We see not our armies; there are no men of war to command our forces, nor any to go forth with our hosts; but, no prophets,—none to tell us how long.

This puts them upon expostulating with God, as delaying, 1. To assert his honour; ver. 10, "How long shall the adversary reproach and blaspheme thy name?" In the desolations of the sanctuary, our chief concern should be for the glory of God, that that may not be injured by the blasphemies of those who persecute his people for his sake, because they are his; and therefore our inquiry should be, not how long shall we be troubled, but how long shall God be blasphemed? 2. To exert his power; ver. 11, "Why withdrawest thou thy hand," and dost not stretch it out to deliver thy people, and destroy thine enemies? "Pluck it out of thy bosom," and be not "as a man astonied, as a mighty man that cannot save," or will not, Jer. xiv. 9. When the power of enemies is most threatening, it is comfortable to fly to the power of God.

12 For God is my King of old,
Working salvation in the midst of the earth
13 Thou didst divide the sea by thy strength:
Thou brakest the heads of the dragons in the waters.
14 Thou brakest the heads of leviathan in pieces,
And gavest him to be meat to the people inhabiting the wilderness
15 Thou didst cleave the fountain and the flood:
Thou driedst up mighty rivers.
16 The day is thine, the night also is thine:
Thou hast prepared the light and the sun.
17 Thou hast set all the borders of the earth:
Thou hast made summer and winter.

The lamenting church fastens upon something here which she calls to mind, and therefore hath she hope, as Lam. iii. 21, and with which she encourageth herself, and silenceth her own complaints. Two things quiet the minds of those that are here sorrowing for the solemn assembly:

First. That God is the God of Israel, a God in covenant with his people; ver. 12, "God is my king of old." This comes in both as a plea in prayer to God, Ps. xliv. 4, "Thou art my King, O God," and as a prop to their own faith and hope, to encourage themselves to expect deliverance, considering the days of old, Ps. lxxvii. 5. The church speaks as a complex body, the same in every age, and therefore calls God, my King, my King of old, or from antiquity; that is, he has of old put himself into that relation to them, and has appeared and acted for them in that relation. As Israel's King he has wrought salvation in the midst of the nations of the earth; for what he has done in the government of the world has tended towards the salvation of his church. Several things are here mentioned which God had done for his people as their King of old, which encouraged them to commit themselves to him, and depend upon him.

1. He had divided the sea before them when they came out of Egypt, not by the strength of Moses or his rod, but by his own strength; and he that could do that could do any thing.

2. He had destroyed Pharaoh and the Egyptians. Pharaoh was the leviathan, the Egyptians were the dragons, fierce and cruel. Observe, 1st. The victory obtained over these enemies. God broke their heads, baffled their politics, when Israel, the more they were afflicted by them, the more they multiplied; crushed their powers, though complicated; ruined their country by ten plagues; and at last drowned them all in the Red sea; "This is Pharaoh and all his multitude," Eze. xxi. 18. It was the Lord's doing, none but he could do it, and he did it with a strong hand and outstretched arm. This was typical of Christ's victory over Satan and his kingdom, pursuant to the first promise, that the seed of the woman should break the serpent's head. 2nd. The improvement of this victory for the encouragement of the church. "Thou gavest him to be meat to the people of Israel" now going to inhabit the wilderness. The spoil of the Egyptians enriched them; they stripped their slain, and so got the Egyptians' arms and weapons, as before they had got their jewels. Or rather, this providence was meat to their faith and hope, to support and encourage them in reference to the other difficulties they were likely to meet with in the wilderness. It was part of the spiritual meat which they were all made to eat of. Note, The breaking of the heads of the church's enemies is the joy and strength of the hearts of the church's friends. Thus the companions make a banquet even of leviathan, Job xli. 6.

3. God had both ways altered the course of nature, both in fetching streams out of the rock and turning streams into rock, ver. 15. 1st. He had dissolved the rock into waters, 'Thou didst bring out the fountain and the flood,' so some read it, and every one knows whence it was brought: out of the rock, out of the flinty rock. Let this never be forgotten, but let it especially be remembered, that that rock was Christ, and the waters out of it spiritual drink. 2nd. He had congealed the waters into rock. "Thou driedst up mighty" rapid "rivers," Jordan particularly, at the time when it overflowed all its banks. He that did these things could now deliver his oppressed people, and break the yoke of the oppressors, as he had done formerly; nay, he would do it, for his justice and goodness, his wisdom and truth, are still the same, as well as his power.

Secondly. That the God of Israel is the God of nature, ver. 16, 17. It is he that orders the regular successions and revolutions, 1. Of day and night. He is the Lord of all time; the evening and the morning are of his ordaining; it is he that opens the eyelids of the morning light, and draws the curtains of the evening shadow. 'He hath prepared the moon and the sun,' so some read it; the two great lights, to rule by day and by night alternately. The preparing of them notes their constant readiness and exact observance of their time, which they never miss a moment. 2. Of summer and winter. Thou hast appointed all the bounds of the earth, and the different climates of its several regions, for "thou hast made summer and winter," both frigid and torrid zone; or, rather, the constant revolutions of the year, and its several seasons. Herein we are to acknowledge God, from whom all the laws and powers of nature are derived; but how doth this come in here? 1st. He that had power at first to settle, and still to preserve, this course of nature by the diurnal and annual motions of the heavenly bodies, has certainly all power both to save and to destroy, and with him nothing is impossible, nor any difficulties or oppositions insuperable. 2nd. He that is faithful to his covenant with the day and with the night, and preserves the ordinances of heaven inviolable, will certainly make good his promise to his people, and never cast off those whom he has chosen, Jer. xxxi. 35, 36; xxxiii. 20, 21. His covenant with Abraham and his seed is as firm as that with Noah and his sons, Gen. viii. 21. 3rd. Day and night, summer and winter, being counterchanged in the course of nature throughout all the borders of the earth, we can expect no other, but that trouble and peace, prosperity and adversity, should be in like manner counterchanged in all the borders of the church. We have as much reason to expect afflictions as to expect night and winter. But we have then no more reason to despair of the return of comfort than we have to despair of day and summer.

18 Remember this, that the enemy hath reproached, O LORD,
And that the foolish people have blasphemed thy name.
19 O deliver not the soul of thy turtledove unto the multitude of the wicked:
Forget not the congregation of thy poor for ever.
20 Have respect unto the covenant: [of cruelty
For the dark places of the earth are full of the habitations 21 O let not the oppressed return ashamed:
Let the poor and needy praise thy name.
22 Arise, O God, plead thine own cause:
Remember how the foolish man reproacheth thee daily.
23 Forget not the voice of thine enemies:
The tumult of those that rise up against thee increaseth continually.

from Babylon. We must not press too closely such expressions as those in verse 9.

lxxiv. 2. The word rendered "rod" also means "sceptre" and "tribe." It is doubtful in which sense the psalmist used it here, but it signifies that which was God's heritage.

lxxiv. 3. "Perpetual desolations" must indicate long-continued ruin, and is a phrase which favours the opinion that the psalm was written after the return from the captivity.

lxxiv. 4. Those who apply this psalm to the sacrilege of Antiochus Epiphanes compare this verse and the following with 1 Macc. i. 30—67; 2 Macc. v. 24—27; vi. 1—7; and Josephus, "Antiq.," xii. 7.

lxxiv. 5. This verse may be almost literally translated, "He is known like one who bringeth down axes on a thicket of trees." The enemy mentioned in verse 3 seems to be meant, and his work is described in verse 6 as one of destruction.

lxxiv. 6. The carved work "thereof," or "of it," i.e. of the

The psalmist here, in the name of the church, most earnestly begs that God would appear for them against their enemies, and put an end to their present troubles; and to encourage his own faith he interests God in this matter; ver. 22, "Arise, O God, plead thine own cause." This we may be sure he will do, for he is jealous for his own honour; whatever is his own cause he will plead it with a strong hand, will appear against those that oppose it, and with and for those that cordially espouse it. He will arise and plead it. Though for a time he seems to neglect it, he will stir up himself, will manifest himself, will do his own work in his own time. Note, The cause of religion is God's own cause, and he will certainly plead it. Now, to make it out that the cause is God's, he pleads,

First. That the persecutors are God's sworn enemies. Lord, they have not only abused us, but they have been and are abusive to thee; what is done against us for thy sake doth by consequence reflect upon thee. But that is not all; they have directly and immediately reproached thee, and blasphemed thy name, ver. 18. This was that which they roared in the sanctuary; they triumphed as if they had now got the mastery of the God of Israel, of whom they had heard such great things. As nothing grieves the saints more than to hear God's name blasphemed, so nothing encourageth them more to hope that God will appear against their enemies than when they are arrived to such a pitch of wickedness as to reproach God himself; this fills the measure of their sins apace, and hastens their ruin. The psalmist insists much upon this: We dare not answer their reproaches; Lord, do thou answer them. "Remember that the foolish people have blasphemed thy name," ver. 18, and that still "the foolish man reproacheth thee daily." Observe the character of those that reproach God; they are foolish. As atheism is folly, Ps. xiv. 1, so is profaneness and blasphemy no less so. Perhaps they are cried up for the wits of the age that ridicule religion and sacred things; but really they are the greatest fools, and will shortly be made to appear so before all the world. And yet see their malice—They reproach God daily, as constantly as his faithful worshippers pray to him, and praise him—Their impudence; they do not hide their blasphemous thoughts in their own bosoms, but proclaim them with a loud voice; "Forget not the voice of thine enemies," ver. 23; and this with a daring defiance of Divine justice—They rise up against thee; and by their blasphemies even wage war with heaven, and take up arms against the Almighty. 'Their noise and tumult ascendeth continually,' (so some,) as the cry of Sodom came up before God calling for vengeance, Gen. xviii. 21. It "increaseth continually," (so we read it,) they grow worse and worse, and are hardened in their impieties by their successes. Now, Lord, remember this, do not forget it; God needs not to be put in remembrance by us of what he has to do, but thus we must shew our concern for his honour, and believe that he will vindicate us.

Secondly. That the persecuted are his covenant people.

1. See what distress they are in. They are fallen into the hands of "the multitude of the wicked," ver. 19. How are they increased that trouble them? There is no standing before an enraged multitude, especially as these, armed with power; and as they are numerous so are they barbarous, "the dark places of the earth are full of the habitations of cruelty." The land of the Chaldeans, where there was none of the light of the knowledge of the true God, though otherwise it was famed for learning and arts, was indeed a dark place; the inhabitants of it were alienated from the life of God, through the ignorance that was in them, and therefore they were cruel. Where there was no true divinity, there was scarce to be found common humanity; they were especially cruel to the people of God: certainly they have no knowledge who eat them up, Ps. xiv. 4. They are oppressed, ver. 21, because they are poor, and unable to right themselves; they are oppressed, and so impoverished and made poor.

2. See what reason they had to hope that God would appear for their relief, and not suffer them to be always thus trampled upon. Observe how the psalmist pleads with God for them. 1st. It is thy turtle-dove that is ready to be swallowed up by the multitude of the wicked, ver. 19. The church is a dove for harmlessness and mildness, innocency and inoffensiveness, purity and fruitfulness; a dove for mournfulness in a day of distress; a turtle-dove for fidelity, and the constancy of love. Turtle-doves and pigeons were the only fowl that were offered in sacrifice to God: shall thy turtle-dove, that is true to thee, and devoted to thine honour, be delivered, its life and soul and all, into the hand of the multitude of the wicked, to whom it will soon become an easy and acceptable prey? Lord, it will be thine honour to help the weak, especially to help thine own. 2nd. It is the congregation of thy poor; and they are not the less thine for their being poor, for God hath chosen the poor of the world, Jas. ii. 5. But they have the more reason to expect thou wilt appear for them because they are many: it is the congregation of thy poor; let them not be abandoned and forgotten for ever. 3rd. They are in covenant with thee; and wilt thou not have respect unto the covenant? ver. 20. Wilt thou not perform the promises thou hast in thy covenant made to them? wilt thou not own them whom thou hast brought into the bond of thy covenant? When God delivers his people, it is in remembrance of his covenant, Lev. xxvi. 42. Lord, though we are unworthy to be respected, yet have respect to the covenant. 4th. They trust in thee, and boast of their relation to thee, and expectations from thee; O let not them return ashamed of their hope, ver. 21, as they will be if they be disappointed. 5th. If thou deliver them, they will praise thy name, and give thee the glory of their deliverance. Appear, Lord, for those that will praise thy name, against those that blaspheme it.

PSALM LXXV.

Though this psalm is attributed to Asaph in the title, yet it doth so exactly agree with David's circumstances at his coming to the crown after the death of Saul, that most interpreters apply it to that juncture, and suppose that either Asaph penned it in the person of David, as his poet-laureate, (probably the substance of the psalm was some speech which David made to a convention of the states at his accession to the government, and Asaph turned it into verse, and published it in a poem, for the better spreading of it among the people,) or that David penned it, and delivered it to Asaph as precentor of the temple. In this psalm, I. David returns God thanks for bringing him to the throne, ver. 1, 9. II. He promiseth to lay out himself for the public good, in the use of the power God had given him, ver. 2, 3, 10. III. He checks the insolence of those that opposed his coming to the throne, ver. 4, 5. IV. He fetcheth a reason for all this from God's sovereign dominion in the affairs of the children of men, ver. 6—8. In singing this psalm, we must give to God the glory of all the revolutions of states and kingdoms, believing that they are all according to his counsel, and that he will make them all to work for the good of his church.

To the chief Musician, Al-taschith, A Psalm or Song of Asaph.

UNTO thee, O God, do we give thanks,
Unto thee do we give thanks:
For that thy name is near thy wondrous works declare.

2 When I shall receive the congregation
I will judge uprightly.
3 The earth and all the inhabitants thereof are dissolved:
I bear up the pillars of it. Selah.
4 I said unto the fools, Deal not foolishly:
And to the wicked, Lift not up the horn:
5 Lift not up your horn on high:
Speak not with a stiff neck.

In these verses,

First. The psalmist gives to God the praise of his advancement to honour and power, and other the great things he had done for him and for his people Israel; ver. 1, "Unto thee, O God, do we give thanks," for all the favours thou hast bestowed upon us; and again, "Unto thee do we give thanks," for our thanksgivings must be often repeated. Did we not often pray for a mercy when we were in pursuit of it, and shall we think it will suffice once or twice to give thanks when we have obtained it? Not only I do give thanks, but we do; I and all my friends. If we share with others in their mercies, we must join with them in their praises unto thee, O God, the author of our mercies; and we will not give that glory to the instruments which is due to thee only. "For that thy name is near,"—that is, that the complete accomplishment of thy promise made to David is not far off,—"thy wondrous works" which thou hast already done for him do "declare." Note, 1. There are many works which God doth for his people that may truly be called wondrous works, out of the common course of providence, and quite beyond our expectation. 2. These wondrous works declare the nearness of his name. They shew that he himself is at hand, nigh to us in what we call upon him for; and that he is about to do some great things for his people, in pursuance of his purpose and promise. 3. When God's wondrous works declare the nearness of his name, it is our duty to give him thanks; again and again to give him thanks.

Secondly. He lays himself under an obligation to use his power well, pursuant to the great trust reposed in him; ver. 2, "When I shall receive the congregation, I will judge uprightly." Here he takes it for granted that God would in due time perfect that which concerned him; that though the congregation was very slow in gathering to him, and great opposition was made to it, yet at length he should receive it; for what God hath spoken in his holiness he will perform by his wisdom and power. Being thus in expectation of the mercy, he promiseth to make conscience of his duty; When I am a judge, I will judge, and judge uprightly; not as those that went before me, who either neglected judgment, or, which was worse, perverted it; either did no good with their power or did hurt. Note, 1. Those that are advanced to posts of honour must remember they are posts of service, and must set themselves with diligence and application of mind to do the work to which they are called. He doth not say, When I shall receive the congregation, I will take my ease, and take state upon me, and leave the public business to others; but, I will mind it myself. 2. Public trusts are to be managed with great integrity. They that judge must judge uprightly, according to the rules of justice, without respect of persons.

Thirdly. He promiseth himself that his government would be a public blessing to Israel, ver. 3. The present state of the kingdom was very bad; "The earth and all the inhabitants thereof are dissolved," and no marvel, when the former reign was so dissolute; all went to wreck and ruin. There was a general corruption of manners for want of putting the laws in execution against vice and profaneness. They were divided one from another for want of centring, as they ought to do, in the government God had appointed. They were all to pieces, two against three, and three against two, crumbled into factions and parties, which was likely to issue in their ruin; but "I bear up the pillars of it." Even in Saul's time David did what he could towards the public welfare, but he hoped when he had himself received the congregation he should do much more, and should not only prevent the public ruin, but recover the public strength and beauty. Now, 1. See the mischief of parties. They melt and dissolve a land, and the inhabitants of it. 2. See how much one head many times holds up. The fabric had sunk if David had not held up the pillars of it. This may well be applied to Christ and his government. The world and all the inhabitants of it were dissolved by sin; man's apostacy threatened the destruction of the whole creation; but Christ bore up the pillars of it: he saved the whole world from utter ruin, by saving his people from their sins, and into his hand the administration of the kingdom of providence is committed, for "he upholdeth all things by the word of his power," Heb. i. 3.

Fourthly. He checks those that opposed his government, that were against his accession to it, and obstructed the administration of it; striving to keep up that vice and profaneness which he made it his business to suppress; ver. 4, 5, "I said unto the fools, Deal not foolishly." He had said so to them in Saul's time. When he had not power to restrain them, yet he had wisdom and grace to reprove them, and to give them good counsel; though they bore themselves high upon the favour of that unhappy prince, he cautioned them not to be too presumptuous. Or, rather, he doth now say so to them. As soon as he came to the crown, he issued out a proclamation against vice and profaneness, and here we have the contents of it. 1. To the simple sneaking sinners, the tools in Israel, that corrupted themselves, to them he said, "Deal not foolishly;" do not act so directly contrary both to your reason and to your interest as you do while you walk contrary to the laws God has given Israel, and the promises he has made to David. Christ, the son of David, gives us this counsel, issues out this edict, Deal not foolishly. He who is made of God to us wisdom bids us be wise for ourselves, and not make fools of ourselves. 2. To the proud daring sinners, the wicked, that set God himself at defiance, he saith, "Lift not up the horn;" brag not of your power and prerogatives, persist not in your contumacy and contempt of the government set over you; "Lift not up your horn on high," as though you could have what you will, and do what you will; "speak not with a stiff neck," in which is an iron sinew, that will never bend to the will of God in the government; for they that will not bend shall break; they whose necks are stiffened are so to their own destruction. This is Christ's word of command in his Gospel, that every mountain will be brought low before him, Isa. xl. 4. Let not the anti-christian power, with its heads and horns, lift up itself against him, for it shall certainly be broken to pieces; what is said with a stiff neck must be unsaid again with a broken heart, or we are undone. Pharaoh said with a stiff neck, "Who is the Lord?" but God made him know to his cost.

sanctuary; another allusion to verse 3. Translate this verse, "And now its carved work they beat down together, with axe and hammer."

lxxiv. 7. Compare herewith 2 Kings xxv. 9. The second clause is literally, "They profaned the habitation of thy name to the ground"—i.e., they utterly profaned it.

lxxiv. 8. The ancient versions here are nearly all wrong. We may render, "They said in their heart, We will extirpate them altogether," &c. For "synagogues" the Syriac translates "festival," and so also the Greek; but our version may be accepted as more correct than these, which, indeed, seem to have followed a different reading for the verb: "Let us bring to an end," &c.

lxxiv. 13. Neither the "dragons" of the text nor the "whales" of the margin can be correct. The word tanninim means any large animals which live in water, and here, no doubt, refers to crocodiles. The language is figurative, and applies to Egypt, and the rescue or exodus of Israel.

He putteth down one, and setteth up another.
8 For in the hand of the LORD there is a cup,
And the wine is red; it is full of mixture;
And he poureth out of the same:
But the dregs thereof, all the wicked of the earth shall wring them out, and drink them.
9 But I will declare for ever;
I will sing praises to the God of Jacob.
10 All the horns of the wicked also will I cut off;
But the horns of the righteous shall be exalted

In these verses we have two great doctrines laid down, and two good inferences drawn from them, for the confirmation of what he had before said:

First. Here are two things laid down concerning God's government of the world, which we ought to mix faith with, both pertinent to the occasion.

1. That from God alone kings receive their power, ver. 6, 7; and therefore to God alone David would give the praise of his advancement; therefore, having his power from God, he would use it for him; and therefore they were fools that lifted up the horn against him. We see strange revolutions in states and kingdoms, and are surprised at the sudden disgrace of some, and elevation of others; we are all full of such changes when they happen; but here we are directed to look at the author of them, and are here taught where the original of power is, and whence promotion comes. Whence comes preferment to kingdoms, to the sovereignty of them? and whence come preferments in kingdoms to places of power and trust in them? The former depends not upon the will of the people, nor the latter on the will of the prince, but both on the will of God, who has all hearts in his hands; to him therefore those must look that are in pursuit of preferment, and then they begin right. We are here told,

1st. Negatively, which way we are not to look for the fountain of power. "Promotion comes neither from the east nor from the west, nor from the desert," that is, neither from the desert on the north of Jerusalem, nor from that on the south; so that the fair gale of preferment is not to be expected to blow from any point of the compass, but only from above, directly from thence. Men cannot gain promotion either by the wisdom or wealth of the children of the East, or by the numerous forces of the isles of the Gentiles that lay westward, or those of Egypt or Arabia that lay south. No concurring smiles of second causes will raise men to preferment without the First Cause. The learned Bishop Lloyd (Serm. in loc.) gives this gloss upon it. All men took the original of power to be from heaven, but from whom there they knew not. The Eastern nations, who were generally given to astrology, took it to come from their stars, especially the sun, their god; No, saith David, it comes neither from the east nor from the west, neither from the rising or setting of such a planet, or such a constellation, nor from the south, not from the exaltation of the sun, or any star in the mid heaven. He mentions not the north, because none supposed it to come from thence, or because the same word that signifies the north signifies the secret place, and from the secret of God's counsel it doth come; or from the oracle in Zion, which lay on the north side of Jerusalem. Note, No wind so good as to blow promotion, but as he directs who hath the winds in his fists.

2nd. Positively; "God is the judge," the governor or umpire. When parties contend for the prize, "he puts down one, and sets up another," as he sees fit, so as to serve his own purposes, and bring to pass his own counsels. Herein he acts by prerogative, and is not accountable to us for any of these matters; nor is it any damage, danger, or disgrace that He, who is infinitely wise, holy, and good, has an arbitrary and despotic power to set up and put down whom and when and how he pleaseth. This is a good reason why magistrates should rule for God, as those that must give account to him, because it is by him that kings reign.

2. That from God alone all must receive their doom; ver. 8, "In the hand of the Lord there is a cup," which he puts into the hands of the children of men; a cup of providence, mixed up (as he thinks fit) of many ingredients; a cup of affliction. The sufferings of Christ are called a cup, Mat. xx. 22; Jno. xviii. 11; the judgments of God upon sinners are "the cup of the Lord's right hand," Hab. ii. 16. "The wine is red," noting the wrath of God which is infused into the judgments executed on sinners, and is the wormwood and the gall in the affliction and the misery. It is red as fire, red as blood, for it burns, it kills. "It is full of mixture" prepared in wisdom, so as to answer the end. There are mixtures of mercy and grace in the cup of affliction, when it is put into the hands of God's own people; mixtures of the curse when it is put into the hands of the wicked; it is wine mingled with gall. These vials, 1st. Are poured out upon all: see Rev. xv. 7, xvi. 1, where we read of the angels pouring out the vials of God's wrath upon the earth. Some drops of this wrath may light on good people; when God's judgments are abroad, they have their share in common calamities. But, 2nd. The dregs of the cup are reserved for the wicked. The calamity itself is but the vehicle into which the wrath and curse is infused, the top of which has little of the infusion; but the sediment is pure wrath, and that shall fall to the share of sinners. They have the dregs of the cup now in the terrors of conscience; and hereafter in the torments of hell. They shall wring them out, that not a drop of the wrath may be left behind, and they shall drink them, for the curse shall "enter into their bowels like water, and like oil into their bones." The cup of the Lord's indignation will be to them a cup of trembling, everlasting trembling, Rev. xiv. 10. The wicked man's cup while he prospers in the world is full of mixture, but the worst is at the bottom. The wicked are reserved unto the day of judgment.

Secondly. Here are two good practical inferences drawn from these great truths, and they are the same purposes of duty that he began the psalm with. 1. This being so, he will praise God and give him glory for the power to which he had advanced him; ver. 9, "I will declare for ever" that which "thy wondrous works declare," ver. 1. He will praise God for his elevation, not only at first while the mercy was fresh, but for ever, so long as he lives; the exaltation of the Son of David will be the subject of the saints' everlasting praises. He will give glory to God, not only as his God, but as the God of Jacob, knowing it was for Jacob his servant's sake, and because he loved his people Israel, that he made him king over them. 2. He will use the power with which he is intrusted for the great ends for which it was put into his hands, ver. 10; as before, ver. 2, 4. According to the duty of the higher powers, 1st. He resolves to be a terror to evil-doers, to humble their pride, and break their power. Though not all the heads, yet "all the horns of the wicked will I cut off," with which they push their poor neighbours; I will disable them to do mischief. Thus God promises to raise up carpenters which should "fray the horns of the Gentiles that had scattered Judah and Israel," Zec. i. 18—21. 2nd. He resolves to be a protection and praise to them that do well; "The horns of the righteous shall be exalted, that is, they shall be preferred, and put into places of power; and they that are good, and have hearts to do good, shall not want ability and opportunity for it. This agrees with David's resolutions, Ps. ci. 1, &c.; and herein David was a type of Christ, who with the breath of his mouth shall slay the wicked, but shall exalt with honour the horn of the righteous, Ps. cxii. 9.

PSALM LXXVI.

This psalm seems to have been penned upon occasion of some great victory obtained by the church over some threatening enemy or other, and designed to grace the triumph. The Septuagint call it, a song upon the Assyrians, from whence many good interpreters conjecture that it was penned when Sennacherib's army, then besieging Jerusalem, was entirely cut off by a destroying angel in Hezekiah's time; and several passages in the psalm are very applicable to that work of wonder. But there was a religious triumph upon occasion of another victory in Jehoshaphat's time, which might as well be the subject of this psalm, 2 Chr. xx. 28, and it might be called a song of Asaph, because always sung by the sons of Asaph. Or it might be penned by Asaph that lived in David's time, upon occasion of the many triumphs with which God delighted to honour that reign. Upon occasion of this glorious victory, whatever it was. I. The psalmist congratulates the happiness of the church in having God so nigh, ver. 1—3. II. He celebrates the glory of God's power, which this was an illustrious instance of, ver. 4—6. III. He infers from hence what reason all have to fear before him, ver. 7—9. And, IV. What reason his people have to trust in him, and to pay their vows to him, ver. 10—12. It is a psalm proper for a thanksgiving day upon the account of public successes, and not improper at other times, because it is never out of season to glorify God for the great things he has done for his church formerly, especially for the victories of the Redeemer over the powers of darkness, which all those Old Testament victories were types of, at least those that are celebrated in the Psalms.

To the chief Musician on Neginoth, A Psalm or Song of Asaph.

IN Judah is God known:
His name is great in Israel.
2 In Salem also is his tabernacle,
And his dwelling place in Zion.
3 There brake he the arrows of the bow,
The shield, and the sword, and the battle. Selah.
4 Thou art more glorious and excellent
Than the mountains of prey.
5 The stouthearted are spoiled,
They have slept their sleep:
And none of the men of might have found their hands.
6 At thy rebuke, O God of Jacob,
Both the chariot and horse are cast into a dead sleep.

The church is here triumphant, even in the midst of its militant state. The psalmist, in the church's name, triumphs here in God, the centre of all our triumphs.

First. In the revelation God had made of himself to them, ver. 2. It is the honour and privilege of Judah and Israel, that among them God is known, and where he is known his name will be great. God is known as he is pleased to make himself known; and they are happy to whom he discovers himself: happy people, that have their land filled with the knowledge of God; happy persons, that have their hearts filled with that knowledge! In Judah God was known so as he was not known in other nations, which made the favour the more obliging, that it was distinguishing, Ps. cxlvii. 19, 20.

Secondly. In the tokens of God's special presence with them in his ordinances, ver. 2. In the whole land of Judah and Israel God was known, and his name was great; but in Salem, in Zion, was his tabernacle and his dwelling-place. There he kept court, there received the homage of his people by their sacrifices, and entertained them by the feasts upon the sacrifices, thither they came to address themselves to him, and thence by his oracles he issued out his orders. There he recorded his name, and of that place he said, "Here will I dwell, for I have desired it." It is the glory and happiness of a people to have God among them by his ordinances; but his dwelling-place is a tabernacle, a moveable dwelling: yet a little while is that light with us.

Thirdly. In the victories they had obtained over their enemies; ver. 3, "There brake he the arrows of the bow." Observe how threatening the danger was; though Judah and Israel, Salem and Zion, were thus privileged, yet war is raised against them, and the weapons of war are furbished. Here is bow and arrows, shield and sword, and all for battle; but all broken and rendered useless. And it was done there, 1. In Judah and Israel; in favour of that people near to God. While the weapons of war were used against other nations, they answered their end, but when turned against that holy nation they were broken presently. The Chaldee paraphraseth it thus: 'When the house of Israel did his will, he placed his majesty among them, and there he broke the arrows of the bow;' while they kept close to his service, they were great and safe, and every thing went well with them. Or, 2. In the tabernacle and dwelling-place in Zion; there he brake the arrows of the bow. It was done in the field of battle, and yet it is said to be done in the sanctuary, because done in answer to the prayers which there God's people made to him, and in performance of the promises which he there made to them; of both which see that instance, 2 Chr. xx. 5, 14. Public successes are owing as much to what is done in the church as to what is done in the camp. Now this victory redounded very much,

1. To the immortal honour of Israel's God; ver. 4, "Thou art," and hast manifested thyself to be, "more glorious and excellent than the mountains of prey." 1st. Than the great and mighty ones of the earth in general, who are high, and think themselves firmly fixed like mountains, but are really mountains of prey, oppressive to all about them. It is their glory to destroy; it is thine to deliver. 2nd. Than our invaders in particular. When they besieged the cities of Judah, they cast up mounts against them, and raised batteries; but thou art more able to protect us, than they are to annoy us. Wherein the enemies of the church deal proudly, it will appear that God is above them.

2. To the perpetual disgrace of the enemies of Israel, ver. 5, 6. They were stout-hearted, men of great courage and resolution, flushed with their former victories, enraged against Israel, confident of success; they were men of might, robust, and fit for service; they had chariots and horses, which were then greatly valued and trusted to in war, Ps. xx. 7. But all this force was of no force when it was levelled against Jerusalem. 1st. The stout-hearted have despoiled and disarmed themselves, (so some read it,) and when God pleaseth he can make his enemies to weaken and destroy themselves. "They have slept," not the sleep of the righteous, who sleep in Jesus, but "their sleep," the sleep of sinners, that shall wake to everlasting shame and contempt. 2nd. The men of might are as far to seek for their hands as the stout-hearted are for their lxxiv. 14. "Leviathan" here may also be understood of the crocodile; another allusion to Egypt, and especially to its leaders, as overthrown when Israel was delivered.

lxxiv. 19. Translate, "Deliver not the soul of thy dove to a wild beast: the life of thine afflicted ones forget not for ever."

lxxv. 2. "When I shall receive the congregation:" rather, "when I take" (or fix) "an appointed time."

lxxv. 8. "Mixture" may mean mingled wine; perhaps mixed with water and ready for drinking. For "wring out" we may rather translate "drain out"—i.e., swallow.

lxxv. 10. As the horn is the symbol of power and of exaltation, the sense will be, that God will weaken and destroy the pride and power of the wicked, but will increase the dignity of the righteous.

lxxvi. Title. The Syriac also ascribes this psalm to Asaph, and adds, "when Rabbah, of the children of Ammon, was destroyed." The real occasion of the psalm is unknown.

spirit. As the bold men are cowed, so the strong men are lamed, and cannot so much as find their hands to save their own heads, much less to hurt their enemies. 3rd. The chariots and horses may be truly said to be cast into a dead sleep, when their drivers and their riders were so. God did but speak the word, as the God of Jacob that commands deliverances for Jacob, and at his rebuke "the chariot and horse" were both "cast into a dead sleep;" when the men were laid dead upon the spot by the destroying angel, the chariot and horse were not at all formidable. See the power and efficacy of God's rebukes. With what pleasure may we Christians apply all this to the advantages we enjoy by the Redeemer! It is through him that God is known; it is in him that God's name is great; to him it is owing that God has a tabernacle and a dwelling-place in his church. He it was that vanquished the strong man armed, "spoiled principalities and powers, and made a show of them openly."

7 Thou, even thou, art to be feared: [angry?
And who may stand in thy sight when once thou art
8 Thou didst cause judgment to be heard from heaven;
The earth feared, and was still,
9 When God arose to judgment,
To save all the meek of the earth. Selah.
10 Surely the wrath of man shall praise thee:
The remainder of wrath shalt thou restrain.
11 Vow, and pay unto the LORD your God:
Let all that be round about him bring presents unto him that ought to be feared
12 He shall cut off the spirit of princes:
He is terrible to the kings of the earth.

This glorious victory with which God had graced and blessed his church is here made to speak three things:

First. Terror to God's enemies; ver. 7—9, "Thou, even thou, art to be feared." Thy majesty is to be reverenced, thy sovereignty to be submitted to, and thy justice to be dreaded by those that have offended thee. Let all the world learn by this event to stand in awe of the great God. 1. Let all be afraid of his wrath against the daring impiety of sinners; 'Who may stand in thy sight from the minute that thou art angry?' If God be a consuming fire, how can chaff and stubble stand before him, though "his anger be kindled but a little?" Ps. ii. 12. 2. Let all be afraid of his jealousy for oppressed innocency, and the injured cause of his own people; "Thou didst cause judgment to be heard from heaven," then "when thou didst arise to save all the meek of the earth," ver. 8, 9. And then "the earth feared and was still;" waiting what would be the issue of those glorious appearances of thine. Note, 1st. God's people are the meek of the earth, Zep. ii. 3; the quiet in the land, Ps. xxxv. 20; that can bear any wrong, but do none. 2nd. Though the meek of the earth are by their meekness exposed to injury, yet God will sooner or later appear for their salvation, and plead their cause. 3rd. When God comes "to save all the meek of the earth;" he will "cause judgment to be heard from heaven," that is, he will make the world know that he is angry at the oppressors of his people, and takes what is done against them as done against himself. The righteous God long seems to keep silence, yet sooner or later he will "make judgment to be heard." 4th. When God is speaking judgment from heaven, it is time for the earth to compose itself into an awful and reverent silence; 'The earth feared and was still," as silence is made by proclamation when the court sits. "Be still, and know that I am God," Ps. xlvi. 10; "Be silent, O all flesh, before the Lord, for he is raised" up to judgment, Zec. ii. 13. Those that suppose this psalm to have been penned upon the occasion of the routing of Sennacherib's army, take it for granted that the descent of the destroying angel who did the execution was accompanied with thunder, by which God caused judgment to be heard from heaven, and that the earth feared; that is, there was an earthquake, but it was soon over. But this is altogether uncertain.

Secondly. Comfort to God's people, ver. 10. We live in a very angry provoking world, we feel much many times, and are apt to fear more from the wrath of man, which seems boundless. But this is a great comfort to us, 1. That as far as God permits the wrath of man to break forth at any time, he will make it turn to his praise, will bring honour to himself and serve his own purposes by it. "Surely the wrath of man shall praise thee," not only by the checks given to it, when it shall be forced to confess its own impotency, but even by the looses given to it for a time. The hardships which God's people suffer by the wrath of their enemies, are made to redound to the glory of God and his grace; and the more the heathen rage and plot against the Lord and his Anointed, the more will God be praised for setting his king upon his holy hill of Zion in spite of them, Ps. ii. 1, 6. When the heavenly hosts make this the matter of their thanksgiving-songs, that God has taken to him his great power, and has reigned, though the nations were angry, Rev. xi. 17, 18, then the wrath of man adds lustre to the praises of God. 2. That what will not turn to his praise shall not be suffered to break out; "the remainder of wrath shalt thou restrain." Men must never permit sin, because they cannot check it when they will, but God can. He can set bounds to the wrath of man, as he doth to the raging sea, "Hitherto it shall come, and no farther; here shall its proud waves be stayed." God restrained the remainder of Sennacherib's rage, for he put a hook in his nose, and a bridle in his jaws, Isa. xxxvii. 29; and, though he permitted him to talk big, he restrained him from doing what he designed.

Thirdly. Duty to all, ver. 11, 12. Let all submit themselves to this great God, and become his loyal subjects. Observe,

1. The duty required of us all; "all that are about him," that have any dependence upon him, or any occasion to approach to him; and who is there that has not? We are, therefore, every one of us commanded to do our homage to the Kings of kings; "Vow and pay," that is, take an oath of allegiance to him, and make conscience of keeping it. Vow to be his, and pay what you vow; bind your souls with a bond to him, (for that is the nature of a vow,) and then live up to the obligations you have laid upon yourselves; for "better it is not to vow, than to vow and not to pay." And having taken him for our King, let us bring presents to him, as subjects to their sovereign, 1 Sam. x. 17. "Send ye the lamb to the ruler of the land," Isa. xvi. 1. Not that God needs any present we can bring, or can be benefited by it; but thus we must give him honour, and own that we have our all from him. Our prayers and praises, and especially our hearts, are the presents we should bring to the Lord our God.

2. The reasons to enforce this duty; "Render to all their due; fear to whom fear is due." And is it not due to God? Yes; 1st. He "ought to be feared." He is the fear, so the word is; his name is glorious and fearful, and he is the proper object of our fear: with him is terrible majesty. The God of Abraham is called "the fear of Isaac," Gen. xxxi. 42; and we are commanded to make him our fear, Isa. viii. 13. When we bring presents to him, we must have an eye to him as greatly to be feared; for he is terrible in his holy places. 2nd He will be feared, even by those who think it their own sole prerogative to be feared; ver. 12, "He shall cut off the spirit of princes." He shall slip it off as easily as we slip off a flower from the stalk, or a bunch of grapes from the vine, so the word signifies. He can dispirit those that are most daring, and make them heartless; for "He is," or will be, "terrible to the kings of the earth." And sooner or later, if they be not so wise as to submit themselves to him, he will force them to call in vain to rocks and mountains to fall on them and hide them from his wrath, Rev. vi. 16. Since there is no contending with God, it is as much our wisdom as it is our duty to submit to him.

PSALM LXXVII.

This psalm, according to the method of many other psalms, begins with sorrowful complaints, but ends with comfortable encouragements. The complaints seem to be of personal grievances, but the encouragements relate to the public concerns of the church, so that it is not certain whether it was penned upon a personal or a public account. If they were private troubles that he was groaning under, it teacheth us, that what God has wrought for his church in general may be improved for the comfort of particular believers. If it was some public calamity that he is here lamenting, his speaking of it so feelingly, as if it had been some particular trouble of his own, shews how much we should lay to heart the interests of the church of God, and make them our own. One of the rabbins saith, this psalm is spoken in the dialect of the captives, and therefore some think it was penned in the captivity in Babylon. I. The psalmist complains here of the deep impressions which his troubles made upon his spirits, and the temptation he was in to despair of relief, ver. 1—10. II. He encourageth himself to hope that it would be well at last, by the remembrance of God's former appearances for the help of his people, of which he gives several instances, ver. 11—20. In singing this psalm, we must take shame to ourselves for all our sinful distrusts of God, and of his providence and promise, and give to him the glory of his power and goodness by a thankful commemoration of what he has done for us formerly, and a cheerful dependence upon him for the future.

To the chief Musician, to Jeduthun, A Psalm of Asaph.

I CRIED unto God with my voice,
Even unto God with my voice; and he gave ear unto me.
2 In the day of my trouble I sought the Lord:
My sore ran in the night, and ceased not:
My soul refused to be comforted.
3 I remembered God, and was troubled:
I complained, and my spirit was overwhelmed. Selah.
4 Thou holdest mine eyes waking:
I am so troubled that I cannot speak.
5 I have considered the days of old,
The years of ancient times.
6 I call to remembrance my song in the night:
I commune with mine own heart:
And my spirit made diligent search.
7 Will the Lord cast off for ever?
And will he be favourable no more?
8 Is his mercy clean gone for ever?
Doth his promise fail for evermore?
9 Hath God forgotten to be gracious?
Hath he in anger shut up his tender mercies? Selah.
10 And I said, This is my infirmity:
But I will remember the years of the right hand of the most High.

We have here the lively portraiture of a good man under prevailing melancholy, falling into, and sinking in, that horrible pit, and that miry clay, but struggling to get out. Drooping saints that are of a sorrowful spirit, may here as in a glass see their own faces. The conflict which the psalmist had with his griefs and fears seems to have been over when he penned this record of it; for he saith, ver. 1, "I cried unto God, and he gave ear unto me;" which while the struggle lasted he had not the comfortable sense of, as he had afterwards; but he inserts it in the beginning of his narrative, as an intimation that his trouble did not end in despair, for God heard him, and at length he knew that he heard him. Observe,

First. His melancholy prayers. Being afflicted he prayed, Jas. v. 13; and being in an agony he prayed more earnestly, ver. 1. 'My voice was unto God and I cried, even with my voice unto God;' he was full of complaints, loud complaints; but he directed them to God, and turned them all into prayers, vocal prayers, very earnest and importunate. Thus he gave vent to his grief, and gained some ease, and thus he took the right way in order to relief; ver. 2, "In the day of my trouble I sought the Lord." Note, Days of trouble must be days of prayer; days of inward trouble especially, when God seems to have withdrawn from us we must seek him; and seek till we find him. In the day of his trouble he did not seek for the diversion of business or recreation, to shake off his trouble that way, but he sought God and his favour and grace. Those that are under trouble of mind must not think to drink it away, or laugh it away, but pray it away. 'My hand was stretched out in the night, and ceased not,' so Dr. Hammond reads the following words, as speaking the incessant importunity of his prayers: compare Ps. cxliii. 5, 6.

Secondly. His melancholy grief. Grief may then be called melancholy indeed, 1. When it admits of no intermission. Such was his: "My sore," or wound, "ran in the night," and bled inwardly, "and it ceased not;" no, not in the time appointed for rest and sleep. 2. When it admits of no consolation. And that also was his case; "My soul refused to be comforted." He had no mind to hearken to those that would be his comforters; "As vinegar upon nitre, so is he that sings songs to a heavy heart," Pr. xxv. 20; nor had he any lxxvi. 4. "'Mountains of prey,' i.e., strongholds out of which incursions are made," says Fürst, but Gesenius understands "mountains of depredators or of thieves," because they come forth from them for booty. Cocceius supposes "mountains of prey" are so called because of the ravages of wild beasts in them.

lxxvi. 5. "None of the men of might have found their hands," i.e., they could not display activity and energy.

lxxvi. 6. "The chariot and horse:" hereby Patrick understands horsemen and charioteers. The Syriac version has "riders upon horses fell asleep," with which the Septuagint and Vulgate coincide. The Hebrew text is correctly explained by Patrick. War chariots are not now used, but the word "horse" is still employed for cavalry.

lxxvi. 12. "He shall cut off the spirit of princes," i.e., "he controlleth the spirit of princes," or holds it in check and subjection.

lxxvii. 2. The words "my sore ran in the night, and ceased not" do not fairly represent the original. Boothroyd and other English mind to think of those things that would be his comforts; he put them far from him as one that indulged himself in sorrow. Those that are in sorrow upon any account do not only prejudice themselves, but affront God, if they refuse to be comforted.

Thirdly. His melancholy musings. He pored so much upon the trouble, whatever it was, personal or public, that, 1. The methods that should have relieved him did but increase his grief, ver. 3. 1st. One would have thought that the remembrance of God should have comforted him, but it did not; "I remembered God, and was troubled," as poor Job, ch. xxiii. 15, "I am troubled at his presence: when I consider, I am afraid of him." When he remembered God, his thoughts fastened only upon his justice, and wrath, and dreadful majesty; and thus God himself became a terror to him. 2nd. One would have thought that pouring out his soul before God should have given him ease, but it did not; he complained, and yet his spirit was overwhelmed, and sunk under the load. 2. The means of his present relief were denied him, ver. 4. He could not sleep; which, if it be quiet and refreshing, is a parenthesis to our griefs and cares. "Thou holdest mine eyes waking" with thy terrors, which make me "full of tossings to and fro until the dawning of the day." He could not speak by reason of the disorder of his thoughts, and the tumult of his spirits, and the mighty confusion his mind was in. He kept silence even from good, while his heart was hot within him, he was ready to burst like a new bottle, Job xxxiii. 19; and yet so troubled, that he could not speak and refresh himself. And grief never preys so much upon the spirits as when it is thus smothered and pent up.

Fourthly. His melancholy reflections; ver. 5, 6, "I have considered the days of old," and compared them with the present days, and our former prosperity doth but aggravate our present calamities; for we see not "the wonders that our fathers told us of." Melancholy people are apt to pore altogether upon the days of old, and the years of ancient times, and to magnify them for the justifying of their own uneasiness and discontent at the present posture of affairs. But "say not thou that the former days were better than these;" because it is more than thou knowest whether they were or no, Eccl. vii. 10. Neither let the remembrance of the comforts we have lost make us unthankful for those that are left, or impatient under our crosses. Particularly, he called to remembrance his song in the night; the comforts with which he had supported himself in his former sorrows, and entertained himself in his former solitude. These songs he remembered, and tried if he could not sing them over again; but he was out of tune for them, and the remembrance of them did but pour out his soul in him, Ps. xlii. 4; see Job xxxv. 10.

Fifthly. His melancholy fears and apprehensions. "I communed with mine own heart," ver. 6. Come, my soul, what will be the issue of these things? What can I think of them, and what can I expect they will come to at last? "I made diligent search" into the causes of my trouble, inquiring wherefore God contended with me, and what would be the consequences of it? And thus I began to reason; "Will the Lord cast off for ever," as he doth for the present? He is not now favourable; "and will he be favourable no more?" His mercy is now gone, and is it clean gone for ever? His promise now fails, and doth it fail for evermore? God is not now gracious, but hath he forgotten to be gracious? His tender mercies have been withheld, perhaps in wisdom, but are they shut up? shut up in anger? ver. 7—9. This is the language of a disconsolate, deserted soul, now walking in darkness, and having no light; a case not uncommon, even with those "that fear the Lord, and obey the voice of his servant," Isa. l. 10. He may here be looked upon, 1. As groaning under a sore trouble. God hid his face from him, and withdrew the usual tokens of his favour. Note, Spiritual trouble is of all other most grievous to a gracious soul; nothing wounds and pierceth it like the apprehensions of God's being angry, the suspending of his favour, and the superseding of his promise; this wounds the spirit, and who can bear that? 2. As grappling with a strong temptation. Note, God's own people, in a cloudy and dark day, may be tempted to make desperate conclusions about their own spiritual state, and the condition of God's church and kingdom in the world, and as to both to give up all for gone. We may be tempted to think that God has abandoned us, and cast us off, that the covenant of grace fails us, and that the tender mercy of our God shall be for ever withheld from us. But we must not give way to such suggestions as these. If fear and melancholy ask such peevish questions, let faith answer them from the Scripture, "Will the Lord cast off for ever?" "God forbid," Rom. xi. 1. No; "The Lord will not cast off his people," Ps. xciv. 14. "Will he be favourable no more?" Yes, he will; for "though he cause grief, yet will he have compassion," Lam. iii. 32. "Is his mercy clean gone for ever?" No; "his mercy endureth for ever;" as it is "from everlasting, it is to everlasting," Ps. ciii. 7. "Doth his promise fail for evermore?" No; "it is impossible for God to lie," Heb. vi. 18. "Hath God forgotten to be gracious?" No; he cannot deny himself, and his own name which he hath proclaimed gracious and merciful, Ex. xxxiv. 6. "Has he in anger shut up his tender mercies?" No; they "are new every morning," Lam. iii. 22; and, therefore, "How shall I give thee up, Ephraim?" Hos. xi. 8, 9.

Thus was he going on with his dark and dismal apprehensions, when on a sudden he first checked himself with that word, Selah,—stop there, go no farther, let us hear no more of these unbelieving surmises; and he then chid himself; ver. 10, "I said, This is mine infirmity." He is soon aware that it is not well said, and therefore, Why art thou cast down, O my soul? I said, This is mine affliction, (so some understand it,) this is the calamity that falls to my lot, and I must make the best of it. Every one has his affliction, his trouble in the flesh; and this is mine, the cross I must take up. Or rather, This is my sin,—it is mine iniquity, the plague of my own heart. These doubts and fears proceed from the want and weakness of faith, and the corruption of a distempered mind. Note, 1. We all know that ill by ourselves, of which we must say, This is our infirmity; a sin that most easily besets us. 2. Despondency of spirit, and distrust of God under affliction, are too often the infirmities of good people; and as such are to be reflected upon by us with sorrow and shame, as by the psalmist here: "This is my infirmity." And when at any time it is working in us, we must thus suppress the rising of it, and not suffer the evil spirit to speak. We must argue down the insurrections of unbelief, as the psalmist here: "But I will remember the years of the right hand of the Most High." He had been considering the years of ancient times, ver. 5, the blessings formerly enjoyed, the remembrance of which did only add to his grief; but now he considered them as the years of the right hand of the Most High; that those blessings of ancient times came from the Ancient of Days, from the power and sovereign disposal of his right hand, who is over all, God blessed for ever; and this satisfied him: for may not the Most High with his right hand make what changes he pleaseth?

11 I will remember the works of the LORD.
Surely I will remember thy wonders of old 12 I will meditate also of all thy work,
And talk of thy doings
13 Thy way, O God, is in the sanctuary:
Who is so great a God as our God?
14 Thou art the God that doest wonders:
Thou hast declared thy strength among the people.
15 Thou hast with thine arm redeemed thy people,
The sons of Jacob and Joseph. Selah.
16 The waters saw thee, O God, the waters saw thee,
They were afraid:
The depths also were troubled.
17 The clouds poured out water:
The skies sent out a sound:
Thine arrows also went abroad.
18 The voice of thy thunder was in the heaven:
The lightnings lightened the world:
The earth trembled and shook.
19 Thy way is in the sea,
And thy path in the great waters,
And thy footsteps are not known.
20 Thou leddest thy people like a flock
By the hand of Moses and Aaron.

The psalmist here recovers himself out of the great distress and plague he was in, and silenceth his own fears of God's casting off his people by the remembrance of the great things he had done for them formerly, which, though he had in vain tried to quiet himself with, ver. 5, 6, yet he tried again, and upon this second trial found it not in vain. It is good to persevere in the proper means for the strengthening of faith, though they do not prove effectual at first. "I will remember," surely I will, what God has done for his people of old, till I can from thence infer a happy issue of the present dark dispensations, ver. 11, 12. Note, 1. The works of the Lord for his people have been wondrous works. 2. They are recorded for us, that they may be remembered by us. 3. That we may have benefit by the remembrance of them, we must meditate upon them, and dwell upon them in our thoughts, and must talk of them, that we may inform ourselves and others farther concerning them. 4. The due remembrance of the works of God will be a powerful antidote against distrust of his promise and goodness; for he is God, and changeth not. If he begin, he will finish his work, and bring forth the top-stone. Two things in general satisfied him very much:

First. That God's "way is in the sanctuary," ver. 13. It is in holiness, so some. When we cannot solve the particular difficulties that may arise in our constructions of the Divine providence, this we are sure of in general, that "God is holy in all his works," that they are all worthy of himself, and consonant to the eternal purity and rectitude of his nature. He has holy ends in all he doth, and will be sanctified in every dispensation of his providence. His way is according to his promise which he has spoken in his holiness, and made known in the sanctuary. What he hath done is according to what he hath said, and may be construed by it; and from what he hath said we may easily gather that he will not cast off his people for ever. God's way is for the sanctuary, and for the benefit of it; all he doth is intended for the good of his church.

Secondly. That God's "way is in the sea." Though God is holy, just, and good in all he doth, yet we cannot give an account of the reasons of his proceedings, nor make any certain judgment of his designs; "His path is in the great waters, and his footsteps are not known," ver. 19. God's ways are like the deep waters, which cannot be fathomed, Ps. xxxvi. 6; like the way of a ship in the sea, which cannot be tracked, Pr. xxx. 18, 19. God's proceedings are always to be acquiesced in, but cannot always be accounted for. He instanceth in some particulars, for which he goes as far back as the infancy of the Jewish church, and from which he gathers, 1st. That there is no God to be compared with the God of Israel; ver. 13, "Who is so great a God as our God?" Let us first give to God the glory of the great things he has done for his people, and acknowledge him therein great above all comparison; and then we may take to ourselves the comfort of what he has done, and encourage ourselves with it. 2nd. That he is a God of almighty power; ver. 14, "Thou art the God that" alone "dost wonders," above the power of any creature; thou hast visibly, and beyond any contradiction, "declared thy strength among the people." What God has done for his church has been a standing declaration of his almighty power, for therein he has made bare his everlasting arm.

1. God brought Israel out of Egypt, ver. 15. This was the beginning of mercy to them, and was yearly to be commemorated among them in the passover. "Thou hast with thine arm," stretched out in so many miracles, "redeemed thy people" out of the hand of the Egyptians. Though they were delivered by power, yet they are said to be redeemed, as if it had been done by price, because it was typical of the great redemption which was to be wrought out in the fulness of time both by price and power. Those that were redeemed are here called not only the sons of Jacob, to whom the promise was made, but of Joseph also, who had a most firm and lively belief of the performance of it; for "when he was dying he made mention of the departing of the children of Israel out of Egypt, and gave commandment concerning his bones."

2. He divided the Red sea before them; ver. 16, "The waters" gave way, and a lane was made through that crowd instantly, as if they had seen God himself at the head of the armies of Israel, and had retired for fear of him. Not only the surface of the waters, but "the depths were troubled," and opened to the right and to the left, in obedience to his word of command.

3. He destroyed the Egyptians; ver. 17, "The clouds poured out water" upon them, while the pillar of fire, like an umbrella over the camp of Israel, sheltered it from the shower, in which, as in the deluge, the waters that were above the firmament, concurred with those that were beneath the firmament, to destroy the rebels. Then "the skies sent out a sound; thine arrows also went abroad," which is explained ver. 18, "The voice of thy thunder was heard in the heaven," that is, the sound which the skies sent forth. "The lightnings lightened the world;" those are the arrows that went abroad, by which the host of the Egyptians was discomfited, with so much terror, that the earth of the adjacent coasts shook and trembled. Thus "God's way was in the sea," for the destruction of his enemies, as well as for the salvation of his people; and yet, when the waters returned to their place, "his footsteps were not known," ver. 19. There was no mark set upon the place, as there was afterwards in interpreters explain it, "by night my hand without ceasing is stretched out unto him." The Syriac is, "his hand scourged me by night, and I rested not." Symmachus correctly expresses the sense, "my hand was stretched out continually." The Latin translation of Sebastian Munster closely agrees with the ordinary English version, the editor observing that the word "hand" in Hebrew often means "a stroke," but though he prefers this he mentions the other. Diodati comes very near the correct meaning.

lxxvii. 4. There is here a curious various reading in the Greek. Some copies read, "my eyes anticipated the watches," and others, "all my foes anticipated the watches," or guards. Whether we read that the psalmist's enemies or eyes were more wakeful than the watches, the translations must be rejected. The Syriac understands it of darkness suddenly coming over the eyes. Dr. Benisch follows the Targum exactly, "Thou takest hold of my eyelids;" but the sense is in general accurately given in our version.

Jordan, Jos iv. 9. We do not read in the story of Israel's passing through the Red sea that there were thunders and lightnings, and an earthquake; yet there might be, and Josephus saith there were, such displays of the Divine terror upon that occasion. But it may refer to the thunders, lightnings, and earthquake that were at mount Sinai when the law was given.

4. He took his people Israel under his own conduct and protection; ver. 20, "Thou leddest thy people like a flock." They being weak and helpless, and apt to wander like a flock of sheep, and lying exposed to the beasts of prey, God went before them with all the care and tenderness of a shepherd, that they might not miscarry. The pillar of cloud and fire led them, yet that is not here taken notice of, but the agency of Moses and Aaron, by whose hand God led them. They could not do it without God, but God did it with and by them. Moses was their governor, Aaron their high priest; they were guides, overseers, and rulers to Israel, and by them God led them. The right and happy administration of the two great ordinances of magistracy and ministry are, though not so great a miracle, yet as great a mercy to any people as the pillar of cloud and fire was to Israel in the wilderness.

The psalm concludes abruptly, and doth not apply those ancient instances of God's power to the present distresses of the church, as one might have expected. But as soon as the good man began to meditate on these things he found he had gained his point. His very entrance upon this matter gave him light and joy, Ps. cxix. 130; his fears suddenly and strangely vanished, so that he needed to go no farther. He went his way and did eat, and his countenance was no more sad.

PSALM LXXVIII.

This psalm is historical. It is a narrative of the great mercies God had bestowed upon Israel; the great sins wherewith they had provoked him, and the many tokens of his displeasure they had been under for their sins. The psalmist began in the foregoing psalm to relate God's wonders of old for his own encouragement in a difficult time; there he broke off abruptly, but here resumes the subject, for the edification of the church, and enlargeth much upon it; shewing not only how good God had been to them, which was an earnest of farther finishing mercy, but how basely they had carried themselves to God, which justified him in correcting them as he did at this time, and forbade all complaints. Here is, I. The preface to this church history, commanding the attention of the present age to it, and recommending it to the study of the generations to come, ver. 1—8. II. The history itself from Moses to David. It is put into a psalm or song, that it might be the better remembered and transmitted to posterity, and that the singing of it might affect them with the things here related more than they would be with a bare narrative of them. The general scope of this psalm we have, ver. 9—11, where notice is taken of the present rebukes they were under, ver. 9; the sin which brought them under those rebukes, ver. 10; and the mercies of God to them formerly, which aggravated that sin, ver. 11. As to the particulars, we are here told, 1. What wonderful works God had wrought for them in bringing them out of Egypt, ver. 12—16; providing for them in the wilderness, ver. 23—29; plaguing and ruining their enemies, ver. 43—53; and at length putting them in possession of the land of promise, ver. 54, 55; 2. How ungrateful they were to God for his favours to them, and how many and great provocations they were guilty of; how they murmured against God and distrusted him, ver. 17—20; and did but counterfeit repentance and submission when he punished them, ver. 34—37; thus grieving and tempting him, ver. 40—42; how they affronted God with their idolatries after they came to Canaan, ver. 56—58; 3. How God had justly punished them for their sins, ver. 21, 22, in the wilderness, making their sin their punishment, ver. 29—33; and now of late when the ark was taken by the Philistines, ver. 59—64; 4. How graciously God had spared them, and returned in mercy to them, notwithstanding their provocations; he had forgiven them formerly, ver. 38—39; and now of late had removed the judgments they had brought upon themselves, and brought them under a happy establishment both in church and state, ver. 65—72. As the general scope of this psalm may be of use to us in the singing of it, to put us upon recollecting what God has done for us and for his church formerly, and what we have done against him, so the particulars also may be of use to us for warning against those sins of unbelief and ingratitude which Israel of old was notoriously guilty of, and the record of which was preserved for our learning; "These things happened unto them for ensamples," 1 Cor. x. 11; Heb. iv. 11.

Maschil of Asaph.

GIVE ear, O my people, to my law:
Incline your ears to the words of my mouth.
2 I will open my mouth in a parable:
I will utter dark sayings of old:
3 Which we have heard and known,
And our fathers have told us.
4 We will not hide them from their children, [LORD, Shewing to the generation to come the praises of the
And his strength, and his wonderful works that he hath 5 For he established a testimony in Jacob, [done.
And appointed a law in Israel,
Which he commanded our fathers,
That they should make them known to their children:
6 That the generation to come might know them,
Even the children which should be born;
Who should arise and declare them to their children:
7 That they might set their hope in God,
And not forget the works of God,
But keep his commandments:
8 And might not be as their fathers,
A stubborn and rebellious generation;
A generation that set not their heart aright,
And whose spirit was not stedfast with God.

These verses, which contain the preface to this history, shew that the psalm answers the title. It is indeed Maschil,—'a psalm to give instruction.' If we receive not the instruction it gives, it is our own fault.

Here, First. The psalmist demands attention to what he wrote; ver. 1, "Give ear O my people, to my law." Some make these the psalmist's words. David, as a king, or Asaph in his name, as his secretary of state, or scribe to the sweet singer of Israel, here calls upon the people, as his people, committed to his charge, to give ear to his law. He calls his instructions his law or edict; such was their commanding force in themselves. Every good truth, received in the light and love of it, will have the power of a law upon the conscience. Yet that was not all; David was a king, and he would interpose his royal power for the edification of his people. If God by his grace make great men good men, they will be capable of doing more good than others, because their word will be a law to all about them, who must therefore give ear and hearken; for to what purpose is Divine revelation brought to our ears if we will not incline our ears to it; both humble ourselves and engage ourselves to hear it, and heed it? Or, the psalmist being a prophet, speaks as God's mouth, and so calls them his people, and demands subjection to what was said as to a law. "Let him that has an ear" thus "hear what the Spirit saith unto the churches," Rev. ii. 7.

Secondly. Several reasons are given why we should diligently attend to that which is here related.

1. The things here discoursed of are weighty, and deserve consideration; strange, and need it; ver. 2, "I will open my mouth in a parable,"—in that which is sublime and uncommon, but very excellent, and well worthy your attention; "I will utter dark sayings," which challenge your most serious regards as much as the enigmas with which the eastern princes and learned men used to pose one another. These are called dark sayings, not because they are hard to be understood, but because they are greatly to be admired, and carefully to be looked into. This is said to be fulfilled in the parables which our Saviour put forth, Mat. xiii. 35, which were, as this, representations of the state of the kingdom of God among men.

2. They are the monuments of antiquity; "Dark sayings of old, which our fathers have told us," ver. 3. They are things of undoubted certainty; we have heard them and known them, and there is no room left to question the truth of them. The Gospel of Luke is called a "declaration of those things which are most surely believed among us," Lu. i. 1; so were the things here related. The honour we owe to our parents and ancestors obligeth us to attend to that which our fathers have told us; and, as far as it appears to be true and good, to receive it with so much the more reverence and regard.

3. They are to be transmitted to posterity, and it lies as a charge upon us carefully to hand them down, ver. 4. Because our fathers told them us, "we will not hide them from their children." Our children are called theirs, for they were in care for their seed's seed, and looked upon them as theirs; and in teaching our children the knowledge of God we repay to our parents some of that debt we owe to them for teaching us. Nay, if we have no children of our own, we must declare the things of God to their children, the children of others. Our care must be for posterity in general, and not only for our own posterity; and for the generation to come hereafter, the children that shall be born, as well as for the generation that is next rising up, and the children that are born. That which we are to transmit to our children is not only the knowledge of languages, arts, and sciences, their liberty and property, but especially the praises of the Lord, and his strength appearing in "the wonderful works that he has done." Our great care must be to lodge our religion, that great depositum, pure and entire in the hands of those that succeed us. There are two things, the full and clear knowledge of which we must preserve the entail of to our heirs:

1st. The law of God; for this was given with a particular charge to teach it diligently to their children; ver. 5, "He established a testimony," or covenant, and enacted a law in Jacob and Israel, gave them precepts and promises, which he commanded them to make known to their children, Deu. vi. 7, 20. The church of God, as the historian saith of the Roman commonwealth, was not to be res unius ætatis,—'a business of one age,' but was to be kept up from one generation to another; and therefore, as God provided for a succession of ministers in the tribe of Levi and the house of Aaron, so he appointed that parents should train up their children in the knowledge of his law; and when they were grown up, they must "arise, and declare them to their children," ver. 6. That, as one generation of God's servants and worshippers passeth away another generation may come, and the church, as the earth, may abide for ever; and thus God's name among men may be as the days of heaven.

2nd. The providences of God concerning them, both in mercy and in judgment. The former seems to be mentioned for the sake of this; since God gave order that his laws should be made known to posterity, it is requisite that with them his works also should be made known, and the fulfilling of the promises made to the obedient, and the threatenings denounced against the disobedient. Let these be told to our children, and our children's children,

First. That they may take encouragement to conform themselves to the will of God, ver. 7. That, not forgetting the works of God wrought in former days, they might set their hope in God, and keep his commandments, might make his command their rule, and his covenant their stay; and those only may with confidence hope for God's salvation that make conscience of doing his commandments. The works of God, duly considered, will very much strengthen our resolution both to set our hope in him and to keep his commandments; for he is able to bear us out in both.

Secondly. That they may take warning not to conform themselves to the example of their fathers; ver. 8, "That they might not be as their fathers, a stubborn and rebellious generation." See here, 1*st.* What was the character of their fathers. Though they were the seed of Abraham, taken into covenant with God, and, for aught we know, the only professing people he had then in the world, yet they were stubborn and rebellious, and walked contrary to God, in direct opposition to his will. They did, indeed, profess relation to him, but they did not set their hearts right, they were not cordial in their engagements to God, nor inward with him in their worship of him; and therefore their spirit was not stedfast with him, but upon every occasion they flew off from him. Note, Hypocrisy is the high road to apostacy; those that do not set their hearts right will not be stedfast with God, but play fast and loose. 2*nd.* What was a charge to the children. "That they be not as their fathers." Note, Those that are descended from wicked and ungodly ancestors, if they will but consider the word and works of God, will see reason enough not to tread in their steps. It will be no excuse for a vain conversation, that it was received by tradition from our fathers, 1 Pet. i. 18. For what we know of them that was ill must be an admonition to us, that we dread that which was so pernicious to them, as we would shun those courses which they took that were ruinous to their health or estates.

9 The children of Ephraim, being armed, and carrying Turned back in the day of battle. [bows.
10 They kept not the covenant of God,
And refused to walk in his law;
11 And forgat his works,
And his wonders that he had shewed them.

lxxvii. 6. The Syriac is, "I have meditated in the night;" the Greek, "I meditated, with my heart by night I talked much;" the Latin Vulgate, though usually a transcript of the Greek, here is, "I have meditated with my heart by night." The Hebrew may be rendered, "I remember my melody by night."

lxxvii. 13. A more literal rendering is, "Thy way, O God, is in holiness: who is a God great as God? (what El is great as Elohim?)." The Chaldee renders the first clause according to the sense, "Thy ways are holy;" so the Syriac, "O God, thy way is holy." The Greek and Latin have "Thy way, O God, is in the holy," which some render "holy place;" but we prefer the Chaldee and Syriac.

lxxvii. 15. Why the sons of Joseph? The Chaldee explains it of the sons which Jacob begat and Joseph nourished. But all Israel is sometimes called Joseph, as in Psa. lxxx. 1, lxxxi. 5.

lxxvii. 18. For "in the heaven" we should rather translate "in the whirlwind."

12 Marvellous things did he in the sight of their fathers,
In the land of Egypt, in the field of Zoan.
13 He divided the sea, and caused them to pass through;
And he made the waters to stand as an heap.
14 In the daytime also he led them with a cloud,
And all the night with a light of fire.
15 He clave the rocks in the wilderness,
And gave them drink as out of the great depths.
16 He brought streams also out of the rock,
And caused waters to run down like rivers.
17 And they sinned yet more against him
By provoking the most High in the wilderness.
18 And they tempted God in their heart
By asking meat for their lust.
19 Yea, they spake against God;
They said, Can God furnish a table in the wilderness?
20 Behold, he smote the rock, that the waters gushed out,
And the streams overflowed;
Can he give bread also?
Can he provide flesh for his people?
21 Therefore the LORD heard this, and was wroth:
So a fire was kindled against Jacob,
And anger also came up against Israel;
22 Because they believed not in God,
And trusted not in his salvation:
23 Though he had commanded the clouds from above,
And opened the doors of heaven,
24 And had rained down manna upon them to eat,
And had given them of the corn of heaven.
25 Man did eat angels' food:
He sent them meat to the full.
26 He caused an east wind to blow in the heaven:
And by his power he brought in the south wind.
27 He rained flesh also upon them as dust,
And feathered fowls like as the sand of the sea:
28 And he let it fall in the midst of their camp,
Round about their habitations.
29 So they did eat, and were well filled:
For he gave them their own desire;
30 They were not estranged from their lust.
But while their meat was yet in their mouths,
31 The wrath of God came upon them,
And slew the fattest of them,
And smote down the chosen men of Israel.
32 For all this they sinned still,
And believed not for his wondrous works.
33 Therefore their days did he consume in vanity,
And their years in trouble.
34 When he slew them, then they sought him:
And they returned and enquired early after God.
35 And they remembered that God was their rock,
And the high God their redeemer.
36 Nevertheless they did flatter him with their mouth,
And they lied unto him with their tongues.
37 For their heart was not right with him,
Neither were they stedfast in his covenant.
38 But he, being full of compassion, forgave their iniquity,
And destroyed them not:
Yea, many a time turned he his anger away,
And did not stir up all his wrath.
39 For he remembered that they were but flesh;
A wind that passeth away, and cometh not again.

In these verses,

First. The psalmist observes the late rebukes of Providence that the people of Israel had been under, which they had brought upon themselves by their dealing treacherously with God: ver. 9—11, "The children of Ephraim," in which tribe Shiloh was, though they were well armed, and shot with bows, yet "turned back in the day of battle." This seems to refer to that shameful defeat which the Philistines gave them in Eli's time, when they took the ark prisoner, 1 Sam. iv. 10, 11; which the psalmist here begins to speak of, and after a long digression returns to it again, ver. 61. And well might that event be thus fresh in mind in David's time, above forty years after; for the ark, which in that memorable battle was seized by the Philistines, though it was quickly brought out of captivity, was never brought out of obscurity till David fetched it from Kirjath-jearim to his own city. Observe,

1. The shameful cowardice of the children of Ephraim, that warlike tribe, so famed for valiant men, Joshua's tribe. The children of that tribe, though as well armed as ever, yet turned back when they came to face the enemy. Note, Weapons of war stand men in little stead without a martial spirit; and that is gone if God be gone. Sin dispirits men, and takes away the heart. 2. The causes of their cowardice, which were no less shameful; and these were, 1st. A shameful violation of God's law, and their covenant with him, ver. 10. They were basely treacherous and perfidious, for "they kept not the covenant of God," and basely stubborn and rebellious, (as they were described, ver. 8,) for they peremptorily refused to walk in his law, and in effect told him to his face they would not be ruled by him. 2nd. A shameful ingratitude to God for the favours he had bestowed upon them. They forgot his works and his wonders, his works of wonder which they ought to have admired, ver. 11. Note, Our forgetfulness of God's works is at the bottom of our disobedience to his laws.

Secondly. He takes occasion from hence to consult precedents, and to compare this with their fathers' case; who were in like manner unmindful of God's mercies to them, and ungrateful to their founder and great benefactor, and were therefore often brought under his displeasure. The narrative in these verses is very observable, for it relates a kind of struggle between God's goodness and man's badness, and mercy at length rejoiceth against judgment.

1. God did great things for his people Israel when he first incorporated them, and formed them into a people. "Marvellous things did he in the sight of their fathers," and not only in their sight, but in their cause, and for their benefit; so strange, so kind, that one would think they should never be forgotten. What he did for them in the land of Egypt is only mentioned here, ver. 12; but afterwards resumed, ver. 43. And here he goes on to shew, 1st. How he made a lane for them through the Red sea, and caused them, that is, gave them courage, to pass through, though the waters stood over their heads as a heap, ver. 13; see Isa. lxiii. 12, 13, where God is said to lead them by the hand, as it were, "through the deep, that they should not stumble." 2nd. How he provided a guide for them through the untrodden paths of the wilderness, ver. 14. He led them step by step, "in the daytime by a cloud," which also sheltered them from the heat, and "all the night with a light of fire," which perhaps warmed the air; however, made the darkness of the night the less frightful, and perhaps kept off wild beasts, Zec. ii. 5. 3rd. How he furnished their camp with fresh water in a dry and thirsty land where no water was; not by opening the bottles of heaven, that had been a common way, but by broaching a rock; ver. 15, 16, "He clave the rocks in the wilderness," which yielded water, though they were not capable of receiving it either from the clouds above or the springs beneath. Out of the dry and hard rock he gave them drink, not distilled as out of an alembic, drop by drop, but in streams, running down like rivers, and as out of the great depths. God gives abundantly, and is rich in mercy; he gives seasonably, and sometimes makes us to feel the want of mercies, that we may the better know the worth of them. This water which God gave Israel out of the rock was the more valuable, because it was spiritual drink, "and that rock was Christ."

2. When God began thus to bless them, they began to affront him; ver. 17, "They sinned yet more against him," more than they had done in Egypt, though there they were bad enough, Eze. xx. 8. They bore the miseries of their servitude better than the difficulties of their deliverance; and never murmured at their taskmasters so as they did at Moses and Aaron, as if they were "delivered to do all these abominations," Jer. vii. 10. As sin sometimes takes occasion by the commandment, so at other times it takes occasion by the deliverance, to become more exceeding sinful. "They provoked the most High;" though he is most High, and they knew themselves an unequal match for him, yet they provoked him, and even bade defiance to his justice. And this in the wilderness, where he had them at his mercy, and therefore they were bound in interest to please him; and where he shewed them so much mercy, and therefore they were bound in gratitude to please him; yet there they said and did that which they knew would provoke him; "They tempted God in their heart," ver. 18. Their sin began in their heart, and thence it took its malignity; "They do always err in their heart," Heb. iii. 10. Thus they tempted God, tried his patience to the utmost whether he would bear with them or no; and, in effect, bade him do his worst. Two ways they provoked him:

1st. By desiring, or rather demanding, that which he had not thought fit to give them; "They asked meat for their lust." God had given them meat for their hunger in the manna,—wholesome, pleasant food, and in abundance. He had given them meat for their faith, out of the heads of leviathan, which he brake in pieces, Ps. lxxiv. 14. But all this would not serve; they must have meat for their lust, dainties and varieties to gratify a luxurious appetite. Nothing is more provoking to God than our quarrelling with our allotment, and indulging the desires of the flesh.

2nd. By distrusting his power to give them what they desired. This was tempting God indeed. They challenged him to give them flesh; and if he did not, they would say it was because he could not; not because he did not see it fit for them; ver. 19, "They spake against God." They that set bounds to God's power speak against him. It was as injurious a reflection as could be cast upon God to say, "Can God furnish a table in the wilderness?" They had manna, but they did not think they had a table furnished unless they had boiled and roast, a first, a second, and a third course, as they had in Egypt, where they had both flesh and fish, and sauce too, Ex. xvi. 3; Num. xi. 5; dishes of meat, and salvers of fruit. What an unreasonable, insatiable thing is luxury! Such a mighty thing did these epicures think a table well furnished to be, that they thought it was more than God himself could give them in that wilderness; whereas the beasts of the forests, and all the fowls of the mountains, are his, Ps. l. 10, 11. Their disbelief of God's power was so much the worse, in that they did at the same time own that he had done as much as that came to; ver. 20, "Behold, he smote the rock that waters gushed out," which they and their cattle drunk of. And whether is easier to furnish a table in the wilderness, which a rich man can do, or to fetch water out of a rock, which the greatest potentate on the earth cannot do? Never did unbelief, though always unreasonable, ask so absurd a question; Can he that melted down a rock into streams of water give bread also? Or, Can he that has given bread provide flesh also? Is any thing too hard for Omnipotence? When once the ordinary powers of nature are exceeded, God has made bare his arm, and we must conclude nothing is impossible with him. Be it never so great a thing that we ask, it becomes us to own, "Lord, if thou wilt, thou canst."

3. God justly resented the provocation, and was much displeased with them; ver. 21, "The Lord heard this, and was wroth." Note, God is a witness to all lxxviii. 2. The words "parable" and "dark sayings" may be understood of proverbial and enigmatical forms of expression. The idea is that the psalmist will gather lessons of instruction from the records of the past.

lxxviii. 12. "The field of Zoan" is the territory of Tanis, a well-known and ancient city of Egypt. The city has long been a ruin, as predicted by Ezekiel, and its site has yielded curious relics of antiquity.

lxxviii. 15. The Syriac agrees in sense with our version, as also do some other versions; but other authorities maintain that the idea is that God gave them to drink as abundantly as if he had given them the deep to drink from.

lxxviii. 25. Whatever the meaning of abirim here, it should not be translated angels. It means men or persons in high honour, and therefore the phrase "bread of the eminent," as the Hebrew has it, may signify food of the most excellent kind.

our murmurings and distrusts; he hears them and is much displeased with them. "A fire was kindled" for this "against Jacob, the fire of the Lord burnt among them," Num. xi. 1. Or, it may be understood of the fire of God's anger which came up against Israel. To unbelievers our God is himself a consuming fire. And those that will not believe the power of God's mercy shall feel the power of his indignation, and be made to confess that it is a fearful thing to fall into his hands. Now here we are told,

1st. Why God thus resented the provocation, ver. 4. Because by this it appeared that they believed not in God, they did not give credit to the revelation he had made of himself to them, for they durst not commit themselves to him, nor venture themselves with him; they trusted not in the salvation he had begun to work for them; for then they would not thus have questioned its progress. Those cannot be said to trust in God's salvation as their felicity at last who cannot find in their hearts to trust in his providence for food convenient in the way to it. And that which aggravated their unbelief was, the experience they had had of the power and goodness of God, ver. 23—25. He had given them undeniable proofs of his power, not only on earth beneath, but in heaven above; for "he commanded the clouds from above," as one that had created them and commanded them into being; he made what use he pleased of them. Ordinarily by their showers they contribute to the earth's producing corn; but now, when God so commanded them, they showered down corn themselves, which is therefore called here, the corn of heaven; for heaven can do the work without the earth, but not the earth without heaven. God, who has the key of the clouds, opened the doors of heaven; that is more than opening the windows, which yet is spoken of as a great blessing, Mal. iii. 10. To all that by faith and prayer ask, seek, and knock, these doors shall at any time be opened, for the God of heaven is rich in mercy to all that call upon him; he not only keeps a good house, but keeps open house. Justly might God take it ill they should distrust him, when he had been so very kind to them, that he "had rained down manna upon them to eat," substantial food daily, duly, enough for all, enough for each; "Man did eat angels' food," such as angels, if they had occasion for food, would eat and be thankful for; or rather, such as was given by the ministry of angels, and (as the Chaldee reads it) 'descended from the dwelling of angels.' 'Every one,' even the least child in Israel, 'did eat the bread of the mighty,' (so the margin reads it;) the weakest stomach could digest it, and yet it was so nourishing, that it was strong meat for strong men. And though the provision was so good, yet they were not stinted, nor ever reduced to short allowance; for He "sent them meat to the full;" if they gathered little it was their own fault, and yet even then they had no lack, Ex. xvi. 18. The daily provision God makes for us, and has made ever since we came into the world, though it has not so much of miracle as this, has no less of mercy, and is therefore a great aggravation of our distrust of God.

2nd. How he expressed his resentment of the provocation, not in denying them what they so inordinately lusted after, but in granting it to them. First. Did they question his power? he soon gave them a sensible conviction that he could "furnish a table in the wilderness." Though the winds seem to blow where they list, yet when he pleased he could make them his caterer to fetch in provisions, ver. 26. He caused an east wind to blow, and a south wind, either a south-east wind or an east wind first, to bring in the quails from that quarter, and then a south wind to bring in more from that quarter; so that he rained flesh upon them, and that of the most delicate sort; not butcher's meat, but wild fowl, and abundance of it, as dust, as the sand of the sea, ver. 27. So that the meanest Israelite might have his belly full of it, and it cost them nothing, no, not the pains of fetching it from the mountains, for "he let it fall in the midst of their camp, round about their habitation," ver. 28. We have the story Num. xi. 31, 32. See how good God is, even to the evil and unthankful, and wonder that his goodness doth not overcome their badness. See what little reason we have to judge of God's love by such gifts of his bounty as these. Dainty bits are no tokens of his peculiar favour. Christ gave dry bread to the disciples he loved, but a sop dipped in the sauce to Judas that betrayed him. Secondly. Did they defy his justice, and boast that they had gained their point? he made them pay dear for their quails; for, though he "gave them their own desire, they were not estranged from their lust," ver. 29, 30; that is, their appetite was insatiable, they were well filled, and yet they were not satisfied; for they knew not what they would have. Such is the nature of lust, it is content with nothing; and the more it is humoured the more humoursome it grows. They that indulge their lust will never be estranged from it. Or, it intimates that God's liberality did not make them ashamed of their ungrateful lustings, as it would have done if they had had any sense of honour. But what came of it? While "the meat was yet in their mouth," rolled under the tongue as a sweet morsel, "the wrath of God came upon them, and slew the fattest of them," ver. 31, those that were most luxurious, and most daring: see Num. xi. 33, 34. They were fed as sheep for the slaughter. The butcher takes the fattest first. We may suppose there were some pious and contented Israelites that did eat moderately of the quails, and were never the worse; for it was not the meat that poisoned them, but their own lust. Let epicures and sensualists here read their doom. They who make a god of their belly, their end is destruction, Phil. iii. 19. "The prosperity of fools shall destroy them," and their ruin will be the greater.

4. The judgments of God upon them did not reform them, nor attain the end, no more than his mercies; ver. 32, "For all this they sinned still," they murmured and quarrelled with God and Moses as much as ever. Though God "was wrath and smote them, yet they went on frowardly in the way of their heart," Isa. lvii. 17; "they believed not for his wondrous works." Though his works of justice were as wondrous and as great proofs of his power as his works of mercy, yet they were not wrought upon by them to fear God, nor convinced how much it was their interest to make him their friend. Those hearts are hard indeed that will neither be melted by the mercies of God nor broken by his judgments.

5. They persisting in their sins, God proceeded in his judgments, but they were judgments of another nature, which wrought not suddenly, but slowly. He punished them, not now with such acute diseases as that was which "slew the fattest of them," but a lingering, chronical distemper; ver. 33, "Therefore their days did he consume in vanity" in the wilderness, "and their years in trouble." By an irreversible doom they were condemned to wear out thirty-eight tedious years in the wilderness, which, indeed, were consumed in vanity; for in all those years there was not a step taken nearer Canaan, but they were turned back again, and wandered to and fro as in a labyrinth, nor one stroke struck towards the conquest of it; and not only in vanity, but in trouble, for their carcasses were condemned to fall in the wilderness, and there they all perished but Caleb and Joshua. Note, Those that sin still must expect to be in trouble still. And the reason why we spend our days in so much vanity and trouble, why we live with so little comfort, and to so little purpose, is, because we do not live by faith.

6. Under these rebukes they professed repentance, but they were not cordial and sincere in it. 1st. Their profession was plausible enough; ver. 34, 35, "When he slew them," or condemned them to be slain, "then they sought him," they confessed their fault, and begged his pardon. When some were slain, others in a fright cried to God for mercy, and promised they would reform and be very good; then "they returned to God, and inquired early after him." So one would take them to be such as desired to find him. And they pretended to do this because, however they had forgotten it formerly, now "they remembered that God was their rock," and therefore, now they needed him, they would fly to him, and take shelter in him; and that "the high God was their Redeemer," that brought them out of Egypt, and to whom therefore they might come with boldness. Afflictions are sent to put us in mind of God as our Rock and our Redeemer; for in prosperity we are apt to forget him. 2nd. They were not sincere in this profession; ver. 36, 37, "They did but flatter him with their mouth," as if they thought by fair speeches to prevail with him to revoke the sentence, and remove the judgment, with a secret intention to break their word when the danger was over; they did not "return to God with their whole heart, but feignedly," Jer. iii. 10. All their professions, prayers, and promises, were extorted by the rack. It was plain they did not mean as they said, for they did not stick to it; they thawed in the sun, but froze in the shade; they did but "lie to God with their tongues, for their heart was not with him," was not right with him, as appeared by the issue, for "they were not stedfast in his covenant." They were not sincere in their reformation, for they were not constant; and by thinking thus to impose upon a heart-searching God they really put as great an affront upon him as by any of their reflections.

7. God hereupon in pity to them put a stop to the judgments which were threatened and in part executed; ver. 38, 39, "But he, being full of compassion, forgave their iniquity." One would think this counterfeit repentance should have filled up the measure of their iniquity. What could be more provoking than to lie thus to the holy God? than thus to keep back part of the price, the chief part, Acts v. 3. And "yet he, being full of compassion, forgave their iniquity" thus far, that he did not destroy them, and cut them off from being a people, as justly he might have done; but spared their lives till they had reared another generation which should enter into the promised land. "Destroy it not, for a blessing is in it," Isa. lxv. 8. "Many a time he turned his anger away," for he is Lord of his anger, "and did not stir up all his wrath," to deal with them as they deserved. And why did he not? Not because their ruin would have been any loss to him, but, 1st. Because he was full of compassion; and when he was going to destroy them his repentings were kindled together, and he said, "How shall I give thee up, Ephraim? How shall I deliver thee, Israel?" Hos. xi. 8. 2nd. Because, though they did not rightly remember that he was their Rock, he "remembered that they were but flesh." He considered the corruption of their nature, which inclined them to evil, and was pleased to make that an excuse for his sparing them, though it was really no excuse for their sin: see Gen. vi. 3. He considered the weakness and frailty of their nature, and what an easy thing it would be to crush them; they are "as a wind that passeth away and cometh not again." They may soon be taken off, but when they are gone, they are gone irrecoverably, and then what will become of the covenant with Abraham? They are flesh, they are wind, from whence it were easy to argue, they may justly, they may presently, be cut off, and there would be no loss of them. But God argues on the contrary, therefore he will not destroy them; for the true reason is, he is full of compassion.

40 How oft did they provoke him in the wilderness,
And grieve him in the desert!
41 Yea, they turned back and tempted God,
And limited the Holy One of Israel.
42 They remembered not his hand,
Nor the day when he delivered them from the enemy
43 How he had wrought his signs in Egypt,
And his wonders in the field of Zoan:
44 And had turned their rivers into blood;
And their floods, that they could not drink. [them;
45 He sent divers sorts of flies among them, which devoured
And frogs, which destroyed them.
46 He gave also their increase unto the caterpiller,
And their labour unto the locust.
47 He destroyed their vines with hail,
And their sycomore trees with frost.

SYCAMORE TREES.

48 He gave up their cattle also to the hail,
And their flocks to hot thunderbolts.
49 He cast upon them the fierceness of his anger,
Wrath, and indignation, and trouble,
By sending evil angels among them.
50 He made a way to his anger;

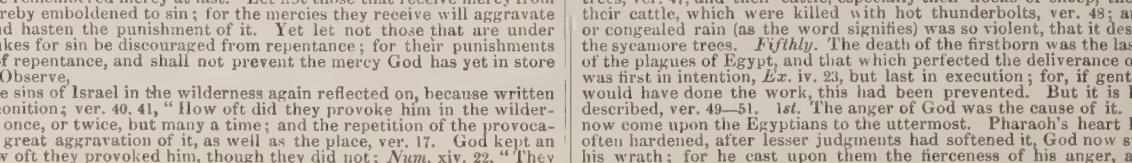
lxxviii. 26. The ancient versions somewhat differ. The Syriac is, "He sent down winds in the heavens," or sky; the old Douay version, which represents the Greek and Latin here, has, "He transported the south wind from heaven; and in his power he brought in the south-west wind." Although the Hebrew kadim usually means an east wind, it may sometimes mean any strong wind, as here.



lxxviii. 32. "They sinned still," or "sinned the more," or "went on sinning."

lxxviii. 38. For "did not stir up all his wrath," the Greek has "did not kindle all his wrath." The English is better.

lxxviii. 39. The word rendered "wind" is very often translated "spirit," and so it can be here. Dr. A. Clarke is probably correct when he explains the words, "the spirit goeth away and it doth not return." The Hebrews are said to regard this as the middle of the Psalter, 1,263 verses before, and the same after.

lxxviii. 41. A better explanation than "limited" is that of

He spared not their soul from death,
But gave their life over to the pestilence;
51 And smote all the firstborn in Egypt;
The chief of their strength in the tabernacles of Ham:
52 But made his own people to go forth like sheep,
And guided them in the wilderness like a flock.
53 And he led them on safely, so that they feared not:
But the sea overwhelmed their enemies.
54 And he brought them to the border of his sanctuary,
Even to this mountain, which his right hand had pur-
55 He cast out the heathen also before them, [chased.
And divided them an inheritance by line,
And made the tribes of Israel to dwell in their tents.
56 Yet they tempted and provoked the most high God,
And kept not his testimonies:
57 But turned back, and dealt unfaithfully like their fathers:
They were turned aside like a deceitful bow.
58 For they provoked him to anger with their high places,
And moved him to jealousy with their graven images.
59 When God heard this, he was wroth,
And greatly abhorred Israel:
60 So that he forsook the tabernacle of Shiloh,
The tent which he placed among men;
61 And delivered his strength into captivity,
And his glory into the enemy's hand
62 He gave his people over also unto the sword;
And was wroth with his inheritance.
63 The fire consumed their young men;
And their maidens were not given to marriage.
64 Their priests fell by the sword;
And their widows made no lamentation.
65 Then the Lord awaked as one out of sleep,
And like a mighty man that shouteth by reason of wine.
66 And he smote his enemies in the hinder parts:
He put them to a perpetual reproach.
67 Moreover he refused the tabernacle of Joseph,
And chose not the tribe of Ephraim:
68 But chose the tribe of Judah,
The mount Zion which he loved.
69 And he built his sanctuary like high palaces,
Like the earth which he hath established for ever.
70 He chose David also his servant,
And took him from the sheepfolds:
71 From following the ewes great with young
He brought him to feed Jacob his people,
And Israel his inheritance
72 So he fed them according to the integrity of his heart;
And guided them by the skilfulness of his hands.

CARAVAN IN THE DESERT.

The matter and scope of this paragraph is the same with the former, shewing what great mercies God had bestowed upon Israel, how provoking they had been, what judgments he had brought upon them for their sins, and yet how in judgment he remembered mercy at last. Let not those that receive mercy from God be thereby emboldened to sin; for the mercies they receive will aggravate their sin, and hasten the punishment of it. Yet let not those that are under Divine rebukes for sin be discouraged from repentance; for their punishments are means of repentance, and shall not prevent the mercy God has yet in store for them. Observe,

First. The sins of Israel in the wilderness again reflected on, because written for our admonition; ver. 40, 41, "How oft did they provoke him in the wilderness." Not once, or twice, but many a time; and the repetition of the provocation was a great aggravation of it, as well as the place, ver. 17. God kept an account how oft they provoked him, though they did not; Num. xiv. 22, "They have tempted me these ten times." By provoking him they did not so much anger him as grieve him; for he looked upon them as his children, "Israel is my son, my firstborn," and the undutiful, disrespectful carriage of children doth more grieve than anger the tender parents; they lay it to heart, and take it unkindly, Isa. i. 2. They grieved him, because they put him under a necessity of afflicting them; which he did not willingly. After they had humbled themselves before him, they "turned back and tempted God," as before, "and limited the Holy One of Israel," prescribing to him what proofs he should give of his power and presence with them, and what methods he should take in leading them, and providing for them. They limited him to their way, and their time, as if he did not observe that they quarrelled with him. It is presumption for us to "limit the Holy One of Israel;" for, being the Holy One, he will do what is most for his own glory; and being the Holy One of Israel, he will do what is most for their good; and we both impeach his wisdom and betray our own pride and folly if we go about to prescribe to him. That which occasioned their limiting God for the future was their forgetting his former favours; ver. 42, "They remembered not his hand," how strong it is, and how it had been stretched out for them, nor "the day when he delivered them from the enemy;" Pharaoh, that great enemy that sought their ruin. There are some days made remarkable by signal deliverances, which ought never to be forgotten; for the remembrance of them would encourage us in our greatest straits.

Secondly. The mercies of God to Israel, which they were unmindful of when they tempted God, and limited him, and this catalogue of the works of wonder which God wrought for them begins higher, and is carried down farther, than that before, ver. 12, &c.

1. This begins with their deliverance out of Egypt, and the plagues with which God compelled the Egyptians to let them go. These were the signs God wrought in Egypt: ver. 43, "the wonders he wrought in the field of Zoan," that is, in the country of Zoan, as we say, in agro N., meaning in such a country.

1st. Divers of the plagues of Egypt are here instanced in, which speak aloud the power of God, his favours to Israel, as well as terror to his and their enemies. As, First. The turning the waters into blood. They had made themselves drunk with the blood of God's people, even the infants, and now God gave them blood to drink, for they were worthy, ver. 44. Secondly. The flies and frogs which infested them, mixtures of insects in swarms, in shoals, which devoured them, which destroyed them, ver. 45. For God can make the weakest and most despicable animals instruments of his wrath when he pleaseth; what they want in strength may be made up in number. Thirdly. The plague of locusts, which devoured their increase, and that which they had laboured for, ver. 46. They are called God's great army, Joel ii. 25. Fourthly. The hail, which destroyed their trees, especially their vines, the weakest of trees, ver. 47, and their cattle, especially their flocks of sheep, the weakest of their cattle, which were killed with hot thunderbolts, ver. 48; and the frost or congealed rain (as the word signifies) was so violent, that it destroyed even the sycamore trees. Fifthly. The death of the firstborn was the last and sorest of the plagues of Egypt, and that which perfected the deliverance of Israel. It was first in intention, Ex. iv. 23, but last in execution; for, if gentler methods would have done the work, this had been prevented. But it is here largely described, ver. 49—51. 1*st.* The anger of God was the cause of it. Wrath was now come upon the Egyptians to the uttermost. Pharaoh's heart having been often hardened, after lesser judgments had softened it, God now stirred up all his wrath; for he cast upon them the fierceness of his anger, anger in the highest degree; wrath and indignation the cause, and trouble (tribulation and anguish, Rom. ii. 8, 9) the effect. This from on high he cast upon them, and did not spare, and they could not flee out of his hands, Job xxvii. 22. "He made a way," or, as the word is, 'He weighed a path' "to his anger;" he did not cast it upon them uncertainly, but by weight. His anger was weighed with the greatest exactness in the balances of justice; for in his greatest displeasure he never did, nor ever will, do any wrong to any of his creatures. The path of his anger is always weighed. 2*nd.* The angels of God were the instruments employed in this execution. He sent evil spirits among them; not evil in their own nature, but in respect of the errand upon which they were sent. They were destroying angels, or angels of punishment, which passed through all the land of Egypt, with orders according to the weighed paths of God's anger, not to kill all, but the firstborn only. Good angels become evil angels to sinners. They that make the holy God their enemy, let them never expect the holy angels to be their friends. 3*rd.* The execution itself was very severe. "He spared not their soul from death," but suffered death to ride in triumph among them, and "gave their life over to the pestilence," which cut the thread of life off immediately; for "he smote all the firstborn in Egypt," ver. 51, "the chief of their strength," the hopes of their respective families. Children are the parents' strength, and the firstborn the chief of their strength. Thus, because Israel was precious in God's sight, he gave men for them, and people for their life, Isa. xliii. 4.

2nd. By these plagues on the Egyptians, "God made" a way for "his own people to go forth like sheep;" distinguishing between them and the Egyptians, "as the shepherd divideth between the sheep and the goats," having set his own mark on these sheep, by the blood of the lamb sprinkled on their doorposts. "He made them go forth like sheep," not knowing whither they went, "and guided them in the wilderness," like as a shepherd guides his flock, with all possible care and tenderness; ver. 52, "He led them on safely," though in dangerous paths, so that "they feared not," that is, they did not need to fear. They were indeed frightened at the Red sea, Ex. xiv. 10, but that was said to them, and done for them, which effectually silenced their fears: "but the sea overwhelmed their enemies" that ventured to pursue them into it, ver. 53. It was a lane to them, but a grave to their persecutors.

2. It is carried down as far as their settlement in Canaan; ver. 54, "He brought them to the border of his sanctuary," that is, to that land, in the midst of which he set up his sanctuary, which was as it were the centre and metropolis, the crown and glory of it. That is a happy land which is the border of God's sanctuary; it was the happiness of that land, that there God was Schnurrer, mentioned by Rosenmüller—"wearied," or "sickened." The Syriac has "they provoked the Holy One of Israel." The Prayer-Book version is "they moved;" but the Douay, "they exasperated the Holy One of Israel," is to be preferred to it.

lxxviii. 45. There is the same difference of explanation here as in Ex. viii. 21; some think it a heterogeneous swarm of flies, others a kind of beetle which the Egyptians venerated, and others the dog-fly. It is certain that some winged insect is meant.

lxxviii. 46. The caterpillar here seems to be an unfledged locust.

lxxviii. 47. Sycomore-trees, as they are here called, were a sort of wild fig-tree, or fig mulberry, so termed because the fruit resembles a fig, and the leaf is like that of the mulberry-tree.

known, and there was his sanctuary and dwelling-place, Ps. lxxvi. 1, 2. The whole land in general, and Zion in particular, was "the mountain which his right hand had purchased," which by his own power he had set apart for himself: see Ps. xliv. 3. He "made them to ride on the high places of the earth," Isa. lviii. 14; Deu. xxxii. 13. They found the Canaanites in the full and quiet possession of that land, but God "cast out the heathen before them," not only took away their title to it, as the Lord of the whole earth, but himself executed the judgment given against them, and as Lord of hosts turned them out of it, and made his people "Israel tread upon their high places;" dividing each tribe an inheritance by line, and making them to dwell in the houses of those whom they had destroyed. God could have turned the uninhabited, uncultivated wilderness (which perhaps was almost as much compass of ground as Canaan) into fruitful soil, and have planted them there; but the land he designed them was to be a type of heaven, and therefore must be the glory of all lands; it must likewise be fought for, for "the kingdom of heaven suffers violence."

Thirdly. The sins of Israel after they were settled in Canaan, ver. 56—58. The children were like their fathers, and brought their old corruptions into their new habitations; though God had done so much for them, yet "they tempted and provoked the most high God still." He gave them his testimonies, but they did not keep them; they began very promisingly, but they turned back; gave God good words, but dealt unfaithfully; and were like a deceitful bow, which seemed likely to send the arrow to the mark, but when it is drawn, breaks, and drops the arrow at the archer's foot, or, perhaps makes it recoil in his face. There was no hold of them, nor any confidence to be put in their promises or professions. They seemed sometimes devoted to God, but they presently turned aside, and "provoked him to anger with their high places, and their graven images." Idolatry was the sin that did most easily beset them, and which, though they often professed their repentance for, they as often relapsed into. It was spiritual adultery either to worship idols, or to worship God by images, as if he had been an idol; and therefore by it they are said to move him to jealousy, Deu. xxxii. 16, 21.

Fourthly. The judgments God brought upon them for these sins. Their place in Canaan would no more secure them in a sinful way than their descent from Israel; "You only have I known of all the families of the earth, therefore I will punish you," Am. iii. 2. Idolatry is winked at among the Gentiles, but not in Israel.

1. God was displeased with them; ver. 59, "When God heard this," when he heard the cry of their iniquity which came up before him, "he was wroth," he took it very heinously, as well he might, "and he greatly abhorred Israel," whom he had greatly loved and delighted in. They that had been the people of his choice became the generation of his wrath. Presumptuous sins, idolatries especially, render even Israelites odious to God's holiness, and obnoxious to his justice.

2. He deserted his tabernacle among them, and removed the defence which was upon that glory, ver. 60. God never leaves us till we leave him, never withdraws till we have driven him from us. His name is Jealous, and he is a jealous God, and therefore no marvel if a people whom he had betrothed to himself be loathed and rejected, and he refuse to cohabit with them any longer, when they have embraced the bosom of a stranger. The tabernacle at Shiloh was the tent God had placed among men, in which God would in very deed dwell with men upon earth; but when his people treacherously forsook it, he justly forsook it, and then all its glory departed. Israel has small joy of the tabernacle without the presence of God in it.

3. He gave up all into the hands of the enemy. Those whom God forsakes become an easy prey to the destroyer. The Philistines are sworn enemies to the Israel of God, and no less so to the God of Israel, and yet God will make use of them to be a scourge to his people. 1st. God permits them to take the ark prisoner, and carry it off as a trophy of their victory, to shew that he had not only forsaken the tabernacle, but even the ark itself, which shall now be no longer a token of his presence; ver. 61, "He delivered his strength into captivity," as if it had been weakened and overcome, and his glory fell under the disgrace of being abandoned into the enemies' hands. We have the story 1 Sam. iv. 11. When the ark is become as a stranger among Israelites, no marvel if it soon be made a prisoner among Philistines. 2nd. He suffers the armies of Israel to be routed by the Philistines; ver. 62, 63, "He gave his people over unto the sword," to the sword of his own justice, and of the enemies' rage, for "he was wroth with his inheritance;" and that wrath of his was "the fire which consumed their young men," in the prime of their time, by the sword or sickness, and made such a devastation of them, that "their maidens were not praised," that is, "were not given in marriage," which is honourable in all; because there were no young men for them to be given to; and because the distresses and calamities of Israel were so many and great, that the joys of marriage solemnities were judged unseasonable; and it was said, "Blessed is the womb that beareth not." General destructions produce a scarcity of men; Isa. xiii. 12, "I will make a man more precious than fine gold," so that "seven women shall take hold of one man," Isa. iv. 1: compare ch. iii. 25. Yet this was not the worst: 3rd. Even their priests that attended the ark fell by the sword, Hophni and Phinehas. Justly they fell, for they "made themselves vile," and were "sinners before the Lord exceedingly;" and their priesthood was so far from being their protection, that it aggravated their sin, and hastened their fall; and justly did they fall by the sword, because they exposed themselves in the field of battle without call or warrant; and we throw ourselves out of God's protection when we go out of our place and out of the way of our duty. When the priests fell "their widows made no lamentation," ver. 64. All the ceremonies of mourning were lost and buried in substantial grief. The widow of Phinehas, instead of lamenting her husband's death, died herself, when she had called her son Ichabod, 1 Sam. iv. 19.

Fifthly. God's return in mercy to them, and his gracious appearances for them after this. We read not of their repentance and return to God, but God was grieved for the miseries of Israel, Jud. x. 16, and concerned for his own honour, "fearing the wrath of the enemy, lest they should behave themselves strangely," Deu. xxxii. 27; and therefore, "then the Lord awaked as one out of sleep, and like a mighty man that shouteth by reason of wine," ver. 65, not only like one that is raised out of sleep, and recovers himself from the slumber, which by drinking he was overcome with, who then regardeth that which before he seemed wholly to neglect, and to be mindless of; but like one that is refreshed with sleep, and whose heart is made glad by the sober and moderate use of wine, and is therefore the more lively and vigorous, and fit for business. When God had delivered the ark of his strength into captivity, as one jealous of his honour, he soon put forth the arm of his strength to rescue it; stirred up his strength to do great things for his people.

1. He plagued the Philistines that held the ark in captivity, ver. 66. He smote them with emerods in the hinder parts, wounded them behind, as if they were fleeing from him, even then when they thought themselves more than conquerors. He put them to reproach, and they themselves helped to make it a perpetual reproach by the golden images of their emerods, which they returned with the ark for a trespass offering, 1 Sam. vi. 5, to remain in perpetuam rei memoriam,—'as a perpetual memorial.' Note, Sooner or later God will glorify himself by putting disgrace upon his enemies, then when they are most elevated with their successes.

2. He provided a new settlement for his ark, after it had been some months in captivity, and some years in obscurity. He did indeed refuse the tabernacle of Joseph, he never sent it back to Shiloh, in the tribe of Ephraim, ver. 67. The ruins of that place were standing monuments of Divine justice, "Go see what I did to Shiloh," Jer. vii. 12. But he did not wholly take away the glory from Israel; the moving of the ark is not the removing of it; Shiloh has lost it, but Israel has not. God will have a church in the world, and a kingdom among men, though this or that place may have its candlestick removed; nay, the rejection of Shiloh is the election of Zion, as, long after, the fall of the Jews was the riches of the Gentiles, Rom. xi. 12. When God chose not the tribe of Ephraim, of which tribe Joshua was, he chose the tribe of Judah, ver. 68, because of that tribe Jesus was to be, who is greater than Joshua. Kirjath-jearim, the place to which the ark was brought after its rescue out of the hands of the Philistines, was in the tribe of Judah. There it took possession of that tribe; but thence it was removed to Zion, "that mount Zion which he loved," ver. 61, which was "beautiful for situation, the joy of the whole earth;" there it was that he "built his sanctuary like high palaces, and like the earth." David indeed erected only a tent for the ark; but a temple was then designed and prepared for, and finished by his son. And that was, 1st. A very stately place. It was built like the palaces of princes, and the great men of the earth; nay, it excelled them all in splendour and magnificence. Solomon built it, and yet here it is said God built it, for his father had taught him, perhaps with reference to this undertaking, that "Except the Lord build the house, they labour in vain that build it," Ps. cxxvii. 1, which is a psalm for Solomon. 2nd. A very stable place, like the earth. Though not to continue as long as the earth, yet while it was to continue it was as firm as the earth, which God upholds by the word of his power, and it was not finally destroyed till the gospel temple was erected, which is to continue as long as the sun and moon endure, Ps. lxxxix. 36, 37, and against which the gates of hell shall never prevail.

3. He set a good government over them; a monarchy, and a monarch after his own heart. "He chose David his servant" out of all the thousands of Israel, and put the sceptre into his hand, out of whose loins Christ was to come, and who was to be a type of him, ver. 70. Concerning David observe here,

1st. The meanness of his beginning. His extraction indeed was great, for he descended from the prince of the tribe of Judah; but his education was poor. He was bred not a scholar, not a soldier, but a shepherd: he was taken from the sheepfolds, as Moses was; for God delights to put honour upon the humble and diligent, to raise the poor out of the dust, and to set them among princes; and sometimes finds those most fit for public station that have spent the beginning of their time in solitude and contemplation. The Son of David was upbraided with the obscurity of his original, "Is not this the carpenter?" David was taken—he doth not say from leading the rams, but—from following the ewes, especially those great with young, which intimated that of all the good properties of a shepherd, he was most remarkable for his tenderness and compassion to those of his flock that most needed it. This temper of mind fitted him for government; and made him a type of Christ, who when he feeds his flock like a shepherd, doth with a particular care "gently lead those that are with young," Isa. xl. 11.

2nd. The greatness of his advancement. God preferred him "to feed Jacob his people," ver. 71. It was a great honour God put upon him in advancing him to be a king, especially to be king over Jacob and Israel, God's peculiar people, near and dear to him; but withal it was a great trust reposed in him when he was charged with the conduct of those that were God's own inheritance. God advanced him to the throne that he might feed them, not that he might feed himself; that he might do good, not that he might make his family great. It is the charge given to all the under shepherds, both magistrates and ministers, that they feed the flock of God.

3rd. The happiness of his management. David having so great a trust put into his hands, obtained mercy of the Lord to be found both skilful and faithful in the discharge of it; ver. 72, "So he fed them;" he ruled them, and taught them, guided and protected them, First. Very honestly; he did it "according to the integrity of his heart," aiming at nothing else but the glory of God, and the good of the people committed to his charge. The principles of his religion were the maxims of his government, which he administered, not with carnal policy, but with godly sincerity, by the grace of God. In every thing he did he meant well, and had no by-end in view. Secondly. Very discreetly. He did it "by the skilfulness of his hands;" he was not only very sincere in what he designed, but very prudent in what he did, and chose out the most proper means in pursuit of his end; for his God did instruct him to discretion. Happy the people that are under such a government; and with good reason doth the psalmist make this the finishing crowning instance of God's favour to Israel, for David was a type of Christ, the great and good Shepherd, who was humbled first, and then exalted, and of whom it was foretold, that he should be filled with the spirit of wisdom and understanding, and should judge and reprove with equity, Isa. xi. 3, 4. On the integrity of his heart, and the skilfulness of his hands, all his subjects may entirely rely, and of the increase of his government and people there shall be no end.

PSALM LXXIX.

This psalm, if penned with any particular event in view, is, with most probability, made to refer to the destruction of Jerusalem and the temple, and the woful havoc made of the Jewish nation by the Chaldeans under Nebuchadnezzar. It is set to the same tune, as I may say, with the Lamentations of Jeremiah, and that weeping prophet borrows two verses out of it, (ver. 6, 7,) and makes use of them in his prayer, Jer. ii. 25. Some think it was penned long before by the spirit of prophecy, prepared for the use of the church in that cloudy and dark day; others, that it was penned then by the spirit of prayer, either by a prophet named Asaph, or some other prophet for the sons of Asaph. Whatever the particular occasion was, we have here, I. A representation of the very deplorable condition that the people of God were in at this time, ver. 1—5. II. A petition to God for succour and relief, that their enemies might be reckoned with, ver. 6, 7, 10, 12; that their sins might be pardoned, ver. 8, 9; and that they might be delivered, ver. 11. III. A plea taken from the readiness of his people to praise him, ver. 13. In times of the church's peace and prosperity, this psalm may, in the singing of it, give us occasion to bless God that we are not thus trampled on and insulted: but it is especially seasonable in a day of treading down and perplexity, for the exciting of our desires towards God, and the encouragement of our faith in him as the church's patron.

A Psalm of Asaph.

O GOD, the heathen are come into thine inheritance;
Thy holy temple have they defiled;
They have laid Jerusalem on heaps.
2 The dead bodies of thy servants have they given lxxviii. 51. The two clauses of this verse are not merely a parallelism, but have very nearly the same meaning. "The first-born" are the chief of the strength of Egypt; and Egypt is Ham.

lxxviii. 54. "The border of his sanctuary" is literally "the border of his holiness," i.e., his holy border, or Canaan. The "mountain" may be the land of promise in general, or Zion in particular. For the word "purchased" we should rather prefer "acquired," or took possession of.

lxxviii. 57. "A deceitful bow" is one which is feeble and unfit for accurate shooting.

lxxviii. 63. For "were not given to marriage" some understand "did not lament," as the Greek and Latin express it.

lxxviii. 64. One Chaldee Targum of this verse is, "When the Philistines took captive the ark of the Lord, the priests Hophni and Phinehas fell by the sword in Shiloh; and when they brought the news his wives did not lament, for they died on the same day."

To be meat unto the fowls of the heaven,
The flesh of thy saints
Unto the beasts of the earth. [salem;
3 Their blood have they shed like water round about Jeru-
And there was none to bury them.
4 We are become a reproach to our neighbours,
A scorn and derision to them that are round about us.
5 How long, LORD? wilt thou be angry for ever?
Shall thy jealousy burn like fire?

We have here a sad complaint exhibited in the court of heaven. The world is full of complaints, and so is the church too, for it not only suffers with it, but from it, as a lily among thorns. God is complained to; whither should children go with their grievances but to their father, to such a father as is able and willing to help? The heathen are complained of, who being themselves aliens from the commonwealth of Israel, were sworn enemies to it. Though they knew not God, nor owned him, yet God having them in a chain, the church very fitly appeals to him against them, for he is King of nations, to overrule them, to judge among the heathen, and King of saints, to favour and protect them.

First. They complain here of the anger of their enemies, and the outrageous fury of the oppressor, exerted,

1. Against places, ver. 1. They did all the mischief they could, 1st. To the holy land; they invaded that, and made inroads into it; "The heathen are come into thine inheritance," to plunder that, and lay it waste. Canaan was dearer to the pious Israelites, as it was God's inheritance, than as it was their own; as it was the land in which God was known, and his name was great, than as it was the land in which they were bred and born, and which they and their ancestors had been long in possession of. Note, Injuries done to religion should grieve us more than even those done to common right, nay, to our own right. We should better bear to see our own inheritance wasted, than God's inheritance. This psalmist had mentioned it in the foregoing psalm as an instance of God's great favour to Israel, that he had cast out the heathen before them, Ps. lxxviii. 55. But see what a change sin made; now the heathen are suffered to pour in upon them. 2nd. To the holy city; "they have laid Jerusalem on heaps," heaps of rubbish, such heaps as are raised over graves, (so some). The inhabitants were buried in the ruins of their own houses, and their dwelling-places became their sepulchres, their long homes. 3rd. To the holy house; that sanctuary which God had built like high palaces, and which was thought to be established as the earth, was now laid level with the ground. "Thy holy temple have they defiled," by entering into it and laying it waste. God's own people had defiled it by their sins, and therefore God suffered their enemies to defile it by their insolence.

2. Against persons, against the bodies of God's people, and farther their malice could not reach. 1st. They were prodigal of their blood, and killed them without mercy; their eye did not spare, nor did they give any quarter; ver. 3, "Their blood have they shed like water," wherever they met with them, round about Jerusalem, in all the avenues to the city; whoever went out or came in was waited for of the sword. Abundance of human blood was shed, so that the channels of water ran with blood: and they did it with no more reluctancy or regret than if they had spilled so much water; little thinking that every drop of it will be reckoned for in the day when "God shall make inquisition for blood." 2nd. They were abusive to their dead bodies; when they had killed them they would let none bury them. Nay, those that were buried, even the "dead bodies of God's servants, the flesh of his saints," whose names and memories they had a particular spite at, they digged up again, and "gave them to be meat to the fowls of the heaven, and to the beasts of the earth;" or at least they left those so exposed whom they slew; they hung them in chains, which was in a particular manner grievous to the Jews to see, because God had given them an express law against this, as a barbarous thing, Deu. xxi. 23. This inhuman usage of Christ's witnesses is foretold Rev. xi. 9, and thus even the dead bodies were witnesses against their persecutors. This is mentioned (saith Austin, De Civ. Dei, lib. i. cap. 12,) not as an instance of the misery of the persecuted,—for the bodies of the saints shall rise in glory, however they became meat to the birds and the fowls,—but of the malice of their persecutors.

3. Against their names; ver. 4, "We" that survive "are become a reproach to our neighbours," they all study to abuse us, and load us with contempt, and represent us as ridiculous, or odious, or both, upbraiding us with our sins and with our sufferings, or giving the lie to our relation to God, and expectations from him; so that we are become "a scorn and derision to them that are round about us." If God's professing people degenerate from what themselves and their fathers were, they must expect to be told of it; and it is well if a just reproach will help to bring us to a true repentance. But it has been the lot of the Gospel Israel to be made unjustly a reproach and derision; the apostles themselves were counted as the offscouring of all things.

Secondly. They wonder more at God's anger, ver. 5. This they discern in the anger of their neighbours, and this they complain most of, "How long, Lord, wilt thou be angry?" Shall it be "for ever?" This intimates that they desired no more but that God would be reconciled to them, that his anger might be turned away, and then the remainder of men's wrath would be restrained. Note, Those who desire God's favour as better than life, cannot but dread and deprecate his wrath as worse than death.

6 Pour out thy wrath upon the heathen that have not known thee,
And upon the kingdoms that have not called upon thy 7 For they have devoured Jacob, [name.
And laid waste his dwelling place.
8 O remember not against us former iniquities:
Let thy tender mercies speedily prevent us:
For we are brought very low.
9 Help us, O God of our salvation,
For the glory of thy name:
And deliver us, and purge away our sins,
For thy name's sake.
10 Wherefore should the heathen say, Where is their God?
Let him be known among the heathen in our sight
By the revenging of the blood of thy servants which is 11 Let the sighing of the prisoner come before thee; [shed.
According to the greatness of thy power
Preserve thou those that are appointed to die;
12 And render unto our neighbours sevenfold into thei bosom
Their reproach, wherewith they have reproached thee,
13 So we thy people and sheep of thy pasture [Lord.
Will give thee thanks for ever:
We will shew forth thy praise to all generations.

The petitions here put up to God, are very suitable to the present distresses of the church, and they have pleas to enforce them interwoven with them, taken mostly from God's honour.

First. They pray that God would so turn away his anger from them, as to turn it upon those that persecuted and abused them; ver. 6, "Pour out thy wrath," the full vials of it, "upon the heathen;" let them wring out the dregs of it and drink them. This prayer is in effect a prophecy, in which "the wrath of God is revealed from heaven against all ungodliness and unrighteousness of men." Observe here, 1. The character of those he prays against; they are such as have not known God, nor called upon his name. And the reason why men do not call upon God is because they do not know him, how able and willing he is to help them. They that persist in ignorance of God, and neglect of prayer, are the ungodly, who live without God in the world. There are kingdoms that know not God, and obey not the Gospel, but neither their multitude, nor their force united, will secure them from his just judgments. 2. Their crime; "They have devoured Jacob," ver. 7. And that is crime enough in the account of Him who reckons those that touch his people, touch the apple of his eye. They have not only disturbed, but devoured Jacob; not only encroached upon his dwelling-place, the land of Canaan, but have laid it waste by plundering and depopulating it. 3. Their condemnation. "Pour out thy wrath" upon them; do not only restrain them from doing farther mischief, but reckon with them for the mischief they have done.

Secondly. They pray for the pardon of sin, which they own to be the procuring cause of all their calamities. How unrighteous soever men were, God was righteous in permitting them to do what they did. They pray,

1. That God would not remember against them their former iniquities, ver. 8. Either their own former iniquities, that now they were old they might not be made to possess the iniquities of their youth. Or, the former iniquities of their people, the sins of their ancestors. In the captivity of Babylon former iniquities were brought to account; but God promiseth not again to do so, Jer. xxxi. 29, 30; and so they pray, Remember not against us our first sins; which some make to look as far back as the golden calf, because that God said, "In the day when I visit, I will visit for this sin" of theirs "upon them," Ex. xxxii. 34. If the children by repentance and reformation cut off the entail of the parents' sin, they may in faith pray that God will not remember them against them. When God pardons sin he blots it out, and remembers it no more.

2. That he would purge away their sins they had been lately guilty of, by the guilt of which their minds and consciences had been defiled. "Deliver us, and purge away our sins," ver. 9. Then deliverances from trouble are granted in love, and are mercies indeed, when they are grounded upon the pardon of sin, and flow from that; we should therefore be more earnest with God in prayer for the removal of our sins, than for the removal of our afflictions; and the pardon of them is the foundation and sweetness of our deliverances.

Thirdly. They pray that God would work deliverance and salvation for them, and bring their troubles to a good end, and that speedily; "Let thy tender mercies speedily prevent us," ver. 8. They had no hopes but from God's mercies, his tender mercies; their case was so deplorable that they looked upon themselves as the proper objects of Divine compassion; and so near to desperate, that unless Divine mercy did speedily interpose to prevent their ruin, they were undone. This whets their importunity, "Lord, help us, Lord, deliver us;" help us under our troubles, that we may bear them well; help us out of our troubles, that the spirit may not fail. Deliver us from sin, from sinking. Three things they plead: 1. The great distress they were reduced to; "We are brought very low;" and being low, shall be lost, if thou help us not. The lower we are brought, the more need we have of help from heaven, and the more will Divine power be magnified in raising us up. 2. Their dependence upon him; "Thou art the God of our salvation," who alone canst help, "Salvation belongeth to the Lord," and whom we expect help from; for "in the Lord alone is the salvation of his people." They who make God the God of their salvation shall find him so. 3. The interest of his own honour in their case. They plead no merit of theirs, they pretend to none; but, "Help us for the glory of thy name;" pardon us "for thy name's sake." The best encouragements in prayer are those that are taken from God only, and those things whereby he has made himself known. Two things are insinuated in this plea: 1st. That God's name and honour would be greatly injured if he did not deliver them; for those that derided them blasphemed God, as if he were weak and could not help them, or withdrawn, and would not; therefore they plead, ver. 10, "Wherefore should the heathen say, Where is their God?" He has forsaken them, and forgotten them; and this they get by worshipping a God whom they cannot see. (Nil præter nubes et cœli numen adorant,—'They adore no other divinity than the clouds and the sky.'—Juv.) That which was their praise, that they served a God that is every where, was now turned to their reproach and his too, that they served a God that is nowhere. Lord, say they, make it to appear that thou art, by making it to appear that thou art with us, and for us; that when we are asked, "Where is your God?" we may be able to say, He is nigh unto us in all that which we call upon him for; and you see he is so by what he doth for us. 2nd. That God's name and honour would be greatly advanced if he did deliver them; his mercy would be glorified in delivering them that were so miserable and helpless. By making bare his everlasting arm on their behalf, he would make unto himself an everlasting name; and their deliverance would be a type and figure of the great salvation which, in the fulness of time, Messiah the Prince would work out, to the glory of God's name.

Fourthly. They pray that God would avenge them on their adversaries, 1. For their cruelty and barbarity, ver. 10. Let the avenging of our blood (according to the ancient law, Gen. vi. 6,) be known among the heathen, let them be made sensible that what judgments are brought upon them are punishments of the wrong they have done to us, and let this be in our sight; and by lxxviii. 65. The sense of this verse seems to be, "And the Lord awoke as one that had slept, as a mighty man that had been overcome by wine." Some understand the second clause of "a mighty man whom his wine excites," or stimulates. This seems to be the idea of the Prayer-Book version, "like a giant refreshed with wine." The Douay version, following the Latin, has, "as a mighty man having surfeited of wine." Whatever may be the precise form of the translation required, the psalmist clearly means that the Lord awakes in his might like a warrior after a heavy sleep. It is not possible that the Lord should be here compared to a warrior inflamed with wine, because the waking and not the drinking is the point to be rendered prominent.

lxxviii. 69. For "like high palaces" we prefer to render "like high places," or perhaps, "like heaven." Some think the sense is that like the lofty, or eminent men, he built his sanctuary. The Prayer-Book version is free and conjectural, "there he built his this means let God be known among the heathen, as the God to whom vengeance belongs, Ps. xciv. 1, and the God that espouseth his people's cause. Those that have intoxicated themselves with the blood of the saints shall have blood given them to drink, for they are worthy. 2. For their insolence and scorn, ver. 12, "render to them their reproach." The indignities which by word and deed they have done to the people of God himself, and his name, let them be repaid to them with interest. The reproach wherewith men have reproached us only, we must leave it to God whether he will render it to them or no, and must pray that he would forgive them; but the reproach wherewith they have blasphemed God himself, we may in faith pray that God would render it sevenfold into their bosoms, so as to strike at their hearts, to humble them, and bring them to repentance. This prayer is a prophecy of the same import with that of Enoch, that God will convince sinners of all their hard speeches which they have spoken against him, Jude 15, and will return them into their own bosoms by everlasting terrors at the remembrance of them.

Fifthly. They pray that God would find out a way for the rescue of his poor prisoners, especially the condemned prisoners, ver. 11. The case of their brethren that were fallen into the hands of the enemy was very sad; they were kept close prisoners, and because they durst not be heard to bemoan themselves, they vented their griefs in deep and silent sighs. All their breathing was sighing, and so was their praying. They were appointed to die, as sheep for the slaughter, and had received the sentence of death within themselves. This deplorable case the psalmist recommends, 1. To the Divine pity; "Let their sighs come up before thee," and be thou pleased to take cognizance of their moans. 2. To the Divine power; "According to the greatness of thy arm," which no creature can contest with; "Preserve thou those that are appointed to die" from the death to which they are appointed. Man's extremity is God's opportunity to appear for his people: see 2 Cor. i. 8—10.

Sixthly. They promise the returns of praise for the answers of prayer; ver. 13, "So we will give thee thanks for ever." Observe, 1. How they please themselves with their relation to God; though we are oppressed and brought low, yet we are the sheep of thy pasture; not disowned and cast off by thee for all this; "We are thine, save us." 2. How they promise themselves an opportunity of praising God for their deliverance; which they therefore desired, and would bid welcome, because it would furnish them with matter for thanksgiving, and put their hearts in tune for that excellent work, the work of heaven. 3. How they oblige themselves not only to give God thanks at present, but to shew forth his praise unto all generations, that is, to do all they could, both to perpetuate the remembrance of God's favours to them, and to engage their posterity to keep up the work of praise. 4. How they plead this with God; Lord, appear for us against our enemies, for if they get the better, they will blaspheme thee, ver. 12; but if we be delivered we will praise thee. Lord, we are that people of thine, which thou hast formed for thyself, to shew forth thy praise; if we be cut off, whence shall that rent, that tribute, be raised? Note, Those lives that are entirely devoted to God's praise, are assuredly taken under his protection.

PSALM LXXX.

This psalm is much to the same purpose with the next foregoing. Some think it was penned upon occasion of the desolation and captivity of the ten tribes, as the foregoing psalm of the two. But many were the distresses of the Israel of God, many, perhaps, which are not recorded in the sacred history, some whereof might give occasion for the drawing up of this psalm, which is proper to be sung in the day of Jacob's trouble; and if, in singing it, we express a true love to the church, and a hearty concern for its interest, with a firm confidence in God's power to help it out of its greatest distresses, we make melody with our hearts to the Lord. The psalmist here, I. Begs for the tokens of God's presence with them, and favour to them, ver. 1—3. II. He complains of the present rebukes they were under, ver. 4—7. III. He illustrates the present desolations of the church by the comparison of a vine and a vineyard; which had flourished, but was now destroyed, ver. 8—16. IV. He concludes with prayer to God for the preparing of mercy for them, and the preparing of them for mercy, ver. 17—19. This, as many psalms before and after, relate to the public interests of God's Israel, which ought to lie nearer our hearts than any secular interest of our own.

To the chief Musician upon Shoshannim-Eduth, A Psalm of Asaph.

GIVE ear, O Shepherd of Israel,
Thou that leadest Joseph like a flock;
Thou that dwellest between the cherubims, shine forth.
2 Before Ephraim and Benjamin and Manasseh stir up thy strength,
And come and save us.
3 Turn us again, O God, and cause thy face to shine;
And we shall be saved.
4 O LORD God of hosts, how long wilt thou be angry against the prayer of thy people?
5 Thou feedest them with the bread of tears;
And givest them tears to drink in great measure.
6 Thou makest us a strife unto our neighbours:
And our enemies laugh among themselves.
7 Turn us again, O God of hosts,
And cause thy face to shine; and we shall be saved.

The psalmist here in the name of the church applies himself to God by prayer with reference to the present afflicted state of Israel.

First. He entreats God's favour for them, ver. 1, 2, that is all in all to the sanctuary when it is desolate, and is to be sought in the first place. Observe, 1. How he eyes God in his address; as the Shepherd of Israel, whom he had called the sheep of his pasture, Ps. lxxix. 13, under whose conduct and care Israel was, as the sheep under the care and conduct of the shepherd. Christ is the great and good shepherd, to whom we may in faith commit the custody of his sheep that were given to him. He leads Joseph like a flock to the best pastures, and out of the way of danger; if Joseph follow him not as obsequiously as the sheep do the shepherd, it is his own fault. He dwells between the cherubims, where he is ready to receive petitions, and to give directions. The mercy-seat was between the cherubims, and it is very comfortable in prayer to look up to God as sitting on a throne of grace, and that it is so to us is owing to the great propitiation, for the mercy-seat was the propitiatory. 2. What he expects and desires from God. That he would give ear to the cry of their miseries, and of their prayers; that he would shine forth both in his own glory, and in favour and in kindness to his people; that he would shew himself, and smile on them; that he would stir up his strength, that he would excite it, and exert it: it had seemed to slumber, Lord, awaken it; his cause met with great opposition, and the enemies threatened to overpower it, Lord, put forth thy strength so much the more, and come for salvation to us; be to thy people a powerful help, and a present help. Lord, do this before Ephraim, Benjamin, and Manasseh; that is, in the sight of all the tribes of Israel, let them see it to their satisfaction. Perhaps these three tribes are named because they were the tribes which formed that squadron of the camp of Israel that in their march through the wilderness followed next after the tabernacle; so that before them the ark of God's strength rose to scatter their enemies.

Secondly. He complains of God's displeasure against them; God was angry, and he dreads that more than any thing, ver. 4. 1. It was great anger: he apprehended that God was angry against the prayer of his people; not only that he was angry notwithstanding their prayers, by which they hoped to turn away his wrath from them, but he was angry with their prayers; though they were his own people that prayed. That God should be angry at the sins of his people, and at the prayers of his enemies, is not strange; but that he should be angry at the prayers of his people, is strange indeed. He not only delayed to answer them, that he often doth in love, but he was displeased at them. If he be really angry at the prayers of his people, we may be sure it is because they ask amiss, Jas. iv. 3. They pray, but they do not wrestle in prayer, their ends are not right, or there is some secret sin harboured and indulged in them; they do not lift up pure hands, or with wrath and doubting. But perhaps it is only in their own apprehension; he seems angry with their prayers when really he is not; for thus he will try their patience and perseverance in prayer; as Christ tried the woman of Canaan when he said, "It is not meet to take the children's bread and cast it to dogs." 2. It was anger that had continued a great while. "How long wilt thou be angry?" We have still continued praying, and yet are still under thy frowns.

Now the tokens of God's displeasure, which they had been long under, were both their sorrow and shame. 1st. Their sorrow, ver. 5, "Thou feedest them with the bread of tears." They eat their meat from day to day in tears; this is the vinegar in which they dipped their morsel, Ps. xlii. 3. They had tears given them to drink, not now and then a taste of that bitter cup, but in great measure. Note, There are many that spend their time in sorrow, who yet shall spend their eternity in joy. 2nd. It was their shame, ver. 7. God by frowning upon them made them a strife unto their neighbours, each strove which should expose them most; and such a cheap and easy prey were they made to them, that all the strife was who should have the stripping and plundering of them. Their enemies laughed among themselves to see the frights they were in, the straits they were reduced to, and the disappointments they met with. When God is displeased with his people, we must expect to see them in tears, and their enemies in triumph.

Thirdly. He prays earnestly for converting grace in order to their acceptance with God, and their salvation: "Turn us again, O God," ver. 3; "Turn us again, O God of hosts," ver. 7, and then "cause thy face to shine, and we shall be saved." It is the burthen of the song, for we have it again, ver. 19. They are conscious to themselves that they have gone astray from God and their duty, and have turned aside into sinful ways, and that was it that provoked God to hide his face from them, and to give them up into the hand of their enemies; and therefore they desire to begin their work at the right end; Lord, turn us to thee in a way of repentance and reformation, and then, no doubt, thou wouldst return to us in a way of mercy and deliverance. Observe, 1. No salvation but from God's favour; "cause thy face to shine," let us have thy love, and the light of thy countenance, and then we shall be saved. 2. No obtaining favour with God unless we be converted to him. We must turn again to God from the world and the flesh, and then he will cause his face to shine upon us. 3. No conversion to God but by his own grace; we must frame our doings to turn to him, Hos. v. 4, and then pray earnestly for his grace, "Turn thou me, and I shall be turned;" pleading that gracious promise, Pr. i. 23, "Turn you at my reproof, behold I will pour out my Spirit unto you." The prayer here is for a national conversion. In this method we must pray for national mercies, that what is amiss may be amended, and then our grievances would be soon redressed. National holiness would secure national happiness.

8 Thou hast brought a vine out of Egypt:
Thou hast cast out the heathen, and planted it.
9 Thou preparedst room before it,
And didst cause it to take deep root,
And it filled the land.
10 The hills were covered with the shadow of it,
And the boughs thereof were like the goodly cedars.
11 She sent out her boughs unto the sea,
And her branches unto the river.
12 Why hast thou then broken down her hedges,
So that all they which pass by the way do pluck her?
13 The boar out of the wood doth waste it,
And the wild beast of the field doth devour it.

WILD BOARS.

14 Return, we beseech thee, O God of hosts:
Look down from heaven, and behold, and visit this vine, temple on high;" and yet, if we substitute "sanctuary" for "temple," it may be defended.

lxxix. Title. This psalm is manifestly more modern than the time of Asaph, and can scarcely be older than the fall of Jerusalem under Nebuchadnezzar. It has been thought to be as recent as the reign of Antiochus Epiphanes, but this is very improbable.

lxxix. 6. The words of this verse also occur in Jer. x. 25, with a slight difference. Rosenmüller says this verse and the next are taken from Jeremiah, but it is possible the contrary may be the fact, as the context here suggests.

lxxx. 2. Ephraim and Manasseh, the sons of Joseph, are here mentioned with Benjamin, probably because Joseph and Benjamin were sons of the same mother.

lxxx. 3. "Turn us again," according to the Chaldee, means restore us from captivity; others explain it "refresh us," or simply "restore us," which last we prefer.

15 And the vineyard which thy right hand hath planted,
And the branch that thou madest strong for thyself
16 It is burned with fire, it is cut down:
They perish at the rebuke of thy countenance.
17 Let thy hand be upon the man of thy right hand,
Upon the son of man whom thou madest strong for thy-18 So will not we go back from thee: [self.
Quicken us, and we will call upon thy name.
19 Turn us again, O LORD God of hosts,
Cause thy face to shine; and we shall be saved.

The psalmist is here presenting his suit for the Israel of God, and pressing it home at the throne of grace, pleading with God for mercy and grace for them. The church is here represented as a vine, ver. 8, 14, and a vineyard, ver. 15. The root of this vine is Christ, Rom. xi. 28. The branches are believers, Jno. xv. 5. The church is like a vine, weak, and needing support; unsightly, and having an unpromising outside, but spreading and fruitful, and its fruit most excellent. The church is a choice and noble vine; we have reason to acknowledge the goodness of God, that he has planted such a vine in the wilderness of this world, and preserved it to this day. Now observe here,

First. How the vine of the Old Testament church was planted at first. It was brought out of Egypt with a high hand, the heathen were cast out of Canaan to make room for it; seven nations to make room for that one. 'Thou didst sweep before it,' so some read ver. 9, to make clear work; the nations were swept away as dirt with the besom of destruction. God, having made room for it and planted it, he caused it to take deep root by a happy establishment of their government both in church and state; which was so firm that, though their neighbours about them oft attempted it, they could not prevail to pluck it up.

Secondly. How it spread and flourished. 1. The land of Canaan itself was fully peopled. At first they were not so numerous as to replenish it, Ex. xxiii. 29. But in Solomon's time Judah and Israel were many as the sand of the sea; the land was filled with them, and yet such a fruitful land that it was not overstocked, ver. 10. The hills of Canaan were covered with their shadow, and the branches, though they extend themselves far like those of the vine, yet were not weak like them, but as strong as those of the goodly cedars; Israel not only had abundance of men, but those mighty men of valour. 2. They extended their conquests and dominion to the neighbouring countries; ver. 11, "She sent out her boughs to the sea," the great sea westward, "and her branches to the river," to the river of Egypt southward, the river of Damascus northward, or rather, the river Euphrates eastward, Gen. xv. 18. Nebuchadnezzar's greatness is represented by a flourishing tree, Dan. iv. 20, 21. But it is observable here concerning this vine, that it is praised for its shadow, its boughs and its branches, but not a word of its fruit, for Israel was an empty vine, Hos. x. 1. God came looking for grapes, but behold wild grapes, Isa. v. 2. And if a vine do not bring forth fruit, no tree so useless, so worthless, Eze. xv. 2, 6.

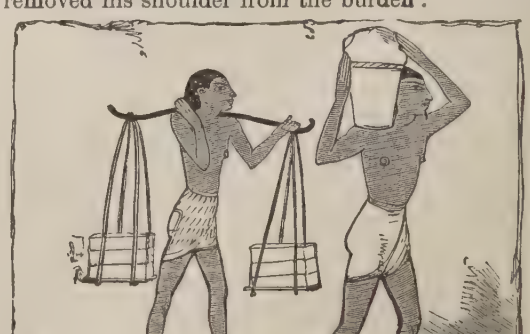
Thirdly. How it was wasted and ruined. Lord, thou hast done great things for this vine, and why shall it all be undone again? If it were a plant not of God's planting it were not strange to see it rooted up; but shall God desert and abandon that which he himself gave being to? ver. 12, "Why hast thou then broken down her hedges?" There was a good reason for this change in God's way towards them; this noble vine was become the degenerate plant of a strange vine, Jer. ii. 21, to the reproach of its great owner; and then no marvel if he took away its hedge, Isa. v. 5. Yet God's former favours to this vine are urged as pleas in prayer to God, and improved as encouragements to faith, that for all this God would not wholly cast them off. Observe, 1. The malice and enmity of the Gentile nations against Israel. As soon as ever God broke down their hedges and left them exposed, troops of enemies presently broke in upon them, that waited for an opportunity to destroy them. They that passed by the way had a pluck at them; the boar out of the wood, and the wild beast of the field were ready to ravage it, ver. 13. But, 2. See also the restraint which these cruel enemies were under, for till God had broken down their hedges they could not pluck a leaf of this vine. The devil could not hurt Job so long as God continued the hedge round about him, Job i. 10. See how much it is the interest of any people to keep themselves in the favour of God, and then they need not fear any wild beast of the field, Job v. 23. But if we provoke God to withdraw, "our defence is departed from us," and we are undone. The deplorable state of Israel is described ver. 16, "It is burned with fire, it is cut down;" the people are treated like thorns and briars, that are nigh unto cursing, and whose end is to be burned, and no longer like vines, that are protected and cherished. "They perish," not through the rage of the wild beast and the boar, but "at the rebuke of thy countenance;" that was it which they dreaded, and to which they attributed all their calamities. It is well or ill with us according as we are under God's smiles or frowns.

Fourthly. What their requests were to God hereupon.

1. That God would help the vine, ver. 14, 15; that he would graciously take cognizance of its case, and do for it as he thought fit. "Return, we beseech thee, O Lord of hosts," for thou hast seemed to go away from us. "Look down from heaven," to which thou hast retired; from heaven, that place of prospect, whence thou seest all the wrongs that are done us; that place of power, whence thou canst send effectual relief; from heaven, where thou hast prepared thy throne of judgment, to which we appeal; and where thou hast prepared a better country for those that are Israelites indeed: thence give a gracious look, thence make a gracious visit to this vine. Take our woful condition into thy compassionate consideration, and for the particular fruits of thy pity we refer ourselves to thee. Only "behold the vineyard," or rather the root, "which thy right hand hath planted," and which therefore we hope thy right hand will protect; that "branch which thou madest strong for thyself," to shew forth thy praise, Isa. xliii. 21, that with the fruit of it thou mightest be honoured. Lord, it is formed by thyself, and for thyself, and therefore it may with an humble confidence be committed to thyself, and to thine own care. "As for God, his work is perfect." What we read "the branch," in the Hebrew is 'the son' (Ben), whom in thy counsel thou hast made strong for thyself. That branch was to come out of the stock of Israel, "My servant, the branch," Zec. iii. 8. And therefore, till he was come, Israel in general, and the house of David in particular, must be preserved, and upheld, and kept in being. "He is the true vine," Jno. xv. 1; Isa. xi. 1; "Destroy it not, for that blessing is in it," Isa. lxv. 8.

2. That he would help the vinedresser; ver. 17, 18, "Let thy hand be upon the man of thy right hand;" that king, whoever it was, of the house of David, that was now to go in and out before them; let thy hand be upon him, not only to protect and cover him, but to own him, and strengthen him, and give him success. We have this phrase, Ezr. vii. 28, "And I was strengthened as the hand of the Lord my God was upon me." Their king is called the man of God's right hand, as he was the representative of their state, which was dear to God, as his Benjamin, the son of his right hand; and as he was president in their affairs, and an instrument in God's right hand of much good to them, defending them from themselves and from their enemies, and directing them in the right way; and under shepherd under him who was the great Shepherd of Israel. Princes that have power must remember that they are sons of men, of Adam, so the word is; that if they are strong, it is God that hath made them strong, and he has made them so for himself, for they are his ministers to serve the interests of his kingdom among men; which if they do in sincerity, his hand shall be upon them, and we should pray in faith that it may be so; adding this promise, that if God will adhere to our governors we will adhere to him: "So will not we go back from thee;" we will never desert a cause which we see that God espouseth, and is the patron of. Let God be our leader, and we will follow him. Adding also this prayer, "Quicken us," put life into us, revive our dying interests, revive our drooping spirits, "and then we will call upon thy name." We will continue to do so upon all occasions, having found it not in vain to do so. We cannot call upon God's name in a right manner, unless he quicken us; but it is he puts life into our souls, that puts liveliness into our prayers.

But many interpreters, both Jewish and Christian, apply this to the Messiah, the son of David, the protector and saviour of the church, and the keeper of the vineyard. 1st. He is the man of God's right hand; to whom he hath sworn by his right hand, so the Chaldee; whom he has exalted to his right hand, and who is indeed his right hand, the arm of the Lord, for all power is given to him. 2nd. He is that Son of Man whom he has made strong for himself, for the glorifying of his name, and the advancing of the interests of his kingdom among men. 3rd. God's hand is upon him throughout his whole undertaking, to bear him out, and carry him on, to protect and animate him, that "the good pleasure of the Lord might prosper in his hand." 4th. The stability and constancy of believers is entirely owing to that grace and strength which is laid up for us in Jesus Christ, Ps. lxviii. 28. In him is our strength found, by which we are enabled to persevere to the end. Let thy hand be upon him, on him let our help be laid, who is mighty, let him be made able to save to the uttermost, and that will be our security, "So will not we go back from thee."



Lastly. The psalm concludes with the same petition that had been put up twice before, and yet it is no vain repetition; ver. 19, "Turn us again." The title given to God rises, ver. 3, "O God!" ver. 7, "O God of hosts!" ver. 19, "O Lord, Jehovah, God of hosts!" When we come to God for his grace, his good will towards us, and his good work in us, we should pray earnestly, continue instant in prayer, and pray more earnestly.

PSALM LXXXI.

This psalm was penned, as is supposed, not upon occasion of any particular providence, but for the solemnity of a particular ordinance, either that of the new moon in general, or that of the feast of trumpets, on the new moon of the seventh month, Lev. xxiii. 24; Num. xxix. 1. When David, by the Spirit, introduced the singing of psalms into the temple service, this psalm was intended for that day, to excite and assist the proper devotions of it. All the psalms are profitable; but if one psalm be more suitable than another to the day, and the observances of it, we should choose that. The two great intentions of our religious assemblies, and which we ought to have in our eye in our attendance on them, are answered in this psalm, which are, to give glory to God, and to receive instruction from God, to behold the beauty of the Lord, and to inquire in his temple. Accordingly, by this psalm we are assisted on our solemn feast days, I. In praising God, for what he is to his people, ver. 1—3; and has done for them, ver. 4—7. II. In teaching and admonishing one another concerning the obligations we lie under to God, ver. 8—10; the danger of revolting from him, ver. 11, 12; and the happiness we should have if we would but keep close to him, ver. 13—16. This, though speaking primarily of Israel of old, is written for our learning, and is therefore to be sung with application.

To the chief Musician upon Gittith, A Psalm of Asaph.

SING aloud unto God our strength:
Make a joyful noise unto the God of Jacob.
2 Take a psalm, and bring hither the timbrel,
The pleasant harp with the psaltery.
3 Blow up the trumpet in the new moon,
In the time appointed, on our solemn feast day.
4 For this was a statute for Israel,
And a law of the God of Jacob.
5 This he ordained in Joseph for a testimony,
When he went out through the land of Egypt:
Where I heard a language that I understood not.
6 I removed his shoulder from the burden:

lxxx. 8. That the people of Israel are here set forth under the figure of a vine is evident, and it is so expressed in the Chaldee.

lxxx. 11. "The sea" here is doubtless the Mediterranean, and "the river" is the Euphrates; these being the eastern and western limits of Israel in its full extent.

lxxx. 12. For "hedges" read "fences," as stone walls, rather than growing hedges, are intended, though the latter are not unknown in Palestine.

lxxx. 13. The wild boar is famous in the records of Syria and the East. The myth of Adonis or Tammuz represents him as being killed by a wild boar in Syria. The animal is still to be found in many parts of the country, and is exceedingly destructive to the crops of corn. It also devours the grapes and branches of the vineyards. Wild boars are represented on the ancient monuments of Assyria and other nations, especially in hunting scenes.

lxxx. 16. One of the features of war in countries in which vine-

His hands were delivered from the pots.
7 Thou calledst in trouble, and I delivered thee;
I answered thee in the secret place of thunder:
I proved thee at the waters of Meribah. Selah.

When the people of God were gathered together in the solemn day, the day of the feast of the Lord, they must be told that they had business to do, for we do not go to church to sleep, or to be idle. No; there is that which the duty of every day requires; work of the day, which is to be done in its day. And here,

First. The worshippers of God are excited to their work; and are taught, by singing this psalm, to stir up both themselves and one another to it, ver. 1—3. Our errand is to "give unto God the glory due unto his name;" and in all our religious assemblies we must mind this as our business. 1. In doing this, we must eye God as our strength, and as the God of Jacob, ver. 1. He is the strength of Israel, as a people; for he is a God in covenant with them, that will powerfully protect, support, and deliver them; that fights their battles, and makes them to do valiantly, and victoriously. He is the strength of every Israelite; by his grace we are enabled to go through all our services, sufferings, and conflicts. And to him, as our strength, we must both pray and sing praise to him, as the God of all the wrestling seed of Jacob, with whom we have a spiritual communion. 2. We must do this by all the expressions of holy joy and triumph. It was then to be done by musical instruments, the timbrel, harp, and psaltery, and by blowing the trumpet; some think, in remembrance of the sound of the trumpet on mount Sinai, which waxed louder and louder. It was then, and is now to be done, by singing psalms, singing aloud, and making a joyful noise. The pleasantness of the harp, and the awfulness of the trumpet, intimates to us that God is to be worshipped with cheerfulness and holy joy, with reverence and godly fear. Singing aloud, and making a noise, intimates that we must be warm and affectionate in praising God; that we must with a hearty good-will shew forth his praise, as those that are not ashamed to own our dependence on him, and obligations to him; and that we should join many together in this work, the more the better, it is the liker to heaven. 3. This must be done in the time appointed. No time amiss for praising God; "Seven times a day will I praise thee;" nay, "at midnight will I rise and give thanks to thee." But some are times appointed, not for God to meet us, he is always ready, but for us to meet one another, that we may join together in praising God. The solemn feast-day must be a day of praise, when we are receiving the gifts of God's bounty, and rejoicing in them then it is proper to sing his praises.

Secondly. They are here directed in their work.

1. They must look up to the Divine institution, which it is the observation of. In all religious worship we must have an eye to the command; ver. 4, "This was a statute for Israel," for the keeping up of a face of religion among them; it was "a law of the God of Jacob," which all the seed of Jacob are bound by, and must be subject to. Note, Praising God is not only a good thing, which we may do well to do, but it is our indispensable duty, which we are obliged to do. It is at our peril if we neglect it; and in all religious exercises we must have an eye to the institution as our warrant and rule. This I do, because God has commanded me; and therefore, I hope he will accept me. Then it is done in faith.

2. They must look back upon those operations of Divine providence, which it is the memorial of. This solemn service was ordained for a testimony, ver. 5; a standing traditional evidence, for the attesting of the matters of fact. It was a testimony to Israel, that they might know and remember what God had done for their fathers, and would be a testimony against them, if they should be ignorant of them and forget them.

1st. The psalmist, in the people's name, puts himself in mind of the general work of God on Israel's behalf, which was kept in remembrance by this and other solemnities, ver. 5. When God went out against the land of Egypt, to lay it waste, that he might force Pharaoh to let Israel go, then he ordained solemn feast days to be observed by a statute for ever in their generations, as a memorial of it, particularly the passover, which perhaps is meant by the solemn feast day, ver. 3. That was appointed just then when God went out through the land of Egypt to destroy the firstborn, and passed over the houses of the Israelites, Ex. xii. 23, 24. And by it that work of wonder was to be kept in perpetual remembrance, that all ages might in it behold the goodness and severity of God. The psalmist, speaking for his people, takes notice of this aggravating circumstance of their slavery in Egypt, that there they heard a language that they understood not; there they were strangers in a strange land. The Egyptians and the Hebrews understood not one another's language; for Joseph spake to his brethren by an interpreter, Gen. xlii. 23; and the Egyptians are said to be to the house of Jacob a people of a strange language, Ps. cxiv. 1. To make a deliverance appear the more gracious, the more glorious, it is good to observe every thing that makes the trouble we are delivered from appear the more grievous.

2nd. The psalmist, in God's name, puts the people in mind of some of the particulars of their deliverance. Here he changeth the person; ver. 6, God speaks by him, saying, "I removed his shoulder from the burthen." Let him remember this on the feast day, First. That God had brought them out of the house of bondage; had removed their shoulder from the burthen of oppression, under which they are ready to sink; had delivered their hands from the pots, or panniers, or baskets in which they carried clay or bricks. Liberty out of slavery is a very sensible mercy, and which ought to be had in everlasting remembrance. But this was not all. Secondly. God had delivered them at the Red sea. Then they called in trouble, and he rescued them, and disappointed the designs of their enemies against them, Ex. xiv. 10. Then he answered them with a real answer out of the secret place of thunder, that is, out of the pillar of fire, through which God looked upon the host of the Egyptians, and troubled it, Ex. xiv. 25. Or, it may be meant of the giving of the law at mount Sinai, which was the secret place; for it was death to gaze, Ex. xix. 21, and it was in thunder that God then spake. Even the terrors of Sinai were favours to Israel, Deu. iv. 33. Thirdly. God had borne their manners in the wilderness; "I proved thee at the waters of Meribah, that is, thou didst there shew thy temper, what an unbelieving murmuring people thou wast, and yet I continued my favour to thee; Selah, mark that. Compare God's goodness and man's badness, and they will serve as foils to each other. Now if they on their solemn feast days were thus to call to mind their redemption out of Egypt, much more ought we on the Christian sabbath to call to mind a more glorious redemption wrought out for us by Jesus Christ, from worse than Egyptian bondage, and the many gracious answers he hath given to us, notwithstanding our manifold provocations.

8 Hear, O my people, and I will testify unto thee:
O Israel, if thou wilt hearken unto me;
9 There shall no strange god be in thee;
Neither shalt thou worship any strange god.
10 I am the LORD thy God,
Which brought thee out of the land of Egypt:
Open thy mouth wide, and I will fill it.
11 But my people would not hearken to my voice;
And Israel would none of me.
12 So I gave them up unto their own hearts' lust:
And they walked in their own counsels.
13 Oh that my people had hearkened unto me,
And Israel had walked in my ways!
14 I should soon have subdued their enemies,
And turned my hand against their adversaries
15 The haters of the LORD should have submitted themselves unto him:
But their time should have endured for ever.
16 He should have fed them also with the finest of the wheat:
And with honey out of the rock should I have satisfied thee.

God, by the psalmist, here speaks to Israel, and in them to us, on whom the ends of the world are come.

First. He demands their diligent and serious attention to what he was about to say; ver. 8, "Hear, O my people;" and who should hear me if my own people will not? I have heard and answered thee, now wilt thou hear me? Hear what is said with the greatest solemnity, and the most unquestionable certainty; for it is what "I will testify unto thee." Do not only give me the hearing, but hearken unto me, that is, be advised by me, be ruled by me. Nothing could be more reasonably or more justly expected, and yet God puts an 'if' upon it; "If thou wilt hearken unto me." It is thine interest to do so, and yet it is questionable whether thou wilt or no; for thy neck is an iron sinew.

Secondly. He puts them in mind of their obligation to him, as the Lord their God and Redeemer; ver. 10, "I am the Lord thy God, which brought thee out of the land of Egypt," which is the preface to the Ten Commandments, and a powerful reason for the keeping of them, shewing that we are bound to it in duty, interest, and gratitude, all which bonds we break asunder if we be disobedient.

Thirdly. He gives them an abstract, both of the precepts and of the promises which he gave them as the Lord, and their God, upon their coming out of Egypt. 1. The great command was, that they should have no other gods before him; ver. 9, "There shall no strange god be in thee," none beside thine own God. Other gods might well be called strange gods, for it was very strange that ever any people, who had the true and living God for their God, should hanker after any other. God is jealous in this matter, for he will not suffer his glory to be given to another; and therefore in this matter they must be circumspect, Ex. xxiii. 13. 2. The great promise was, that God himself, as a God all-sufficient, would be nigh unto them in all that which they called upon him for, Deu. iv. 7. That if they would adhere to him as their powerful protector and ruler, they should always find him their bountiful benefactor; "Open thy mouth wide and I will fill it," as the young ravens that cry, open their mouths wide, and the old ones fill them. See here, 1st. What is our duty. To raise our expectations from God, and enlarge our desires towards him. We cannot look for too little from the creature, nor too much from the Creator. We are not straitened in him, and therefore why should we be straitened in our own bosoms? 2nd. What is God's promise. I will fill thy mouth with good things, Ps. ciii. 5. There is enough in God to fill our treasures, Pr. viii. 21; to replenish every hungry soul, Jer. xxxi. 25; to supply all our wants, to answer all our desires, and to make us completely happy. The pleasures of sense will surfeit, and never satisfy, Isa. lv. 2; Divine pleasures will satisfy, and never surfeit. And we may have enough from God if we pray for it in faith; "Ask, and it shall be given you;" "he gives liberally, and upbraideth not." God assured his people Israel, that it should be their own fault if he did not do as great and kind things for them as he had done for their fathers. Nothing should have been thought too good, too much, to give them, if they would but have kept close to God. He "would moreover have given them such and such things," 2 Sam. xii. 8.

Fourthly. He chargeth them with a high contempt of his authority as their lawgiver, and his grace and favour as their benefactor, ver. 11. He had done much for them, and designed to do more; but all in vain, "My people would not hearken to my voice," but turned a deaf ear to all I said. Two things he complains of: 1. Their disobedience to his commands. They did hear his voice, so as never any people did; but they would not hearken to it,—they would not be ruled by it,—neither by the law, nor by the reason of it. 2. Their dislike of his covenant-relation to them; "They would none of me;" 'they acquiesced not in my word,' so the Chaldee. God was willing to be to them a God, but they were not willing to be to him a people; they did not like his terms; "I would have gathered them, but they would not." They had none of him; and why had they not? It was not because they might not; they were fairly invited into covenant with God. It was not because they could not; for "the word was nigh them, even in their mouth, and in their heart;" but it was purely because they would not. God calls them his people, for they were bought by him, bound to him, his by a thousand ties, and yet even they have not hearkened, have not obeyed: Israel, the seed of Jacob my friend, set me at nought, and would have none of me. Note, All the wickedness of the wicked world is owing to the wilfulness of the wicked will. The reason why people are not religious is because they will not be so.

Fifthly. He justifies himself with this in the spiritual judgments he had brought upon them; ver. 12, "So I gave them up unto their own hearts' lusts," which would be more dangerous enemies, and more mischievous oppressors to them than any of the neighbouring nations ever were. God withdrew his Spirit from them, took off the bridle of restraining grace, left them to themselves, and justly; they will do as they will, and therefore let them do as they will; "Ephraim is joined to idols, let him alone." It is a righteous thing with God to give those up to their own hearts' lusts that indulge them, and give up themselves to be led by them; for why should his Spirit always strive? His grace is his own, and he is debtor to no man; and yet, as he never gave his grace to any that could say they deserved it, so he never took it away from any yards are found is the destruction of them by fire and by other agencies. The Syriac version of this verse is, "They have burned its branches with fire; at the rebuke of thy face they shall perish." The Greek is, "It is burnt with fire and uprooted; at the rebuke of thy face they shall perish."

lxxxi. 6. In Egypt burdens were very much carried on or sustained by the shoulder. The expression "from the pots" should be "from the basket," because the reference is to the basket or hamper which bondsmen in Egypt were very often forced to carry. Our translators seem to have thought the allusion was to the employment of the Israelites as potters.

lxxxi. 7. "I answered thee in the secret place of thunder" is a fair translation, which can hardly be said of the Prayer-Book version, "I heard thee what time as the storm fell upon thee." The original allusion appears to be to a dark thunder-cloud. Compare Ex. xiv. 24, and xix. 16.

but such as had first forfeited it. "They would none of me, so I gave them up;" let them take their course, and see what follows; "they walked in their own counsels," in the way of their heart, and in the sight of their eye,—both in their worships and in their conversations. I left them to do as they would, and then they did all that was ill; they walked in their own counsels, and not according to the counsels of God, and his advice. God therefore was not the author of their sin; he left them to the lusts of their own hearts, and the counsels of their own heads; if they do not well, the blame must lie upon their own hearts, and the blood upon their own heads.

Sixthly. He testifies his good-will to them, in wishing they had done well for themselves. He saw how sad their case was, and how sure their ruin, when they were delivered up to their own lusts. That is worse than being given up to Satan, that may be in order to reformation, 1 Tim. i. 20, and to salvation, 1 Cor. v. 5. But to be delivered up to our own hearts' lusts, is to be sealed under condemnation. "He that is filthy let him be filthy still." What fatal precipices will not these hurry a man to! Now here God looks upon them with pity, and shews that it was with reluctancy that he thus abandoned them to their folly and fate; "How shall I give thee up, Ephraim?" Hos. xi. 8, 9; so here; "O that my people had hearkened!" see Isa. xlviii. 18. Thus Christ lamented the obstinacy of Jerusalem, "If thou hadst known," Lu. xix. 41. The expressions here are very affecting, ver. 13—16; designed to shew, 1. How unwilling God is that any should perish, and desirous that all should come to repentance. He delights not in the ruin of sinful persons or nations. 2. What enemies sinners are to themselves, and what an aggravation it will be of their misery that they might have been happy upon such easy terms.

Observe here, 1st. The great mercy God had in store for his people, and which he would have wrought for them if they had been obedient. First. He would have given them victory over their enemies, and would soon have completed the reduction of them. They should not only have kept their ground, but have gained their point against the remaining Canaanites, and their encroaching, vexatious neighbours; ver. 14, "I should soon have subdued their enemies;" and it is God only that is to be depended on for the subduing our enemies. Nor would he have put them to the expense and fatigue of a tedious war; he would soon have done it; for he would have "turned his hand against their adversaries," and then they had not been able to stand before them. It intimates how easily he would have done it, and without any difficulty; with the turn of a hand, nay, "with the breath of his mouth shall he slay the wicked," Isa. xi. 4. If he but turn his hand, "the haters of the Lord will submit themselves to him," ver. 15. And though they are not brought to love him, yet they shall be made to fear him, and to confess that he is too hard for them, and it is in vain to contend with him. God is honoured, and so is his Israel, by the submission of those that have been in rebellion against them, though it be but a forced and feigned submission. Secondly. He would have confirmed and perpetuated their posterity, and established it upon sure and lasting foundations. In despite of all the attempts of their enemies against them, "their time should have endured for ever," and they should never have been disturbed in the possession of the good land God had given them, much less evicted, and turned out of possession. Thirdly. He would have given them great plenty of all good things; ver. 16, "He should have fed them with the finest of the wheat," with the best grain, and the best of the kind. Wheat was the staple commodity of Canaan, and they exported a deal of it, Eze. xxvii. 17. He would not only have provided for them the best sort of bread, but "with honey out of the rock would he have satisfied them." Besides the precious products of the fruitful soil, that there might not be a barren spot in all their land, even the clefts of the rock should serve for beehives, and in them they should find honey in abundance: see Deu. xxxii. 13, 14. In short, God designed to make them every way easy and happy.

2nd. The duty God required from them as the condition of all this mercy. He expected no more but that they should hearken to him, as a scholar to his teacher, to receive his instructions; as a servant to his master, to receive his commands. And that they should walk in his ways, those ways of the Lord which are right and pleasant, that they should observe the institutions of his ordinances, and attend the intimations of his providence. And there was nothing unreasonable in this.

3rd. Observe how the reason of the withholding of the mercy is laid in their neglect of the duty. If they had hearkened to me, "I would soon have subdued their enemies." Note, National sin and disobedience is the great and only thing that retards and obstructs national salvation and deliverance. "When I would have healed Israel," and set every thing to rights among them, then "the iniquity of Ephraim was discovered," and so a stop was put to the cure, Hos. vii. 1. We are apt to say, if such a method had been taken, such an instrument employed, we should soon have subdued our enemies; but we mistake. If we had hearkened to God, and kept to our duty, the thing had been done; but it is sin that makes our troubles long, and salvation slow. And this is that which God himself complains of, and wisheth it had been otherwise. Note, Therefore God would have us do our duty to him, that we may be qualified to receive favour from him. He therefore delights in our serving him, not because he is the better for it, but because we shall be.

PSALM LXXXII.

This psalm is calculated for the meridian of princes' courts, and courts of justice, not in Israel only, but in other nations; yet it was probably penned primarily for the use of the magistrates of Israel, the great Sanhedrim, and others their elders that were in places of power, and perhaps by David's direction. This psalm is designed to make kings wise, and to instruct the judges of the earth, as Ps. ii. 10; to tell them their duty, as 2 Sam. xxii. 3; and tell them of their faults, as Ps. lviii. 1. We have here, I. The dignity of magistracy, and its dependence upon God, ver. 1. II. The duty of magistrates, ver. 3, 4. III. The degeneracy of bad magistrates, and the mischief they do, ver. 2, 5. IV. Their doom read, ver. 6, 7. V. The desire and prayer of all good people that the kingdom of God may be set up more and more, ver. 8. Though magistrates may most closely apply this psalm to themselves, yet we may any of us sing it with understanding, when we give glory to God in singing of it, as presiding in all public affairs, providing for the protection of injured innocency, and ready to punish the most powerful injustice, and when we comfort ourselves with the belief of his present government, and with the hopes of his future judgment.

A Psalm of Asaph.

GOD standeth in the congregation of the mighty;
He judgeth among the gods.
2 How long will ye judge unjustly,
And accept the persons of the wicked? Selah.
3 Defend the poor and fatherless:
Do justice to the afflicted and needy.
4 Deliver the poor and needy:
Rid them out of the hand of the wicked.
5 They know not, neither will they understand;
They walk on in darkness:
All the foundations of the earth are out of course

We have here,

First. God's supreme presidency and power in all councils and courts asserted and laid down, as a great truth necessary to be believed both by princes and subjects; ver. 1, "God stands" as chief director "in the congregation of the mighty," the mighty One, in cœtu fortis,—'in the councils of the prince,' the supreme magistrate, and "he judgeth among the gods," the inferior magistrates; both the legislative and the executive power of princes is under his eye and his hand. Observe here, 1. The power and honour of magistrates. They are the mighty; they are so in authority for the public good. It is a great power that they are intrusted with, and they ought to be so in wisdom and courage; they are in the Hebrew dialect called gods. The same word is used for these subordinate governors that is used for the sovereign ruler of the world; they are Elohim. Angels are so called, both because they are great in power and might, and because God is pleased to make use of their service in the government of this lower world. And magistrates, in an inferior capacity, are likewise the ministers of his providence in general, for the keeping up of order and peace in human societies, and particularly of his justice and goodness, in punishing evil-doers, and protecting them that do well. Good magistrates, that answer the ends of magistracy, are as God; some of his honour is put upon them; they are his vicegerents and great blessings to any people. "A divine sentence is in the lips of the king," Pr. xvi. 10; but, "as roaring lions and ranging bears, so are wicked rulers over the poor people," Pr. xxviii. 15. 2. A good form and constitution of government intimated, and that is a mixed monarchy, like ours. Here is the mighty One, the sovereign, and here is his congregation, his privy council, his parliament, his bench of judges, who are called the gods. 3. God's incontestable sovereignty maintained in and over all the congregations of the mighty. God stands, he judgeth among them; that is, they have their power from him, and are accountable to him; by him kings reign. He is present at all their debates, and inspects all they say and do; and what is said and done amiss will be called over again, and they reckoned with for their maladministrations. God has their hearts in his hands, and their tongues too, and he directs them which way soever he will, Pr. xxi. 1. So that he has a negative voice in all their resolves, and his counsels shall stand, whatsoever devices rise in men's hearts. He makes what use he pleaseth of them, and serves his own purposes and designs by them, though little doth their heart think so, Isa. x. 7. Let magistrates consider this, and be awed by it; God is with them in the judgment, 2 Chr. i. 5; Deu. xix. 17. Let subjects consider this, and be comforted with it; for good princes and good judges, that mean well, are under a Divine direction; and bad ones, that mean never so ill, are under a Divine restraint.

Secondly. A charge given to all magistrates to do good with their power, as they will answer it to Him by whom they are intrusted with it, ver. 3, 4. 1. They are to be the protectors of those that lie exposed to injury, and the patrons of those that want advice and assistance. Defend the poor that have no money wherewith to make friends, or fee council; and the fatherless, that while they are young and unable to help themselves, have lost those that would have been the guides of their youth. Magistrates, as they must be fathers to their country in general, so particularly to those in it that are fatherless. Are they called gods? Herein they must be followers of him, they must be fathers of the fatherless. Job was so, Job xxix. 13. 2. They are to administer justice impartially, and "do right to the afflicted and needy," who, being weak and helpless, have often wrongs done them, and will be in danger of losing all, if magistrates do not ex officio interpose for their relief. If a poor man has an honest cause, his poverty must be no prejudice to his cause, how great and powerful soever those are that contend with him. 3. They are to rescue those that are already fallen into the hands of oppressors, and deliver them; ver. 4, "rid them out of the hand of the wicked." "Avenge them of their adversary," Lu. xviii. 3. These are clients that there is nothing to be got by, no pay for serving them, no interest by obliging them, yet these are they whom judges and magistrates must concern themselves for, whose comfort they must consult, and whose cause they must espouse.

Thirdly. A charge drawn up against bad magistrates, that neglect their duty, and abuse their power, forgetting that God standeth among them, ver. 2, 5. Observe,

1. What the sin is they are here charged with. They judge unjustly, contrary to the rules of equity, and the dictates of their consciences; giving judgment against those that have right on their side, out of malice and ill-will; or for those that have an unrighteous cause, out of favour and partial affection. To do unjustly is bad, but to judge unjustly is much worse, because it is doing wrong under colour of right; against such acts of injustice there is least fence for the injured, and by them encouragement is given to the injurious. It was as great an evil as any Solomon saw under the sun, when he observed "the place of judgment that iniquity was there," Eccl. iii. 16; Isa. v. 7. They not only accepted the persons of the rich, because they were rich, though that is bad enough; but, which is much worse, they "accepted the persons of the wicked," because they were wicked; they not only countenanced them in their wickedness, but loved them the better for it, and fell in with their interests. Woe unto thee, O land, when thy judges are such as these.

2. What were the cause of this sin. They were told plainly enough that it was their office and duty to protect and deliver the poor; it was many a time given them in charge, yet they judge unjustly, for they know not, neither will they understand. They do not care to hear their duty, they will not take pains to study it; they have no desire to take things right, but are governed by interest, not by reason or justice; "A gift in secret blinds their eyes." They know not, because they will not understand; none so blind as those that will not see. They have baffled their own consciences, and so they walk on in darkness, not knowing or caring what they do, or whither they go. They that walk on in darkness are walking on to everlasting darkness.

3. What were the consequences of this sin. "All the foundations of the earth," or of the land, "are out of course." When justice is perverted, what good can be expected? "The earth and all the inhabitants thereof are dissolved," as the psalmist speaks in a like case, Ps. lxxv. 3. The miscarriages of public persons are public mischiefs.

6 I have said, Ye are gods;
And all of you are children of the most High.
7 But ye shall die like men,
And fall like one of the princes

lxxxi. 10. In travelling from Egypt to Canaan, men were said to "go up," but in journeying from Canaan to Egypt they were said to "go down." Compare Gen. xliv. 17, xlv. 25; Isa. xxx. 1, 2.

lxxxi. 12. "I gave them up" is said to refer to the letting a horse go without check. The next words, "unto their own hearts' lust," should rather be "to the obstinacy of their heart," i.e., to their headstrong disposition and self-will.

lxxxi. 15. "Should have submitted themselves unto him:" these words, in accordance with a known idiom, denote rather a forced and formal than a willing and sincere submission: those who had hated God would have professed not to hate him, and would have withdrawn their opposition to his people.

lxxxi. 16. "Honey out of the rock" is a phrase which refers to the habit which bees are said to have of making their nests in rocks. Dr. Tristram says this is very common.

lxxxii. 1. The first clause is literally "God stands in the council

8 Arise, O God, judge the earth:
For thou shalt inherit all nations.

We have here,

First. Earthly gods abased and brought down, ver. 6 7. The dignity of their character is acknowledged: ver. 6, "I have said, Ye are gods." They have been honoured with the name and title of gods; God himself called them so in the statute against treasonable words, Ex. xxii. 28, "Thou shalt not revile the gods." And if they have this style from the fountain of honour, who can dispute it? But what is man, that he should be thus magnified? "He called them gods, because unto them the word of God came," so our Saviour expounds it, Jno. x. 35; that is, they had a commission from God, and were delegated and appointed by him to be the shields of the earth, the conservators of the public peace, and revengers to execute wrath upon those that disturb it, Rom. xiii. 4. All of them are in this sense children of the Most High; God has put some of his honour upon them, and employs them in his providential government of the world, as David made his sons chief rulers. Or, because "I said ye are gods," you have carried the honour farther than was intended, and have imagined yourselves to be "the children of the Most High," as the king of Babylon, Isa. xiv. 14, "I will be like the Most High;" and the king of Tyre, Eze. xxviii. 2, "Thou hast set thine heart as the heart of God." It is a hard thing for men to have so much honour put upon them by the hand of God, and so much honour paid them, as ought to be by the children of men, and not to be proud of it, and puffed up with it, and so think of themselves above what is meet. But here follows a mortifying consideration, "Ye shall die like men." This may be taken either,

1. As the punishment of bad magistrates, such as judged unjustly, and by their misrules put the foundations of the earth out of course. God will reckon with them, and will cut them off in the midst of their pomp and prosperity; they shall die like other wicked men, and fall like one of the heathen princes, and their being Israelites shall not secure them, no more than their being judges; or like one of the angels that sinned; or like one of the giants of the old world. Compare this with that which Elihu observed concerning the mighty oppressors in his time; Job xxxiv. 26, "He striketh them as wicked men in the open sight of others." Let those that abuse their power know that God will take both it and their lives from them; for wherein they deal proudly, he will shew himself above them. Or,

2. As the period of the glory of all magistrates in this world. Let them not be puffed up with their honour, or neglect their work; but let the consideration of their mortality be both mortifying to their pride and quickening to their duty. Ye are called gods, but ye have no patent for immortality; "ye shall die like men," like common men, and 'like one of them ye, O princes, shall fall.' Note, Kings and princes, old judges of the earth, though they are gods to us, are men to God, and shall die like men, and all their honour shall be laid in the dust. Mors sceptra ligonibus æquat,—'Death mingles sceptres with spades.'

Secondly. The God of heaven exalted, and raised high, ver. 8. The psalmist finds it to little purpose to reason with these proud oppressors; they turned a deaf ear to all he said, and walked on in darkness, and therefore he looks up to God, appeals to him, and begs of him to take unto himself his great power. "Arise, O God, judge the earth." And when he prays that he would do it, he believes that he will do it: "Thou shalt inherit all nations." This has respect, 1. To the kingdom of providence. God governs the world, sets up and puts down whom he pleaseth; he inherits all nations, has an absolute dominion over them, to dispose of them as a man doth of his inheritance. This we are to believe, and to comfort ourselves with, that the earth is not given so much into the hands of the wicked, the wicked rulers, as we are tempted to think it is, Job ix. 24; but God has reserved the power to himself, and overrules them. In this faith we must pray, "Arise, O God, judge the earth," appear against those that judge unjustly, and set shepherds over thy people after thine own heart. There is a righteous God to whom we may have recourse, and on whom we may depend, for the effectual relief of all that find themselves aggrieved by unjust judges. 2. It has respect to the kingdom of the Messiah. It is a prayer for the hastening of that, that Christ would come, who is to judge the earth; and that promise is pleaded, that God shall give him the heathen for his inheritance. Thou, O Christ, shalt inherit all nations, and be the governor over them, Ps. ii. 8; xxii. 28. Let the second coming of Christ set to rights all these disorders. There are two words with which we may comfort ourselves and one another, in reference to the mismanagements of power among men; one is, Rev. xix. 6, "Hallelujah, the Lord God omnipotent reigneth;" the other is, Rev. xxii. 20, "Surely I come quickly."

PSALM LXXXIII.

This psalm is the last of those that go under the name of Asaph. It is penned, as most of those, upon a public account, with reference to the insults of the church's enemies, that sought its ruin. Some think it was penned upon occasion of the threatening descent which was made upon the land of Judah in Jehoshaphat's time by the Moabites and Ammonites, those children of Lot here spoken of, ver. 8, who were at the head of the alliance, and to whom all the other states here mentioned were auxiliaries. We have the story 2 Chr. xx. 1, where it is said, the children of Moab and Ammon, and others besides them, invaded the land. Others think it was penned with reference to all the confederacies of the neighbour nations against Israel from first to last. The psalmist here makes an appeal and application, I. To God's knowledge, by a remonstrance of their designs and endeavours to destroy Israel, ver. 1—8. II. To God's justice and jealousy both for his church and for his own honour, by an earnest prayer for the defeat of their attempt, that the church might be preserved, the enemies humbled, and God glorified, ver. 9—18. This, in the singing of it, we may apply to the enemies of the gospel church, all antichristian powers and factions, representing to God their confederacies against Christ and his kingdom, and rejoicing in hopes that all their projects will be baffled, and the gates of hell shall not prevail against the church.

A Song or Psalm of Asaph.

KEEP not thou silence, O God:
Hold not thy peace, and be not still, O God
2 For, lo, thine enemies make a tumult:
And they that hate thee have lifted up the head
3 They have taken crafty counsel against thy people,
And consulted against thy hidden ones. [a nation;
4 They have said, Come, and let us cut them off from being
That the name of Israel may be no more in remembrance
5 For they have consulted together with one consent:
They are confederate against thee:
6 The tabernacles of Edom, and the Ishmaelites;
Of Moab, and the Hagarenes;
7 Gebal, and Ammon, and Amalek;
The Philistines with the inhabitants of Tyre;
8 Assur also is joined with them:
They have holpen the children of Lot. Selah.

The Israel of God was now in danger, and fear, and great distress; and yet their prayer is called, a song or psalm, for singing psalms is not unseasonable, no, not when the harps are hung upon the willow trees.

First. The psalmist here begs of God to appear on the behalf of his injured, threatened people; ver. 1, "Keep not thou silence, O God," but give judgment for us against those that do us an apparent wrong. Thus Jehoshaphat prayed upon occasion of that invasion, 2 Chr. xx. 11, "Behold how they reward us, to come to cast us out of thy possession." Sometimes God seems to connive at the unjust treatment which is given to his people; he keeps silence, as one that either did not observe it or did not concern himself in it; he holds his peace, as if he would observe an exact neutrality, and let them fight it out; he is still, and gives not the enemies of his people any disturbance or opposition; but seems to sit by "as a man astonied, or as a mighty man that cannot save." Then He gives us leave to call upon him, as here, "Keep not thou silence, O God." Lord, speak to us by thy prophets for our encouragement against our fears, as he did in reference to that invasion, 2 Chr. xx. 14. Lord, speak for us by thy providence, and speak against our enemies; speak deliverance to us, and disappointment to them. God's speaking is his acting; for with him saying and doing are the same thing.

Secondly. He here gives an account of the grand alliance of the neighbour nations against Israel, which he begs of God to break, and blast the projects of. Now observe here,

1. Against whom this confederacy is formed. It is against the Israel of God, and so in effect against the God of Israel. Thus the psalmist takes care to interest God in their cause, not doubting but that, if it appeared that they were for God, God would make it appear he was for them, and then they might set all their enemies at defiance; for who then could be against them? Lord, saith he, they are thine enemies, and they hate thee. All wicked people are God's enemies; "the carnal mind is enmity against God," but especially wicked persecutors; they hated the religious worshippers of God, because they hated God's holy religion, and the worship of him. This was that which made God's people so zealous against them,—that they fought against God; "They are confederates against thee," ver. 5. Were our interest only concerned, we could the better bear it; but when God himself is struck at, it is time to cry, Help, Lord; "Keep not thou silence, O God." He proves that they are confederate against God, for they are so against the people of God, who are near and dear to him,—his son, his firstborn, his portion, and the lot of his inheritance He may truly be said to fight against me that endeavours to destroy my children, to root out my family, and ruin my estate. Lord, saith the psalmist, they are thy enemies, for they consult against thy hidden ones. Note, God's people are his hidden ones. Hid, 1. In respect of secrecy. Their life is hid with Christ in God; the world knows them not; if they knew them, they would not hate them as they do. 2nd. In respect of safety. God takes them under his special protection, hides them in the hollow of his hand; and yet, in defiance of God, and his power and promise to secure his people, they will consult to ruin them, and cast them down from their excellency, Ps. lxii. 4, and to make a prey of those whom "the Lord hath set apart for himself," Ps. iv. 3. They resolve to destroy those whom God resolves to preserve.

2. How this confederacy is managed. The devil is at the bottom of it, and therefore it is carried on, 1st. With a great deal of heat and violence. "Thine enemies make a tumult," ver. 2; "The heathen rage," Ps. ii. 1; "The nations are angry," Rev. xi. 18. They are noisy in their clamours against the people, whom they hope to run down with their loud calumnies. This comes in as a reason why God should not keep silence. The enemies talk big, and talk much; Lord, let them not talk all, but do thou speak to them in thy wrath, Ps. ii. 5. 2nd. With a great deal of pride and insolence. They have lift up the head; in confidence of their success they are so elevated, as if they could overtop the Most High, and overpower the Almighty 3rd. With a great deal of art and policy. They have taken crafty counsel, ver. 3. The subtlety of the old serpent appears in their management, and they contrive by all possible means, though never so base, never so bad, to gain their point. They are profound to make slaughter, Hos. v. 2; as if they could outwit Infinite Wisdom. 4th. With a great deal of unanimity. Whatever separate, clashing interests they have among themselves, against the people of God they consult with one consent, ver. 5; nor is Satan's kingdom divided against itself. To push on this unholy war, they lay their heads together, and their horns, and their hearts too. Fas est et ab hoste doceri,—'Even an enemy may instruct.' Do the enemies of the church act with one consent to destroy it? Are the kings of the earth of one mind to give their power and honour to the beast? And shall not the church's friends be unanimous in serving her interests? If Herod and Pilate are made friends, that they may join in crucifying Christ, sure Paul and Barnabas, Paul and Peter, will soon be made friends, that they may join in preaching Christ.

3. What is it that is aimed at in this confederacy. They consult not like the Gibeonites to make a league with Israel, that they might strengthen themselves by such a desirable alliance, which had been their wisdom. They consult not only to clip the wings of Israel, to recover their new conquests, and check the progress of their victorious arms; not only to keep the balance even between them and Israel, and to prevent their power from growing exorbitant. This will not serve; it is no less than the utter ruin and extirpation of Israel that is designed; ver. 4, "Come, let us cut them off from being a nation," as they cut off the seven nations of Canaan; let us leave them neither root nor branch, but lay their country so perfectly waste, "that the name of Israel may be no more in remembrance," no, not in history; for with them they would destroy their Bibles, and burn all their records. Such is the enmity of the serpent's seed against the seed of the woman. It is the secret wish of many wicked men, that the church of God might not have a being in the world, that there might be no such thing as religion among mankind. Having banished the sense of it out of their own hearts, they would gladly see the whole earth as well rid of it; all its laws and ordinances abolished, all its restraints and obligations shaken off, and all that preach, profess, or practise it, cut off; this they would bring it to if it were in their power; but "He that sits in heaven shall laugh at them."

4. Who they are that are drawn into this confederacy. The nations that entered into this alliance are here mentioned, ver. 6—8. The Edomites and Ishmaelites, both descendants from Abraham, lead the van; for apostates from the church have been its most bitter and spiteful enemies; witness Julian. These were allied to Israel in blood, and yet in alliance against Israel There of God," i.e., he presides over his own council or assembly. In the next clause "gods" are probably judges," to whom the name is sometimes given.

lxxxii. 5. "They know not, neither will they understand:" the Chaldee has, "They know not how to do good, and do not understand the law."

lxxxiii. 1. For "Keep not thou silence, O God," the Greek has, "O God, who shall be like unto thee?" but our version is correct.

lxxxiii. 3. "Hidden ones" are those whom God protects.

lxxxiii. 6. The Hagarenes are thought to have been a branch of the Ishmaelites. The Syriac has, "Edom and the Arabians, and Moab and the Gadarenes."

lxxxiii. 7. For "Gebal and Ammon," the Syriac has "the border of Ammon." Gebal is well known to have been in Phœnicia, and its site and ruins have been often described. The Philistines were the inveterate foes of Israel.

are no bonds of nature so strong but the spirit of persecution has broke through them; "The brother shall betray the brother to death." Moab and Ammon were the children of righteous Lot; but as an incestuous, so a degenerate race. The Philistines were long a thorn in Israel's side, and very vexatious: but how the inhabitants of Tyre, who in David's time were Israel's firm allies, come in among their enemies, I know not. But that Assur, that is, the Assyrian, also is joined with them, is not strange, or that, as the word is, they were an arm to the children of Lot. See how numerous the enemies of God's church have always been; "Lord, how are they increased that trouble it!" God's heritage was as a speckled bird, all the birds round about were against her, Jer. xii. 9; which highly magnifies the power of God in preserving to himself a church in the world in despite of the combined force of earth and hell.

9 Do unto them as unto the Midianites;
As to Sisera, as to Jabin, at the brook of Kison:
10 Which perished at En-dor:
They became as dung for the earth.
11 Make their nobles like Oreb, and like Zeeb:
Yea, all their princes as Zebah, and as Zalmunna:
12 Who said, Let us take to ourselves
The houses of God in possession.
13 O my God, make them like a wheel;
As the stubble before the wind
14 As the fire burneth a wood,
And as the flame setteth the mountains on fire;
15 So persecute them with thy tempest,
And make them afraid with thy storm.
16 Fill their faces with shame;
That they may seek thy name, O LORD.
17 Let them be confounded and troubled for ever;
Yea, let them be put to shame, and perish:
18 That men may know that thou, whose name alone is JEHOVAH.
Art the most high over all the earth.

The psalmist here, in the name of the church, prays for the destruction of those confederate forces, and in God's name foretells it; for this prayer that it might be so amounts to a prophecy that it shall be so; and this prophecy reacheth to all the enemies of the gospel church. Whoever they be that oppose the kingdom of Christ, here they may read their doom. The prayer is, in short, that these enemies that were confederate against Israel might be defeated in all their attempts, and that they might prove their own ruin, and so God's Israel might be preserved and perpetuated. Now this is here illustrated,

First. By some precedents. Let that be their punishment which has been the fate of others who have formerly set themselves against God's Israel. The defeat and discomfiture of former combinations may be pleaded in prayer to God, and improved for the encouragement of our own faith and hope; because God is the same still that ever he was, the same to his people, and the same against his and their enemies; with him is no variableness.

1. He prays that their armies might be destroyed as the armies of former enemies had been; ver. 9, 10, "Do to them as to the Midianites;" let them be routed by their own fears; for so the Midianites were, more than by Gideon's three hundred men. Do to them as to the army under the command of Sisera, who was general under Jabin king of Canaan, which God discomfited, Jud. iv. 15, at the brook Kishon, near to which was Endor. They became as dung on the earth, their dead bodies were thrown like dung laid in heaps, or spread to fatten the ground; they were trodden to dirt by Barak's small but victorious army; and this was fitly made a precedent here, because Deborah made it so to aftertimes when it was fresh; Jud. v. 31, "So let all thine enemies perish, O Lord;" that is, so they shall perish.

2. He prays that their leaders may be destroyed as they had been formerly. The common people would not have been so mischievous if their princes had not set them on; and therefore they are particularly prayed against, ver. 11, 12. Observe, 1st. What their malice was against the Israel of God. They said, "Let us take to ourselves the houses of God in possession," ver. 12. The pleasant places of God, so the word is; by which we may understand the land of Canaan, which was a pleasant land, and was Immanuel's land; or, the temple, which was indeed God's pleasant place, Isa. lxiv. 11; or, as Dr. Hammond suggests, the pleasant pastures, which these Arabians, who traded in cattle, did in a particular manner court. The princes and nobles aimed to enrich themselves by this war; and their armies must be made as dung for the earth to serve their covetousness and ambition. 2nd. What their lot should be. They shall be made like Oreb and Zeeb, two princes of the Midianites, who, when their forces were routed, were taken in their flight by the Ephraimites and slain, Jud. vii. 25; and like Zebah and Zalmunna, whom Gideon himself slew, Jud. viii. 21. Let these enemies of ours be made as easy a prey to us as they were to the conquerors then. We may not prescribe to God; but we may pray to God that he will deal with the enemies of his church in our days as he did with those in the days of our fathers.

Secondly. He illustrates it by some similitudes, and prays,

1. That God would make them like a wheel, ver. 13; that they might be in continual motion, unquiet, unsettled, and giddy in all their counsels and resolves; that they might roll down easily and speedily to their own ruin. Or, as some think, that they might be broken by the judgments of God, as the corn is broken, or beaten out by the wheel which was then used in threshing. Thus, when a wise king scattereth the wicked, he is said to bring the wheel over them, Pr. xx. 26. They that trust in God have their hearts fixed; they that fight against him are unfixed, like a wheel.

2. That they might be chased as stubble, or chaff before the fierce wind. The wheel, though it continually turn round, yet is fixed on its own axis. But let them have no more fixation than the light stubble has which the wind hurries away, and nobody desires to save it, but is willing it should go, Ps. i. 4. Thus shall "the wicked be driven away in his wickedness, and chased out of the world."

3. That they might be consumed as wood by the fire, or as briars and thorns, as fern or furze upon the mountains by the flames, ver. 14. When the stubble is driven by the wind, yet it will rest at last under some hedge, in some ditch or other. But he prays that they might not only be driven away as stubble but burnt up as stubble. And this will be the end of wicked men, Heb. vi. 8 and particularly of all the enemies of God's church. The reddition of these comparisons we have ver. 15, "So persecute them with thy tempest," persecute them to their utter ruin, "and make them afraid with thy storm." See how sinners are made miserable; the storm of God's wrath raiseth terrors in their own hearts, and so they are made completely miserable. God can deal with the proudest and most daring sinner that has bid defiance to his justice, and can "make him afraid as a grasshopper." It is the torment of devils that they tremble.

Thirdly. He illustrates it by the good consequences of their confusion ver. 16—18. He prays here that God, having filled their hearts with terror would thereby fill their faces with shame, that they might be ashamed of their enmity to the people of God, Isa. xxvi. 11; ashamed of their folly in acting both against Omnipotence itself and their own true interest. They did what they could to put God's people to shame; but the shame will, at long run, return upon themselves. Now,

1. The beginning of this shame might be a means of their conversion. Let them be broken and baffled in their attempts, "that they may seek thy name, O Lord." Let them be put to a stand, that they may have both leisure and reason to pause a little, and consider who it is that they are fighting against, and what an unequal match they are for him, and may therefore humble and submit themselves, and desire conditions of peace. Let them be made to fear thy name, and perhaps that will bring them to seek thy name. Note, That which we should earnestly desire and beg of God for our enemies and persecutors is, that God would bring them to repentance, and we should desire their abasement in order to this; no other confusion to them, but what may be a step towards their conversion.

2. If it did not prove a means of their conversion, the perfecting of it would redound greatly to the honour of God. If they will not be ashamed and repent, let them be put to shame, and perish. If they will not be troubled and turned, which would soon put an end to all their trouble, a happy end, "let them be troubled for ever;" and never have peace. And this will be for God's glory; ver. 18, "That" other "men may know" and own, if they themselves will not, "that thou whose name alone is Jehovah," (that incommunicable, though not ineffable name,) "art the most high over all the earth." God's triumphs over his and his church's enemies will be incontestable proofs, 1st. That he is, according to his name Jehovah, a self-existent, self-sufficient being, that has all power and perfection in himself. 2nd. That he is the most high God, Sovereign Lord of all, above all gods, above all kings; above all that exalt themselves, and pretend to be high. 3rd. That he is so not only over the land of Israel, but over all the earth; even those nations of the earth that do not know him, or own him, for his kingdom ruleth over all. These are great and unquestionable truths, but men will hardly be persuaded to know and believe them; therefore the psalmist prays that the destruction of some might be the conviction of others. The final ruin of all God's enemies in the great day will be the effectual proof of this before angels and men; when the everlasting shame and contempt to which sinners shall rise, Dan. xii. 2, shall redound to the everlasting honour and praise of that God to whom vengeance belongs.

PSALM LXXXIV.

Though David's name be not in the title of this psalm, yet we have reason to think he was the penman of it, because it breathes so much of his excellent spirit, and is so like to the 63rd psalm, which was penned by him. It is supposed that David penned this psalm when he was forced by Absalom's rebellion to quit his city, which he lamented his absence from, not so much because it was the royal city, as because it was the holy city; witness this psalm, which contains the pious breathings of a gracious soul after God, and communion with him. Though it be not entitled, yet it may fitly be looked upon as, a psalm or song for the sabbath day, the day of our solemn assemblies. The psalmist here, with great devotion, expresseth his affection, I. To the ordinances of God: his value for them, ver. 1; desire towards them, ver. 2, 3; his conviction of the happiness of those that did enjoy them, ver. 4, 7; and his placing his own happiness so very much in the enjoyment of them, ver. 10. II. To the God of the ordinances: his desire towards him, ver. 8, 9; his faith in him, ver. 11; and his conviction of the happiness of those that put their confidence in him, ver. 12. In singing this psalm, we should have the same devout affections working towards God that David had, and then the singing of it will be very pleasant.

To the chief Musician upon Gittith, A Psalm for the sons of Korah.

HOW amiable are thy tabernacles, O LORD of hosts!
2 My soul longeth, yea, even fainteth
For the courts of the LORD: my heart and my flesh [crieth out
For the living God.
3 Yea, the sparrow hath found an house,
And the swallow a nest for herself, where she may lay [her young,
Even thine altars, O LORD of hosts,
My King, and my God.
4 Blessed are they that dwell in thy house:
They will be still praising thee. Selah.
5 Blessed is the man whose strength is in thee;
In whose heart are the ways of them.
6 Who passing through the valley of Baca make it a well;
The rain also filleth the pools.
7 They go from strength to strength,
Every one of them in Zion appeareth before God.

The psalmist here, being by force restrained from waiting upon God in public ordinances, by the want of them is brought under a more sensible conviction than ever of the worth of them. Observe,

First. The wonderful beauty he saw in holy institutions; ver. 1, "How amiable are thy tabernacles, O Lord of hosts!" Some think he here calls God the Lord of hosts, that is, in a special manner of the angels, the heavenly hosts, because of the presence of the angels in God's sanctuary. They attended the Shechinah, and were, as some think, signified by the cherubim; God is the Lord of these hosts, and his the tabernacle is. It is spoken of as more than lxxxiii. 8. Assur is Assyria, and the Chaldee understands the reference to be to Sennacherib. "The children of Lot" were the Moabites and Ammonites.

lxxxiii. 13. That the word rendered "wheel" rather signifies a "whirlwind" is very probable, as in Psa. lxxvii. 18 and elsewhere.

lxxxiii. 15. For "persecute" understand "pursue." The psalm was probably composed in a day of national peril, when the enemies of Israel had leagued themselves together for its overthrow; and its petitions for the annihilation of enemies must be viewed as the patriotic utterances of a Hebrew under such trying circumstances. It is, as a literary composition, the most perfect ancient martial ode in existence.

lxxxiv. 1. This psalm is as peaceful as the foregoing is warlike, although apparently written in a time of personal trouble.

lxxxiv. 3. If we must retain the ordinary version here, we need not suppose that the birds actually built their nests on the altars of one, "thy tabernacles" because there were divers courts in which the people attended; and because the tabernacle itself consisted of a holy place, and a most holy. How amiable are these! How lovely is the sanctuary in the eyes of all that are truly sanctified! Gracious souls see a wonderful, inexpressible beauty in holiness, and in holy work. A tabernacle was a mean habitation, but the disadvantage of external circumstances makes holy ordinances not at all the less amiable; for the beauty of holiness is spiritual, and their glory is within.

Secondly. The longing desire he had to return to the enjoyment of public ordinances, or rather of God in them, ver. 2. It was an entire desire; body, soul, and spirit concurred in it. He was not conscious to himself of any rising thought to the contrary; it was an intense desire; it was like the desire of the ambitious, or covetous, or epicure. He longed, he fainted, he cried out, importunate to be restored to his place in God's courts; and almost impatient of delay. Yet it was not so much the courts of the Lord that he coveted, but he cried out in prayer for the living God himself. O that I might know him, and be taken again into communion with him, 1 Jno. i. 3. Ordinances are empty things, if we meet not with God in the ordinances.

Thirdly. His grudging the happiness of the little birds that made their nests in the buildings that were adjoining to God's altars, ver. 3. This is an elegant and surprising expression of his affection to God's altars. "The sparrow has found a house, and the swallow a nest for herself." These little birds, by the instinct and direction of nature, provide habitations for themselves in houses, as other birds do in the woods, both for their own repose and in which to lay their young. Some such David supposeth there were in the buildings about the courts of God's house; and wisheth himself with them. He would rather live in a bird's nest nigh God's altars than in a palace at a distance from them. He sometimes wished for the wings of a dove, on which to fly into the wilderness, Ps. lv. 6. Here for the wings of a sparrow that he might fly undiscovered into God's courts; and though to watch as a sparrow alone upon the housetop is the description of a very melancholy state and spirit, Ps cii. 7, yet David would be glad to take it for his lot, provided he might be near God's altars. It is better to be serving God in solitude, than serving sin with a multitude. The word for a sparrow signifies any little bird; and, if I may offer a conjecture, perhaps, when in David's time, music was introduced so much into the sacred service, both vocal and instrumental, to complete the harmony they had singing-birds in cages hung about the courts of the tabernacle; (for we find the singing of birds taken notice of to the glory of God, Ps. civ. 12.) And David envies the happiness of these, and would gladly change places with them. Observe, David envies the happiness not of those birds that flew over the altars, and had only a transient view of God's courts, but of those that had nests for themselves there. David will not think it enough to sojourn in God's house as a wayfaring man that turns aside to tarry for a night, but let this be his rest, his home, here he will dwell. And he takes notice that these birds not only have nests for themselves there, but there they lay their young. For those that have a place in God's courts themselves cannot but desire that their children also may have in God's house and within his walls a place and a name, that they may feed their kids beside the shepherd's tents. Some give another sense of this verse. Lord, by thy providence thou hast furnished the birds with nests and resting-places, agreeable to their nature, and to them they have free recourse. But thine altar, which is my nest, my resting-place, which I am as desirous of as ever the wandering bird was of her nest, I cannot have access to. Lord, wilt thou provide better for thy birds than for thy babes? "As a bird that wanders from her nest," so am I, now I wander from the place of God's altars, for that is my place, Pr. xxvii. 8. I shall never be easy till I return to my place again. Note, They whose souls are at home, at rest in God, cannot but desire a settlement near his ordinances. There were two altars, one for sacrifice, the other for incense; and David, in his desire of a place in God's courts, has an eye to both; as we also must in all our attendance on God have an eye both to the satisfaction and to the intercession of Christ. And lastly, observe how he eyes God in this address; Thou art the "Lord of hosts, my King, and my God." Where should a poor, distressed subject seek for protection but with his King? "And should not a people seek unto their God?" my King, my God, is Lord of hosts, by him and his altars let me live and die.

Fourthly. His acknowledgment of the happiness both of the ministers and of the people that had liberty of attendance on God's altars; "Blessed are they," O when shall I return to the enjoyment of that blessedness?

1. Blessed are the ministers. The priests and Levites that have their residence about the tabernacle, and are in their courses employed in the service of it; ver. 4, "Blessed are they that dwell in thy house;" that are at home there, and whose business lies there. He is so far from pitying them as confined to a constant attendance, and obliged to perpetual seriousness, that he would sooner envy them than the greatest princes in the world. There are those that bless the covetous, but he blesseth the religious; "Blessed are they that dwell in thy house," not because they have good wages, a part of every sacrifice for themselves, which would enable them to keep a good table, but because they have good work, "they will be still praising thee." And if there be a heaven upon earth, it is in praising God; in continual praising him. Apply this to his house above; Blessed are they that dwell there; angels and glorified saints, "for they rest not day or night from praising God." Let us, therefore, spend as much of our time as may be in that blessed work in which we hope to spend a joyful eternity.

2. Blessed are the people. The inhabitants of the country, who, though they do not constantly dwell in God's house as the priests do, yet have liberty of access to it, at the times appointed for their solemn feasts; the three great feasts, at which all the males were obliged to give their attendance, Deu. xvi. 16. David was so far from reckoning this an imposition, and a hardship put upon them, that he envies the happiness of those that might thus attend, ver. 5—7. Those whom he pronounceth blessed are here described.

1st. They are such as act in religion from a rooted principle of dependence upon God, and devotedness to him. "Blessed is the man whose strength is in thee;" that is, that makes thee his strength, and strongly stays himself upon thee; that makes thy name his strong tower into which he runs for safety, Pr. xviii. 10; "Happy is the man whose hope is in the Lord his God," Ps. xl. 4; cxlvi. 5. Those are truly happy who go forth and go on in the exercises of religion, not in their own strength, for then the work is sure to miscarry, but in the strength of the grace of Jesus Christ, from whom all our sufficiency is. David wished to return to God's tabernacles again, that there he might strengthen himself in the Lord his God for service and suffering.

2nd. They are such as have a dear love for holy ordinances; "in whose heart are the ways of them," that is, that, having placed their happiness in God as their end, rejoice in all the ways that lead to him; all those means by which their graces are strengthened, and their communion with him kept up. They not only walk in these ways, but they have them in their hearts, they lay them near their hearts; there is no care or concern, no pleasure or delight, lies nearer than this. Note, Those that have the new Jerusalem in their eye must have the ways that lead to it in their heart; must mind them, their eyes must look straight forward in them; must ponder the paths of them, must keep close to them, and be afraid of turning aside to the right hand or to the left. If we make God's promise our strength, we must make God's Word our rule, and walk by it.

3rd. They are such as will break through difficulties and discouragements in waiting upon God in holy ordinances, ver. 6. When they come up out of the country to worship at the feasts, their way lies through many a dry and sandy valley, so some; in which they are ready to perish for thirst. But, to guard against that inconvenience, they dig little pits to receive and keep the rain water, which is ready to them and others for their refreshment. When they make the pools, the rain of heaven fills them. If we be ready to receive the grace of God, that grace shall not be wanting to us, but shall be sufficient for us at all times. Their way lay through many a weeping valley, so Baca signifies; that is, as others understand it, many a watery valley; which in wet weather, when the rain filled the pools, either through the rising of the waters or the dirtiness of the way, were unpassable. But by draining and drenching them, they made a road through them, for the benefit of those that went up to Jerusalem. Care should be taken to keep those roads in repair that lead to church as well as those that lead to market. But all this is intended to shew, First. That they had a good will to the journey. When they were to attend the solemn feasts at Jerusalem, they would not be kept back by bad weather, or bad ways; nor make those an excuse for staying at home. Difficulties in the way of duty are designed to try our resolution, and "he that observes the wind shall not sow." Secondly. That they made the best of the way to Zion; contrived and took pains to mend it where it was bad, and what inconveniences could not be removed they bore them as well as they could. Our way to heaven lies through a valley of Baca, but even that may be made a well, if we make a due improvement of the comforts God has provided for the pilgrims to the heavenly city.

4th. They are such as are still pressing forward till they come to their journey's end at length, and do not take up short of it; ver. 7, "They go from strength to strength," that is, their company increaseth by the accession of more out of every town they pass through, till they become very numerous. Those that were near stayed till those that were farther off called on them, saying, "Come, and let us go to the house of the Lord," Ps. cxxii. 1, 2; that they might go together in a body, in token of their mutual love. Or, the particular persons, instead of being fatigued with the tediousness of their journey, and the difficulties they met with, the nearer they came to Jerusalem the more lively and cheerful they were, and so went stronger and stronger, Job xvii. 8. Thus it is promised that "they that wait on the Lord shall renew their strength," Isa. xl. 31. Even where they are weak there they were strong; they go from virtue to virtue, so some; it is the same word that is used for the virtuous woman. They that press forward in their Christian course shall find God adding grace to their graces, Jno. i. 16. They shall be changed from glory to glory, 2 Cor. iii. 18; from one degree of glorious grace to another; till at length "every one of them appears before God in Zion," to give glory to him, and receive blessings from him. Note, They that grow in grace shall at last be perfect in glory. The Chaldee reads it, 'They go from the house of the sanctuary to the house of doctrine; and the pains which they have taken about the law shall appear before God, whose majesty dwells in Zion.' We must go from one duty to another, from prayer to the word, from practising what we have learned to learn more; which if we do, the benefit of it will appear to God's glory, and our own everlasting comfort.

8 O LORD God of hosts, hear my prayer:
Give ear, O God of Jacob. Selah.
9 Behold, O God our shield,
And look upon the face of thine anointed.
10 For a day in thy courts is better than a thousand.
I had rather be a doorkeeper in the house of my God.
Than to dwell in the tents of wickedness.
11 For the LORD God is a sun and shield:
The LORD will give grace and glory:
No good thing will he withhold
From them that walk uprightly.
12 O LORD of hosts,
Blessed is the man that trusteth in thee.

Here, First. The psalmist prays for audience and acceptance with God, not mentioning particularly what he desired God would do for him; he needed to say no more, when he had professed such an affectionate esteem for the ordinances of God, which now he was restrained and banished from. All his desire was in that profession plainly before God, and his longing, his groaning, was not hid from him. Therefore he prays, ver. 8, 9, only that God would hear his prayer, and give ear; that he would behold his condition, behold his good affection, and look upon his face, which way it was set, and how his countenance discovered the longing desire he had towards God's courts. He calls himself, as many think, God's anointed, for so David was; anointed by him, and anointed for him. In this petition, 1. He has an eye to God, under several of his glorious titles. As the Lord God of hosts, that has all the creatures at his command; and therefore has all power both in heaven and in earth. As the God of Jacob, a God in covenant with his own people, a God that never said to the praying seed of Jacob Seek ye me in vain. And as God our shield, that takes his people under his special protection, pursuant to his covenant with Abraham their father; Gen. xv. 1, "Fear not, Abram, I am thy shield." When David could not be hid in the secret of God's tabernacle, Ps. xxvii. 5, being at a distance from it, yet he hoped to find God his shield ready to him wherever he was. 2. He has an eye to the Mediator, for of him I rather understand those words, 'Look upon the face of thy Messiah,' thine anointed one; for of his anointing David spoke, Ps. xlv. 7. In all our addresses to God we must desire that he would look upon the face of Christ, accept us for his sake, and be well pleased with us in him. We must look with an eye of faith, and then God will with an eye of favour look upon the face of the Anointed, who does shew his face when we without him dare not shew ours.

Secondly. He pleads his love to God's ordinances, and his dependence upon God himself.

1. God's courts were his choice, ver. 10. A very dear love he had for holy ordinances; he valued them above any thing else, and he expresseth his value for them, 1st. By preferring the time of God's worship before all other time. "A day" spent "in thy courts," in attending on the services of religion, wholly abstracted from all secular affairs, "is better than a thousand;" not than a thousand in thy courts, but anywhere else in this world, though in the midst of all the delights of the children of men. "Better than a thousand;" he doth not say days,

God, but rather that they built them somewhere about the sacred edifice.

lxxxiv. 5, 6. These two verses were clearly intended to be read as one sentence by our translators: "The ways of them who passing through the valley of Baca." No such valley as Baca is known, and some suppose we should render "valley of weeping," and regard it as a figurative phrase, like "valley of the shadow of death." Jewish writers fancifully explain it of the valley of Hinnom, or Gehenna.

lxxxiv. 9. Whatever the ultimate reference of the word "anointed," its first application is to a priest or a king. The Latin translation in common use has "look upon the face of thy Christ," who is, by many, understood to be referred to.

lxxxv. 1. To bring back the captivity of Jacob is to restore those who have been in captivity. The psalm was very probably composed in commemoration of the return of the exiles from Babylon.

lxxxv. 4. Instead of the translation, "turn us," or "convert us," you may supply it with years, with ages, if you will, and yet David will set his hand to it. "A day in thy courts," a sabbath day, a holy day, a feast day, though but one day, would be very welcome to me. Nay, as some of the rabbins paraphrase it, though I were to die for it the next day, yet that would be more sweet than years spent in the business and pleasure of this world. One of these days shall, with its pleasure chase a thousand, and two put ten thousand to flight, to shame, as not worthy to be compared. 2nd. By preferring the place of worship before any other place. "I had rather be a doorkeeper," rather be in the meanest place and office "in the house of my God, than dwell" in state, as master, "in the tents of wickedness." Observe, He calls even the tabernacle a house, for the presence of God in it made even those curtains more stately than a palace, and more strong than a castle. It is the house of my God. The covenant interest he had in God, as his God, was the sweet string on which he loved dearly to be harping. They, and they only, that can upon good ground call God theirs, delight in the courts of his house. I would rather be a porter in God's house than a prince in those tents where wickedness reigns; rather lie at the threshold, so the word is; that was the beggars' place, Acts iii. 2; No matter, saith David, let that be my place rather than none. The Pharisees loved synagogues well enough, provided they might have the uppermost seats there, Mat. xxiii. 6, that they might make a figure. Holy David is not solicitous about that; if he may be but admitted to the threshold, he will say, "Master, it is good to be here." Some read it, 'I would rather be fixed to a post in the house of my God, than live at liberty in the tents of wickedness,' alluding to the law concerning servants, who, if they would not go out free, were to have their ear bored to the door-post, Ex. xxi. 5, 6. David loved his Master, and loved his work so well, that he desired to be tied to this service for ever, to be more free to it, but never to go out free from it, preferring bonds to duty far before the greatest liberty to sin. Such a superlative delight have holy hearts in holy duties; no satisfaction in their account comparable to that in communion with God.

2. God himself was his hope, and joy, and all; therefore he loved the house of his God, because his expectation was from his God, and there he used to communicate himself, ver. 11. See, 1st. What God is and will be to his people. "The Lord God is a sun and shield." We are here in darkness, but if God be our God he will be to us a sun to enlighten and enliven us, to guide and direct us. We are here in danger, but he will be to us a shield, to secure us from the fiery darts that fly thick about us; with his favour he will compass us as with a shield. Let us therefore always walk in the light of the Lord, and never throw ourselves out of his protection, and we shall find him a sun to supply us with all good, and a shield to shelter us from all evil. 2nd. What he doth and will bestow upon them. "The Lord will give grace and glory." Grace signifies both the good will of God towards us and the good work of God in us: glory signifies both the honour which he puts upon us in giving us the adoption of sons and that which he has prepared for us in the inheritance of sons. God will give them grace in this world as a preparation for glory, and glory in the other world as the perfection of grace; both are God's gift, his free gift. And, as on the one hand, wherever God gives grace he will give glory, for grace is glory begun, and is an earnest of it, so, on the other hand, he will give glory hereafter to none to whom he doth not give grace now, or that receive his grace in vain. And if God will give grace and glory, which are the two great things that concur to make us happy in both worlds, we may be sure that "no good thing will he withhold from them that walk uprightly." It is the character of all good people, that they walk uprightly, that they worship God in spirit and in truth, and have their conversation in the world in simplicity and godly sincerity, and such may be sure that God will withhold no good thing from them that is requisite to their comfortable passage through this world. Make sure grace and glory, and other things shall be added. This is a comprehensive promise, and is such an assurance of the present comfort of the saints, that whatever they desire, and think they need, they may be sure that either Infinite Wisdom sees it is not good for them, or Infinite Goodness will give it them in due time. Let it be our care to walk uprightly, and then let us trust God to give us everything that is good for us.

Lastly. He pronounceth them blessed that put their confidence in God, as he did, ver. 12. They are blessed that have the liberty of ordinances, and the privileges of God's house; but, though we should be debarred from them, yet we are not therefore debarred from blessedness if we trust in God. If we cannot go to the house of the Lord, we may go by faith to the Lord of the house, and in him we shall be happy, and may be easy.

PSALM LXXXV.

Interpreters are generally of opinion that this psalm was penned after the return of the Jews out of their captivity in Babylon, when they still remained under some tokens of God's displeasure, which they here pray for the removal of; and nothing appears to the contrary, but that it might be penned then as well as Ps. cxxxvii. They are the public interests that lie near the psalmist's heart here, and the psalm is penned for the great congregation. The church was here in a deluge; above were clouds, below were waves, every thing was dark and dismal. The church is like Noah in the ark, between life and death, between hope and fear. Being so, I. Here is the dove sent forth in prayer. The petitions are, against sin and wrath, ver. 4; and for mercy and grace, ver. 7. The pleas are taken from former favours, ver. 1—3; and present distresses, ver. 5, 6. II. Here is the dove returning with an olive-branch of peace and good tidings. The psalmist expects her return, ver. 8; and then recounts the favours to God's Israel, which by the spirit of prophecy he gave assurance of to others, and by the spirit of faith he took the assurance of to himself, ver. 9—13. In singing this psalm we may be assisted in our prayers to God both for his church in general and for the land of our nativity in particular. The former part will be of use to direct our desires, the latter to encourage our faith and hope in those prayers.

To the chief Musician, A Psalm for the sons of Korah.

LORD, thou hast been favourable unto thy land:
Thou hast brought back the captivity of Jacob.
2 Thou hast forgiven the iniquity of thy people,
Thou hast covered all their sin. Selah.
3 Thou hast taken away all thy wrath: [anger.
Thou hast turned thyself from the fierceness of thine
4 Turn us, O God of our salvation,
And cause thine anger toward us to cease
5 Wilt thou be angry with us for ever?
Wilt thou draw out thine anger to all generations?
6 Wilt thou not revive us again:
That thy people may rejoice in thee?
7 Shew us thy mercy, O LORD,
And grant us thy salvation.

The church, in affliction and distress, is here by direction from God making her application to God. So ready is God to hear and answer the prayers of his people, that by his Spirit in the word, in the heart, he indites their petitions, and puts words into their mouths. The people of God, in a very low and weak condition, are here taught how to address themselves to God.

First. They are to acknowledge with thankfulness the great things God had done for them, ver. 1—3. Thou hast done so and so for us and our fathers. Note, The sense of present afflictions should not drown the remembrance of former mercies, but even then when we are brought very low we must call to remembrance past experiences of God's goodness, which we must take notice of with thankfulness to his praise. They speak of it here with pleasure, 1. That God had shewed himself propitious to their land, and had smiled upon it as his own; "Thou hast been favourable to thy land," as thine, with distinguishing favours. Note, The favour of God is the spring-head of all good, and the fountain of happiness to nations as well as to particular persons. It was by the favour of God that Israel got and kept possession of Canaan, Ps. xliv. 3; and if he had not continued very favourable to them they had been ruined many a time. 2. That he had rescued them out of the hands of their enemies, and restored them to their liberty. "Thou hast brought back the captivity of Jacob," and settled those in their own land again that had been driven out, and were strangers in a strange land, prisoners in the land of their oppressors. The captivity of Jacob, though it may continue long, will be brought back in due time. 3. That he had not dealt with them according to the desert of their provocations; ver. 2, "Thou hast forgiven the iniquity of thy people," and not punished them as in justice thou mightest. "Thou hast covered all their sin." When God forgives sin, he covers it; and when he covers the sin of his people, he covers it all. The bringing back of their captivity was then an instance of God's favour to them, when it was accompanied with the pardon of their iniquity. 4. That he had not continued his anger against them so far and so long as they had reason to fear; ver. 3, having covered all their sin, "thou hast taken away all thy wrath;" for when sin is set aside God's anger ceaseth. God is pacified if we are purified. See what the pardon of sin is: "Thou hast forgiven the iniquity of thy people;" that is, "thou hast turned thine anger from waxing hot," so as to consume us in the flame of it. In compassion to us thou hast not stirred up all thy wrath; but when an intercessor hath stood before thee in the gap thou hast turned away thine anger.

Secondly. They are taught to pray to God for grace and mercy in reference to their present distress. This is inferred from the former: thou hast done well for our fathers, do well for us, for we are the children of the same covenant. 1. They pray for converting grace. "Turn us, O God of our salvation;" in order to the turning of our captivity, turn us from iniquity; turn us to thyself, and to our duty; turn us, and we shall be turned. All those whom God will save sooner or later he will turn. If no conversion, no salvation. 2. They pray for the removal of the tokens of God's displeasure which they were under. "Cause thine anger towards us to cease," as thou didst many a time cause it to cease in the days of our fathers, when thou didst take away thy wrath from them. Observe the method: first turn us to thee, and then cause thine anger to turn from us. When we are reconciled to God, then, and not till then, we may expect the comfort of his being reconciled to us. 3. They pray for the manifestation of God's good-will to them: ver. 7, "Shew us thy mercy, O Lord;" that is, shew thyself merciful to us; not only have mercy on us, but let us have the comfortable evidences of that mercy; let us know that thou hast mercy on us, and mercy in store for us. 4. They pray that God would, graciously to them, and gloriously to himself, appear on their behalf: "Grant us thy salvation;" grant it by thy promise, and then, no doubt, thou wilt work it by thy providence. Note, The vessels of God's mercy are the heirs of his salvation. He shews mercy to those to whom he grants salvation, for salvation is of mere mercy.

Thirdly. They are taught humbly to expostulate with God concerning their present troubles, ver. 5, 6. Where observe, 1. What they dread and deprecate. "Wilt thou be angry with us for ever?" We are undone if thou art, but we hope thou wilt not. "Wilt thou draw out thine anger unto all generations?" No; thou art gracious, slow to anger, and swift to shew mercy, and wilt not contend for ever. Thou wast not angry with our fathers for ever, but didst soon turn thyself from the fierceness of thy wrath; why, then, wilt thou be angry with us for ever? Are not thy mercies and compassions as plentiful and powerful as ever they were? Impenitent sinners God will be angry with for ever; for what is hell but the wrath of God drawn out unto endless generations? But shall a hell upon earth be the lot of thy people? 2. What they desire and hope for. "Wilt thou not revive us again?" ver. 6. Revive us with comforts spoken to us, revive us with deliverances wrought for us. Thou hast been favourable to thy land formerly, and that revived it; wilt thou not again be favourable, and so revive it again? God had granted to the children of the captivity some reviving in their bondage, Ezr. ix. 8. Their return out of Babylon was as life from the dead, Eze. xxxvii. 11, 12. Now, Lord, (say they,) wilt thou not revive us again, and put thy hand again the second time to gather us in? Isa. xi. 11; Ps. cxxvi. 1, 4; "Revive thy work in the midst of the years," Hab. iii. 2. "Revive us again," 1st. "That thy people may rejoice," and so we shall have the comfort of it, Ps. xiv. 7. Give them life that they may have joy. 2nd. That they "may rejoice in thee," and so thou wilt have the glory of it. If God be the fountain of all our mercies, he must be the centre of all our joys.

8 I will hear what God the LORD will speak:
For he will speak peace unto his people, and to his saints
But let them not turn again to folly.
9 Surely his salvation is nigh them that fear him;
That glory may dwell in our land.
10 Mercy and truth are met together;
Righteousness and peace have kissed each other.
11 Truth shall spring out of the earth;
And righteousness shall look down from heaven.
12 Yea, the LORD shall give that which is good;
And our land shall yield her increase.
13 Righteousness shall go before him;
And shall set us in the way of his steps.

or "cause us to return," some prefer "return to us." We believe the meaning is "restore us" to thy favour altogether, as in part thou hast already. The structure of the psalm is peculiar: verses 1 to 3 seem to say that God has done that which verses 4 to 6 pray that He will do: verses 7, &c., proceed in a different strain. It is certain that some psalms were sung responsively, either throughout or in part, and this seems to have been one such. From verse 7 all the choir may have joined in singing.

lxxxvi. Title. The heading of this psalm in the Greek and Latin corresponds with that in the Hebrew. The Syriac also ascribes it to David, but adds "when he built a house to the Lord," and describes the psalm as "a prophecy of the calling of the Gentiles, and also a special prayer of a righteous man." For regarding it as prophetic of the calling of the Gentiles verse 9 would be considered sufficient reason.

lxxxvi. 2. The words rendered "Preserve my soul, for I am holy."

We have here an answer to the prayers and expostulations in the foregoing verses.

First. In general it is an answer of peace. This the psalmist is soon aware of; ver. 8, for he stands upon his watch tower to hear what God will say unto him, as the prophet, Hab. ii. 1, 2, "I will hear what God the Lord will speak." This intimates, 1. The stilling of his passion, his grief, his fear, and the tumult of his spirit which these occasioned. Compose thyself, O my soul, in an humble silence to attend upon God, and wait his motions. I have spoken enough, or too much; now I will hear what God will speak, and welcome his holy will; "What saith my Lord unto his servant?" If we would have God to hear what we say to him by prayer, we must be ready to hear what he saith to us by his Word. 2. The raising of his expectation. Now he has been at prayer he looks for something very great and very kind from the God that hears prayer. When we have prayed, we should look after our prayers, and stay for an answer. Now observe here, 1st. What it is that he promiseth himself from God in answer to his prayers: "He will speak peace to his people, and to his saints." There is a people in the world that are God's people, set apart for him, subject to him, and that shall be saved by him. All his people are his saints, sanctified by his grace, and devoted to his glory; these may sometimes want peace, when without are fightings and within are fears; but sooner or later God will speak peace to them. If he do not command outward peace, yet he will suggest inward peace; speaking that to their hearts by his Spirit which he has spoken to their ears by his Word and ministers, and making them to hear joy and gladness. 2nd. What use he makes of this expectation. First. He takes the comfort of it; and so must we: "I will hear what God the Lord will speak," hear the assurances he gives of peace in answer to prayer. When God speaks peace we must not be deaf to it, but with all humility and thankfulness receive it. Secondly. He cautions the saints to do the duty which this calls for; "But let them not turn again to folly;" for it is on these terms, and no other, that peace is to be expected. To those, and those only, peace is spoken who turn from sin; but if they return to it again it is at their peril. All sin is folly, but especially backsliding; it is egregious folly to turn to sin after we have seemed to turn from it, to turn to it after God hath spoken peace; God is for peace, but when he speaks, such are for war.

Secondly. Here are the particulars of this answer of peace. He doubts not but all will be well in a little time, and therefore gives us the pleasing prospect of the flourishing estate of the church in the last five verses of the psalm, which describe the peace and prosperity that God at length blessed the children of the captivity with, when after a great deal of toil and toss at length they gained a settlement in their own land. But it may be taken, 1. As a promise also to all that fear God and work righteousness, that they shall be easy, they shall be happy. 2. As a prophecy of the kingdom of Messiah, and the blessings with which that kingdom should be enriched. Here is,

1st. Help at hand; ver. 9, "Surely his salvation is nigh," nigh to us, nigher than we think it is, it will soon be effected, how great soever our difficulties and distresses are, when God's time is come, and that time is not far off; when the tale of bricks is doubled, then Moses comes. It is nigh to "all that fear him;" when trouble is nigh, salvation is nigh; for "God is a very present help in time of trouble" to all that are his; whereas "salvation is far from the wicked," Ps. cxix. 155. This may fitly be applied to Christ, the author of eternal salvation. It was the comfort of the Old Testament saints that, though they lived not to see that redemption in Jerusalem which they waited for, yet they were sure it was nigh, and would be welcome to all that fear God.

2nd. Honour secured. "That glory may dwell in our land," that is, that we may have the worship of God settled and established among us; for that is the glory of a land. When that goes, "Ichabod, the glory is departed;" when that stays, glory dwells. This may refer to the Messiah, who was to be the glory of his people Israel, and who came and dwelt among them, Jno. i. 4; for which reason their land is called Immanuel's land, Isa. viii. 8.

3rd. Graces meeting and happily embracing; ver. 10, 11, "Mercy and truth, righteousness and peace, kiss each other." This may be understood, First. Of the reformation of the people, and of the government, in the administration of which all those graces should be conspicuous and commanding. The rulers and ruled shall all be merciful and true, righteous and peaceable; when there is no truth nor mercy all goes to ruin, Hos. iv. 1; Isa. lix. 14, 15. But when these meet in the management of all affairs, when these give aim, when these give law, when there is such plenty of truth that it sprouts up like the grass of the earth, and of righteousness, that it is showered down like rain from heaven, then things go well. When in every congress mercy and truth meet, in every embrace righteousness and peace kiss, and common honesty is indeed common, then glory dwells in a land, as the sin of reigning dishonesty is a reproach to any people. Secondly. Of the return of God's favour, and the continuance of it thereupon. When a people return to God, and adhere to him in a way of duty, he will return to them and abide with them in a way of mercy. So some understand this: Man's truth and God's mercy, man's righteousness and God's peace, meet together. If God finds us true to him, to one another, to ourselves, we shall find him merciful; if we make conscience of righteousness, we shall have the comfort of peace. If truth spring out of the earth, that is, (as Dr. Hammond expounds it) out of the hearts of men, the proper soil for it to grow in, righteousness, that is, God's mercy, shall look down from heaven, as the sun doth upon the world, when it sheds its influences on the productions of the earth and cherisheth them. Thirdly. Of the harmony of the Divine attributes in the Messiah's undertaking. In him, who is both our salvation and our glory, "mercy and truth are met together." God's mercy and truth, and his "righteousness and peace have kissed each other;" that is, the great affair of our salvation is so well contrived, so well concerted, that God may have mercy upon poor sinners, and be at peace with them without any wrong to his truth and righteousness. He is true to the threatening, and just in his government, and yet pardons sinners, and takes them into covenant with himself. Christ as Mediator brings heaven and earth together again, which sin had set at variance. Through him "truth springs out of the earth," that truth which God desires in the inward part, and then "righteousness looks down from heaven," for "God is just, and the justifier of them which believe in Jesus." Or, it may note that in the kingdom of the Messiah these graces shall flourish and prevail, and have a universal command.

4th. Great plenty of every thing desirable; ver. 12, "The Lord shall give that which is good," that is every thing that he sees to be good for us. All good comes from God's goodness; and when mercy, truth, and righteousness have a sovereign influence on men's hearts and lives, all good may be expected. If we thus seek the righteousness of God's kingdom, other things shall be added, Mat. vii. 33. When the glory of the Gospel dwells in our land, then it shall yield its increase; for soul prosperity will either bring outward prosperity along with it, or sweeten the want of it: see Ps. lxvii. 6.

5th. A sure conduct in the good way, ver. 13. The righteousness of his promise which he hath made to us, assuring us of happiness, the righteousness of sanctification, that good work which he has wrought in us; these shall go before him, to prepare his way, both to raise our expectations of his favour and to qualify us for it; and this shall go before us also, and be our guide to "set us in the way of his steps," that is, to encourage our hopes, and guide our practice, that we may go forth to meet him when he is coming towards us in ways of mercy. Christ, the Sun of Righteousness, shall bring us to God, and put us into the way that leads to him; John Baptist, a preacher of righteousness, shall go before Christ, to prepare his way. Righteousness is a sure guide both in meeting God and in following him.

PSALM LXXXVI.

This psalm is entitled a prayer of David. Probably it was not penned upon any particular occasion, but was a prayer he often used himself, and recommended to others for their use, especially in a day of affliction. Many think that David penned this prayer as a type of Christ, who, in the days of his flesh, offered up strong cries, Heb. v. 7. David, in this prayer, according to the nature of that duty, I. Gives glory to God, ver. 8—10, 12, 13. II. Seeks for grace and favour from God; that God would hear his prayers, ver. 1, 6, 7; preserve and save him, and be merciful to him, ver. 2, 3, 16; that he would give him joy, and grace, and strength, and put honour upon him, ver. 4, 11, 17. he pleads God's goodness, ver. 5, 15; and the malice of his enemies, ver. 14. In singing this, we must, as David did, lift up our souls to God with application.

A Prayer of David.

BOW down thine ear, O LORD, hear me:
For I am poor and needy.
2 Preserve my soul; for I am holy:
O thou my God, save thy servant that trusteth in thee.
3 Be merciful unto me, O Lord:
For I cry unto thee daily.
4 Rejoice the soul of thy servant:
For unto thee, O Lord, do I lift up my soul.
5 For thou, Lord, art good, and ready to forgive;
And plenteous in mercy unto all them that call upon thee.
6 Give ear, O LORD, unto my prayer;
And attend to the voice of my supplications.
7 In the day of my trouble I will call upon thee:
For thou wilt answer me.

This psalm was published under the title of a prayer of David; not as if David sung all his prayers, but into some of his songs he inserted prayers; for a psalm will admit the expressions of any pious and devout affections. But it is observable how very plain the language of this psalm is, and how little there is in it of poetical flights or figures, in comparison of some other psalms; for the flourishes of wit are not the proper ornaments of prayer. Now here we may observe,

First. The petitions he puts up to God. It is true, prayer accidentally may preach, but it is most fit that (as it is in this prayer) every passage should be directed to God, for such is the nature of prayer, as it is here described; ver. 4, "Unto thee, O Lord, do I lift up my soul," as he had said, Ps. xxv. 1. In all the parts of prayer the soul must ascend upon the wings of faith and holy desire, and be lifted up to God, to meet the communications of his graces, and in an expectation raised very high of great things from him.

1. He begs that God would give a gracious audience to his prayers; ver. 1, "Bow down thine ear, O Lord, hear me." When God hears our prayers it is fitly said that he bows down his ear to them; for it is admirable condescension in God that he is pleased to take notice of such mean creatures as we are, and such defective prayers as ours are. He repeats this again, ver. 6, "Give ear, O Lord, unto my prayer," a favourable ear, though it be whispered, though it be stammered, "attend to the voice of my supplications." Not that God needs to have his affection stirred up by any thing that we can say; but thus we must express our desire of his favour. The Son of David spake it with assurance and pleasure, Jno. xi. 41, 42, "Father, I thank thee that thou hast heard me; and I know that thou hearest me alway."

2. He begs that God would take him under his special protection, and so be the author of his salvation; ver. 2, "Preserve my soul, save thy servant." It was David's soul that was God's servant, for those only serve God acceptably that serve him with their spirits. David's concern is about his soul. If we understand it of his natural life, it teaches us that the best self-preservation is to commit ourselves to God's keeping, and by faith and prayer to make our Creator our Preserver. But it may be understood of his spiritual life; the life of the soul as distinct from the body; Preserve my soul from that one evil and dangerous thing to souls, and that is sin. Preserve my soul, and so save me. All those whom God will save he doth preserve, and will preserve them to his heavenly kingdom.

3. He begs that God would look upon him with an eye of pity and compassion; ver. 3, "Be merciful to me, O Lord." It is mercy in God to pardon our sins, and to help us out of our distresses; both these are included in this prayer, God be merciful to me. Men shew no mercy, we ourselves deserve no mercy; but, Lord, for mercy's sake, be merciful unto me.

4. He begs that God would fill him with inward comfort; ver. 4, "Rejoice the soul of thy servant." It is God only that can put gladness into the heart, and make the soul to rejoice; and then and not till then the joy is full. And those that are God's servants, as it is their duty to serve him with gladness, so it is their privilege to be filled with joy and peace in believing; and they may in faith pray not only that God will preserve their souls, but that he will rejoice their souls, and the joy of the Lord will be their strength. Observe, When he prays, Rejoice my soul, he adds, "For unto thee do I lift up my soul." Then we may expect comfort from God when we take care to keep up our communion with God. Prayer is the nurse of spiritual joy.

Secondly. The pleas with which he enforceth these petitions.

1. He pleads his relation to God and interest in him. Thou art my God, to whom I have devoted myself, and on whom I depend, and I am thy servant, (ver. 2,) in subjection to thee, and therefore looking for protection from thee.

2. He pleads distress; "Hear me, for I am poor and needy," therefore I want thy help, therefore none else will hear me. God is the poor man's King, whose glory it is to save the souls of the needy. They that are poor in spirit, that see themselves empty and necessitous, are most welcome to the God of all grace.

3. He pleads God's good will towards all that seek him, ver. 5. "To thee do I lift up my soul" in desire and expectation; "for thou, Lord, art good," and whither should beggars go, but to the door of the good housekeeper? The goodness of God's nature is a great encouragement to us in all our addresses to require a remark, and especially the last word, which scarcely means "holy" in the strongest sense, but rather a faithful servant and worshipper of God. It is a declaration of sincere attachment to the Lord. The Syriac version has, "Preserve my soul, for thou art good," but the cause of the difference is not apparent.

lxxxvi. 5. Instead of Adonai, here translated "Lord," a number of copies have Jehovah. The word translated "ready to forgive" means "forgiving" or one who forgives lxxxvi. 8. The Syriac is, "There is none like thee, O Lord God;" but the Hebrew text is fairly represented by our translators. It has been questioned whether by "gods" we are to understand idols or men endowed with wisdom, justice, authority, &c., as princes and judges, or angels. Most likely "the gods" are princes and judges, though angels may be included.

lxxxvi. 11. For "unite my heart to fear thy name" the Syriac has "let my heart rejoice in them that fear thy name." The Latin him. His goodness appears in two things, giving, and forgiving. 1st. He is a sin-pardoning God; not only he can forgive, but he is "ready to forgive;" more ready to forgive than we are to repent: "I said, I will confess, and thou forgavest," Ps. xxxii. 5. 2nd. He is a prayer-hearing God. He is plenteous in mercy, very full, and very free, both rich and liberal unto all them that call upon him. He has wherewithal to supply all their needs, and is open-handed in granting that supply.

4. He pleads God's good work in himself, by which he had qualified him for the tokens of his favour. Three things were wrought in him by Divine grace, which he looked upon as earnests of all good:

1st. A conformity to God; ver. 2, "I am holy," therefore "preserve my soul;" for those whom the Spirit sanctifies he will preserve. He doth not say this in pride and vainglory, but with humble thankfulness to God; 'I am one whom thou favourest,' so the margin reads it, whom thou hast set apart for thyself. If God has begun a good work of grace in us, we must own that the time was a time of love; "Then was I in his eyes as one that found favour." And whom God hath taken into his favour he will take under his protection; "All his saints are in thy hand," Deu. xxxiii. 3. Observe, "I am needy," ver. 1, yet "I am holy," ver. 2. Holy and yet needy; poor in the world, but rich in faith. And those who preserve their purity in their greatest poverty, may assure themselves that God will preserve their comforts, will preserve their souls.

2nd. A confidence in God; "Save thy servant that trusteth in thee." They that are holy yet must not trust in themselves, or in their own righteousness, but only in God and his grace. They that trust in God may expect salvation from him.

3rd. A disposition to communion with God. He hopes God will answer his prayers, because he had inclined him to pray. First. To be constant in prayer; "I cry unto thee daily," and "all the day," ver. 3. It is thus our duty to pray always, without ceasing, and to continue instant in prayer; and then we may hope to have our prayers heard which we make in time of trouble, if we have made conscience of the duty at other times, at all times. It is comfortable if an affliction finds the wheels of prayer agoing, and that they are not then to be set agoing. Secondly. To be inward with God in prayer; to lift up his soul to him, ver. 4. Then we may hope that God will meet us with his mercies when we in our prayers send forth our souls as it were to meet him. Thirdly. To be in a special manner earnest with God in prayer when he was in affliction; ver. 7, "In the day of my trouble," whatever others do, "I will call upon thee," and commit my case to thee, for thou wilt hear and answer me, and I shall not seek in vain, as those did who cried, "O Baal, hear us; but there was no voice, nor any that regarded," 1 Kin. xviii. 29.

8 Among the gods there is none like unto thee, O Lord;
Neither are there any works like unto thy works.
9 All nations whom thou hast made
Shall come and worship before thee, O Lord;
And shall glorify thy name
10 For thou art great, and doest wondrous things:
Thou art God alone
11 Teach me thy way, O LORD;
I will walk in thy truth:
Unite my heart to fear thy name.
12 I will praise thee, O Lord my God, with all my heart:
And I will glorify thy name for evermore.
13 For great is thy mercy toward me:
And thou hast delivered my soul from the lowest hell
14 O God, the proud are risen against me,
And the assemblies of violent men have sought after my [soul;
And have not set thee before them.
15 But thou, O Lord, art a God full of compassion, and gracious, Long suffering, and plenteous in mercy and truth.
16 O turn unto me, and have mercy upon me;
Give thy strength unto thy servant,
And save the son of thine handmaid.
17 Shew me a token for good;
That they which hate me may see it, and be ashamed:
Because thou, LORD, hast holpen me, and comforted me.

David is here going on in his prayer:

First. He gives glory to God; for we ought in our prayers to praise him, ascribing kingdom, power, and glory to him, with the most humble and reverent adorations.

1. As a Being of unparalleled perfection, such an one as there is none like him, nor any to be compared with him; ver. 8, "Among the gods," the false gods, whom the heathens worshipped, the angels, the kings of the earth, among them all, "there is none like unto thee, O Lord;" none so wise, so mighty, so good; "neither are there any works like unto thy works," which is an undeniable proof that there is none like him. His own works praise him, and the best way we have of praising him is by acknowledging that there is none like him.

2. As the fountain of all being, and the centre of all praise; ver. 9, "Thou hast made all nations," made them all of one blood; they all derive their being from thee, and have a constant dependence on thee, and therefore "they shall come and worship before thee, and glorify thy name." This was in part fulfilled in the multitude of proselytes to the Jewish religion in the days of David and Solomon, but was to have its full accomplishment in the days of the Messiah, when some out of every kingdom and nation should be effectually brought in to praise God, Rev. vii. 9. It was by Christ that God made all nations, for without him was not any thing made that was made, and therefore through Christ, and by the power of his Gospel and grace, all nations shall be brought to worship before God, Isa. lxvi. 23.

3. As a Being infinitely great, ver. 10. Therefore all nations shall worship before thee, because as King of nations thou art great, thy sovereignty absolute, and incontestable, thy majesty terrible and insupportable, thy power universal and irresistible, thy riches vast and inexhaustible, thy dominion boundless and unquestionable; and for the proof of this, "thou doest wondrous things," which all nations admire, and from whence they might easily infer that "thou art God alone," not only none like thee, but none beside thee. Let us always entertain great thoughts of this great God, and be filled with holy admirings of this God that doeth wonders; and let him alone have our hearts who is God alone.

4. As a Being infinitely good. Man is bad, very wicked and vile, ver. 14; no mercy is to be expected from him; "But thou, O Lord, art a God full of compassion and gracious," ver. 15. This is that attribute by which he proclaims his name, and by which we are therefore to proclaim it, Ex. xxxiv. 6, 7. It is his goodness that is over all his works, and therefore should fill all our praises; and this is our comfort, in reference to the wickedness of the world we live in, that, however it be, God is good. Men are barbarous, but God is gracious; men are false, but God is faithful. God is not only compassionate, but full of compassion, and in him mercy rejoiceth against judgment. He is long suffering towards us, though we forfeit his favour, and provoke him to anger; and he is plenteous in mercy and truth, as faithful in performing as he was free in promising.

5. As a kind friend and bountiful benefactor to him. We ought to praise God as good in himself, but we do it most feelingly when we observe how good he has been to us. This therefore the psalmist harps upon with most pleasure, ver. 12, 13. He had said, ver. 9, "All nations shall praise thee, O Lord, and glorify thy name." It is some satisfaction to a good man to think that others shall praise and glorify God, but it is his greatest care and pleasure to do it himself. Whatever others do, saith David, "I will praise thee, O Lord my God," not only as the Lord, but as my God; and I will do it with all mine heart,—that is, I will be ready to do it, and cordial in it; I will do it with cheerfulness and liveliness, with a sincere regard to thy honour; for "I will glorify thy name," not for a time, but "for evermore." I will do it as long as I live, and hope to be doing it to eternity. And with good reason does he resolve to be thus particular in praising God, because God had shewed him particular favours. "For great is thy mercy toward me." The fountain of mercy is inexhaustibly full; the streams of mercy are inestimably rich. When we speak of God's mercy to us, it becomes us to magnify it; "Great is thy mercy toward me." Of the greatness of God's mercy, he gives this instance, "Thou hast delivered my soul from the lowest hell;" from death, from so great a death, as St. Paul, 2 Cor. i. 10. From eternal death; so even some of the Jewish writers understood it. David knew he deserved to have been cast off for ever into the lowest hell, for his sin in the matter of Uriah; but Nathan assured him, the Lord had taken away his sin, and by that word he was delivered from the lowest hell; and herein God's mercy was great toward him. Even the best saints owe it not to their own merit, but to the mercy of God, that they are saved from the lowest hell; and the consideration of that should greatly enlarge their hearts in praising the mercy of God, which they are obliged to glorify for evermore. So glorious, so gracious a rescue from everlasting misery justly requires the return of everlasting praise.

Secondly. He prays earnestly for mercy and grace from God. He complains of the restless and implacable malice of his enemies against him, ver. 14; Lord, be thou for me, for there are many against me; then takes notice of their character: they are proud men, that looked with disdain upon poor David. Many are made persecutors by their pride. They are violent men, that will carry all before them by force, right or wrong; they are terrible, formidable men, so some, that do what they can to frighten all about them. Their number: there are assemblies of them, they were men in authority, and met in councils and courts; or men for conversation, and met in clubs; but being assembled they were the more capable of doing mischief. Their enmity to David: they rise up against me in open rebellion; they not only plot, but they put their plots in execution as far as they can; and the design is not only to depose David, but to destroy him. They seek after my life, to slay me; after my soul, to damn me, if it lay in their power. And, lastly, here is their distance and estrangement from God, which was at the bottom of their enmity to David, they have not set thee before them; and what good can be expected from those that have no fear of God before their eyes? Lord, appear against them, for they are thine enemies as well as mine. His petitions are,

1. For the operations of God's grace in him, ver. 11. He prays that God would give him, 1st. An understanding heart, that he would inform and instruct him concerning his duty; "Teach me thy way, O Lord," the way that thou hast appointed me to walk in, and when I am in doubt concerning it make it plain to me what I should do; let me hear the voice, saying, "This is the way," Isa. xxx. 21. David was a very knowing man in the things of God, and yet was sensible he needed farther instruction, and many a time could not trust his own judgment. "Teach me thy way, I will walk in thy truth." One would think it should be, 'Teach me thy truth, and I will walk in thy way,' but it comes all to one. It is the way of truth that God teacheth, and that we must choose, and walk in, Ps. cxix. 30. Christ is the way and the truth, and we must both learn Christ, and walk in him. We cannot walk in God's way and truth unless he teach us; and if we expect he should teach us we must resolve to be governed by his teachings, Isa. ii. 3. 2nd. An upright heart; "Unite my heart to fear thy name;" that is, make me sincere in religion. A hypocrite has a double heart, let mine be single, and entire for God; not divided by him and the world, not straggling from him. Our hearts are apt to wander and hang loose; their powers and faculties scatter after a thousand foreign things, we have therefore need of God's grace to unite them, that we may serve God with all that is within us, and all little enough to be employed in his service. Let my heart be fixed for God, and firm and faithful to him, and fervent in serving him: that is a united heart.

2. For the tokens of God's favour to him, ver. 16, 17. Three things he here prays for: 1st. That God would speak peace and comfort to him. "O turn unto me," as to one thou lovest, and hast a kind and tender concern for. My enemies turn against me, my friends turn from me, Lord, do thou turn to me, "and have mercy upon me." It will be a comfort to me to know that thou pitiest me. 2nd. That God would work deliverance for him, and set him in safety. Give me thy strength,—that is, put strength into me, that I may help myself, and put forth thy strength for me, that I may be saved out of the hands of those that seek my ruin. He pleads relation: "I am thy servant," I am so by birth, as "the son of thine handmaid," born in thy house; and therefore thou art my rightful owner and proprietor, from whom I may expect protection. "I am thine, save me." The children of godly parents, who were betimes dedicated to the Lord, may plead it with him; if they come under the discipline of his family, they are entitled to the privileges of it. 3rd. That God would put reputation on him. "Shew me a token for good,"—that is, make it to appear to others as well as to myself, that thou art doing me good, and designing farther good for me. Let me have some unquestionable illustrious instances of thy favour to me, "that they which hate me may see it, and be ashamed" of their enmity to me, as they will have reason to be when they perceive "thou, Lord, hast holpen me, and comforted me," and that therefore they have been striving follows the Greek, as usual: "Let my heart rejoice that it may fear thy name." Our translation is the most correct.

lxxxvi. 14. The "violent" are men who cause terror and dismay, hence the furious and tyrannical. The Syriac calls them "the mighty," and renders the next clause freely, "and have not remembered thee." Augustine, understanding the preceding verse of actual salvation from hell, applies this to the attempts of the wicked to destroy the soul of the psalmist. Many, however, prefer to regard the whole as having reference to deliverance from temporal calamities and enemies.

lxxxvi. 17. Some of the fathers, as Jerome and Augustine, thought the "token" or "sign" to which reference is here made meant the cross; others again supposed it alluded to the sign which the Lord granted to Ahaz. These are fancies. The words involve no mysterious signification.

lxxxvii. 1. For "his foundation is in the holy mountains" we against God, opposing one whom he owns, and that they have been striving in vain to ruin and vex one whom God himself has undertaken to help and comfort. The joy of the saints shall be the shame of their persecutors.

PSALM LXXXVII.

The foregoing psalm was very plain and easy, but in this are things dark and hard to be understood. It is an encomium of Zion, as a type and figure of the gospel church, to which what is here spoken is very applicable. Zion, for the temple's sake, is here preferred, I. Before the rest of the land of Canaan, as being crowned with special tokens of God's favour, ver. 1—3. II. Before any other place or country whatsoever, as being replenished with more eminent men, and with a greater plenty of Divine blessings, ver. 4—7. Some think it was penned to express the joy of God's people when Zion was in a flourishing state; others think it was penned to encourage their faith and hope when Zion was in ruins, and was to be rebuilt after the captivity. Though no man cared for her, Jer. xxx. 17, "This is Zion whom no man seeketh after," yet God had done great things for her, and spoken glorious things of her, which should all have their perfection and accomplishment in the gospel church; to that therefore we must have an eye in singing this psalm.

A Psalm or Song for the sons of Korah.

HIS foundation is in the holy mountains.
2 The LORD loveth the gates of Zion
More than all the dwellings of Jacob.
3 Glorious things are spoken of thee,
O city of God. Selah.

Some make the first words of the psalm to be part of the title. It is a psalm or song, whose subject is the holy mountains,—that is, the temple built in Zion upon mount Moriah. That is the foundation of the argument, or beginning of the psalm. Or we may suppose the psalmist had now the tabernacle or temple in view, and was in his thoughts contemplating the glories of it, and at length he breaks out into this expression, which has reference, though not to what he had written before, yet to what he had thought of. Every one knew what he meant when he said thus abruptly, "Its foundations is in the holy mountains." Three things are here observed in the praise of the temple:

First. That it was founded on the holy mountains, ver. 1. The church has a foundation, so that it cannot sink or totter. Christ himself is the foundation of it, which God hath laid. The Jerusalem above is a city that has foundations. The foundation is upon the mountains, it is built high. "The mountain of the Lord's house is established upon the top of the mountains," Isa. ii. 2. It is built firm, the mountains are rocky, and on a rock the church is built. The world is founded upon the seas, Ps. xxiv. 2, which are continually ebbing and flowing, and are a very weak foundation; Babel was built in a plain, where the ground was rotten; but the church is built upon the everlasting mountains, and the perpetual hills; for sooner shall the mountains depart, and the hills be removed, than the covenant of God's peace shall be disannulled, and on that the church is built, Isa. liv. 10. The foundation is upon "the holy mountains." Holiness is the strength and stability of the church, that is it which will support it, and keep it from sinking; not so much that it is built upon mountains, as that it is built upon holy mountains; upon the promise of God, for the confirming of which he hath sworn by his holiness; upon the sanctification of the Spirit, which will secure the happiness of all the saints.

Secondly. That God had expressed a particular affection for it; ver. 2, "The Lord loveth the gates of Zion," of the temple, of the houses of doctrine, so the Chaldee, "more than all the dwellings of Jacob," whether in Jerusalem, or any where else in the country. God had said concerning Zion, "This is my rest for ever, here will I dwell;" there he met his people, and conversed with them, received their homage, and shewed them the tokens of his favour, and therefore we may conclude how well he loves those gates. Note, 1. God has a love for the dwellings of Jacob, has a gracious regard to religious families, and accepts their family worship. 2. Yet he loves the gates of Zion better, not only better than any, but better than all the dwellings of Jacob. God was worshipped in the dwellings of Jacob, and family worship is family duty, which must by no means be neglected; yet when they come in competition, public worship (cæteris paribus,—'other things being equal,') is to be preferred before private.

Thirdly. That there was much said concerning it in the word of God; ver. 3, "Glorious things are spoken of thee, O city of God." We are to judge of things and persons by the figure they make and the estimate put upon them in and by the Scripture. Many base and ill things were spoken of the city of God by the enemies of it, to render it mean and odious, but by him whose judgment we are sure is according to truth, glorious things are spoken of it. God said of the temple, "Mine eyes and mine heart shall be there perpetually; I have sanctified this house that my name may be there for ever," 2 Chr. vii. 16; "Beautiful for situation is mount Zion," Ps. xlviii. 2. These are glorious things. Yet more glorious things are spoken of the gospel church; it is the spouse of Christ, the purchase of his blood; it is "a peculiar people, a holy nation, a royal priesthood," and "the gates of hell shall not prevail against it." Let us not be ashamed of the church of Christ in its meanest condition, nor of any that belong to it, nor disown our relation to it, though it be turned never so much to our reproach, since such glorious things are spoken of it, and not one iota or tittle of what is said shall fall to the ground.

4 I will make mention of Rahab and Babylon to them that know me:
Behold Philistia, and Tyre, with Ethiopia;
This man was born there.
5 And of Zion it shall be said,
This and that man was born in her:
And the highest himself shall establish her.
6 The LORD shall count, when he writeth up the people,
That this man was born there. Selah. [there:
7 As well the singers as the players on instruments shall be
All my springs are in thee.

Zion is here compared with other places, and preferred before them. The church of Christ is more glorious and excellent than the nations of the earth.

First. It is owned that other places have their glories; ver. 4, "I will make mention of Rahab," that is, Egypt, "and Babylon, to them that know me," and are about me, and with whom I discourse about public affairs. "Behold Philistia and Tyre, with Ethiopia," or rather Arabia, we will observe that "this man was born there;" here and there one famous man, eminent for knowledge and virtue, may be produced, that was a native of these countries; here and there one that becomes a proselyte, and a worshipper of the true God. But some give another sense of it; that it is a prophecy or promise of bringing the Gentiles into the church, and uniting of them in one body with the Jews. God saith, 'I will reckon Egypt and Babylon with them that know me,' that is, I will reckon them my people, as much as Israel, when they shall receive the Gospel of Christ, and own them as born in Zion, that is, born again there, and admitted to the privileges of Zion as freely as a trueborn Israelite. They that were strangers and foreigners became fellow-citizens with the saints, Eph. ii. 17. A Gentile convert shall stand upon a level with a native Jew. Compare Isa. xix. 23, 25, "The Lord shall say, Blessed be Egypt my people, and Assyria the work of my hands, and Israel mine inheritance."

Secondly. It is proved that the glory of Zion outshines them all upon many accounts; for,

1. Zion shall produce many great and good men, that shall be famous in their generation; ver. 5. "Of Zion it shall be said" by all her neighbours, that "this and that man was born in her;" many men of renown for wisdom and piety, and especially for acquaintance with the words of God and the visions of the Almighty. Many prophets and kings that should be greater favourites of Heaven, and greater blessings to the earth than ever were bred in Egypt or Babylon. The worthies of the church far exceed those of heathen nations, and their names will shine brighter than in perpetual records. 'A man, a man was born in her;' by which some understand Christ, that man, that Son of man, who is fairer than the children of men; he was born at Bethlehem, near Zion, and was the glory of his people Israel. The greatest honour that ever was put upon the Jewish nation was, that of them, as concerning the flesh, Christ came, Rom. ix. 5. Or this also may be applied to the conversion of the Gentiles; of Zion it shall be said, that the law which went forth out of Zion, the Gospel of Christ, shall be an instrument to beget many souls to God, and the Jerusalem that is from above shall be acknowledged the mother of them all.

2. Zion's interest shall be strengthened and settled by an almighty power. "The highest himself shall" undertake to "establish her," who can do it effectually; the accession of proselytes out of divers nations shall be so far from occasioning discord and division, that it shall contribute greatly to Zion's strength; for God himself, having founded her upon an everlasting foundation, whatever convulsions and revolutions there are of states and kingdoms, and however heaven and earth may be shaken, these are things which cannot be shaken, but must remain.

3. Zion's sons shall be registered with honour; ver. 6, "The Lord shall count when he writes up the people," and takes a catalogue of his subjects, "that this man was born there," and so is a subject by birth, by the first birth, being born in his house, by the second birth, being born again of his Spirit. When God comes to reckon with the children of men, that he may render to every man according to his works, he shall observe who was born in Zion, and consequently enjoyed the privileges of God's sanctuary, to whom pertained the adoption, and the glory, and the covenants, and the service of God, Rom. ix. 4; iii. 1, 2; for to them much was given, and therefore of them much will be required, and the account will be accordingly; five talents must be improved by those that were intrusted with five. "I know thy works and where thou dwellest," and where thou wast born. "Selah." Let those that dwell in Zion mark this, and live up to their profession.

4. Zion's songs shall be sung with joy and triumph. "As well the singers as the players on instruments shall be there" to praise God, ver. 7. It was much the honour of Zion, and is the honour of the gospel church, that there God is served and worshipped with rejoicing; his work is done, and done cheerfully, see Ps. lxviii. 25. "All my springs are in thee," O Zion: so God saith he hath deposited treasures of grace in his holy ordinances; there are the springs from which those streams take rise, "which make glad the city of our God," Ps. xlvi. 4. So the Psalmist saith, reckoning the springs from which his dry soul must be watered to lie in the sanctuary, in the word and ordinances, and in the communion of saints. The springs of the joy of a carnal worldling lie in wealth and pleasure, but the springs of the joy of a gracious soul lie in the word of God and prayer. Christ is the true temple; all our springs are in him, and from him all our streams flow; "it pleased the Father," and all believers are well pleased with it too, "that in him should all fulness dwell."

PSALM LXXXVIII.

This psalm is a lamentation, one of the most melancholy of all the psalms; and it doth not conclude as usually the melancholy psalms do, with any the least intimation of comfort or joy, but from first to last, it is mourning and woe. It is not upon a public account that the psalmist here complains; here is no mention of the afflictions of the church, but only upon a personal account, especially trouble of mind, and the grief impressed upon his spirits, both by his outward afflictions, and by the remembrance of his sins, and the fear of God's wrath. It is reckoned among the penitential psalms, and it is well when our fears are thus turned into the right channel; and we take occasion from our worldly grievances to sorrow after a godly sort. In this psalm we have, I. The great pressure of spirit that the psalmist was under, ver. 3—6. II. The wrath of God, which was the cause of that pressure, ver. 7, 15—17. III. The wickedness of his friends, ver. 8, 18. IV. The application he made to God by prayer, ver. 1, 2, 9, 13. V. His humble expostulations and pleadings with God, ver. 10, 12, 14. Those who are in trouble of mind may sing this psalm feelingly; those that are not ought to sing it thankfully, blessing God that it is not their case.

A Song or Psalm for the sons of Korah, to the chief Musician upon Mahalath Leannoth, Maschil of Heman the Ezrahite.

O LORD God of my salvation,
I have cried day and night before thee:
2 Let my prayer come before thee:
Incline thine ear unto my cry;
3 For my soul is full of troubles
And my life draweth nigh unto the grave.
4 I am counted with them that go down into the pit:
I am as a man that hath no strength:
5 Free among the dead,
Like the slain that lie in the grave.

must certainly understand "its foundation is on the holy mountains," because the city of God is intended. When our version was made the word "its" was scarcely known, and "his" or "her" took the place of it. Still, some think "his" means "God's," as though the psalmist had said, "The foundation which God has laid is on the holy mountains," or "The place where God will lay the foundation of the sanctuary is among the holy mountains."

lxxxvii. 4. Rahab is Egypt. The mention of Babylon shows that the psalm was written after David's time. The verse is intended to declare that the chief enemies of Zion and of Israel should be reconciled and converted.

lxxxvii. 6, 7. The sense of these verses is inaccurately given in the Greek and Latin versions: "The Lord shall tell in his writings of peoples and of princes, of them that have been in her. The dwelling in thee is as it were of all rejoicing." So Dr. Chaloner's revision of the Douay Bible. The true idea may be thus expressed: "The Lord

Whom thou rememberest no more:
And they are cut off from thy hand.
6 Thou hast laid me in the lowest pit,
In darkness, in the deeps.
7 Thy wrath lieth hard upon me,
And thou hast afflicted me with all thy waves. Selah.
8 Thou hast put away mine acquaintance far from me;
Thou hast made me an abomination unto them:
I am shut up, and I cannot come forth.
9 Mine eye mourneth by reason of affliction:
LORD, I have called daily upon thee,
I have stretched out my hands unto thee

It should seem by the titles of this and the following psalm, that Heman was the penman of the one, and Ethan of the other. There were two, of these names, that were sons of Zerah the son of Judah, 1 Chr. ii. 4, 6. There were two others famed for wisdom, 1 Kin. iv. 31, where, to magnify Solomon's wisdom, he is said to be wiser than Heman and Ethan. Whether the Heman and Ethan that were Levites and precentors in the songs of Zion were the same, we are not sure, nor which of these, nor whether any of these were the penmen of these psalms. There was a Heman that was one of the chief singers, who is called the king's seer, or prophet, in the words of God, 1 Chr. xxv. 5; it is probable this too was a seer, and yet could see no comfort for himself—an instructor and comforter of others, and yet himself putting comfort away from him. The very first words of the psalm are the only words of comfort and support in all the psalm. There is nothing about him but clouds and darkness; but before he begins his complaint he calls God the God of his salvation, which intimates both that he looked for salvation, as bad as things were, and that he looked up to God for the salvation, and depended upon him to be the author of it. Now here we have the psalmist,

First. A man of prayer; one that gave himself to prayer at all times, but especially now he was in affliction; for "is any afflicted? let him pray." It is his comfort that he had prayed; it is his complaint, that notwithstanding his prayer, he was still in affliction. He was, 1. Very earnest in prayer, "I have cried unto thee," ver. 1; and "have stretched out my hands unto thee," ver. 9, as one that would take hold on thee, and even catch at the mercy, with a holy fear of coming short and missing of it. 2. He was very frequent and constant in prayer. "I have called upon thee daily," ver. 9; nay, day and night, ver. 1: for thus "Men ought always to pray, and not to faint;" God's own elect cry day and night to him; not only morning and evening, beginning every day and every night with prayer, but spending the day and night in prayer. This is indeed praying always, and then we shall speed in prayer when we continue instant in prayer. 3. He directed his prayer to God, and from him expected and desired an answer; ver. 2, "Let my prayer come before thee," to be accepted of thee, not before men, to be seen of them, as the Pharisees' prayers. He doth not desire that men should hear them, but "Lord, incline thou thine ear unto my cry," for to that I refer myself; give what answer to it thou pleasest.

Secondly. He was a man of sorrows, and therefore some make him in this psalm a type of Christ, whose complaints on the cross, and sometimes before, were much to the same tune with this psalm. He cries out, ver. 3, "My soul is full of troubles;" so Christ said, "Now is my soul troubled;" and in his agony, "My soul is exceeding sorrowful;" like the psalmist's here, "even unto death," for he saith, "My life draweth nigh unto the grave." Heman was a very wise man, and a good man, a man of God, and a singer, too, and one may therefore suppose him to be a man of a cheerful spirit, and yet now a man of a sorrowful spirit, troubled in mind, and upon the brink of despair. Inward trouble is the sorest trouble, and that which sometimes the best of God's saints and servants have been severely exercised with. The spirit of man, of the greatest of men, will not always sustain the infirmity, but will droop and sink under it; who, then, can bear a wounded spirit?

Thirdly. He looked upon himself as a dying man, whose heart was ready to break with sorrow; ver. 5, "Free among the dead," one of that ghastly corporation; "Like the slain that lie in the grave," whose rotting and perishing nobody takes notice of, or is concerned for; nay, "Whom thou rememberest no more," to protect or provide for the dead bodies, but they become an easy prey to corruption and the worms; "they are cut off from thy hand," which used to be employed in supporting them, and reaching out to them; but now there is no more occasion for it, they are cut off from it, and cut off by it; for "God will not stretch out his hand to the grave," Job xxx. 24. "Thou hast laid me in the lowest pit," as low as possible, my condition low, my spirits low, "in darkness, in the deeps," ver. 6; sinking, and seeing no way open of escape, brought to the last extremity, and ready to give up all for gone. Thus greatly may good men be afflicted, and such dismal apprehensions may they have concerning their afflictions, and such dark conclusions may they sometimes be ready to make concerning the issue of them, through the power of melancholy and the weakness of faith.

Fourthly. He complained most of God's displeasure against him, which infused the wormwood and the gall into the affliction and the misery; ver. 7, "Thy wrath lies hard upon me." Could he have discerned the favour and love of God in his affliction, it had lain light upon him; but it lay hard, very hard upon him, so that he was ready to sink and faint under it. The impressions of this wrath upon his spirits, were God's waves, with which he afflicted him, which rolled upon him, one on the neck of another, so that he scarce recovered from one dark thought but he was oppressed with another; these waves beat against him with noise and fury; not some, but all God's waves were made use of in afflicting him, and bearing him down. Even the children of God's love may sometimes apprehend themselves children of wrath, and no outward trouble can lie so hard upon them as that apprehension.

Fifthly. It added to his affliction that his friends deserted him, and made themselves strange to him. When we are in trouble, it is some comfort to have those about us that love us, and sympathize with us, but this good man had none such, which gives him occasion not to accuse them, or charge them with treachery, ingratitude, and inhumanity, but to complain to God, with an eye to his hand in this part of the affliction; ver. 8, "Thou hast put away mine acquaintance far from me." Providence had removed them, or rendered them incapable of being serviceable to him, or alienated their affections from him, for every creature is that to us and no more than God makes it to be. If our old acquaintance be shy of us, and those we expect kindness from prove unkind, we must bear that with the same patient submission to the Divine will that we do other afflictions, Job xix. 13. Nay, his friends were not only strange to him, but even hated him, because he was poor and in distress; "thou hast made me an abomination to them;" they are not only shy of me, but sick of me, and I am looked upon by them not only with contempt, but with abhorrence. Let none think it strange concerning such a trial as this, when Heman, that was so famed for wisdom, yet when the world frowned upon him was neglected, as a vessel in which is no pleasure.

Lastly. He looked upon his case as helpless and deplorable; "I am shut up, and I cannot come forth," a close prisoner under the arrests of Divine wrath, and no way open of escape. He therefore lies down and sinks under his troubles, because he sees not any probability of getting out of them. For thus he bemoaneth himself, ver. 9, "Mine eye mourneth by reason of affliction;" and sometimes giving vent to grief by weeping gives some ease to a troubled spirit. Yet weeping must not hinder praying; we must sow in tears; "Mine eye mourns, but I cry unto thee daily;" let prayer and tears go together, and they shall be accepted together; "I have heard thy prayers, I have seen thy tears."

10 Wilt thou shew wonders to the dead?
Shall the dead arise and praise thee? Selah.
11 Shall thy lovingkindness be declared in the grave?
Or thy faithfulness in destruction?
12 Shall thy wonders be known in the dark?
And thy righteousness in the land of forgetfulness?
13 But unto thee have I cried, O LORD;
And in the morning shall my prayer prevent thee.
14 LORD, why castest thou off my soul?
Why hidest thou thy face from me?
15 I am afflicted and ready to die from my youth up:
While I suffer thy terrors I am distracted.
16 Thy fierce wrath goeth over me;
Thy terrors have cut me off.
17 They came round about me daily like water;
They compassed me about together.
18 Lover and friend hast thou put far from me,
And mine acquaintance into darkness.

In these verses,

First. The psalmist expostulates with God concerning the present deplorable condition he was in, ver. 10—12, Wilt thou do a miraculous work to the dead, and raise them to life again? Shall those that are dead and buried rise up to praise thee? No, they leave it to their children to rise up in their rooms to praise God; none expects that they should do it; and wherefore should they rise? Wherefore should they live, but to praise God? The life we are born to at first, and the life we hope to rise to at last, must thus be spent. But "shall thy lovingkindness" to thy people "be declared in the grave," either by those or to those that lie buried there? and thy faithfulness to thy promise, shall that be told in destruction? Shall thy wonders be wrought in the dark or known there, and thy righteousness in the grave, which is the land of forgetfulness, where men remember nothing, nor are themselves remembered? Departed souls may indeed know God's wonders, and declare his faithfulness, justice, and lovingkindness, but deceased bodies cannot; they can neither receive God's favours in comfort, nor return them in praise. Now we will not suppose these expostulations to be the language of despair, as if he thought God could not help him, or would not, much less do they speak any disbelief of the resurrection of the dead at the last day; but he thus pleads with God for speedy relief. Lord, thou art good, thou art faithful, thou art righteous; these attributes of thine will be made known in my deliverance, but if it be not hastened, it will come too late, for I shall be dead and past relief; dead, and not capable of receiving any comfort very shortly. Job often pleaded this, Job vii. 8; x. 21.

Secondly. He resolves to continue instant in prayer, and the more so because the deliverance was deferred; ver. 13, "Unto thee have I cried" many a time, and found comfort in it, and therefore I will continue to do so; "In the morning shall my prayer prevent thee." Note, Though our prayers be not answered presently, yet we must not therefore give over praying, because "the vision is for an appointed time, and at the end it shall speak and not lie." And God, therefore, delays the answer, that he may try our patience and perseverance in prayer. He resolves to seek God early in the morning, when his spirits were lively, and before the business of the day began to crowd in; in the morning, after he had been tossed with cares and sorrowful thoughts in the silence and solitude of the night. But how doth he say, "My prayer shall prevent thee?" Not as if he could wake sooner to pray than God to hear and answer, for he neither slumbers nor sleeps: but it intimates that he would be up earlier than ordinary to pray: would prevent his usual hour of prayer. The greater our afflictions are, the more solicitous and serious we should be in prayer. My prayer shall present itself before thee, and be betimes with thee, and shall not stay for the encouragement of the beginning of mercy, but reach out towards it with faith and expectation, even before the day dawns. God often prevents our prayers and expectations with his mercies; let us prevent his mercies with our prayers and expectations.

Thirdly. He sets down what he will say to God in prayer.

1. He will humbly reason with God concerning the abject afflicted condition he was now in; ver. 14, "Lord, why castest thou off my soul?" What is it that provokes thee to treat me as one abandoned? "Shew me wherefore thou contendest with me." He speaks it with wonder that God should cast off an old servant; should cast off one that was resolved not to cast him off; no wonder men cast me off, but, Lord, why dost thou, whose gifts and callings are without repentance? "Why hidest thou thy face," as one angry at me, that either hast no favour for me, or wilt not let me know it? Nothing grieves a child of God so much as God's hiding his face from him, nor is there any thing he so much dreads as God's casting off his soul. If the sun be clouded, that darkens the earth, but if the sun should abandon the earth, and quite cast it off, what a dungeon would it be!

2. He will humbly repeat the same complaints he had before made, until that God have mercy on him. Two things he represents to God as his grievances:

1st. That God was a terror to him; "I suffer thy terrors," ver. 15. He had continual frightful apprehensions of the wrath of God against him for his sins, and the consequences of that wrath. It terrified him to think of God, and of falling into his hands, and appearing before him to receive his doom from him. He sweat and trembled at the apprehension of God's displeasure against him, and the terror of his majesty. Note, Even those that are designed for God's will reckon when he writes down the nations, 'This was born there.' There will be singers as well as musicians. All my fountains are in Thee." The Syriac is noticeable: "The Lord will number the nations in a book; 'This was born there.' The great ones that dwell in thee shall rejoice, and all that are abased in thee." The cause of the differences in the old versions involves points of criticism, which must be discussed in books for the learned, although the real difficulties are not considerable.

lxxxviii. Title. This title is sufficiently unintelligible as it stands in our version. To make it clearer it must be divided into three portions:—"A song or psalm for the sons of Korah. To the chief musician (or president) over the choir called Mahalath; for responsive singing. A didactic poem by Heman the Ezrahite." The Syriac only has, "Concerning the people who were in Babylon."

lxxxviii. 4. "As a man without strength." So the Hebrew; but the Syriac is, "as a man without help."

favours may yet for a time suffer his terrors. The spirit of adoption is first a spirit of bondage to fear. Poor Job complained of the terrors of God setting themselves in array against him. Job vi. 4. The psalmist here explains himself, and tells us what he means by God's terrors, even his fierce wrath. Let us see what dreadful impressions those terrors made upon him, and how deep they wounded him. First. They had almost taken away his life: "I am so afflicted with them, that I am ready to die," and, as the word is, to give up the ghost; "Thy terrors have cut me off," ver. 16. What is hell, that eternal excision, by which damned sinners are for ever cut off from God and all happiness, but God's terrors fastening and preying upon their guilty consciences? Secondly. They had almost taken away the use of his reason; "When I suffer thy terrors I am distracted;" that sad effect the terrors of the Lord have had upon many, and some good men, who have thereby been put quite out of the possession of their own souls; a most piteous case, and which ought to be looked upon with great compassion. Thirdly. This had continued long; "From my youth up I suffer thy terrors;" he had been from his childhood afflicted with melancholy, and trained up in sorrow, under the discipline of that school. If we begin our days with trouble, and the days of our mourning have been prolonged a great while, let us not think it strange, but let tribulation work patience. It is observable that Heman, who became eminently wise and good, was afflicted and ready to die from his youth up, and suffered God's terrors. Thus many have found it was good for them to bear the yoke in their youth; that sorrow has been much better for them than laughter would have been; and that being much afflicted, and often ready to die when they were young, they have, by the grace of God, got such an habitual seriousness and weanedness from the world as had been of great use to them all their days. And sometimes those whom God designs for eminent services are prepared for them by exercises of this kind. Fourthly. His affliction was now in extremity, and worse than ever. God's terrors now came round about him, so that from all sides he was assaulted with varieties of troubles, and he had no comfortable gale from any point of the compass. They broke in upon him together, like an inundation of water, and this daily and all the day; so that he had no rest, no respite, not the least breathing time, no lucid intervals, nor any gleam of hope. Such was the calamitous state of a very wise and good man; he was so surrounded with terrors that he could find no place of shelter, nor lie any where under the wind.

2nd. That no friend he had in the world was a comfort to him; ver. 18, "Lover and friend hast thou put far from me;" some are dead, others at a distance, and perhaps many unkind. Next to the comforts of religion are those of friendship and society; therefore to be friendless is (as to this life) almost to be comfortless; and to those who have had friends, but have lost them, the calamity is the more grievous. With this the psalmist here closeth his complaint, as if this were it that completed his woe, and gave the finishing stroke to this melancholy piece. If our friends are put far from us by scattering providences, nay, if by death our acquaintance are removed into darkness, we have reason to look upon it as a sore affliction, but must acknowledge and submit to the hand of God in it.

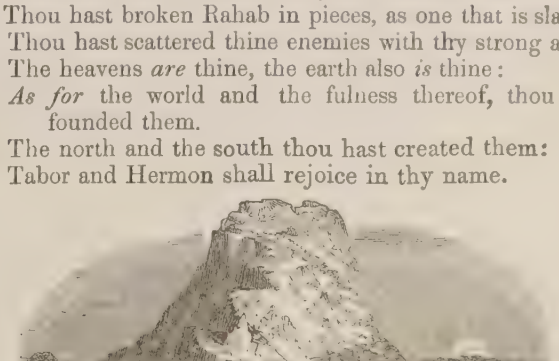
PSALM LXXXIX.

Many psalms that begin with complaint and prayer end with joy and praise, but this begins with joy and praise, and ends with sad complaints and petitions; for the psalmist first recounts God's former favours, and then with the consideration of them aggravates the present grievances. It is uncertain when it was penned, only in general that it was at a time when the house of David was wofully eclipsed; some think it was at the time of the captivity of Babylon, when king Zedekiah was insulted over and abused by Nebuchadnezzar; and then they make the title to signify no more but that the psalm was set to the tune of a song of Ethan, the son of Zerah, called Maschil; others suppose it to be penned by Ethan, who is mentioned in the story of Solomon, who, outliving that glorious prince, thus lamented the great disgrace done to the house of David in the next reign by the revolt of the ten tribes. I. The psalmist in the joyful, pleasant part of the psalm gives glory to God, and takes comfort to himself and his friends; and this he doth more briefly, mentioning God's mercy and truth, ver. 1, and his covenant, ver. 2—4; but more largely in the following verses, wherein, 1. He adores the glory and perfection of God, ver. 5—14. 2. He pleaseth himself in the happiness of those that are admitted into communion with him, ver. 15—18. 3. He builds all his hope upon God's covenant with David, as a type of Christ, ver. 19—37. II. In the melancholy part of the psalm he laments the present calamitous state of the prince and royal family, ver. 38—45; expostulates with God upon it, ver. 46—49; and then concludes with prayer for redress, ver. 50, 51. In singing this psalm we must have high thoughts of God, a lively faith in his covenant with the Redeemer, and a sympathy with the afflicted parts of the church.

Maschil of Ethan the Ezrahite.

I WILL sing of the mercies of the LORD for ever:
With my mouth will I make known thy faithfulness to all generations.
2 For I have said, Mercy shall be built up for ever:
Thy faithfulness shalt thou establish in the very heavens.
3 I have made a covenant with my chosen,
I have sworn unto David my servant,
4 Thy seed will I establish for ever,
And build up thy throne to all generations. Selah.

The psalmist has a very sad complaint to make, of the deplorable condition of the family of David at this time, and yet he begins the psalm with songs of praise; for we must in every thing, in every state, give thanks; thus we must glorify the Lord in the fire. We think when we are in trouble we get ease by complaining; but we do more—we get joy, by praising. Let our complaints therefore be turned into thanksgiving; and in these verses we find that which will be matter of praise and thanksgiving for us in the worst of times, whether upon a personal or public account.



First. However it be, the everlasting God is good and true, ver. 1. Though we may find it hard to reconcile present dark providences with the goodness and truth of God, yet we must abide by this principle, that God's mercies are inexhaustible, and his truth inviolable; and these must be the matter of our joy and praise. "I will sing of the mercies of the Lord for ever;" sing a praising song to God's honour, a pleasant song for my own solace; and Maschil, an instructing song for the edification of others. We may be for ever singing of God's mercies, and yet the subject will not be drawn dry. We must sing of God's mercies as long as we live, train up others to sing of them when we are gone, and hope to be singing of them in heaven world without end; and this is singing of the mercies of the Lord for ever. "With my mouth and my pen, (for by that also we speak,) "will I make known thy faithfulness to all generations;" assuring posterity from my own observation and experience, that God is true to every word that he hath spoken, that they may learn to put their trust in God, Ps. lxxviii. 6.

Secondly. However it be, the everlasting covenant is firm and sure, ver. 2—4 Here we have,

1. The psalmist's faith and hope. Things now look black, and threaten the utter extirpation of the house of David; but "I have said," and I have warrant from the word of God to say it, that "Mercy shall be built up for ever." As the goodness of God's nature is to be the matter of our song, ver. 1, so much more the mercy that is built up for us in the covenant. It is still increasing like a house in the building up, and shall still continue our rest for ever, like a house built up. It shall be built up for ever; for the everlasting habitations we hope for in the new Jerusalem are of this building. If mercy shall be built for ever, then the tabernacle of David which is fallen down shall be raised out of its ruins, and built up as in the days of old, Am. ix. 11. Therefore, mercy shall be built up for ever, because "thy faithfulness shalt thou establish in the very heavens." Though our expectations are in some particular instances disappointed, yet God's promises are not disannulled. They are established in the very heavens, that is, in his eternal counsels; they are above the changes of this lower region, and out of the reach of the opposition of hell and earth. And the stability of the material heavens is an emblem of the truth of God's word; the heavens may be clouded by vapours arising out of the earth, but they cannot be touched,—they cannot be changed.

2. An abstract of the covenant upon which this faith and hope is built. I have said it, saith the psalmist, for God hath sworn it, that the heirs of promise might be entirely satisfied of the immutability of his counsel. He brings in God speaking, ver. 3, owning to the comfort of his people, "I have made a covenant," and therefore will make it good. The covenant is made with David; the covenant of royalty is made with him, as the father of his family, and with his seed through him, and for his sake; representing the covenant of grace made with Christ as head of the church, and with all believers as his spiritual seed. David is here called God's chosen, and his servant: and, as God is not changeable to recede from his own choice, so he is not unrighteous to cast off one that served him. Two things encourage the psalmist to build his faith on this covenant: 1st. The ratification of it. It was confirmed with an oath. "The Lord has sworn, and he will not repent." 2nd. The perpetuity of it. The blessings of the covenant were not only secured to David himself, but were entailed on his family. It was promised that his family should continue; "Thy seed will I establish for ever," so that "David shall not want a son to reign," Jer. xxiii. 20, 21. And that it should continue a royal family; "I will build up thy throne to all generations," to all the generations of time. This has its accomplishment only in Christ, of the seed of David, who lives for ever, to whom God has given the throne of his father David, and of the increase of whose government and peace there shall be no end. Of this covenant the psalmist will return to speak more largely, ver. 19, &c.

5 And the heavens shall praise thy wonders, O LORD:
Thy faithfulness also in the congregation of the saints.
6 For who in the heaven can be compared unto the LORD?
Who among the sons of the mighty can be likened unto the LORD?
7 God is greatly to be feared in the assembly of the saints,
And to be had in reverence of all them that are about him.
8 O LORD God of hosts, who is a strong LORD like unto thee?
Or to thy faithfulness round about thee?
9 Thou rulest the raging of the sea:
When the waves thereof arise, thou stillest them.
10 Thou hast broken Rahab in pieces, as one that is slain;
Thou hast scattered thine enemies with thy strong arm.
11 The heavens are thine, the earth also is thine:
As for the world and the fulness thereof, thou hast founded them.
12 The north and the south thou hast created them:
Tabor and Hermon shall rejoice in thy name.

MOUNT TABOR.

13 Thou hast a mighty arm:
Strong is thy hand, and high is thy right hand.
14 Justice and judgment are the habitation of thy throne:
Mercy and truth shall go before thy face.

lxxxviii. 5. "Free among the dead," i.e., "I am counted as one who is free among the dead." Perhaps, however, the word rendered "free" may mean "feeble," or even "prostrate." So Gesenius, Winer, and others.

lxxxviii. 9. For "mourneth" we may render "melteth," but "languishes" would be better.

lxxxviii. 10. The first Hebrew word translated "dead" is correctly rendered; the second, which is Rephaim, means rather the spirits of the dead. This latter is sometimes explained to signify "giants," and therefore the Syriac here understands it of "mighty men," or heroes—deceased warriors, we suppose.

lxxxviii. 12. "In the dark:" correctly, "in darkness," i.e., in the darkness of the region of death.

lxxxviii. 15. This translation must be rectified. We must either say, "I have been afflicted and ready to die from my youth," or "I am afflicted and ready to die; from my youth onward I have endured

These verses are full of the praises of God. Observe,

First. Where and by whom God is to be praised.

1. God is praised by the angels above; "The heavens shall praise thy wonders, O Lord," ver. 5; that is, The glorious inhabitants of the upper world continually celebrate thy praises. "Bless the Lord, ye his angels," Ps. ciii. 20. The works of God are wonders even to them that are best acquainted, and most intimately conversant with them. God's works the more they are known the more they are admired and praised. This should make us love heaven, and long to be there, that there we shall have nothing else to do but to praise God and his wonders.

2. God is praised by the assemblies of his saints on earth. Praise waits for him in Zion, and though they fall so far short of the praises of angels, yet God is pleased to take notice of them, and accept them, and reckons himself honoured by them. Thy faithfulness and the truth of thy promise, that rock on which the church is built, this shall be praised in the congregation of the saints, who owe their all to that faithfulness, and whose constant comfort it is that there is a promise, and that "He is faithful that has promised." It is expected from God's saints on earth, that they praise him. Who should if they do not? Let every saint praise him, but especially the congregation of saints; when they come together, let them join in praising God; the more the better, it is liker heaven. Of the honour done to God by the assembly of the saints, he speaks again, ver. 7, "God is greatly to be feared in the assembly of the saints." Saints should assemble for religious worship, that they may publicly own their relation to God, and may stir up one another to give honour to him, and in keeping up communion with God, may likewise maintain the communion of saints. In religious assemblies God has promised the presence of his grace, but we must also in them have an eye to his glorious presence, that the familiarity we are admitted to may not breed the least contempt; for he is terrible in his holy places, and therefore greatly to be feared. A holy awe of God must fall upon us, and fill us, in all our approaches to God, even in secret, to which something may very well be added by the solemnity of public assemblies. God must be had in reverence of all that are about him, that attend him continually as his servants, or approach him upon any particular errand: see Lev. x. 3. Those only serve God acceptably who serve him with reverence and godly fear, Heb. xii. 28.

Secondly. What it is to praise God. It is to acknowledge him to be a being of unparalleled perfection, such an one as there is none like him, nor any to be compared with him, ver. 6. If there be any beings that can pretend to vie with God, sure they must be found among the angels; but they are all infinitely short of him; "Who in the heaven can be compared unto the Lord?" so as to challenge any share of that adoration and reverence which is due to him only, or to set up in rivalship with him for the homage of the children of men? They are sons of the mighty, but which of them can be likened unto the Lord? Nobles are prince's peers; some parity there is between them; but none between God and the angels; they are not his peers; "To whom will ye liken me, or shall I be equal? saith the Holy One," Isa. xl. 25. This is insisted on again, ver. 8, "Who is a strong Lord like unto thee?" No angel, no earthly potentate whatsoever, is comparable to God, or has an arm like him, or can thunder with a voice like him. "Thy faithfulness is round about thee," that is, thine angels that are round about thee, attending thee with their praises, and ready to go on thine errands, are all faithful. Or rather, in every thing thou dost, on all sides, thou approvest thyself faithful to thy word, above whatever prince or potentate was. Among men it is often found, that those who are most able to break their word are least careful to keep it; but God is both strong and faithful; he can do every thing, and yet will never do an unjust thing.

Thirdly. What we ought in our praises to give God the glory of. Several things are here mentioned.

1. The command God has of the most ungovernable creatures; ver. 9, "Thou rulest the raging of the sea," than which nothing is more frightful or threatening, nor more out of the power of man to give check to; yet it can swell no higher, no farther, beat no harder, continue no longer, nor do any more hurt than God suffers it; "When the waves thereof arise," thou canst presently hush them asleep,—still them, and make them quiet, and turn the storm into a calm. This coming in here as an act of Omnipotence, what manner of man then was the Lord Jesus, whom the winds and seas obeyed?

2. The victories God has obtained over the enemies of his church. His ruling the raging of the sea, and quelling its billows, was an emblem of this; ver. 10, "Thou hast broken Rahab," many a proud enemy, so it signifies, Egypt in particular, which is sometimes called Rahab, broken it "in pieces, as one that is slain," and utterly unable to make head again. The head being broken, thou hast scattered the remainder with the arm of thy strength. God has more ways than one to deal with his and his church's enemies; we think he should slay them presently but sometimes he scatters them, that he may send them abroad to be monuments of his justice, Ps. li. 11. The remembrance of the breaking of Egypt in pieces, is a comfort to the church in reference to the present power of Babylon; for God is still the same.

3. The incontestable property he has in all the creatures of the upper and lower world, ver. 11, 12. Men are honoured for their large possessions, but "the heavens are thine, O Lord, the earth also is thine," therefore, we praise thee; therefore we trust in thee; therefore we will not fear what man can do against us. "The world and the fulness thereof," all the riches contained in it, all the inhabitants of it, both the tenements and the tenants, they are all thine; for thou hast founded them; and the founder may justly claim to be the owner He instanceth, 1st. In the remotest parts of the world, the north and south, the countries that lie under the two poles, which are uninhabited, and little known, yet thou hast created them, and therefore knowest them, takest care of them, and hast tributes of praise from them. The north is said to be hung over the empty place, yet what fulness there is there God is the owner of it. 2nd. In the highest parts of the world. He instanceth in the two highest hills in Canaan, "Tabor and Hermon," one lying to the west, the other to the east; these "shall rejoice in thy name;" for they are under the care of thy providence, and they produce offerings for thine altar; the little hills are said to rejoice in their own fruitfulness, Ps. lxv. 12. Tabor is commonly supposed to be that high mountain in Galilee on the top of which Christ was transfigured; and then indeed, it might be said to rejoice in that voice which was there heard, "This is my beloved Son."

4. That power and justice, that mercy and truth, with which he governs the world, and rules in the affairs of the children of men, ver. 13, 14. 1st. God is able to do every thing; for he is the Lord God Almighty. His arm, his hand, is mighty and strong, both to save his people, and to destroy his and their enemies; none can either resist his force, or bear the weight of his mighty hand. High is his right hand to reach the highest, even those that set their nest among the stars, Am. ix. 2, 3; Obad. 4; his right hand is exalted in what he hath done, for in thousands of instances he hath signalized his power, Ps. cxviii. 16. 2nd. He never did nor ever will do any thing that is either unjust or unwise: for "righteousness and judgment are the habitation of his throne." None of all his dictates or decrees ever varied from the rules of equity and wisdom, nor could ever any charge God with unrighteousness or folly. Justice and judgment are the preparing of his throne, so some; the establishment of it, so others. The preparations for his government in his counsels from eternity, and the establishment of it in its consequences to eternity, are all justice and judgment. 3rd. He always doth that which is kind to his people, and consonant to the word which he hath spoken. Mercy and truth shall go before thy face to prepare thy way, as harbingers to make room for thee; mercy in promising, truth in performing; truth in being as good as thy word, mercy in being better. How praiseworthy are these in great men, much more in the great God, in whom they are in perfection!

15 Blessed is the people that know the joyful sound:
They shall walk, O LORD, in the light of thy countenance.
16 In thy name shall they rejoice all the day:
And in thy righteousness shall they be exalted.
17 For thou art the glory of their strength:
And in thy favour our horn shall be exalted 18 For the LORD is our defence;
And the Holy One of Israel is our king.

The psalmist having largely shewed the blessedness of the God of Israel, here shews the blessedness of the Israel of God. As "there is none like unto the God of Jeshurun," so, "Happy art thou, O Israel, who is like unto thee, O people?" especially as a type of the gospel Israel, consisting of all true believers, whose happiness is here described.

First. Glorious discoveries are made to them, and glad tidings of good brought to them. They hear, they "know the joyful sound," ver. 15. This alludes either, 1. To the shout of a victorious army, the shout of a king, Num. xxiii. 21. Israel has the tokens of God's presence with them in their wars. The sound of the going in the top of the mulberry trees was indeed a joyful sound, 2 Sam. v. 24, and they often returned, making the earth ring with their songs of triumph; these were joyful sounds. Or, 2. To the sound that was made over the sacrifices, and on the solemn feast-day, Ps. lxxxi. 1—3. This was the happiness of Israel, that they had among them the free and open profession of God's holy religion, and abundance of joy in their sacrifices. Or, 3. To the sound of the jubilee trumpet. A joyful sound it was to servants and debtors, to whom it proclaimed release. The Gospel is indeed a joyful sound; a sound of victory, of liberty, of communion with God, and the sound of abundance of rain. Blessed is the people that hear it, and know it, and bid it welcome.

Secondly. Special tokens of God's favour are granted them. "They shall walk, O Lord, in the light of thy countenance;" they shall govern themselves by thy conduct, be guided by thine eye. And they shall delight themselves in thy consolations; they shall have the favour of God, they shall know that they have it, and it shall be continual matter of joy and rejoicing to them. They shall go through all the exercises of a holy life under the powerful influences of God's lovingkindness, which shall make their duty pleasant to them, and make them sincere in it, aiming at this as their end, to be accepted of the Lord. We then walk in the light of the Lord, when we fetch all our comforts from God's favour, and are very careful to keep ourselves in his love.

Thirdly. They never want matter for joy. Blessed are God's people, for in his name, in all that whereby he has made himself known, if it be not their own fault, "they shall rejoice all the day." They that rejoice in Christ Jesus, and make God their exceeding joy, have enough to balance their grievances, and silence their griefs; and therefore their joy is full, 1 Jno. i. 4, and constant. It is their duty to rejoice evermore.

Fourthly. Their relation to God is their honour and dignity. They are happy, for they are high. "Surely in the Lord," the Lord Christ, "they have righteousness and strength," and so are recommended by him to the Divine acceptance; and therefore "in him shall all the seed of Israel glory," Isa. xlv. 24, 25. And so it is here, ver. 16, 17: 1. "In thy righteousness shall they be exalted," and not in any righteousness of their own. We are exalted out of danger, and into honour, purely by the righteousness of Christ, which is a clothing both for dignity and for defence. 2. "Thou art the glory of their strength;" that is, thou art their strength, and it is their glory that thou art so, and what they glory in. "Thanks be to God, who always causeth us to triumph." 3. "In thy favour," which through Christ we hope for, "our horn shall be exalted." The horn notes beauty, plenty, and power, these they have who are made accepted in the Beloved. What greater preferment are men capable of in this world, than to be God's favourites?

Fifthly. Their relation to God is their protection and safety; ver. 18, 'For our shield is of the Lord,' (so the margin) 'and our king is from the Holy One of Israel.' If God be our ruler, he will be our defender, and who is he then that can harm us? It was the happiness of Israel, that God himself had the erecting of their bulwarks, and the nominating of their king; so some take it. Or rather, that he was himself a wall of fire round about them, and as a holy one, the author and centre of their holy religion. He was their king, and so their glory in the midst of them. Christ is the holy one of Israel, that holy thing; and in nothing was that peculiar people more blessed than in this, that he was born king of the Jews. Now this account of the blessedness of God's Israel comes in here as that to which it was hard to reconcile their present calamitous state.

19 Then thou spakest in vision to thy holy one,
And saidst, I have laid help upon one that is mighty;
I have exalted one chosen out of the people.
20 I have found David my servant;
With my holy oil have I anointed him:
21 With whom my hand shall be established:
Mine arm also shall strengthen him.
22 The enemy shall not exact upon him;
Nor the son of wickedness afflict him
23 And I will beat down his foes before his face,
And plague them that hate him.
24 But my faithfulness and my mercy shall be with him:
And in my name shall his horn be exalted.
25 I will set his hand also in the sea, thy terrors." The ancient translations vary considerably from each other, and afford us no help.

lxxxix. Title. Ethan the Ezrabite, to whom this psalm is ascribed, appears to be so called to distinguish him from some others named Ethan. (See 1 Kings iv. 31.) Of his personal history we know nothing, as he is simply set forth as descended from Zerah and Mahol, and therefore of the tribe of Judah, or at least allied with it. He is by some identified with Ethan a Kohathite lxxxix. 3, 4. The connection of these verses with the preceding may be made plain by prefixing the word "saying."

lxxxix. 5. By "the congregation of the saints" it is most probable the inhabitants of heaven or angelic spirits are to be understood. So, in the next verse, the words "heaven" and "sons of the mighty" are to be similarly explained; hence the latter clause is in the Syriac translated "sons of angels."

lxxxix. 9, 10. The Chaldee translator seems to have understood

And his right hand in the rivers.
26 He shall cry unto me, Thou art my father,
My God, and the rock of my salvation.
27 Also I will make him my firstborn,
Higher than the kings of the earth.
28 My mercy will I keep for him for evermore,
And my covenant shall stand fast with him.
29 His seed also will I make to endure for ever,
And his throne as the days of heaven.
30 If his children forsake my law,
And walk not in my judgments;
31 If they break my statutes,
And keep not my commandments;
32 Then will I visit their transgression with the rod,
And their iniquity with stripes. [from him,
33 Nevertheless my lovingkindness will I not utterly take Nor suffer my faithfulness to fail.
34 My covenant will I not break,
Nor alter the thing that is gone out of my lips.
35 Once have I sworn by my holiness
That I will not lie unto David.
36 His seed shall endure for ever,
And his throne as the sun before me.
37 It shall be established for ever as the moon,
And as a faithful witness in heaven. Selah.

ANOINTING.—ver. 20.

The covenant God made with David and his seed was mentioned before, ver. 3, 4; but in these verses it is enlarged upon, and pleaded with God for favour to the royal family, now almost sunk and ruined; yet certainly it looks at Christ, and has its accomplishment in him much more than in David; nay, some passages here are scarce applicable at all to David, but must be understood of Christ only, who is therefore called David our king, Hos. iii. 5. And very great and precious promises they are which are here made to the Redeemer, which are strong foundations for the faith and hope of the redeemed to build upon. The comforts of our redemption flow from the covenant of redemption, all our springs are in that; Isa. lv. 3, "I will make an everlasting covenant with you, even the sure mercies of David," Acts xiii. 34. Now here we have an account of those sure mercies. Observe,

First. What assurance we have of the truth of the promise, which may encourage us to build upon it. We are here told, 1. How it was spoken; ver. 19, "Thou spakest in vision to thy holy one." God's promise to David, which is especially referred to here, was spoken in vision to Nathan the prophet, 2 Sam. vii. 12—17. Then when the holy one of Israel was their king, ver. 18, then he appointed David to be his viceroy. But to all the prophets, those holy ones, he spake in vision concerning Christ, and to him himself especially, who had lain in his bosom from eternity, and was made perfectly acquainted with the whole design of redemption, Mat. xi. 27. 2. How it was sworn to and ratified; ver. 35, "Once have I sworn by my holiness," that darling attribute. In swearing by his holiness, he sware by himself; for as soon will he cease to be, as be otherwise than holy. His swearing once is enough, he needs not swear again as David did, 1 Sam. xx. 17, for his word and oath are two immutable things. As Christ was made a priest, so he was made a king by an oath, Heb. vii. 21; for his kingdom and priesthood are both unchangeable.

Secondly. The choice made of the person to whom the promise is given, ver. 19, 20. David was a king of God's own choosing, so is Christ; and therefore both are called God's kings, Ps. ii. 6. David was mighty, a man of courage, and fit for business; he was chosen out of the people; not out of the princes, but the shepherds; God found him out, exalted him, and laid help upon him, and ordered Samuel to anoint him. But this is especially to be applied to Christ. 1. He is one that is mighty, every way qualified for the great work he was to undertake, able to save to the uttermost. Mighty in strength, for he is the Son of God; mighty in love, for he is able experimentally to compassionate those that are tempted. He is the mighty God, Isa. ix. 6. 2. He is chosen out of the people, one of us, bone of our bone, that takes part with us of flesh and blood. Being ordained for men, he is taken from among men, that his terror might not make us afraid. 3. God has found him. He is a Saviour of God's own providing, for the salvation from first to last is purely the Lord's doing. He has found the ransom, Job xxxiii. 24; for we could never have found a person fit to undertake this great work, Rev. v. 3, 4. 4. God has laid help upon him. Not only helped him, but treasured up help in him for us; laid it as a charge upon him to help fallen man up again, to help the chosen remnant to heaven; "In me is thy help," Hos. xiii. 9. 5. He has exalted him by constituting him the prophet, priest, and king of his church; clothing him with power, raising him from the dead, and setting him at his own right hand. Whom God chooseth and useth he will exalt. 6. He has anointed him, has qualified him for his office, and so confirmed him in it, by giving him the Spirit, not by measure, but without measure, infinitely above his fellows. He is called Messiah, or Christ, the Anointed. 7. In all this he designed him to be his own servant, for the accomplishing of his eternal purpose, and the advancement of the interests of his kingdom among men.

Thirdly. The promises made to this chosen one, to David in the type, and the Son of David in the antitype; in which not only gracious, but glorious things are spoken of him.

1. With reference to himself, as king and God's servant. And what makes for him makes for all his loving subjects. It is here promised,

1st. That God would stand by him and strengthen him in his undertaking; ver. 21, "With him my hand" not only shall be, but "shall be established" by promise, shall be so established, as that he shall by it be established and confirmed in all his offices, so as that none of them shall be undermined and overthrown, though by the man of sin they should all be usurped and fought against. Christ had a great deal of hard work to do, and hard usage to go through, but he that gave him commission gave him forces sufficient for the execution of his commission. "Mine arm also shall strengthen him" to break through and bear up under all his difficulties. No good work can miscarry in the hand of those whom God himself undertakes to strengthen.

2nd. That he should be victorious over his enemies. That he should not encroach upon them; ver. 22, "The son of wickedness shall not exact upon him," nor afflict him. He that at first broke the peace would set himself against him that undertook to make peace, and do what he could to blast his design; but he could only reach to bruise his heel, farther he could not exact upon him or afflict him. Christ became a surety for our debt, and thereby Satan and death thought to have gained advantage against him; but he satisfied the demands of God's justice, and then they could not exact upon him; "the prince of this world cometh, but he has nothing in me," Jno. xiv. 30. Nay, they not only shall not prevail against him, but they shall fall before him; ver. 23, "I will beat down his foes before his face;" the prince of this world shall be cast out, principalities and powers spoiled, and he shall be the death of deaths itself, and the destruction of the grave, Hos. xiii. 14. Some apply this to the ruin which God brought upon the Jewish nation that persecuted Christ, and put him to death. Nay, and all Christ's enemies that hate him, and will not have him to reign over them, shall be brought forth and slain before him, Lu. xix. 27.

3rd. That he should be the great trustee of the covenant between God and men. That God would be gracious and true to him, and in him be gracious and true to us: ver. 24, "My faithfulness and my mercy shall be with him." It was with David; God continued merciful to him, and so approved himself faithful. It was with Christ; God made good all his promises to him. But that is not all, God's mercy to us, and his faithfulness to us, are with Christ; he is not only pleased with him, but with us in him; and it is in him that all the promises of God are yea and amen. So that if any poor sinners hope for benefit by the faithfulness and mercy of God, let them know it is with Christ, it is lodged in his hand, and to him they must apply themselves for it; ver. 28, "My mercy will I keep for him," to be disposed of by him "for evermore." In the channel of Christ's mediation all the streams of Divine goodness will for ever run; and therefore it is the mercy of our Lord Jesus Christ which we look for unto eternal life, Jude 21; Jno. xvii. 2. And as the mercy of God flows to us through him, so the promise of God is through him firm to us: "My covenant shall stand fast with him," both the covenant of redemption made with him, and the covenant of grace made with us in him. The new covenant is therefore always new, and firmly established, because it is lodged in the hands of a mediator, Heb. viii. 6. The covenant stands fast, because it stands upon this basis. And this redounds to the everlasting honour of the Lord Jesus, that to him the great cause between God and man is entirely referred, and the Father has committed all judgment to him that all men might honour him, Jno. v. 22, 23; therefore it is here said, "In my name shall his horn be exalted." This shall be his glory, that God's name is in him, Ex. xxiii. 21, and that he acts in God's name. "As the Father gave me commandment, so I do."

4th. That his kingdom should be greatly enlarged; ver. 25, "I will set his hand in the sea," that is, he shall have the dominion of the seas, and the isles of the seas; "and his right hand in the rivers," the inland countries that are watered with rivers. David's kingdom extended itself to the Great sea, and the Red sea, to the river of Egypt, and the river Euphrates. But it is in the kingdom of the Messiah that this has its full accomplishment; and shall have more and more when "the kingdoms of this world shall become the kingdoms of the Lord and of his Christ," Rev. xi. 15; and "the isles shall wait for his law."

5th. That he should own God as his Father; and God would own him as his son, his firstborn, ver. 26, 27. This is a comment upon these words in Nathan's message concerning Solomon, for he also was a type of Christ as well as David; 2 Sam. vii. 14, "I will be his father, and he shall be my son;" and the relation shall be owned on both sides. First. "He shall cry unto me, Thou art my Father." It is likely Solomon did so, but we are sure Christ did so, in the days of his flesh, when he offered up strong cries to God, and called him, "Holy Father;" "Righteous Father," and taught us to address ourselves to him as "Our Father in heaven." Christ in his agony cried unto God, "Thou art my Father," Mat. xxvi. 39, 42, "O my Father;" and upon the cross, "Father, forgive them," "Father, into thy hands I commend my spirit." He looked upon him likewise as his God; and therefore he perfectly obeyed him, and submitted to his will in his whole undertaking; he is "my God and your God," Jno. xx. 17. And as the rock of his salvation, who would bear him up, and bear him out in his undertaking, and make him more than a conqueror, even a complete Saviour; and, therefore, with an undaunted resolution he endured the cross, despising the shame, for he knew he should be both justified and glorified. Secondly. "I will make him my firstborn." I see not how this can be applied to David; it is Christ's prerogative to be firstborn of every creature, and as such the heir of all things, Col. i. 15; Heb. i. 2, 6. When all power was given to Christ, both in heaven and in earth, and all things were delivered unto him by the Father, then God made him his Firstborn; and far higher, more great and honourable, than the kings of the earth, for he is the King of kings, "angels, authorities, and powers being made subject to him," 1 Pet. iii. 22.

2. With reference to his seed. God's covenants always took in the seed of the covenanters, this doth so; ver. 29, 36, "His seed shall endure for ever," and with it his throne; now this will be differently understood according as we apply it to Christ or David.

these two verses to refer to the passage of Israel through the Red Sea, and the destruction of Pharaoh and his army.

lxxxix. 12. Tabor was in Galilee. The remarkable mountain now so called lies a few miles to the east of Nazareth. It is celebrated for its isolated character, its singular form, and the tradition that it was the scene of our Lord's transfiguration. Hermon lay considerably more to the north-east, towards Damascus.

lxxxix. 15. "The joyful sound" is no doubt a literal allusion to the blowing of trumpets, which was a feature of the joyful festivals of Israel. Those who recognise the hallowed summons shall realise the Divine approbation.

lxxxix. 17. "Our horn" is our dignity and honour.

lxxxix. 19. The word rendered "holy one" is in some copies plural. It literally means such as are truly devoted to God, and is not the usual word for holy. If the plural form is adopted, the reference may be to the Israelites, or to their prophets. But if the

1st. If we apply it to David, by his seed we are to understand his successors, Solomon and the following kings of Judah that descended from the loins of David. It is supposed that they might degenerate, and not walk in the spirit and steps of their father David; in such a case they must expect to come under Divine rebukes, such as the house of David was at this time under, ver. 38. But let this encourage them, that though they were corrected, they should not be abandoned or disinherited. This refers to that part of Nathan's message, 2 Sam. vii. 14, 15, "If he commit iniquity I will chasten him, but my mercy shall not depart from him." Thus far David's seed and throne did endure for ever; that notwithstanding the wickedness of many of his posterity, who were the scandals of his house, yet his family continued, and continued in the imperial dignity a very long time. That as long as Judah continued a kingdom, David's posterity were kings of it; and the royalty of that kingdom was never in any other family, as that of the ten tribes was in Jeroboam's first, then in Baasha's, &c. And that the family of David continued a family of distinction, till that Son of David came whose throne should endure for ever: see Lu. i. 27, 32; ii. 4, 11. If David's posterity in after times should forsake God and their duty, and revolt to the ways of sin, God would bring desolating judgments upon them, and ruin the family; and yet he would not take away his lovingkindness from David, nor break his covenant with him, for in the Messiah who should come out of his loins all these promises should have their accomplishment to the full. Thus, when the Jews were rejected, yet the apostle makes it out that God's covenant with Abraham was not broken, because it was fulfilled in his spiritual seed, the heirs of the righteousness of faith, Rom. xi. 7.

2nd. If we apply it to Christ, by his seed we are to understand his subjects; all believers, his spiritual seed, the children which God hath given him, Heb. ii. 13. This is that seed which shall be made to endure for ever, and his throne in the midst of them, in the church, in the heart, as the days of heaven. To the end Christ shall have a people in the world to serve and honour him, "he shall see his seed, he shall prolong his days." And this holy seed shall endure for ever in a glorified state, when time and days shall be no more. And thus Christ's throne and kingdom shall be perpetuated; the kingdom of his grace shall continue through all the ages of time, and the kingdom of his glory to the endless ages of eternity.

First. The continuance of Christ's kingdom is here made doubtful by the sins and afflictions of his subjects, their iniquities and calamities threaten the ruin of it. This case is here put that we may not be offended when it comes to be a case in fact, but that we may reconcile it with the stability of the covenant, and be assured of that notwithstanding. 1*st.* It is here supposed that there will be much amiss in the subjects of Christ's kingdom. It is possible his children may forsake God's law, ver. 30, by omissions, and break his statutes, ver. 31, by commissions. There are spots that are the spots of God's children, Deu. xxxii. 5. Many corruptions there are in the bowels of the church, as well as in the hearts of those that are the members of it, and these corruptions break out. 2*nd.* They are here told that they must smart for it, ver. 32. "I will visit their transgression with the rod," their transgression sooner than that of others; "you only have I known, and therefore I will punish you," Am. iii. 2. Their being related to Christ shall not excuse them from being called to an account. But observe what affliction is to God's people. (1.) It is but a rod, not an axe, not a sword; it is for correction, not for destruction. This notes gentleness in the affliction; it is the rod of men, such a rod as men use in correcting their children; and it notes a design of good in and by the affliction, such a rod as yields the peaceable fruit of righteousness. (2.) It is a rod in the hand of God. I will visit them; he that is wise and knows what he doth, gracious and will do what is best. (3.) It is a rod which they shall never feel the smart of but when there is great need. If they break my law, then I will visit their transgression with the rod, but not else. Then it is requisite that God's honour be vindicated, and that they be humbled and reduced.

Secondly. The continuance of Christ's kingdom is made certain, by the inviolable promise and oath of God, notwithstanding all this; ver. 33, "Nevertheless, my kindness will I not" totally and finally "take from him." Notwithstanding their provocations, yet my covenant shall not be broken. Note, Afflictions are not only consistent with covenant love, but to the people of God they flow from it. Though David's seed be chastened, it doth not follow that they are disinherited; they may be cast down, but they are not cast off. God's favour is continued to his people. 1*st.* For Christ's sake; in him the mercy is laid up for us, and God saith, I will not take it from him, ver. 33. I will not lie unto David, ver. 35; we are unworthy, but he is worthy. 2*nd.* For the covenant sake; "My faithfulness shall not fail, my covenant will I not break." It was supposed that they had broken God's statutes, profaned and polluted them, so the word signifies; but, saith God, I will not break, I will not profane and pollute my covenant,—it is the same word. That which is said and sworn is, that God will have a church in the world as long as sun and moon endure, ver. 36, 37. The sun and moon are faithful witnesses in heaven of the wisdom, power, and goodness of the Creator, and shall continue while time lasts, which they are the measures of; but the seed of Christ shall be established for ever, as lights of the world while the world stands, to shine in it, and, when it is at an end, they shall be established lights, shining in the firmament of the Father.

38 But thou hast cast off and abhorred,
Thou hast been wroth with thine anointed.
39 Thou hast made void the covenant of thy servant:
Thou hast profaned his crown by casting it to the ground.
40 Thou hast broken down all his hedges;
Thou hast brought his strong holds to ruin.
41 All that pass by the way spoil him:
He is a reproach to his neighbours.
42 Thou hast set up the right hand of his adversaries;
Thou hast made all his enemies to rejoice.
43 Thou hast also turned the edge of his sword,
And hast not made him to stand in the battle.
44 Thou hast made his glory to cease,
And cast his throne down to the ground.
45 The days of his youth hast thou shortened:
Thou hast covered him with shame. Selah.
46 How long, LORD? wilt thou hide thyself for ever?
Shall thy wrath burn like fire?
47 Remember how short my time is:
Wherefore hast thou made all men in vain?
48 What man is he that liveth, and shall not see death?
Shall he deliver his soul from the hand of the grave? Selah.
49 Lord, where are thy former lovingkindnesses,
Which thou swarest unto David in thy truth?
50 Remember, Lord, the reproach of thy servants;
How I do bear in my bosom the reproach of all the mighty people;
51 Wherewith thine enemies have reproached, O LORD;
Wherewith they have reproached the footsteps of thine anointed.
52 Blessed be the LORD for evermore. Amen, and Amen.

In these verses we have,

First. A very melancholy complaint of the present deplorable state of David's family, which the psalmist thinks hard to be reconciled to the covenant God made with David. Thou saidst thou wouldst not take away thy lovingkindness, "but thou hast cast off." Sometimes it is no easy thing to reconcile God's providences with his promises; and yet we are sure they are reconcilable, for God's works fulfil his word and never contradict it.

1. David's house seemed to have lost its interest in God, which was the greatest strength and beauty of it. God had been pleased with his anointed, but now he was wroth with him, ver. 38; had entered into covenant with the family, but now for aught he could perceive he had made void the covenant, not broken some of the articles of it, but cancelled it, ver. 39. We misconstrue the rebukes of providence if we think they make void the covenant. When the great Anointed One, Christ himself, was upon the cross, God seemed to have cast him off, and was wroth with him; and yet did not make void his covenant with him, for that was established for ever.

2. The honour of the house of David was lost and laid in the dust; "thou hast profaned his crown," which was always looked upon as sacred, "by casting it to the ground," to be trampled on; ver. 39, "Thou hast made his glory to cease," so uncertain is all earthly glory, and so soon doth it wither, and "thou hast cast his throne down to the ground," not only dethroned the king, but put a period to the kingdom, ver. 44. If it were penned in Rehoboam's time it was true, as to the greatest part of the kingdom, five parts of six; if in Zedekiah's time, it was more remarkably true of the poor remainder. Note, Thrones and crowns are tottering things, and are often laid in the dust; but there is a crown of glory, reserved for Christ's spiritual seed, which fadeth not away.

3. It was exposed and made a prey to all the neighbours, who insulted over that ancient and honourable family; ver. 40, "Thou hast broken down all his hedges," all those things that were a defence to them, and particularly that hedge of protection, which they thought God's covenant and promise had made about them, and thou "hast made even his strongholds a ruin," so that they were rather a reproach to them than any shelter. And then, ver. 41, "All that pass by the way spoil him," and make an easy prey of him: see Ps. lxxx. 12, 13. The enemies talk insolently; "he is a reproach to his neighbours," who triumph in his fall from so great a degree of honour. Nay, every one helps forward the calamity; ver. 42, "Thou hast set up the right hand of his adversaries," not only given them power, but inclined them to turn their power this way. If the enemies of the church lift up their hand against it, we must see God setting up their hand, for they could have no power unless it were given them from above. But when God doth permit them to do mischief to his church it pleaseth them; "thou hast made all his enemies to rejoice," and this for thy glory, that those who hate thee should have the pleasure to see the tears and troubles of those that love thee.

4. It was disabled to help itself; ver. 43, "Thou hast turned the edge of his sword," rebated it, and made it blunt, that it cannot do execution as it has done; and, which is worse, thou hast turned the edge of his spirit, and taken off his courage, and "hast not made him to stand" as he used to do "in the battle." The spirit of men is what the Father and former of spirits makes them; nor can we stand with any strength or resolution, farther than God is pleased to uphold us. If men's hearts fail them, it is God that dispirits them; but it is sad with the church when those cannot stand that should stand up for it.

5. It was upon the brink of an inglorious exit; ver. 45, "The days of his youth hast thou shortened," that is, it is ready to be cut off like a young man in the flower of his age. This should intimate that it was penned in Rehoboam's time, when the house of David was but in the days of its youth, and yet waxed old, and began to decay already. And thus it was covered with shame, and it was turned very much to its reproach, that a family which in the first and second reign looked so great, and made such a figure, should in the third dwindle and look so little as the house of David did in Rehoboam's time. But it may be applied to the captivity in Babylon, which in comparison with what was expected, were but the days of the youth of that kingdom. However, the kings then had remarkably the days of their youth shortened, for it was in the days of their youth, when they were about thirty years old, that Jehoiachin and Zedekiah were carried captives to Babylon.

From all this complaint let us learn, 1st. What work sin makes with families, noble royal families, with families in which religion has been uppermost; when posterity degenerates, it falls into disgrace, and iniquity stains their glory. 2nd. How apt we are to place the promised honour and happiness of the church in something external, and to think the promise fails, and the covenant made void, if we be disappointed of that; a mistake which we now are inexcusable if we fall into, since our Master hath so expressly told us that his kingdom is not of this world.

Secondly. A very pathetical expostulation with God upon this. Four things they plead with God for mercy:

1. The long continuance of the trouble; ver. 46, "How long, O Lord? wilt thou hide thyself for ever?" That which grieved them most was, that God hid himself as one displeased, did not appear to them by his prophets to comfort them, did not appear for them by his providences to deliver them, and that he had kept them long in the dark; it seemed an eternal night when God was withdrawn; thou hidest thyself for ever. Nay, God not only hid himself from them, but seemed to set himself against them; "shall thy wrath burn like fire," that is, how long shall it burn? shall it never be put out? What is hell, but the wrath of God burning for ever? And is that the lot of thine anointed?

singular form is preferred, as seems best, the allusion may be to David or Nathan.

lxxxix. 29. "As the days of heaven," i.e., very long enduring. So in Deut. xi. 21.

lxxxix. 38. Hereupon Rosenmüller remarks that many of the Jews wonder what prophet dared to speak to God as in this and the verses following. And Ebn Ezra observes that there was a wise and pious man in Spain who would neither read nor hear this psalm. Ebn Ezra himself denies that the words which follow are those of the Israelites, but says they are those of the enemies, who accuse God of falsehood and perfidy, and therefore afterwards we find the appeal of verses 50, 51. Kimchi, however, rightly notes that here and in similar passages, as Ex. xxxii. 13, Isa. lxiii. 17, 1 Kings xviii. 37, things which are spoken of God, and seem scarcely worthy of him, are said in accordance with the usage of speech, and are to be understood comparatively. After all the Divine promises, the throne

2. The shortness of life, and the certainty of death; Lord, let thine anger cease, and return in mercy to us; remembering how short my time is, and how sure the period of my time. Lord, since my life is so transitory, and will ere long be at an end, let it not be always so miserable as that I should rather choose no being at all, than such a being. Job pleads thus, ch. x. 20, 21; and, probably the psalmist here urgeth it in the name of the house of David, and the present prince of that house, the days of whose youth were shortened, ver. 45.

1st. He pleads the shortness and vanity of life; ver. 47, "Remember how short my time is;" 'how transitory I am,' say some; therefore unable to bear the power of thy wrath, and therefore a proper object of thy pity. "Wherefore hast thou made all men in vain?" Or, 'unto what vanity hast thou created all the sons of Adam?' Now this may be understood either, First. As speaking a great truth. If the ancient lovingkindnesses spoken of ver. 49, be forgotten, (those relating to another life,) man is indeed made in vain. Considering man as mortal, if there were not a future state on the other side of death, we might be ready to think man was made in vain, and was in vain endued with the noble powers and faculties of reason, and filled with such vast designs and desires; but God would not make man in vain; therefore, Lord, remember those lovingkindnesses. Or, Secondly. As speaking a strong temptation that the psalmist was in. It is certain God has not made all men, nor any man in vain, Isa. xlv. 18. For, 1*st*. If we think that God hath made men in vain, because so many have short lives, and long afflictions in this world; it is true that God has made them so, but it is not true that therefore they are made in vain. For those whose days are few and full of trouble, yet may glorify God, and do some good; may keep their communion with God, and get to heaven, and then they are not made in vain. 2*nd*. If we think that God has made men in vain because the most of men neither serve him, nor enjoy him, it is true that as to themselves they were made in vain; better for them they had not been born than not to be born again. But it was not long of God that they were made in vain, it was long of themselves, nor are they made in vain as to him; for he has "made all things for himself, even the wicked for the day of evil," and those whom he is not glorified by he will be glorified upon.

2nd. He pleads the universality and unavoidableness of death; ver. 48, "What man," (what strong man, so the word is,) "is he that liveth, and shall not see death?" The king himself, of the house of David, is not exempted from the sentence, from the stroke. Lord, since he is under a fatal necessity of dying, let not his whole life be made thus miserable. "Shall he deliver his soul from the hand of the grave?" No, he shall not when his time is come. Let him not, therefore, be delivered into the hand of the grave by the miseries of a dying life, till his time is come. We must learn here, that death is the end of all men; our eyes must shortly be closed to see death; there is no discharge from that war, nor will any bail be taken to save us from the prison of the grave. It concerns us, therefore, to make sure a happiness on the other side of death and the grave, that "when we fail, we may be received into everlasting habitations."

3. The next plea is taken from the kindness God had for, and the covenant he made with, his servant David; ver. 49, "Lord, where are thy former lovingkindnesses," which thou shewedst, nay, "which thou swarest to David in thy truth." Wilt thou fail of doing what thou hast promised? Wilt thou undo what thou hast done? Art not thou still the same? Why then may not we have the benefit of the former sure mercies of David? God's unchangeableness and faithfulness assure us that God will not cast off those whom he hath chosen and covenanted with.

4. The last plea is taken from the insolence of the enemies, and the indignity done to God's anointed: ver. 50, 51, "Remember, Lord, the reproach," and let it be rolled away from us, and returned upon our enemies. 1st. They were God's servants that were reproached, and the abuses done to them reflected upon their Master, especially since it was for serving him that they were reproached. 2nd. The reproach cast upon God's servants was a very grievous burthen to all that were concerned for the honour of God. "I bear in my bosom the reproach of all the mighty people," and am even overwhelmed with it; it is what I lay much to heart, and can scarce keep up my spirits under the weight of. 3rd. They are thine enemies who do thus reproach us, and wilt thou not appear against them as such? 4th. "They have reproached the footsteps of thine anointed." They reflected upon all the steps which the king had taken in the course of his administration, tracked him in all his motions, that they might make invidious remarks upon every thing he had said and done. Or, if we may apply it to Christ, the Lord's Messiah, they reproached the Jews with his footsteps, the slowness of his coming. 'They have reproached the delays of the Messiah,' so Dr. Hammond. They called him, "He that should come;" but because he was not yet come, because he did not now come to deliver them out of the hands of their enemies, when they had none to deliver them, they told them, He would never come, they must give over looking for him. The scoffers of the latter days do in like manner reproach the footsteps of the Messiah when they ask, "Where is the promise of his coming?" 2 Pet. iii. 3, 4. The reproaching of the footsteps of the Anointed, some refer to the serpent's bruising of the heel of the seed of the woman, or to the sufferings of Christ's followers, that tread in his footsteps, and are reproached for his name's sake.

Lastly. The psalm concludes with praise, even after this sad complaint; ver. 52, "Blessed be the Lord for evermore, Amen and Amen." Thus he confronts the reproaches of his enemies. The more others blaspheme God, the more we should bless him. Thus he corrects his own complaints, chiding himself for quarrelling with God's providences, and questioning his promises. Let both these sinful passions be silenced with the praises of God. However it be, yet God is good, and we will never think hardly of him; God is true, and we will never distrust him. Though the glory of David's house be stained and sullied, this shall be our comfort,—that God is blessed for ever, and his glory cannot be eclipsed. If we would have the comfort of the stability of God's promise, we must give him the praise of it; in blessing God we encourage ourselves. Here is a double Amen, according to the double signification. Amen,—'so it is,' God is blessed for ever; Amen,—'be it so,' let God be blessed for ever. He began the psalm with thanksgiving, before he made his complaint, ver. 1; and now he concludes it with a doxology. They that give God thanks for what he has done, may give him thanks also for what he will do. God will follow those with his mercies that in a right manner follow him with their praises.

PSALM XC.

The foregoing psalm was supposed to be penned as late as the captivity in Babylon; this, it is plain, was penned as early as the deliverance out of Egypt, and yet they are put close together in this collection of Divine songs. This psalm was penned by Moses, as appears by the title, the most ancient penman of Sacred Writ; we have upon record a praising song of his, Ex. xv., which is alluded to, Rev. xv. 3; and an instructing song of his, Deu. xxxii. But this is of a different nature from both, for it is called a prayer. It is supposed that this psalm was penned upon occasion of the sentence passed upon Israel in the wilderness for their unbelief, murmuring, and rebellion, that their carcases should fall in the wilderness, that they should be wasted away by a series of miseries for thirty-eight years together, and none of them that were then of age shou.d enter Canaan. This was calculated for their wanderings in the wilderness, as that other song of Moses, Deu. xxxi. 19, 21, was for their settlement in Canaan. We have the story to which this psalm seems to refer, Num. xiv. Probably Moses penned this prayer to be daily used, either by the people in their tents, or at least by the priests in the tabernacle service during that tedious fatigue of theirs in the wilderness. In it, I. Moses comforts himself and his people with the eternity of God, and their interest in him however, ver. 1, 2. II. He humbles himself and his people with the consideration of the frailty of man, ver. 3—6. III. He submits himself and his people to the righteous sentence of God passed upon them, ver. 7—11. IV. He commits himself and his people to God by prayer for Divine mercy and grace, and the return of God's favour, ver. 12—17. Though it seems to have been penned upon this particular occasion, yet it is very applicable to the frailty of human life in general; and in singing of it we may easily apply it to the years of our passage through the wilderness of this world, and it furnisheth us with meditations and prayers very suitable to the solemnity of a funeral.

A Prayer of Moses the man of God.

LORD, thou hast been our dwelling place in all generations.
2 Before the mountains were brought forth,
Or ever thou hadst formed the earth and the world,
Even from everlasting to everlasting, thou art God.
3 Thou turnest man to destruction;
And sayest, Return, ye children of men.
4 For a thousand years in thy sight
Are but as yesterday when it is past,
And as a watch in the night.
5 Thou carriest them away as with a flood;
They are as a sleep:
In the morning they are like grass which groweth up.
6 In the morning it flourisheth, and groweth up;
In the evening it is cut down, and withereth.

This psalm is entitled "a prayer of Moses." Where, and in what volume, it was preserved from Moses' time till the collection of psalms begun to be made is uncertain; but, being Divinely inspired, it was under a special protection. Perhaps it was written in the book of Jasher, or the book of the wars of the Lord. Moses taught the people of Israel to pray, and put words into their mouths which they might make use of in turning to the Lord. Moses is here called the man of God, because he was a prophet, the father of the prophets, and an eminent type of the great Prophet. In these verses we are taught,

First. To give God the praise of his care concerning his people at all times; and concerning us in our days; ver. 1, "Lord, thou hast been to us a habitation, or dwelling-place," a refuge or help, "in all generations." Now they were fallen under God's displeasure, and he threatened to abandon them, they plead his former kindness to their ancestors. Canaan was a land of pilgrimage to their fathers the patriarchs, who dwelt there in tabernacles; but then God was their habitation, and wherever they went they were at home, at rest in him. Egypt had been a land of bondage to them for many years; but even then God was their refuge, and in him that poor oppressed people lived, and were kept in being. Note, True believers are at home in God, and that is their comfort in reference to all the toils and tosses they meet with in this world. In Him we may repose and shelter ourselves as in our dwelling-place.

Secondly. To give God the glory of his eternity; ver. 2, "Before the mountains were brought forth, before he made the highest part of the dust of the world," as it is expressed, Pr. viii. 26, "before the earth fell in travail," or as we may read it, "before thou hadst formed the earth and the world;" that is, before the beginning of time thou hadst a being, even "from everlasting to everlasting thou art God." An eternal God, whose existence hath neither its commencement nor its period with time, nor is measured by the successions and revolutions of it, but who art the same yesterday, to day, and for ever, without beginning of days, or end of life, or change of time. Note, Against all the grievances that arise from our own mortality, and the mortality of our friends, we may take comfort from God's immortality; we are dying creatures, and all our comforts in the world are dying comforts. But God is an ever-living God; and they shall find him so that have him for theirs.

Thirdly. To own God's absolute sovereign dominion over man, and his irresistible incontestable power to dispose of him as he pleaseth; ver. 3, "Thou turnest man to destruction," with a word's speaking, when thou pleasest, to the destruction of the body, of the earthly house, "and thou sayest, Return, ye children of men." 1. When God is, by sickness or other afflictions, turning men to destruction, he doth thereby call men to return unto him, that is, to repent of their sins, and live a new life. This God speaketh once, yea twice, "Return unto me, from whom ye have revolted," Jer. iv. 1. 2. When God is threatening to turn men to destruction, to bring them to death, and they have received a sentence of death within themselves, sometimes he wonderfully recovers them, and saith, or as the old translation reads it, 'Again thou sayest, Return,' to life and health again. For God kills, and makes alive again, brings down to the grave, and brings up. 3. When God turns men to destruction, it is according to the general sentence passed upon all, which is this, "Return, ye children of men," one as well as another; Return to your first principles, let the body return to the earth as it was, ("Dust to dust," Gen. iii. 19,) and let "the soul return to God who gave it," Eccl. xii. 7. 4. Though God turns all men to destruction, yet he will again say, "Return, ye children of men," namely, at the general resurrection, when "though a man dies, yet he shall live again; and then shalt thou call, and I will answer," Job xiv. 14, 15; thou shalt bid me return, and I shall return. The body, the soul, shall both return, and unite again.

Fourthly. To acknowledge the infinite disproportion there is between God and men, ver. 4. The patriarchs, some of them, lived near a thousand years; Moses knew it very well, and had recorded it. But what is their long life to God's eternal life? "A thousand years" to us is a great deal, it is what we cannot expect to come near to, or if we could, it is what we could not retain the remembrance of. But it is "in thy sight as yesterday," as one day, as that which is freshest in mind; nay, it is but "as a watch of the night," which was but three hours. 1. A thousand years are nothing to God's eternity, they are less than a day, than an hour, to a thousand years. Betwixt a minute and a million of years there is some proportion; but betwixt time and eternity there is none. The long lives of the patriarchs were nothing to God, not so much as the life of a child, that is born and dies the same day, is to theirs. 2. All the events of a thousand years, whether past or to come, are as present to the Eternal and kingdom of Israel seemed abolished, and hence the pious boldness with which the psalmist utters his complaint.

lxxxix. 40. For "hedges" understand fences, especially stone walls. Throughout these verses the succession of kings is spoken of as an individual.

lxxxix. 45. "The days of his youth hast thou cut short" cannot apply to David. The ruin of the earthly kingdom seemed to the writer like the death of a man in his youth.

lxxxix. 48. "The hand of the grave," or of sheol, is its power or grasp, to which all are exposed.

lxxxix. 49—52. After what reads like a bold impeachment of the conduct of the Lord towards the Hebrew monarchy, the writer in the concluding strophe returns to the tone of his commencement. The hopeless and repining spirit is transformed into prayer and praise. By reading the lines of verses 50, 51 alternately, we get a clear view of the sense:—"Remember, Lord, the reproach of thy Mind as what was done yesterday, or the last hour, is to us, and more so. God will say at the great day, to those whom he has turned to destruction, Return, arise, ye dead. But it might be objected against the doctrine of the resurrection, that it is a long time since it was expected, and it is not yet come. Let that be no difficulty, for a thousand years in God's sight are but as one day. Nullum tempus occurrit regi,—'To the king all periods are alike.' To this purpose these words are quoted 2 Pet. iii. 8.

Fifthly. To see the frailty of men, and his vanity, even at his best estate, ver. 5, 6. Look upon all the children of men, and we shall see, 1. That their life is a dying life. "Thou carriest them away as with a flood;" that is, they are continually gliding down the stream of time into the ocean of eternity. The flood is continually flowing, and they are carried away with it. As soon as we are born we begin to die, and every day of our life carries us so much nearer death. Or, we are carried away violently and irresistibly as with a flood of waters, as with an inundation which sweeps away all before it. Or, as the old world was carried away with Noah's flood. Though God promised not so to drown the world again, yet death is a constant deluge. 2. That it is a dreaming life. Men are carried away as with a flood, and yet "they are as a sleep;" they consider not their own frailty, nor are aware how near they approach to an awful eternity. Like men asleep, they imagine great things to themselves, till death wakes them, and puts an end to the pleasing dream. Time passeth unobserved by us, as it doth with men asleep; and when it is over it is as nothing. 3. That it is a short and transient life, like that of the grass which grows up and flourisheth; in the morning looks green and pleasant, but in the evening the mowers cut it down, and it withers presently; changes its colour, and loses all its beauty. Death will change us shortly, perhaps suddenly; and it is a great change that death will make with us in a little time. Man, in his prime, doth but flourish as the grass, which is weak, and low, and tender, and exposed: and which, when the winter of old age comes, will wither of itself. But it may be mown down by disease or disaster, as the grass is in the midst of summer. "All flesh is as grass."

7 For we are consumed by thine anger,
And by thy wrath are we troubled.
8 Thou hast set our iniquities before thee,
Our secret sins in the light of thy countenance.
9 For all our days are passed away in thy wrath:
We spend our years as a tale that is told.
10 The days of our years are threescore years and ten;
And if by reason of strength they be fourscore years,
Yet is their strength labour and sorrow;
For it is soon cut off, and we fly away.
11 Who knoweth the power of thine anger?
Even according to thy fear, so is thy wrath.

Moses had, in the foregoing verses, lamented the frailty of human life in general; the children of men are as a sleep, and as the grass. But here he teacheth the people of Israel to confess before God that righteous sentence of death which they were under in a special manner, and which by their sins they had brought upon themselves. Their share in the common lot of mortality was not enough, but they are, and must live and die, under peculiar tokens of God's displeasure. Here they speak of themselves: We Israelites are consumed and troubled, and our days are passed away.

First. They are here taught to acknowledge the wrath of God to be the cause of all their miseries. We are consumed, we are troubled, and it is by thine anger, by thy wrath, ver. 7; "our days are passed away in thy wrath," ver. 9. The afflictions of the saints often come purely from God's love, as Job's; but the rebukes of sinners and of good men for their sins, must be seen coming from the anger of God, who takes notice of, and is much displeased with, the sins of Israel. We are too apt to look upon death as no more but a debt owing to nature; whereas it is not so; if the nature of man had continued in its primitive purity and rectitude, there had been no such debt owing to it: it is a debt to the justice of God, a debt to the law. Sin entered into the world, and death by sin. Are we consumed by decays of nature, the infirmities of age, or any chronical disease? We must ascribe it to God's anger. Are we troubled by any sudden, surprising stroke? That also is the fruit of God's wrath, which is thus revealed from heaven against the ungodliness and unrighteousness of men.

Secondly. They are taught to confess their sins, which had provoked the wrath of God against them; ver. 8, "Thou hast set our iniquities before thee," even "our secret sins." It was not without cause that God was angry with them; he had said, "Provoke me not, and I will do you no hurt;" but they had provoked him, and will own that in passing this severe sentence upon them he justly punished them. 1. For their open contempts of him, and the daring affronts they had given him. "Thou hast set our iniquities before thee." God had herein an eye to their unbelief and murmuring, their distrusting his power, and their despising the pleasant land. These he set before him, when he passed that sentence on them. These kindled the fire of God's wrath against them, and kept good things from them. 2. For their more close departures from him; "Thou hast set our secret sins," those that go no farther than the heart, and which are at the bottom of all the overt acts, thou hast set these "in the light of thy countenance;" that is, thou hast discovered these, and brought these also to the account, and made us to see them, who before overlooked them. Secret sins are known to God, and shall be reckoned for. Those that in heart return into Egypt, that set up idols in their heart, shall be dealt with as revolters or idolaters. See the folly of those that go about to cover their sins, for they cannot cover them.

Thirdly. They are taught to look upon themselves as dying and passing away, and not to think either of a long life, or of a pleasant one; for the decree gone forth against them was irreversible; ver. 9, "All our days are" like to be "passed away in thy wrath," that is, under the tokens of thy displeasure; and though we are not quite deprived of the residue of our years, yet we are likely to "spend them as a tale that is told." The thirty-eight years which after this they wore away in the wilderness, were not the subject of the sacred history, for little or nothing is recorded of that which happened to them from the second year to the fortieth after they came out of Egypt. Their time was perfectly trifled away, and was not worthy to be the subject of a history, but only of "a tale that is told;" for it was only to pass away time like telling stories, that they spent those years in the wilderness, all that while they were in the consuming, and another generation was in the raising. When they came out of Egypt "there was not one feeble person among their tribes," Ps. cv. 37; but now they were all feeble. Their joyful prospect of a prosperous glorious life in Canaan, was turned into the melancholy prospect of a tedious inglorious death in the wilderness, so that their whole life was now as impertinent a thing as ever any winter tale was. This is applicable to the state of every one of us in the wilderness of this world; "we spend our years," we bring them to an end each year, and all at last, "as a tale that is told." As the breath of our mouth in winter, (so some) which soon disappears. As a thought, (so some) than which nothing more quick; as a word which is soon spoken, and then vanisheth into air. Or, "as a tale that is told." The spending of our years is like the telling of a tale. A year when it is passed is like a tale when it is told. Some of our years are as a pleasant story, others as a tragical one; most mixed, but all short and transient; that which was long in the doing, may be told in a short time. Our years, when they are gone, can no more be recalled than the word that we have spoken can. The loss and waste of our time, which is our fault and folly, may be thus complained of. We should spend our years like the despatch of business, with care and industry; but, alas! we do spend them like the telling of a tale,—idly, and to little purpose,—mindlessly, and without regard. Every year passed "as a tale that is told;" but what was the number of them? As they were vain, so they were few; ver. 10, seventy or eighty at most, which may be understood either,

1. Of the lives of the Israelites in the wilderness. All those that were numbered when they came out of Egypt, above twenty years old, were to die within thirty-eight years; they numbered those only that were able to go forth to war, most of whom we may suppose were between twenty and forty, who therefore must all die before eighty years old, and many before sixty, and perhaps much sooner, which was far short of the years of the lives of their fathers; and those that lived to seventy or eighty, yet being under a sentence of consumption and a melancholy despair of ever seeing through this wilderness-state, their strength, their life, was nothing but labour and sorrow, which otherwise would have been made a new life by the joys of Canaan. See what work sin made. Or,

2. Of the lives of men in general, ever since the days of Moses. Before Moses, it was ordinary for men to live about one hundred years, or near one hundred and fifty; but since, seventy or eighty is the common stint, which few exceed and multitudes never come near. We reckon those to have lived to the age of man, and to have had as large a share of life as they had reason to expect, who live to be seventy years old; and how short a time is that compared with eternity! Moses was the first that committed Divine revelation to writing, which before had been transmitted by tradition. Now also both the world and the church were pretty well peopled; and therefore there were not now the same reasons for men's living long that there had been. If by reason of a strong constitution some reach to eighty years, yet their strength then is what they have little joy of, it doth but serve to prolong their misery, and make their death the more tedious, for even "their strength then is labour and sorrow," much more their weakness; for the years are come which they have no pleasure in. Or, it may be taken thus: 'Our years are seventy, and the years of some, by reason of strength are eighty, but the breadth of our years,' (for so the latter word signifies rather than strength,) the whole extent of them from infancy to old age, 'is but labour and sorrow.' In the sweat of our face we must eat bread, our whole life is toilsome and troublesome; and perhaps in the midst of the years we count upon "it is soon cut off, and we fly away," and do not live out half our days.

Fourthly. They are taught by all this to stand in awe of the wrath of God; ver. 11, "Who knows the power of thine anger?" 1. None can perfectly comprehend it. The psalmist speaks as one afraid of God's anger, and amazed at the greatness of the power of it; who knows how far the power of God's anger can reach, and how deep it can wound? The angels that sinned, know experimentally the power of God's anger; damned sinners in hell know it; but which of us can fully comprehend or describe it? 2. Few do seriously consider it as they ought. Who knows it so as to improve the knowledge of it? Those that make a mock at sin, and make light of Christ, surely do not know the power of God's anger. For "according to thy fear, so is thy wrath," that is, God's wrath is equal to the apprehensions which the most thoughtful serious people have of it. Let men have never so great a dread upon them of the wrath of God, it is not greater than there is cause for, and than the nature of the thing deserves. God has not in his word represented his wrath more terrible than really it is; nay, what is felt in the other world, is infinitely worse than what is feared in this world. "Who among us can dwell with that devouring fire?"

12 So teach us to number our days,
That we may apply our hearts unto wisdom.
13 Return, O LORD, how long?
And let it repent thee concerning thy servants.
14 O satisfy us early with thy mercy;
That we may rejoice and be glad all our days.
15 Make us glad according to the days wherein thou hast afflicted us,
And the years wherein we have seen evil.
16 Let thy work appear unto thy servants,
And thy glory unto their children.
17 And let the beauty of the LORD our God be upon us:
And establish thou the work of our hands upon us;
Yea, the work of our hands establish thou it.

These are the petitions of this prayer, grounded upon the foregoing meditations and acknowledgments. Is any afflicted? let him learn thus to pray. Four things they are here directed to pray for:

First. For a sanctified use of the sad dispensation they were now under. Being condemned to have our days shortened, "Lord, teach us to number our days," ver. 12; that is, Lord, give us grace duly to consider how few they are, and how little a while we have to live in this world. Note, 1. It is an excellent art rightly to number our days; so as not to be out in our calculation, as he was who counted upon many years to come, when that night his soul was required of him. We must live under a constant apprehension of the shortness and uncertainty of life, and the near approach of death and eternity. We must so number our days as to compare our work with them, and mind it accordingly with a double diligence, as those that have no time to trifle. 2. Those that would learn this Divine arithmetic must pray for Divine instruction, must go to God, and beg of him to teach them by his Spirit, to put them upon considering and to give them a good understanding. 3. We then number our days to good purpose, when thereby our hearts are inclined and engaged to true wis-servants, wherewith thine enemies have reproached, O Lord. I bear in my bosom all the reproach of many peoples, wherewith they have reproached the footsteps of thine anointed one."

xc. Title. Here begins what is called the fourth book of the psalms. The ascription of the psalm to Moses is remarkable, but appears in the Greek, Syriac, Chaldee, and Latin. If this ancient opinion is correct, the psalm may have been composed in the wilderness of Sinai, when the unbelief of the people cut them off from the promise of entering Canaan; or it may have been occasioned by one of the plagues which fell on rebellious Israel.

xc. 2. The more enlightened heathens attributed eternity to God. Thus, Cicero says, "God was never born, and is eternal."

xc. 4. A thousand years is no more to the Lord than a day, or a watch in the night, to man. God alone hath immortality, and is unchanged by the progress of time.

xc. 6. So Plautus: "I was like a short-lived plant; suddenly I dom, that is, to the practice of serious godliness. To be religious is to be wise; this is a thing to which it is necessary that we apply our hearts, and the matter requires and deserves a close application, to which frequent thoughts of the uncertainty of our continuance here, and the certainty of our removal hence, will very much contribute.

Secondly. For the turning away of God's anger from them. That though the decree was gone forth, and was passed revocation, there was no remedy but they must die in the wilderness, yet "Return, O Lord," be thou reconciled to us, "and let it repent thee concerning thy servants," ver. 13; send us tidings of peace to comfort us again after these heavy tidings. How long must we look upon ourselves as under thy wrath; and when shall we have some token given us of our restoration to thy favour? We are thy servants, thy people, Isa. lxiv. 9. When wilt thou change thy way towards us? In answer to this prayer, and upon their profession of repentance, (Num. xiv. 39, 40,) God in the next chapter proceeded with the laws concerning sacrifices, Num. xv. 1, &c., which was a token that it repented him concerning his servants, for if the Lord had been pleased to kill them, he would not have shewed them such things as these.

Thirdly. For comfort and joy in the returns of God's favour to them, ver. 14, 15. They pray for the mercy of God, for they pretend not to plead any merit of their own; "Have mercy upon us, O God," is a prayer we are all concerned to say Amen to. Let us pray for early mercy, the seasonable communications of Divine mercy. That God's tender mercies may speedily prevent us, early in the morning of our days, when we are young and flourishing, ver. 6. Let us pray for that true satisfaction and happiness, which is to be had only in the favour and mercy of God, Ps. iv. 6, 7. A gracious soul, if it may but be satisfied of God's lovingkindness, will be satisfied with it, abundantly satisfied; will take up with that, and will take up with nothing short of it. Two things are pleaded to enforce this petition for God's mercy: 1. That it would be a full fountain of future joys; "O satisfy us with thy mercy," not only that we may be easy and at rest within ourselves, which we can never be while we lie under thy wrath; but, "that we may rejoice and be glad," not only for a time upon the first indications of thy favour, but "all our days," though we are to spend them in the wilderness. Those that make God their chief joy, as their joy may be full, 1 Jno. i. 4—so it may be constant, even in this vale of tears. It is their own fault if they are not glad all their days, for his mercy will furnish them with joy in tribulation, and nothing can separate them from it. 2. That it would be a sufficient balance to their former griefs; "Make us glad according to the days wherein thou hast afflicted us." Let the days of our joy in thy favour be as many as the days of our pain for thy displeasure have been, and as pleasant as those have been gloomy. Lord, thou usest to set the one over against the other, Eccl. vii. 14; do so in our case. Let it suffice that we have drunk so long of the cup of trembling, now put into our hands the cup of salvation. God's people reckon the returns of God's lovingkindness a sufficient recompence for all their troubles.

Fourthly. For the progress of the work of God among them notwithstanding, ver. 16, 17. 1. That he would manifest himself in carrying it on. "Let thy work appear upon thy servants," let it appear that thou hast wrought upon us, to bring us home to thyself, and to fit us for thyself. God's servants cannot work for him unless he work upon them, and work in them both to will and to do; and then we may hope the operations of God's providence will be apparent for us, when the operations of his grace are apparent upon us. "Let thy work appear," and in it thy glory will appear to us, and those that shall come after us. In praying for God's grace, God's glory must be our end; and we must therein have an eye to our children as well as to ourselves, that they also may experience God's glory appearing upon them, so as to change them into the same image, from glory to glory. Perhaps in this prayer they distinguish between themselves and their children, for so God distinguished in his late message to them; Num. xiv. 31, "Your carcases shall fall in this wilderness, but your little ones will I bring into Canaan." Lord, say they, let thy work appear upon us to reform us and bring us to a better temper, and then let thy glory appear to our children, in performing the promise to them which we have forfeited the benefit of. 2. That he would countenance and strengthen them in carrying it on, in doing their part towards it. 1st. That he would smile upon them in it. "Let the beauty of the Lord our God be upon us," that is, let it appear that God favours us. Let us have God's ordinances kept up among us, and the tokens of God's presence with his ordinance; so some. We may apply this petition both to our sanctification, and to our consolation. Holiness is the beauty of the Lord our God, let that be upon us in all we say and do; let the grace of God in us make our faces to shine, and the light of our good works, (that is the comeliness God puts upon us, and those are comely indeed who are so beautified;) and then let Divine consolations put gladness into our hearts, and a lustre upon our countenances, and that also will be the beauty of the Lord upon us as our God. 2nd. That he would succeed them in it, "establish thou the work of our hands upon us." God's working upon us, (ver. 16,) doth not discharge us from using our utmost endeavours in serving him, and working out our salvation. But when we have done all, we must wait upon God for the success, and beg of him to prosper our handy works, to give us to compass that we aim at for his glory. We are so unworthy of Divine assistance, and yet so utterly insufficient to bring any thing to pass without it, that we have need to be earnest for it, and to repeat the request; "Yea, the work of our hands establish thou it," and in order to that establish us in it.

PSALM XCI.

Some of the ancients were of opinion that Moses was the penman, not only of the foregoing Psalm, which is expressly said to be his, but also of the eight that next follow it; but that cannot be, for Ps. xcv. is expressly said to be penned by David, and long after Moses, Heb. iv. 7. And it is probable this Psalm also was penned by David: it is a writ of protection for all true believers, not in the name of king David, or under his broad-seal: he needed it himself, especially if the psalm was penned, as some conjecture it was, at the time of the pestilence which was sent for his numbering the people; but in the name of the King of kings, and under the broad-seal of Heaven. Observe, 1. The psalmist's own resolution to take God for his keeper, ver. 2, from which he gives both direction and encouragement to others, ver. 9. II. The promises which are here made in God's name to all those that do so in sincerity: 1. They shall be taken under the peculiar care of Heaven, ver. 1, 4. 2. They shall be delivered from the malice of the powers of darkness, ver. 3, 5, 6, and that by a distinguishing preservation, ver. 7, 8. 3. They shall be the charge of the holy angels, ver. 10, 11. 4. They shall triumph over their enemies, ver. 13. 5. They shall be the special favourites of God himself, ver. 14—16. In singing this, we must shelter ourselves under, and then solace ourselves in, the Divine protection. Many think that to Christ, as Mediator, these promises do primarily belong, Isa. xlix. 2, not because to him the devil applied one of these promises, Mat. iv. 6, but because to him they are very applicable, and, coming through him, they are more sweet and sure to all believers.

HE that dwelleth in the secret place of the most High Shall abide under the shadow of the Almighty.

2 I will say of the LORD,
He is my refuge and my fortress:
My God; in him will I trust
3 Surely he shall deliver thee from the snare of the fowler,
And from the noisome pestilence.
4 He shall cover thee with his feathers, and under his wings shalt thou trust:
His truth shall be thy shield and buckler.
5 Thou shalt not be afraid for the terror by night;
Nor for the arrow that flieth by day;
6 Nor for the pestilence that walketh in darkness;
Nor for the destruction that wasteth at noonday.
7 A thousand shall fall at thy side, and ten thousand at thy [right hand;
But it shall not come nigh thee.
8 Only with thine eyes shalt thou behold
And see the reward of the wicked

In these verses we have,

First. A great truth laid down in general, that all those who live a life of communion with God are constantly safe under his protection, and may, therefore, preserve a holy serenity and security of mind at all times; ver. 1, "He that dwells," that sits down "in the secret place of the Most High, shall abide under the shadow of the Almighty;" that is, he that by faith chooseth God for his guardian, shall find all that in him which he needs or can desire. Note, 1. It is the character of a true believer that "he dwells in the secret place of the Most High," that is, he is at home in God, returns to God, and reposeth in him as his rest; he acquaints himself with inside religion, and makes heart-work of the service of God; worships him within the veil, and loves to be alone with God, to converse with him in solitude. 2. It is the privilege and comfort of those that do so, that they "abide under the shadow of the Almighty," that is, he shelters them and comes between them and every thing that would annoy them, whether storm or sunshine. They shall not only have an admittance, but a residence under God's protection; he will be their rest and refuge for ever.

Secondly. The psalmist's comfortable application of this to himself; ver. 2, "I will say of the Lord," whatever others say of him, "He is my refuge;" I choose him so, and confide in him. Others make idols their refuge, but I will say of Jehovah, the true and living God, he is my refuge; any other is a refuge of lies. And he is a refuge that will not fail me, for he is my fortress and stronghold. Idolaters called their idols Mahuzzim, their most stronghold, Dan. xi. 19, but therein they deceived themselves; those only secure themselves that make the Lord their God, their fortress. And, having no reason to question his sufficiency, fitly doth it follow, "In him will I trust." If Jehovah be our God, our refuge, and our fortress, what can we desire which we may not be sure to find in him? He is neither fickle, nor false, nor weak, nor mortal; he is God, and not man, and therefore there is no danger of being disappointed in him. We know whom we have trusted.

Thirdly. The great encouragement he gives to others to do likewise; not only from his own experience of the comfort of it (for in that it was possible there might be a fallacy,) but from the truth of God's promise, in which there neither is nor can be any deceit, ver. 3, &c., "Surely he shall deliver thee." Those who have themselves found the comfort of making God their refuge, cannot but desire that others may do so too. Now here it is promised,

1. That believers shall be kept from those mischiefs which they are in imminent danger of, and which would be fatal to them; ver. 3, "From the snare of the fowler," which is laid unseen, and catches the unwary prey on a sudden; "and from the noisome pestilence," which seizeth men unawares, and against which there is no guard. This promise protects, 1st. The natural life, and is often fulfilled in our preservation from those dangers which are very threatening and very near, and yet we ourselves are not apprehensive of them, no more than the bird is of "the snare of the fowler." We owe it, more than we are sensible, to the care of the Divine providence that we have been kept from infectious diseases, and out of the hands of the wicked and unreasonable. 2nd. The spiritual life, which is protected by Divine grace from the temptations of Satan, which are as the snares of the fowler, and from the contagion of sin, which is the noisome pestilence. He that has given grace to be the glory of the soul will create a defence upon all that glory.

2. That God himself will be their protector; they must needs be safe that have him for their keeper, and in a good bottom for whom he undertakes; ver. 4, "He shall cover thee," shall keep thee secret, Ps. xxxi. 20, and so keep thee safe, Ps. xxvii. 5. God protects believers, 1st. With the greatest tenderness and affection, which is intimated in that, "He shall cover thee with his feathers, under his wings," which alludes to the hen gathering her chickens under her wings, Mat. xxiii. 37. By natural instinct she not only protects them, but calls them under that protection, when she sees them in danger; not only keeps them safe, but cherisheth them and keeps them warm. To this the great God is pleased to compare his care of his people, which are helpless as the chickens, and easily made a prey of, but are invited to trust under the wings of the Divine promise and providence, which is the periphrasis of a proselyte to the true religion, that he is come to trust under the wings of the God of Israel, Ru. ii. 12. 2nd. With the greatest power and efficacy; wings and feathers, though spread with the greatest tenderness, yet are weak and easily broken through, and therefore it is added, "His truth shall be thy shield and buckler," a strong defence. God is as willing to guard his people as the hen is to guard the chickens, and as able as a man of war in armour.

3. That he will not only keep them from evil, but from the fear of evil, ver. 5, 6. Here is, 1st. Great danger supposed; the mention of it is enough to frighten us: night and day we lie exposed, and those that are disposed to be timorous will not think themselves safe either night or day. When we are retired into our chambers, our beds, and made all as safe as we can about us, yet there is terror by night, from thieves and robbers, winds and storms, besides those things that are the creatures of fancy and imagination, which are often most frightful of all; we read of fear in the night, Cant. iii. 8. There is also a pestilence that walketh in darkness, as that was which slew the firstborn of the Egyptians, and the army of the Assyrians; no locks or bars can shut out diseases, which we carry about with us in our own bodies the seeds of them. But sure, in the daytime, when we can look about us, we are not so much in danger. Yes, there is an arrow that flieth by day too, and yet flies unseen; there is a destruction that wasteth at high noon, when we are awake, and have all our sprang up, suddenly I was cut off." Analogous comparisons occur in Homer's "Iliad," books vi. and xxi.

xc. 9. So Seneca: "As a tale, such is life." The word "tale" may, however, here mean a meditation, and some explain it of a breath or a sigh. The Syriac is, "Our years come to an end like a spider's web."

xc. 10. Macrobius says, "When ten times seven or seven times ten years are numbered, this is believed by natural philosophers to be the limit of life, and by it the perfect term of human life is bounded; for if any one exceeds it, he devotes himself to the study of wisdom alone, and is exempt from all duty, and employs his whole energy in persuasion, being reverenced for his release from other obligations." So Herodotus makes Solon say to Crœsus, "I will suppose the term of life to extend to seventy years."

xc. 12. Seneca says, "All our life long we ought to learn to die;" and Apuleius, "Philosophy is meditation upon death."

friends about us; even then we cannot secure ourselves, nor can they secure us. It was in the daytime that that pestilence wasted which was sent to chastise David for numbering the people, on occasion of which some think this psalm was penned. But 2nd. Here is great security promised to believers in the midst of this danger; "Thou shalt not be afraid," that is, God, by his grace will keep thee from disquieting distrustful fear, that fear which hath torment, in the midst of the greatest dangers. Wisdom shall keep thee from being causelessly afraid, and faith shall keep thee from being inordinately afraid. Thou shalt not be afraid of the arrow, as knowing that though it may hit thee, it cannot hurt thee: if it take away the natural life, yet it shall be so far from doing any prejudice to the spiritual life, that it shall be its perfection. A believer needs not fear, and therefore should not fear, any arrow, because the point is off, the poison is out, "O death, where is thy sting?" and because it is under Divine direction, and will hit where God appoints, and not otherwise. Every bullet has its commission. Whatever is done, our heavenly Father's will is done, and we have no reason to be afraid of that.

4. That they shall be preserved in common calamities in a distinguishing way, ver. 6. When death rides in triumph, and diseases rage, so that thousands and ten thousands fall, fall by sickness, or fall by the sword in battle, fall at thy side, at thy right hand, and the sight of their fall is enough to frighten thee; and if they fall by the pestilence, their falling so near thee may be likely to infect thee; yet "it shall not come nigh thee," the death shall not, the fear of death shall not. Those that preserve their purity in times of general corruption, may trust God with their safety in times of general desolation. When multitudes die round about us, though thereby we must be awakened to prepare for our own death, yet we must not be afraid with any amazement, nor make ourselves subject to bondage, as many do all their lifetime through fear of death, Heb. ii. 15. The sprinkling of blood secured the firstborn of Israel, when thousands fell. Nay, it is promised to God's people that they shall have the satisfaction of seeing, not only God's promises fulfilled to them, but his threatenings fulfilled upon those that hate them; ver. 8, "Only with thine eyes shalt thou behold and see the just reward of the wicked," which perhaps refers to the destruction of the firstborn of Egypt by the pestilence, which was both the punishment of the oppressors and the enlargement of the oppressed; this Israel saw when they saw themselves unhurt, untouched. As it will aggravate the damnation of sinners, that with their eyes they shall behold and see the reward of the righteous, Lu. xiii. 28, so it will magnify the salvation of the saints, that with their eyes they shall behold and see the destruction of the wicked, Isa. lxvi. 24; Ps. lviii. 10.

9 Because thou hast made the LORD, which is my refuge,
Even the most High, thy habitation;
10 There shall no evil befall thee,
Neither shall any plague come nigh thy dwelling.
11 For he shall give his angels charge over thee,
To keep thee in all thy ways.
12 They shall bear thee up in their hands,
Lest thou dash thy foot against a stone.
13 Thou shalt tread upon the lion and adder:
The young lion and the dragon shalt thou trample under 14 Because he hath set his love upon me, [feet.
Therefore will I deliver him:
I will set him on high, because he hath known my name.
15 He shall call upon me, and I will answer him:
I will be with him in trouble;
I will deliver him, and honour him.
16 With long life will I satisfy him,
And shew him my salvation.

Here are more promises to the same purpose with those in the foregoing verses, and they are exceeding great and precious, and sure to all the seed.

First. The psalmist assures believers of Divine protection from his own experience, and that which he saith is the word of God, and what we may rely upon.

Observe, 1. The character of those that shall have the benefit and comfort of these promises, it is much the same with that, ver. 1. They are such as make the Most High their habitation, ver. 9, that are continually with God, and rest in him; that make his name both their temple and their strong tower; that dwell in love, and so dwell in God. It is our duty to be at home in God; to make our choice of him, and then to live our life in him as our habitation; to converse with him and delight in him, and depend upon him; and then it shall be our privilege to be at home in God; that is, we shall be welcome to him, as a man to his own habitation, without any let, hindrance, or molestation from the arrests of the law or the clamours of conscience; and then we shall be safe in him, shall be kept in perfect peace, Isa. xxvi. 3. To encourage us to make the Lord our habitation, and to hope for safety and satisfaction in him, the psalmist intimates the comfort he had had in doing so; he whom thou makest thy habitation is my refuge, and I have found him firm and faithful, and in him there is room enough and shelter enough both for thee and me. "In my Father's house there are many mansions," one needs not crowd another, much less crowd out another.

2. The promises that are sure to all those who have thus made the Most High their habitation.

1st. That, whatever happens to them, nothing shall hurt them; ver. 10, "There shall no evil befall thee." Though trouble and affliction befall thee, yet there shall be no real evil in it, for it shall come from the love of God, and shall be sanctified; it shall not come for thy hurt, but for thy good; and though for the present it be not joyous, but grievous, yet in the end it shall yield so well, that thou thyself shalt own no evil befell thee. It is not an evil, an only evil, but there is a mixture of good in it, and a product of good by it. Nay, not thy person only, but thy dwelling shall be taken under the Divine protection; there shall no plague come nigh that; nothing to do thee or thine any damage. Nihil accidere bono viro mali potest—'No evil can befall a good man.'—Senec. de Provid.

2nd. That the angels of light shall be serviceable to them, ver. 11, 12. This is a precious promise, and speaks a great deal both of honour and comfort to the saints; and it is never the worse for its being quoted and abused by the devil in tempting Christ, Mat. iv. 6. Observe, First The charge given to the angels concerning the saints. He who is the Lord of the angels, who gave them their being, and gives laws to them, whose they are, and whom they were made to serve, "He shall give his angels a charge over thee;" not only over the church in general, but over every particular believer. The angels keep the charge of the Lord their God, and this is the charge they receive from him. It notes the great care God takes of the saints, in that the angels themselves shall be charged with them and employed for them. The charge is, "To keep thee in all thy ways;" here is a limitation of the promise, they shall "keep thee in thy ways," that is, as long as thou keepest in the way of thy duty. They that go out of that way put themselves out of God's protection. This word the devil left out when he quoted it to enforce a temptation, knowing how much it made against him. But observe the extent of the promise; it is "to keep thee in all thy ways." Even where there is no apparent danger, yet we need it, and where there is the most imminent danger we shall have it. Wherever the saints go, the angels are charged with them, as the servants are with the children. Secondly. The care which the angels take of the saints pursuant to this charge; "They shall bear thee up in their hands," which notes both their great ability and their great affection; they are able to bear up the saints out of the reach of danger, and they do it with all the tenderness and affection wherewith the nurse carries the little child about in her arms. It speaks us helpless, and them helpful. They are descending in their ministrations, they "keep the feet of the saints," lest they dash them against a stone, lest they stumble and fall into sin and into trouble.

3rd. That the powers of darkness shall be triumphed over by them; ver. 13, "Thou shalt tread upon the lion and adder." The devil is called a roaring lion, the old serpent, the red dragon; so that to this promise the apostle seems to refer in that, Rom. xvi. 20, "The God of peace shall tread Satan under your feet." Christ has broken the serpent's head, spoiled our spiritual enemies, Col. ii. 15, and through him we are more than conquerors; for Christ calls us, as Joshua called the captains of Israel, to come and set their feet on the necks of these vanquished enemies. Some think this promise had its full accomplishment in Christ, and the miraculous power which he had over the whole creation, healing the sick, casting out devils, and particularly putting it into his disciples' commission, that they should take up serpents, Mar. xvi. 18. It may be applied to that care of the Divine providence by which we are preserved from ravenous, noxious creatures; "The wild beasts of the field shall be at peace with thee," Job v. 23; nay, and have ways and means of taming them, Jas. iii. 7.

Secondly. He brings in God himself speaking words of comfort to the saints, and declaring the mercy he hath in store for them, ver. 14—16. Some make this to be spoken to the angels, as the reason of the charge given them concerning the saints; that is to say, Take care of them, for they are dear to me, and I have a tender concern for them. And now, as before, we must observe,

1. To whom these promises do belong; they are described by three characters: 1st. They are such as know God's name; his nature we cannot fully know, but by his name he has made himself known, and with that we must acquaint ourselves. 2nd. They are such as have set their love upon him, and they who rightly know him will love him, will place their love upon him, as the only adequate object of it, will let out their love towards him with pleasure and enlargement, and will fix their love upon him with a resolution never to remove it to any rival. 3rd. They are such as call upon him, that by prayer keep up a constant correspondence with him, and in every difficult case refer themselves to him.

2. What the promises are which God makes to the saints.

1st. That he will in due time deliver them out of trouble; "I will deliver him," ver. 14; and again, ver. 15, noting a double deliverance, living and dying; a deliverance in trouble and a deliverance out of trouble. If God proportions the degree and continuance of our troubles to our strength; if he keeps us from offending him in our troubles, and makes our death our discharge at length from all our troubles, then this promise is fulfilled: see Ps. xxxiv. 19; 2 Tim. iii. 11; iv. 18.

2nd. That he will in the meantime "be with them in trouble," ver. 15. If he doth not presently put a period to their afflictions, yet they shall have his gracious presence with them in their troubles; he will take notice of their sorrows, and know their souls in adversity; will visit them graciously by his word and Spirit, and converse with them, will take their part, will support and comfort them, and sanctify their afflictions to them, which will be the surest token of his presence with them in their troubles.

3rd. That herein he will answer their prayers; "He shall call upon me," that is, I will pour upon him the spirit of prayer, "and then I will answer," answer by promises, Ps. lxxxv. 8; answer by providences bringing in seasonable relief; and answer by graces "strengthening them with strength in their souls," Ps. cxxxviii. 3; thus he answered Paul with grace sufficient, 2 Cor. xii. 9.

4th. That he will exalt and dignify them; "I will set him on high," out of the reach of trouble, above the stormy region, on a rock above the waves, Isa. xxxiii. 16. They shall be enabled, by the grace of God, to look down upon the things of this world with a holy contempt and indifference, and to look up to the things of the other world with a holy ambition and concern, and then they are set on high. "I will honour him," and those are truly honourable whom God puts honour upon, by taking them into covenant and communion with himself, and designing them for his kingdom and glory, Jno. xii. 26.

5th. That they shall have a sufficiency of life in this world; ver. 16, "With length of days will I satisfy him." That is, First. They shall live long enough; they shall be continued in this world till they have done the work they were sent into this world for, and are ready for heaven, and that is long enough. Who would wish to live a day longer than God has some work to do, either by him or upon him? Secondly. They shall think it long enough, for God by his grace shall wean them from the world, and make them willing to leave it. A man may die young, and yet die full of days; satur dierum—'satisfied with living.' A wicked worldly man is not satisfied, no, not with long life; he still cries, Give, give. But he that has his treasure and heart in another world has soon enough of this; he would not live always.

6th. That they shall have an eternal life in the other world. This crowns the blessedness; "I will shew him my salvation;" shew him the Messiah, so some. Good old Simeon was then satisfied with long life when he could say, "Mine eyes have seen thy salvation." Nor was there any greater joy to the Old Testament saints than to see Christ's day, though at a distance. Or, rather, the better country, that is, the heavenly, which the patriarchs desired and sought. He will shew him that, that is, bring him to that blessed state, the felicity of which consists so much in seeing that face to face which here we see through a glass darkly, and in the meantime give him a prospect of it. All these promises some think point primarily at Christ, and had their accomplishment in his resurrection and exaltation.

PSALM XCII.

It is a groundless opinion of some of the Jewish writers, who are usually free of their conjectures, that this Psalm was penned and sung by Adam in innocency, on the first sabbath. It is inconsistent with the Psalm itself, which speaks of the workers of xc. 16. "Let thy work appear," &c., must mean, "Let thy active interposition in our favour be manifest." The Greek and Latin have, "Look upon thy servants and upon thy works, and direct their children;" but this rendering cannot be justified.

xci. 1. The words translated "he that dwelleth in the secret place" may be explained, "he that dwells under the protection"—i.e., habitually places himself under the protection of the Most High—"will constantly enjoy his guardianship." The second clause may very literally be rendered, "shall spend the night under the shelter of the Almighty." From the grammatical changes of person in this psalm it has been reckoned by some critics as responsive. Verse 1 may announce the general subject of the psalm; verse 2 is the believing acceptance of the truth just before affirmed; verses 3—13 offer a series of gracious assurances; and the whole concludes with the words of promise from God himself.

xci. 6. The Greek and Latin versions are thus rendered by the

PSALM XCII.

Iniquity, when as yet sin had not entered. It is probable it was penned by David, and being calculated for the sabbath day, I. Praise, the business of the sabbath, is here recommended, ver. 1—3. II. God's works, which gave occasion for the sabbath, are here celebrated as great and unsearchable in general, ver. 4—6. In particular, with reference to the works both of providence and redemption, the Psalmist sings unto God both of mercy and judgment, the ruin of sinners and the joy of saints, three times counter-changed. 1. The wicked shall perish, ver. 7, but God is eternal, ver. 8. 2. God's enemies shall be cut off, but David shall be exalted, ver. 9, 10. 3. David's enemies shall be confounded, ver. 11, but all the righteous shall be fruitful and flourishing, ver. 12—15. In singing this psalm we must take pleasure in giving to God the glory due to his name, and triumph in his works.

A Psalm or Song for the sabbath day.

IT is a good thing to give thanks unto the LORD,
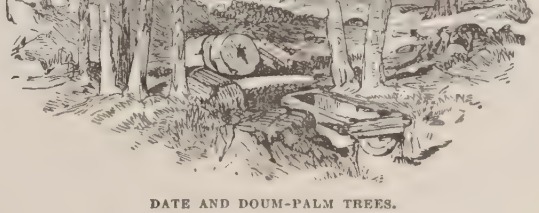
And to sing praises unto thy name, O most High:
2 To shew forth thy lovingkindness in the morning,
And thy faithfulness every night,
3 Upon an instrument of ten strings, and upon the psaltery;
Upon the harp with a solemn sound.
4 For thou, LORD, hast made me glad through thy work:
I will triumph in the works of thy hands
5 O LORD, how great are thy works!
And thy thoughts are very deep.
6 A brutish man knoweth not;
Neither doth a fool understand this.

This psalm was appointed, or at least accustomed, to be sung in the house of the sanctuary on the sabbath day, that day of rest, which was an instituted memorial of the work of creation, of God's rest from that work, and the continuance of it in his providence; for "the Father worketh hitherto." Note, 1. The sabbath day must be a day not only of holy rest, but of holy work, and the rest is in order to the work. 2. The proper work of the sabbath is praising God; every sabbath day must be a thanksgiving day, and the other services of the day must be in order to this, and therefore must by no means thrust this into a corner. One of the Jewish writers refers it to the kingdom of the Messiah, and calls it 'A psalm or song for the age to come, which shall be all sabbath.' Believers through Christ enjoy that sabbatism which remains for the people of God, Heb. iv. 9, the beginning of the everlasting sabbath. In these verses,

First. We are called upon and encouraged to praise God; ver. 1—3, "It is a good thing to give thanks unto the Lord." Praising God is good work; it is good in itself, and good for us. It is our duty,—the rent, the tribute, we are to pay to our great Lord; we are unjust if we withhold it. It is our privilege that we are admitted to praise God, and have hope to be accepted in it. It is good; for it is pleasant and profitable, work that is its own wages. It is the work of angels,—the work of heaven. It is good to give thanks for the mercies we have received, for that is the way of fetching in farther mercy. It is fit to sing to his name who is Most High, exalted above all blessing and praise. Now observe here,

1. How we must praise God. We must do it by shewing forth his lovingkindness and his faithfulness. Being convinced of his glorious attributes and perfections, we must shew them forth, as those that are greatly affected with them ourselves, and desire to affect others with them likewise. We must shew forth not only his greatness and majesty, his holiness and justice, which magnify him, and strike an awe upon us; but his lovingkindness and his faithfulness, for his goodness is his glory, Ex. xxxiii. 18, 19, and by these he proclaims his name. His mercy and truth are the great supports of our faith and hope, and the great encouragements of our love and obedience; these therefore we must shew forth as our pleas in prayer, and the matter of our joy. This was then done not only by singing, but by music joined with it; "upon an instrument of ten strings," ver. 3; but then it was to be "with a solemn sound," not with that which was gay and apt to dissipate the spirits, but that which was grave and apt to fix them.

2. When we must praise God. "In the morning, and every night;" not only on sabbath days, but every day; it is that which the duty of every day requires. We must praise God, not only in public assemblies, but in secret, and in our families; shewing forth to ourselves and those about us his lovingkindness and faithfulness. We must begin and end every day with praising God; must give him thanks every morning, when we are fresh, and before the business of the day comes in upon us, and every night, when we are again composed and retired and are recollecting ourselves. Give him thanks every morning for the mercies of the night, and every night for the mercies of the day. Going out and coming in we must bless God.



Secondly. We have an example set before us in the psalmist himself, both to move us to and to direct us in this work; ver. 4, "Thou, Lord, hast made me glad through thy work." Note, 1. Those can best recommend to others the duty of praise that have themselves experienced the pleasantness of it. God's works are to be praised, for they have many a time rejoiced my heart, and therefore, whatever others think of them, I must think well and speak well of them. 2. If God has given us the joy of his works, there is all the reason in the world we should give him the honour of them. Has he made our hearts glad? Let us then make his praises glorious. Has God made us glad through the works of his providence for us, and of his grace in us, and both through the great work of redemption?—

1. Let us then thence fetch encouragement for our faith and hope. So the psalmist doth; "I will triumph in the works of thy hands." From a joyful remembrance of what God has done for us we may raise a joyful prospect of what he will do, and triumph in the assurance of it,—triumph over all opposition, 2 Thes. ii. 14.

2. Let us thence fetch matter for holy adorings and admirings of God; ver. 5, "O Lord, how great are thy works!"—great beyond conception, beyond expression! The products of great power and wisdom, of great consequence and importance; men's works are nothing to them. We cannot comprehend the greatness of God's works, and therefore must reverently and awfully wonder at them, and even stand amazed at the magnificence of them. Men's works are little and trifling, for their thoughts are shallow; but, Lord, thy works are great, and such as cannot be measured; for "thy thoughts are very deep," and such as cannot be fathomed. God's counsels as much exceed the contrivances of our wisdom as his works do the efforts of our power; "His thoughts are above our thoughts, as his ways are above our ways," Isa. lv. 9; O the depth of God's designs! Rom. xi. 33. The greatness of God's works should lead us to consider the depth of his thoughts, that counsel of his own will according to which he doth all things,—what a compass his thoughts fetch, and to what a length they reach!

Thirdly. We are admonished not to neglect the works of God, by the character of those that do, ver. 6. They are fools,—they are brutish,—who do not know, who do not understand, how great God's works are; who will not acquaint themselves with them, or give him the glory of them; "they regard not the work of the Lord, nor consider the operation of his hands," Ps. xxviii. 5. Particularly they understand not the meaning of their own prosperity, which is spoken of ver. 7. They take it as a pledge of their happiness, whereas it is a preparative for their ruin. If there are so many who know not the designs of Providence, nor care to know them, those that through grace are acquainted with them, and love to be so, have the more reason to be thankful.

7 When the wicked spring as the grass,
And when all the workers of iniquity do flourish;
It is that they shall be destroyed for ever:
8 But thou, LORD, art most high for evermore
9 For, lo, thine enemies, O LORD,
For, lo, thine enemies shall perish;
All the workers of iniquity shall be scattered.
10 But my horn shalt thou exalt like the horn of an unicorn:
I shall be anointed with fresh oil.
11 Mine eye also shall see my desire on mine enemies,
And mine ears shall hear my desire of the wicked that rise up against me.
12 The righteous shall flourish like the palm tree.
He shall grow like a cedar in Lebanon

DATE AND DOUM-PALM TREES.

13 Those that be planted in the house of the LORD
Shall flourish in the courts of our God.
14 They shall still bring forth fruit in old age;
They shall be fat and flourishing;
15 To shew that the LORD is upright:
He is my rock, and there is no unrighteousness in him.

The psalmist had said, ver. 4, that from the works of God he would take occasion to triumph; and here he doth so.

First. He triumphs over God's enemies, ver. 7, 9, 11; triumphs in the foresight of their destruction; not as it would be the misery of his fellow-creatures, but as it would redound to the honour of God's justice and holiness. He is confident of the ruin of sinners,

1. Though they are flourishing, ver. 7. "When the wicked spring as the grass" in spring, so numerous, so thick-sown, so green, and growing so fast; "and all the workers of iniquity do flourish" in pomp, and power, and all the instances of outward prosperity, are easy and many, and succeed in their enterprises, one would think all this was in order to their being happy, that it was a certain evidence of God's favour, and an earnest of something as good or better in reserve; but it is quite otherwise; "It is that they shall be destroyed for ever." The very prosperity of fools shall slay them, Pr. i. 32. The sheep that are designed for the slaughter are put into the fattest pasture.

2. Though they are daring, ver. 9. They are thine enemies, and impudently avow themselves to be so. They are contrary to God, and they fight against God; they are in rebellion against his crown and dignity, and therefore it is easy to foresee that they shall perish; for "whoever hardened his heart against God and prospered?" Note, All the impenitent workers of iniquity shall be deemed and taken as God's enemies; and as such they shall perish and be scattered. Christ reckons those his enemies that will not have him to reign over them; and they shall be brought forth and slain before him. The workers of iniquity are now associated, and closely linked together, in a combination against God and religion; but they shall be scattered, and disabled to help one another against the just judgment of God. 'In the world to come they shall be separated from the congregation of the righteous,' so the Chaldee, Ps. i. 5.

Roman Catholic translators: "of the business that walketh about in the dark, of invasion, or of the noon-day devil." Our translation is as good as these are bad.

xci. 9. For "my refuge" it seems we should read "thy refuge," and translate the whole, "Because thou hast made the Lord thy refuge, the Most High thy habitation." We may, however, suggest another explanation of the actual Hebrew text, and favoured by the Chaldee and Syriac: "For thou, O Lord, art my refuge; thou hast set thy dwelling on high." But we on the whole prefer the former view.

xci. 13. For "dragon" put "serpent." The second clause is exactly parallel with the first in sense, save that two kinds of serpents are meant.

xcii. 3. "Upon the harp with a solemn sound" is a translation which some have objected to. The Hebrew is "upon higgaion with a harp;" but as the language is poetical, our version may be fairly

3. Though they had a particular malice against the psalmist, and upon that account he might be tempted to fear them, yet he triumphs over them; ver. 11, "Mine eyes shall see my desire on mine enemies that rise up against me," that is, 'shall see them not only disabled to do me any farther mischief, but reckoned with for the mischief they have done me, and brought either to repentance or ruin; and this was his desire concerning them. In the Hebrew it is no more but thus, 'Mine eye shall look on mine enemies, and mine ear shall hear of the wicked.' He doth not say what he shall see, or what he shall hear, but he shall see and hear that in which God will be glorified, and in which he will therefore be satisfied. This perhaps has reference to Christ, to his victory over Satan, death, and hell, the destruction of those that persecuted and crucified him, and opposed his Gospel, and to the final ruin of the impenitent at the last day. They that rise up against Christ will fall before him and be made his footstool.

Secondly. He triumphs in God, and his glory and grace.

1. In the glory of God; ver. 8, "But thou, O Lord, art most high for evermore." The workers of iniquity that fight against us, may be high for a time, and think to carry all before them with a high hand, but thou art high, most high for evermore. Their height will be humbled and brought down, but thine is everlasting. Let us not therefore fear the pride and power of evil men, nor be discouraged by their impotent menaces, for the moth shall eat them up as a garment, but God's righteousness shall be for ever, Isa. lvi. 7, 8.

2. In the grace of God, his favour and the fruits of it.

1st. To himself, ver. 20. Thou, O Lord, that art thyself most high, shalt exalt my horn. The great God is the fountain of honour, and he being high for evermore, himself will exalt his people for ever; for he "is the praise of all his saints," Ps. cxliii. 14. The wicked are forbidden to lift up the horn, Ps. lxxv. 4, 5, but those that serve God and the interests of his kingdom with their honour and power, and commit it to him to keep it, to raise it, to use it, and to dispose of it as he pleaseth, may hope that he will exalt their horn as the horn of a unicorn, to the greatest height, either in this world or the other; "My horn shalt thou exalt" when thine enemies perish; for then shall the righteous shine forth as the sun, when the wicked shall be doomed to shame and everlasting contempt. He adds, "I shall be anointed with fresh oil," which speaks a fresh confirmation in his office, to which he had been anointed, or abundance of plenty, so that he should have fresh oil as often as he pleased, or renewed comforts to revive him when his spirits drooped. Grace is the anointing of the Spirit, which, when it is given to help in the time of need, and is received, as there is occasion, from the fulness that is in Jesus Christ, we are then anointed with fresh oil. Some read it, 'when I grow old, thou shalt anoint me with fresh oil;' 'My old age shalt thou exalt with rich mercy,' so the Seventy. Compare ver. 14, "They shall bring forth fruit in old age." The comforts of God's Spirit, and the joys of his salvation, shall be a refreshing oil to the hoary heads that are found in the way of righteousness.

2nd. To all the saints. They are here represented as trees of righteousness, Isa. lxi. 3; Ps. i. 3. Observe,

First. The good place they are fixed in. They are "planted in the house of the Lord," ver. 13. The trees of righteousness do not grow of themselves; they are planted, not in common soil, but in Paradise, in the house of the Lord. Trees do not use to be planted in a house, but God's trees are said to be planted in his house, because it is from his grace, by his Word and Spirit, that they receive all the sap and virtue that keeps them alive, and makes them fruitful. They fix themselves to holy ordinances, take root in them, abide by them, put themselves under the Divine protection, and bring forth all their fruits to God's honour and glory.

Secondly. The good plight they shall be kept in. It is here promised, 1*st.* That they shall grow, ver. 11. Where God gives true grace he will give more grace. God's trees shall grow higher, like the cedars, the tall cedars, in Lebanon; they shall grow nearer heaven, and with a holy ambition shall aspire towards the upper world. They shall grow stronger, like the cedars, and fitter for use. "He that hath clean hands shall be stronger and stronger." 2*nd.* That they shall flourish, both in the credit of their profession, and in the comfort and joy of their own souls. They shall be cheerful themselves, and respected by all about them; "They shall flourish like the palm-tree," which has a stately body, Cant. vii. 7, large boughs, Lev. xxiii. 40; Jud. iv. 5. Dates, the fruit of it, are very pleasant, but it is especially alluded to here, as being evergreen. The wicked flourish as the grass, ver. 7, which is soon withered; the righteous as the palm-tree, which is long-lived, and which the winter doth not change. It has been said of the palm-tree, that 'the more it is pressed down, the more it grows,'—sub pondere crescit, so the righteous flourish under their burthens; "the more they are afflicted, the more they multiply." Being "planted in the house of the Lord," there their root is; "they flourish in the courts of our God," there their branches spread. Their "life is hid with Christ in God;" but their light also shines before men. It is very desirable that those that have a place should have a name in God's house, and within his walls, Isa. lvi. 5. Let good Christians aim to excel, that they may be eminent, and may flourish, and so may adorn the doctrine of God our Saviour, as flourishing trees adorn the courts of a house. And let those that flourish in God's courts give him the glory of it; it is by virtue of this promise, "They shall be fat and flourishing." Their flourishing without is from a fatness within, from the root and fatness of the good olive, Rom. xi. 17. Without a living principle of grace in the heart the profession will not be long flourishing, but where that is "the leaf also shall not wither," Ps. i. 3. "The trees of the Lord are full of sap," Ps. civ. 16: see Hos. xiv. 5, 6. 3*rd.* That they shall be fruitful. Were there nothing but leaves upon them, they would not be trees of any value; but "they shall bring forth fruit." The products of sanctification, all the instances of a lively devotion and a useful conversation, good works, by which God is glorified, and others edified, these are the fruits of righteousness, in which it is the privilege as well as the duty of the righteous to abound; and it is the matter of a promise as well as the matter of a command. It is promised they shall bring forth fruit in old age: other trees when they are old leave off bearing, but in God's trees the strength of grace doth not fail with the strength of nature. The last days of the saints are sometimes their best days, and their last work their best work. This indeed shews that they are upright; perseverance is the surest evidence of sincerity. But it is here said "to shew that the Lord is upright," ver. 15, that he is true to his promises, and faithful to every word that he hath spoken, and that he is constant to the work which he has begun. As it is by the promises that believers first partake of a Divine nature, so it is by the promises that that Divine nature is preserved and kept up, and therefore the power it exerts is an evidence that the Lord is upright, and so he will shew himself with an upright man, Ps. xviii. 25. This the psalmist triumphs in; "He is my rock, and there is no unrighteousness in him." I have chosen him for my rock on which to build, in the clefts of which to take shelter, on the top of which to set my feet; I have found him a rock, strong and stedfast, and his word as firm as a rock; I have found (and let every one speak as they find) that there is no unrighteousness in him. He is as able, and will be as kind, as his Word makes him to be. All that ever trusted in God found him faithful and all-sufficient; and none were ever made ashamed of their hope in him.

PSALM XCIII.

This short psalm sets forth the honour of the kingdom of God among men, to his glory, the terror of his enemies, and the comfort of all his loving subjects. And it relates both to the kingdom of his providence, by which he upholds and governs the world, and especially to the kingdom of his grace, by which he secures the church, sanctifies and preserves it. The administration of both these kingdoms is put into the hands of the Messiah, and to him doubtless the prophet here bears witness, and to his kingdom, speaking of it as present, because sure; and because, as the Eternal Word, even before his incarnation, he was Lord of all. Concerning God's kingdom glorious things are here spoken: I. Have other kings their royal robes? so has he, ver. 1. II. Have they their throne? so has he, ver. 2. III. Have they their enemies whom they subdue and triumph over? so has he, ver. 3, 4. IV. Is it their honour to be faithful and holy? so is it his, ver. 5. In singing this psalm we forget ourselves if we forget Christ, to whom the Father hath given all power both in heaven and in earth.

THE LORD reigneth, he is clothed with majesty;
The LORD is clothed with strength, wherewith he hath girded himself:
The world also is stablished, that it cannot be moved
2 Thy throne is established of old:
Thou art from everlasting.
3 The floods have lifted up, O LORD,
The floods have lifted up their voice;
The floods lift up their waves.
4 The LORD on high
Is mightier than the noise of many waters,
Yea, than the mighty waves of the sea.
5 Thy testimonies are very sure:
Holiness becometh thine house, O LORD, for ever.

Next to the being of God, there is nothing that we are more concerned to believe and consider than God's dominion; that Jehovah is God, and that this God reigns, ver. 1; not only that he is King of right, and is the owner and proprietor of all persons and things, but that he is King in fact, and doth direct and dispose of all the creatures and all their actions, according to the counsel of his own will. This is celebrated here, and in many other psalms; "The Lord reigns." It is the song of the gospel church, of the glorified church; Rev. xix. 6, "Hallelujah, the Lord God Omnipotent reigns." And here we are told how he reigns.

First. The Lord reigns gloriously; "He is clothed with majesty." The majesty of earthly princes, compared with God's terrible majesty, is but like the glimmerings of a glowworm, compared with the brightness of the sun when he goes forth in his strength. Are the enemies of God's kingdom great and formidable? yet let us not fear them, for God's majesty will eclipse theirs.

Secondly. He reigns powerfully. "He is" not only "clothed with majesty," as a prince in his court, but he "is clothed with strength," as a general in the camp. He has wherewithal to support his greatness, and to make it truly formidable. See him not only clad in robes, but clad in armour; both strength and honour are his clothing. He can do every thing, and with him nothing is impossible. 1. With this power "he hath girded himself." It is not derived from any other, nor doth the executing of it depend upon any other, but he has it of himself, and with it doth whatsoever he pleaseth. Let us not fear the power of man, which is borrowed and bounded, but fear him who has power to kill and cast into hell. 2. To this power it is owing that the world stands to this day; "The world also is established." It was so at first, by the creating power of God, when "he founded it upon the seas." It is so still, by that providence which upholds all things, and is a continued creation. It is so established, that though "he hath hanged the earth upon nothing," Job xxvi. 7, yet "it cannot be moved;" "All things continue to this day according to his ordinance." Note, The preserving of the powers of nature, and the course of nature, is what the God of nature must have the glory of; and we that have the benefit thereof daily are very careless and ungrateful, if we give him not the glory of it. Though God clothes himself with majesty, yet he condescends to take care of this lower world, and to settle the affairs of that. And if he established the world, much more will he establish his church, that it cannot be moved.

Thirdly. He reigns eternally; ver. 2, "Thy throne is established of old." 1. God's right to rule the world is founded in his making it. He that gave being to it, no doubt, may give law it, and so his title to the government is incontestable. "Thy throne is established;" it is a title without a flaw in it; and it is ancient,—it is established of old, from the beginning of time, before any other rule, principality, or power was erected, as it will continue when all other rule, principality, and power shall be put down, 1 Cor. xv. 24. The whole administration of his government was settled in his eternal counsels before all worlds; for he doth all according to the purpose which he purposed in himself. The chariots of providence came down from between the mountains of brass, from those decrees which are fixed as the everlasting mountains, Zec. vi. 1. "Thou art from everlasting," and therefore "thy throne is established of old;" because God himself was from everlasting, his throne, and all the determinations of it, were so too; for in an eternal mind there could not but be eternal thoughts.

Fourthly. He reigns triumphantly, ver. 3, 4. We have here, 1 A threatening storm supposed; "The floods have lifted up, O Lord," (to God himself the remonstrance is made,) "the floods have lifted up their voice," which speaks terror; nay, they have lifted up their waves, which speaks real danger. It alludes to a tempestuous sea, such as the wicked are compared to, Isa. lvii. 20. The heathen rage, Ps. ii. 1, and think to ruin the church,—to overwhelm it like a deluge, to sink it like a ship at sea. The church is said to be tossed with tempests, Isa. liv. 11, and the floods of ungodly men make the saints afraid, Ps. xviii. 4. We may apply it to the tumults that are sometimes in our own bosoms, through prevailing passions and frights, which put the soul into disorder, and are ready to overthrow its graces and comforts. But if the Lord reigns there, even the winds and seas shall obey him. 2. An immovable anchor cast in this storm; ver. 4, "The Lord himself is mightier." Let this keep our minds fixed, 1st. That God is on high, above them, which notes his safety, they cannot reach him, Ps. xxix. 10, and his sovereignty; they are ruled by him,—they are overruled, and wherein they rebel overcome, Ex. xviii. 11. 2nd. That he is mightier, doth more wondrous things than the noise of many waters. They cannot disturb his rest or rule; they cannot defeat his designs and purposes. Observe, The power of the church's enemies is but as the noise of many waters; there is more of sound than substance in it; Pharaoh king of Egypt accepted. Higgaion here seems to signify grave and serious music, and not a musical instrument, as has been suggested.

xcii. 10. The so-called "unicorn" was a species of wild ox or buffalo.

xcii. 11. This verse may be rendered in two ways: "Mine eye shall look upon mine enemies, upon those that rise up against me; mine ears shall hear the wicked;" or the words may be arranged as in our version, which removes the obscurity of the Hebrew.

xciii. 1. A more literal translation of this verse would be, "The Lord reigneth, he is clothed with majesty; the Lord is clothed, he is girded with strength. The world also shall be stable, it shall not be moved." The power of the Lord is seen in the stability of the world, which is his work.

xciii. 3. In each case the word rendered "floods" means rivers or streams of water. The figure is derived from the tumultuous and roaring rush of mountain torrents.

is but a noise, Jer. xlvi. 17. The church's friends are commonly worse frightened than hurt. God is mightier than this noise; he is mighty to preserve his people's interests from being ruined by these many waters, and his people's spirits from being terrified by the noise of them. He can, when he pleaseth, command peace to the church, Ps. lxv. 7,—peace in the soul, Isa. xxvi. 3. Note, The unlimited sovereignty and irresistible power of the great Jehovah is very encouraging to the people of God, in reference to all the noises and hurries they meet with in this world, Ps. xlvi. 1, 2.

Fifthly. He reigns in truth and holiness, ver. 5. 1. All his promises are inviolably faithful; "Thy testimonies are very sure." As God is able to protect his church, so he is true to his promises he has made of its safety and victory. His word is past, and all the saints may rely upon it. Whatever was foretold concerning the kingdom of the Messiah, would certainly have its accomplishment in due time. Those testimonies, upon which the faith and hope of the Old Testament saints was built, were very sure, and would not fail them. 2. All his people ought to be conscientiously pure; "Holiness becomes thy house, O Lord, for ever." God's church is his house; it is a holy house cleansed from sin, consecrated by God, and employed in his service. The holiness of it is its beauty; nothing better becomes the saints than conformity to God's image, and an entire devotedness to his honour; and it is its strength and safety. It is the holiness of God's house that secures it against the many waters, and their noise. Where there is purity there shall be peace. Fashions change, and that that is becoming at one time is not at another; but holiness always becomes God's house and family, and those that belong to it. It is perpetually decent; and nothing so ill becomes the worshippers of the holy God as unholiness.

PSALM XCIV.

This psalm was penned when the church of God was under hatches, oppressed and persecuted; and is an appeal to God, as the judge of heaven and earth, and an address to him, to appear for his people against his and their enemies. Two things this psalm speaks, I. Conviction and terror to the persecutors, ver. 1—11, shewing them their danger and folly, and arguing with them. II. Comfort and peace to the persecuted, ver. 12—23, assuring them, both from God's promise and from the psalmist's own experience, that their troubles would end well, and God would in due time appear to their joy and the confusion of those that set themselves against them. In singing this psalm we must look abroad upon the pride of oppressors with a holy indignation, and the tears of the oppressed with a holy compassion; but at the same time look upwards to the righteous Judge with an entire satisfaction, and look forward, to the end of all those things, with a pleasing hope.

O LORD God, to whom vengeance belongeth;
O God, to whom vengeance belongeth, shew thyself.
2 Lift up thyself, thou judge of the earth:
Render a reward to the proud.
3 LORD, how long shall the wicked,
How long shall the wicked triumph?
4 How long shall they utter and speak hard things?
And all the workers of iniquity boast themselves?
5 They break in pieces thy people, O LORD,
And afflict thine heritage.
6 They slay the widow and the stranger,
And murder the fatherless.
7 Yet they say, The LORD shall not see.
Neither shall the God of Jacob regard it.
8 Understand, ye brutish among the people:
And ye fools, when will ye be wise?
9 He that planted the ear, shall he not hear?
He that formed the eye, shall he not see?
10 He that chastiseth the heathen, shall not he correct?
He that teacheth man knowledge, shall not he know?
11 The LORD knoweth the thoughts of man,
That they are vanity.

In these verses we have,

First. A solemn appeal to God against the cruel oppressors of his people, ver. 1, 2. And this speaks terror enough to them, that they have the prayers of God's people against them, who cry day and night to him to avenge them of their adversaries; and shall he not avenge them speedily? Lu. xviii. 3, 7. Observe here,

1. The titles they give to God for the encouraging of their faith in this appeal; "O God, to whom vengeance belongeth," and "thou judge of the earth." We may with boldness appeal to him; for, 1st. He is judge, supreme judge,—judge alone,—from whom every man's judgment proceeds. He that gives law, gives sentence upon every man according to his works, by the rule of that law. He hath prepared his throne for judgment. He hath indeed appointed magistrates to be avengers under him, Rom. xiii. 4; but he is the avenger in chief, to whom even magistrates themselves are accountable. His throne is the last refuge (the dernier ressort, as the law speaks,) of oppressed innocency. He is universal judge, not of this city or country only, but judge of the earth, of the whole earth. None are exempt from his jurisdiction; nor can it be alleged against an appeal to him in any court, that it is coram non judice,—'before a person not judicially qualified.' 2nd. He is just. As he has authority to revenge wrong, so it is his nature, and property, and honour. And this also is implied in the title here given to him, and repeated with such an emphasis; "O God, to whom vengeance belongs," who will not suffer might always to prevail against right. This is a good reason why we must not avenge ourselves, because God hath said, "Vengeance is mine;" and it is daring presumption to usurp his prerogative, and step into his throne, Rom. xii. 19. Let this frighten those who do wrong, whether with a close hand, so as not to be discovered, or with a high hand, so as not to be controlled, There is a God to whom vengeance belongs, who will certainly call them to an account. And let it encourage those who suffer wrong to bear it with silence; committing themselves to him that judgeth righteously.

2. What it is they ask of God. 1st. That he would glorify himself, and get honour to his own name. Wicked persecutors thought God was withdrawn, and had forsaken the earth. Lord, say they, shew thyself; make them know that thou art, and that thou art ready to "shew thyself strong, on the behalf of those whose hearts are upright with thee." The enemies thought God was conquered, because his people were. Lord, say they, "Lift up thyself, be thou exalted in thy own strength;" lift up thyself to be seen, to be feared, and suffer not thy name to be trampled upon and run down. 2nd. That he would mortify the oppressors; "render a reward to the proud," that is, reckon with them for all their insolence, and the injuries they have done to thy people. These prayers are prophecies, which speak terror to all the sons of violence. The righteous God will deal with them according to their merits.

Secondly. An humble complaint to God of the pride and cruelty of the oppressors, and an expostulation with him concerning it, ver. 3—6. Where observe,

1. The character of the enemies they complain against. They are wicked, they are workers of iniquity; they are bad, very bad themselves, and therefore they hate and persecute those whose goodness shames and condemns them. Those are wicked indeed, and workers of the worst iniquity, lost to all honour and virtue, that are cruel to the innocent, and hate the righteous.

2. Their haughty, barbarous carriage which they complain of. 1st. They are insolent, and take a pleasure in magnifying themselves. They talk high, and talk big; they triumph; they speak loud things; they boast themselves, as if their tongues were their own, and their hands too, and they were accountable to none for what they say or do, and as if the day were their own, and they doubted not but to carry the cause against God and religion. They that speak highly of themselves, that triumph and boast, are apt to speak hardly of others, but there will come a day of reckoning for all their hard speeches which ungodly sinners have spoken against God, his truths, and ways, and people, Jude 15. 2nd. They are impious, and take a pleasure in running down God's people, because they are his; ver. 5, "They break in pieces thy people, O Lord;" break their assemblies, their estates, their families, their persons in pieces, and do all they can to afflict thine heritage, to grieve them, to crush them, to run them down, to root them out. God's people are his heritage. There are those that for his sake hate them and seek their ruin; and this is a very good plea with God in our intercessions for the church: Lord, it is thine, thou hast a property in it. It is thine heritage, thou hast a pleasure in it, and out of it the rent of thy glory in this world issues; and wilt thou suffer these wicked men to trample upon it thus? 3rd. They are inhuman, and take a pleasure in wronging those that are least able to help themselves, ver. 6. They not only oppress and impoverish, but "they slay the widow and the stranger;" not only neglect the fatherless, and make a prey of them, but murder them, because they are weak and exposed, and sometimes lie at their mercy. Those whom they should protect from injury, they are most injurious to; perhaps because God has taken them into his particular care. Who would think it possible that any of the children of men should be thus barbarous?

3. A modest pleading with God concerning the continuance of the persecution. Lord, how long shall they do thus? and again, how long? When shall this wickedness of the wicked come to an end?

Thirdly. A charge of atheism exhibited against the persecutors, and an expostulation with them upon that charge.

1. Their atheistical thoughts are here discovered; ver. 7, "Yet they say, The Lord shall not see." Though the cry of their wickedness is very great and loud, though they rebel against the light of nature, and the dictates of their own consciences, yet they have the confidence to say, "The Lord shall not see." He will not only wink at small faults, but shut his eyes at great ones too; or they think they have managed it so artfully, under colour of justice and religion, perhaps, that it will not be adjudged murder. The God of Jacob, though his people pretend to have such an interest in him, doth not regard it, either as against justice, or as against his own people. He will never call them to an account for it. Thus denying God's government of the world, bantering his covenant with his people, and setting the judgment to come at defiance.

2. They are here convicted of folly and absurdity. He that saith either that Jehovah, the living God, shall not see, or that the God of Jacob shall not regard the injuries done to his people, Nabal is his name, and folly is with him. And yet here he is fairly reasoned with, for his conviction and conversion, to prevent his confusion; ver. 8, "Understand, ye brutish among the people," and let reason guide you. Note, The atheistical, though they set up for wits, and philosophers, and politicians, yet are really the brutish among the people; and if they would but understand, they would believe. God by the prophet speaks as if he thought the time long till men would be men, and shew themselves so by understanding and considering. "Ye fools, when will ye be wise?" so wise as to know that God sees and regards all you say and do, and to speak and act accordingly, as those that must give account. Note, None are so bad but means are to be used for the reclaiming and reforming of them; none so brutish, so foolish, but it should be tried whether they may not yet be made wise. While there is life there is hope. To evidence the folly of those that question God's omniscience and justice, the psalmist argues, 1st. From the works of creation, ver. 9. The formation of human bodies, which, as it proves that there is a God, so it proves that God has infinitely and transcendently in himself all those perfections that are in any creature. "He that planted the ear," (and it is planted in the head, as a tree in the ground,) "shall he not hear?" No doubt he shall, more and better than we can. "He that formed the eye," (and how curiously it is formed above any part of the body anatomists know and let us know by their dissections,) "shall he not see?" Could he give, would he give, that perfection to a creature which he has not in himself? Note, First. The powers of nature are all derived from the God of nature: see Ex. iv. 11. Secondly. By the knowledge of ourselves we may be led a great way towards the knowledge of God; if by the knowledge of our own bodies, and the organs of sense, so as to conclude that if we can see and hear, much more can God, then certainly by the knowledge of our own souls, and their noble faculties. The gods of the heathen had eyes and saw not, ears and heard not; our God has no eyes or ears, as we have, and yet we must conclude he both sees and hears; because we have our sight and hearing from him, and are accountable to him how we use it.

2nd. He argues from the works of providence; ver. 10, "He that chastiseth the heathen" for their polytheism and idolatry, "shall not he" much more "correct" his own people for their atheism and profaneness? He that chastiseth the children of men for oppressing and wronging one another, shall not he correct those that profess to be his own children, and call themselves so, and yet persecute those that are really so? Shall not we be under his correction, under whose government the whole world is? Doth he regard as king of nations, and shall he not much more regard as the God of Jacob? Dr. Hammond gives another very probable sense of this. 'He that instructeth the nations,' that is, gives them his law, 'shall not he correct,' that is, shall not he judge them according to that law, and call them to an account for their violations of it? In vain was the law given, if there will not be a judgment upon it. And it is true that the same word signifies to chastise and instruct; because xciii. 4. We may translate more literally, "Than the sound of many mighty waters, than the waves of the sea, the Lord on high is mighty." The irresistible force of the torrent and of the sea is an emblem of power; but there is One who can exercise a power which is far greater, and before which they are of small account. His might can only be compared with his own fidelity to his gracious promises, as hinted in verse 5.

xciv. 1. The bold abruptness of the opening words is more striking in a literal version: "God of revenges, Lord God of revenges, appear!" The term "revenges" signifies judicial punishments, as, indeed, the next verse reminds us by introducing God as a judge.

xciv. 4. This verse may be translated as a direct statement: "They utter, they speak hard things; all the doers of iniquity boast." The sense is perhaps really this: "all the doers of iniquity utter and speak hard things, and glory therein." It would appear that the oppression and wrongs inflicted by "the doers of iniquity" were done chastisement is intended for instruction, and instruction should go along with chastisement.

3rd. He argues from the works of grace. "He that teacheth man knowledge, shall not he know?" He not only as the God of nature has given the light of reason, but as the God of grace has given the light of revelation, hath shewed man what is true wisdom and understanding; and he that doth this, shall he not know? Job xxviii. 23, 28. The flowing of the stream is a certain sign of the fulness of the fountain. If all knowledge is from God, no doubt all knowledge is in God. From this general doctrine of God's omniscience, he not only confutes the atheists, who said, "the Lord shall not see," ver. 7, he will not take cognizance of what we do; but awakens us all to consider that God will take cognizance even of what we think; ver. 11, "The Lord knows the thoughts of man, that they are vanity." First. He knows those thoughts in particular concerning God's conniving at the wickedness of the wicked, and knows them to be vain; and laughs at the folly of those who by such fond conceits buoy themselves up in sin. Secondly. He knows all the thoughts of the children of men, and knows them to be for the most part vain; that the imaginations of the thoughts of men's hearts are evil, only evil, and that continually. Even in good thoughts there is a fickleness and inconstancy which may well be called vanity. It concerns us to keep a strict guard upon our thoughts, because God takes particular notice of them. Thoughts are words to God, and vain thoughts are provocations.

12 Blessed is the man whom thou chastenest, O LORD,
And teachest him out of thy law;
13 That thou mayest give him rest from the days of adversity,
Until the pit be digged for the wicked.
14 For the LORD will not cast off his people,
Neither will he forsake his inheritance.
15 But judgment shall return unto righteousness:
And all the upright in heart shall follow it.
16 Who will rise up for me against the evildoers?
Or who will stand up for me against the workers of [iniquity?
17 Unless the LORD had been my help,
My soul had almost dwelt in silence
18 When I said, My foot slippeth;
Thy mercy, O LORD, held me up.
19 In the multitude of my thoughts within me
Thy comforts delight my soul.
20 Shall the throne of iniquity have fellowship with thee,
Which frameth mischief by a law? [righteous, 21 They gather themselves together against the soul of the
And condemn the innocent blood
22 But the LORD is my defence;
And my God is the rock of my refuge.
23 And he shall bring upon them their own iniquity,
And shall cut them off in their own wickedness;
Yea, the LORD our God shall cut them off.

The psalmist, having denounced tribulation to them that trouble God's people, here assures them that are troubled of rest: see 2 Thes. i. 6, 7. He speaks comfort to suffering saints from God's promises and his own experience.

First. From God's promises, which are such as not only save them from being miserable, but secure a happiness to them; ver. 12, "Blessed is the man whom thou chastenest." Here he looks above the instruments of trouble, and eyes the hand of God, which gives it another name, and puts quite another colour upon it. The enemies break in pieces God's people, ver. 5; they aim at no less; but the truth of the matter is, that God by them chastens his people, as the father the son in whom he delighteth, and the persecutors are only the rod he makes use of. "Howbeit they mean not so, neither doth their heart think so," Isa. x. 5—7. Now it is here promised,

1. That God's people shall get good by their sufferings. When he chastens them he will teach them, and blessed is the man who is thus taken under a Divine discipline; for none teacheth like God. Note, 1st. The afflictions of the saints are fatherly chastenings, designed for our instruction, reformation, and improvement. 2nd. When the teachings of the Word and Spirit go along with the rebukes of Providence, they then both speak men blessed, and help to make them so; for then they are marks of adoption and means of sanctification. When we are chastened, we must pray to be taught, and look into the law as the best expositor of providence. It is not the chastening itself that doth good, but the teaching that goes along with it, and is the exposition of it.

2. That they shall see through their sufferings; ver. 13, "That thou mayest give him rest from the days of adversity." Note, 1st. There is a rest remaining for the people of God after the days of their adversity, which, though they may be many and long, shall be numbered and finished in due time, and shall not last always. He that sends the trouble will send the rest, that he may comfort them according to the time that he hath afflicted them. 2nd. God therefore teacheth his people by their troubles that he may prepare them for deliverance, and so give them rest from their troubles; that being reformed, they might be relieved, and the affliction having done its work, it may be removed.

3. That they shall see the ruin of those that are the instruments of their sufferings, which is the matter of a promise, not as gratifying any passion of theirs, but as redounding to the glory of God; "until the pit is digged," or rather, while the pit is in digging "for the wicked," God is ordering peace for them at the same time that he is ordaining his arrows against the persecutors.

4. That though they may be cast down, yet certainly they shall not be cast off, ver. 14. Let God's suffering people assure themselves of this, that whatever their friends do, God will not cast them off, nor throw them out of his covenant or out of his care; neither will he forsake them, because they are his inheritance, which he will not quit his title to, nor suffer himself to be disseized of. St. Paul comforted himself with this, Rom. xi. 1.

5. That as bad as things are, they shall mend; and though they are now out of course, yet they shall return to their due and ancient channel; ver. 15, "Judgment shall return unto righteousness," that is, the seeming disorders of providence (for real ones there never were) shall be rectified. God's judgment, that is, his government, looks sometimes as if it were at a distance from righteousness, while the wicked prosper, and the best men meet with the worst usage; but it shall return to righteousness again, either in this world, or, at the farthest, in the judgment of the great day, which will set all to rights. And then 'all the upright in heart shall be after it,' that is, they shall follow it with their praises, and with an entire satisfaction; they shall return to a prosperous and flourishing condition, and shine forth out of obscurity. They shall accommodate themselves to the dispensations of Divine providence, and with suitable affections attend all its motions. "They shall walk after the Lord," Hos. xi. 10. Dr. Hammond thinks this was most eminently fulfilled in the destruction of Jerusalem first, and afterwards of heathen Rome, the crucifiers of Christ and persecutors of Christians, and the rest which the churches had thereby; "Then judgment returned even to righteousness," that is, to mercy and goodness, and favour to God's people, who then were as much countenanced as before they had been trampled on.

Secondly. From his own experiences and observations.

1. He and his friends had been oppressed by cruel and imperious men, that had power in their hands, and abused it, by abusing all good people with it. They were themselves evil-doers, and workers of iniquity, ver. 16; they abandoned themselves to all manner of impiety and immorality, and then their throne was a throne of iniquity, ver. 20. Their dignity served to put a reputation upon sin, and their authority was employed to support it, and to bring about their wicked designs. It is pity that ever a throne, which should be a terror to evil-doers and a protection and praise to them that do well, should be the seat and shelter of iniquity. That is a throne of iniquity which by the policy of its counsel frameth mischief, and by its sovereignty enacts it, and turns it into a law. Iniquity is daring enough, even when human laws are against it, which often prove too weak to give an effectual check to it; but how insolent, how mischievous, is it when it is backed by a law! Iniquity is not the better, but much the worse, for being enacted by law; nor will it excuse those that practise it, to say they did but do as they were bidden. These workers of iniquity, having framed mischief by a law, take care to see the law executed; for "they gather themselves together against the soul of the righteous," who dare not keep the statutes of Omri, nor the law of the house of Ahab; and they condemned the innocent blood for violating their decrees. See an instance in Daniel's enemies; they framed mischief by a law when they obtained an impious edict against prayer, Dan. vi. 7, which when Daniel would not obey, they assembled together against him, ver. 11, and condemned his innocent blood to the lions. The best of benefactors to mankind have often been thus treated, under colour of law and justice, as the worst of malefactors.

2. This oppression they were under bore very hard upon them, and oppressed their spirits too. Let not suffering saints despair, though when they are persecuted they find themselves perplexed and cast down. It was so with the psalmist here: His "soul had almost dwelt in silence," ver. 17; that is, he was at his wit's end, and knew not what to say or do; he was, in his own apprehension, at his life's end, ready to drop into the grave, that land of silence. St. Paul in a like case received a sentence of death within himself, 2 Cor. i. 8, 9. He said, "My foot slippeth," ver. 18, that is, I am going irretrievably, there is no remedy, I must fall, "I shall one day perish by the hand of Saul;" or, my hope fails me, I do not find such firm footing for my faith as I have sometimes found: see Ps. lxxiii. 2. He had a multitude of perplexed, entangled thoughts within him concerning the case he was in, and the construction to be made of it, and concerning the course he should take, and what was likely to be the issue of it.

3. In this distress they sought for help and succour, and some relief. 1st. They looked about for it, and were disappointed; ver. 16, "Who will rise up for me against the evil-doers?" Have I any friend that in love to me will appear for me? Hath justice any friend that in a pious indignation at unrighteousness will plead my injured cause? He looked, but there was none to save, there was none to uphold. Note, When on the side of the oppressors there is power, it is no marvel if the oppressed have no comforter, none that dare own them, or speak a good word for them, Eccl. iv. 1; when St. Paul was brought before Nero's throne of iniquity, no man stood by him, 2 Tim. iv. 16. 2nd. They looked up for it, ver. 20. They humbly expostulate with God; "Lord, shall the throne of iniquity have fellowship with thee?" Wilt thou countenance and support these tyrants in their wickedness? We know thou wilt not. A throne has fellowship with God when it is a throne of justice, and answers the end of the erecting of it; for by him kings reign, and when they reign for him, their judgments are his, and he owns them as his ministers, and whoever resist them, or rise up against them, shall receive to themselves damnation; but when it becomes a throne of iniquity, it has no longer fellowship with God. Far be it from the just and holy God that he should be the patron of unrighteousness, even in princes and those that sit in thrones; yea, though they be the thrones of the house of David.

4. They found succour and relief in God, and in him only. When other friends failed, in him they had a faithful and powerful friend; and it is recommended to all God's suffering saints to trust in him.

1st. God helps at a dead lift, ver. 17. When I had almost dwelt in silence, then the Lord was my help, kept me alive, kept me in heart; and unless I had made him my help, by putting my trust in him, and expecting relief from him, I could never have kept possession of my own soul; but living by faith in him has kept my head above water, has given me breath, and something to say.

2nd. God's goodness is the great support of sinking spirits; ver. 18, "When I said, My foot slippeth" into sin, into ruin, into despair, then "thy mercy, O Lord, held me up," and kept me from falling, and defeated the design of those who consulted to cast me down from mine excellency, Ps. lxii. 4. We are beholden not only to God's power, but to his pity, for spiritual supports. Thy mercy, the gifts of thy mercy, and my hope in thy mercy, held me up. God's right hand sustains his people, when they look on their right hand and on their left, and there is none to uphold. And we are then prepared for his gracious supports, when we are sensible of our own weakness and inability to stand by our own strength, and come to God to acknowledge it, and to tell him how our foot slippeth.

3rd. Divine consolations are the effectual relief of troubled spirits; ver. 19, "In the multitude of my thoughts within me," that are noisy like a multitude, crowding and jostling one another like a multitude, and very unruly and ungovernable; in the multitude of my sorrowful, solicitous, timorous thoughts, "thy comforts delight my soul;" and they are never more delightful than when they come in so seasonably to silence my unquiet thoughts, and keep my mind easy. The world's comforts give but little delight to the soul when it is hurried with melancholy thoughts; they are songs to a heavy heart. But God's comforts will reach the soul, and not the fancy only, and will bring with them that peace and pleasure which the smiles of the world cannot give, and which the frowns of the world cannot take away.

4th. God is and will be, as a righteous judge, the patron and protector of right, and the punisher and avenger of wrong. This the psalmist had both the assurance of, and the experience of.

by Israelites and not by the heathen, who are not mentioned in this psalm. The Septuagint ascribes the composition to David, as the Syriac also does, with a curious addition of no value: "concerning the congregation of Korah, Dathan, and Abiram."

xciv. 12, 13. These verses are thus paraphrased by Rosenmüller: "Blessed is he whom thou hast instructed; that taught by thee the knowledge of holy things, he may be able patiently to bear the miseries of a time of trouble, and learn to know that thy chastisements will not be continual, and expect or wait with a quiet and tranquil mind until deserved and determined punishment shall seize and remove the ungodly."

xciv. 15. The literal rendering of the second clause is, "and after it all the upright in heart," but it is uncertain whether "it" refers to "righteousness" or to the whole of the preceding clause; and it is doubtful whether the words "after it" refer to time or place. On the whole we understand the verse to mean that when just

First. He will right the injured, ver. 22. When none else will, or can, or dare shelter me, "the Lord is my defence," to preserve me from the evil of my troubles, from sinking under them, and being ruined by them; and he is "the rock of my refuge," in the clefts of which I may take shelter, and on the top of which I may set my feet, to be out of the reach of danger. God is his people's refuge, to whom they may flee, in whom they are safe, and may be secure. He is the rock of their refuge, so strong, so firm: impregnable, immovable as a rock. Natural fastnesses sometimes exceed artificial fortifications.

Secondly. He will reckon with the injurious; ver. 23, "He shall render to them their own iniquity;" that is, he shall deal with them according to their deserts; and that very mischief which they did and designed against God's people shall be brought upon themselves; and it follows, he "shall cut them off in their own wickedness." A man cannot be more miserable than his own wickedness will make him, if God visit it upon him; it will cut him in the remembrance of it; it will cut him off in the recompence of it. This the psalm concludes with the triumphant assurance of. "Yea, the Lord our God," who takes our part, and owns us for his, "shall cut them off" from any fellowship with him, and so shall make them completely miserable, and their pomp and power shall stand them in no stead.

PSALM XCV.

For the expounding of this psalm we may borrow a great deal of light from the apostle's discourse, Heb. iii. and iv., where it appears, both to have been penned by David, and to have been calculated for the days of the Messiah; for it is there said expressly, Heb. iv. 7, that the day here spoken of, ver. 7, is to be understood of the gospel day, in which God speaks to us by his Son, in a voice which we are concerned to hear, and proposeth to us a rest, beside that of Canaan. In singing of psalms it is intended, I. That we should make melody unto the Lord, and that we are here excited to do, and assisted in doing; being called upon to praise God, ver. 1, 2, as a great God, ver. 3—5, and as our gracious benefactor, ver. 6, 7. II. That we should teach and admonish ourselves and one another; and we are here taught and warned to hear God's voice, ver. 7, and not to harden our hearts, as the Israelites in the wilderness did, ver. 8, 9, lest we fall under God's wrath, and fall short of his rest, as they did, ver. 10, 11. This psalm must be sung with a holy reverence of God's majesty, and a dread of his justice, with a desire to please him, and a fear to offend him.

O COME, let us sing unto the LORD:
Let us make a joyful noise to the rock of our salvation.
2 Let us come before his presence with thanksgiving,
And make a joyful noise unto him with psalms
3 For the LORD is a great God,
And a great King above all gods.
4 In his hand are the deep places of the earth:
The strength of the hills is his also.
5 The sea is his, and he made it:
And his hands formed the dry land.
6 O come, let us worship and bow down:
Let us kneel before the LORD our maker
7 For he is our God; [his hand.
And we are the people of his pasture, and the sheep of

The psalmist here, as often elsewhere, stirs up himself and others to praise God; for it is a duty which ought to be performed with the most lively affections, and which we have great need to be excited to, being very often backward to it, and cold in it. Observe,

First. How God is to be praised. 1. With holy joy and delight in him. The praising song must be a joyful noise, ver. 1; and again, ver. 2. Spiritual joy is the heart and soul of thankful praise. It is the will of God (such is the condescension of his grace) that when we give glory to him, as a being infinitely perfect and blessed, we should, at the same time, rejoice in him as our Father and King, and a God in covenant with us. 2. With humble reverence and a holy awe of him; ver. 6, "let us worship, and bow down," and kneel before him, as becomes those who know what an infinite distance there is between us and God, how much we are in danger of his wrath, and in need of his mercy. Though bodily exercise alone profits little, yet certainly it is our duty to glorify God with our bodies, by the outward expressions of reverence, seriousness, and humility, in the duties of religious worship. 3. We must praise God with our voice; we must speak forth, sing forth, his praises out of the abundance of a heart filled with love, and joy, and thankfulness; "Sing to the Lord, make a noise, a joyful noise to him with psalms;" as those that are ourselves much affected with his greatness and goodness, are forward to own ourselves so, are desirous to be more and more affected therewith, and would willingly be instrumental to kindle and inflame the same pious and devout affection in others also. 4. We must praise God in concert, in the solemn assemblies; "Come, let us sing;" let us join in singing to the Lord; not others without me, nor I alone, but others with me. "Let us come" together "before his presence," in the courts of his house, where his people use to attend him, and to expect his manifestations of himself. Whenever we come into God's presence, we must come "with thanksgiving," that we are admitted to such a favour; and whenever we have thanks to give we must come before God's presence, set ourselves before him, and present ourselves to him in the ordinances which he hath appointed.

Secondly. Why God is to be praised, and what must be the matter of our praise: we do not want matter, it were well if we did not want a heart. We must praise God,

1. Because he is a great God and sovereign Lord of all; ver. 3, he is great, and therefore greatly to be praised. He is infinite and immense, and hath all perfection in himself. 1st. He has great power; "he is a great King above all gods," above all deputed deities, all magistrates, to whom he said, Ye are gods; (he manageth them all, and serves his own purposes by them, and to him they are all accountable:) above all counterfeit deities, all pretenders, all usurpers; he can do that which none of them can do; he can and will famish and vanquish them all. 2nd. He has great possessions. This lower world is here particularly instanced in; we reckon those great men that have large territories, which they call their own against all the world, which yet are a very inconsiderable part of the universe. How great then is that God, whose the whole earth is, and the fulness thereof; not only under whose feet it is, as he has an incontestable dominion over all the creatures, and a propriety in them, but in whose hand it is, as he has the actual directing and disposing of all, ver. 4; even "the deep places of the earth," which are out of our sight, subterraneous springs and mines, are in his hand; and "the height of the hills," which are out of our reach, whatever grows or feeds upon them, "is his also." This may be taken figuratively: the meanest of the children of men, that are as the low places of the earth, are not beneath his cognizance; and the greatest, that are as the strength of the hills, are not above his control. Whatever strength is in any creature it is derived from God, and employed for him, ver. 5. "The sea is his," and all that is in it; the waves fulfil his word; it is his, for "he made it," gathered its waters and fixed its shores. The dry land, though given to the children of men, is his too, for he still reserved the property to himself; it is his, for his hands formed it, when his word made the dry land appear. His being the Creator of all makes him without dispute the owner of all. This being a gospel psalm, we may very well suppose that it is the Lord Jesus whom we are here taught to praise. He is a great God; the mighty God is one of his titles, and God over all, blessed for evermore. As Mediator, he is a great King above all gods; by him kings reign; and angels, principalities, and powers are subject to him; by him, as the Eternal Word, all things were made, Jno. i. 3; and it was fit he should be the restorer and reconciler of all who was the creator of all, Col. i. 16, 20. To him all power is given both in heaven and in earth, and into his hand all things are delivered. It is he that sets one foot on the sea and the other on the earth, as sovereign Lord of both, Rev. x. 2; and therefore to him we must sing our songs of praise, and before him we must worship and bow down.

2. Because he is our God; not only has a dominion over us, as he has over all the creatures, but stands in special relation to us, ver. 7. He is our God; and therefore it is expected we should praise him. Who will if we do not? What else did he make us for, but that we should be to him for a name and a praise?

1st. He is our Creator, and the author of our being; we must "kneel before the Lord our Maker," ver. 6. Idolaters kneel before gods which they themselves made; we kneel before a God that made us and all the world, and who is therefore our rightful proprietor; for His we are, and not our own.

2nd. He is our Saviour, and the author of our blessedness. He is here called "the Rock of our salvation," ver. 1; not only the founder, but the very foundation of that work of wonder, on whom it is built. That Rock is Christ; to him therefore we must sing our songs of praises, "to Him that sits upon the throne, and to the Lamb."

3rd. We are therefore his, under all possible obligations; "we are the people of his pasture and the sheep of his hand." All the children of men are so; they are fed and led by his providence, which cares for them, and conducts them, as the Shepherd the sheep. We must therefore praise him, not only because he made us, but because he preserves and maintains us, and our breath and ways are in his hand. All the church's children are in a special manner so; Israel is "the people of his pasture, and the sheep of his hand," and therefore he demands their homage in a special manner. The gospel church is his flock, Christ is the great and good Shepherd of it; we as Christians are led by his hand into the green pastures, by him we are protected and well provided for: to his honour and service we are entirely devoted as a peculiar people, and therefore to him must be glory in the churches, whether it be in the world or no, throughout all ages, Eph. iii. 21.

To day if ye will hear his voice,
8 Harden not your heart, as in the provocation,
And as in the day of temptation in the wilderness:
9 When your fathers tempted me,
Proved me, and saw my work.
10 Forty years long was I grieved with this generation,
And said, It is a people that do err in their heart,
And they have not known my ways:
11 Unto whom I sware in my wrath
That they should not enter into my rest.

The latter part of this psalm, which begins in the middle of a verse, is an exhortation to those that sing gospel psalms to live gospel lives, and to hear the voice of God's word, or otherwise how can they expect that he should hear the voice of their prayers and praises? Observe,

First. The duty required of all those that are the people of Christ's pasture, and the sheep of his hand. He expects that they hear his voice, for he hath said, "My sheep hear my voice," Jno. x. 27. "We are his people," say they; are you so? then hear his voice. If you call him Master, or Lord, then do the things which he saith, and be his willing, obedient people. Hear the voice of his doctrine, his law, and in both of his Spirit; hear and heed; hear and yield. Hear his voice, and not the voice of a stranger. "If ye will hear his voice;" some take it as a wish, 'O, that ye would hear his voice!' that ye would be so wise, and do so well for yourselves; as, "if thou hadst known," Lu. xix. 41, that is, O, that thou hadst known! Christ's voice must be heard to-day; this the apostle lays much stress upon, applying it to the gospel day. While he is speaking to you see that you attend to him, for this day of your opportunities will not last always, improve it therefore while it is called to-day, Heb. iii. 13, 15. Hearing the voice of Christ is the same with believing. To-day, if by faith you accept the gospel offer, well and good, but to-morrow it may be too late. In a matter of such vast importance nothing more dangerous than delay.

Secondly. The sin they are warned against, as inconsistent with the believing, obedient ear required, and that is hardness of heart. "If ye will hear his voice," and profit by what you hear, then do not harden your hearts; for the seed sown on the rock never brought any fruit to perfection. The Jews therefore believed not the Gospel of Christ, because their hearts were hardened; they were not convinced of the evil of sin, and of their danger by reason of sin, and therefore they regarded not the offer of salvation. They would not bend to the yoke of Christ, nor yield to his demands. And if the sinner's heart be hardened, it is his own act and deed, he hardened it himself, and he alone shall bear the blame for ever.

Thirdly. The example they are warned by; which is that of the Israelites in the wilderness. Take heed of sinning as they did, lest you be shut out of the everlasting rest, as they were out of Canaan: "Be not as your fathers, a stubborn and rebellious generation," Ps. lxxviii. 8. Thus here, "Harden not your heart, as" you did, that is your ancestors, "in the provocation," or in Meribah, the place where they quarrelled with God and Moses, Ex. xvii. 2—7, "and in the day of temptation in the wilderness," ver. 8. So often did they provoke God by their distrusts and murmurings, that the whole time of their continuance in the wilderness might be called a day of temptation, or Massah, the other name given to that place, Ex. xvii. 7, because they tempted the Lord, judgment has been executed, good men will return to their prosperity and peace.

xciv. 20. The throne or seat of iniquity frames mischief against law and right.

xciv. 23. The Lord will remove the wicked by means of their own wickedness, not merely in it.

xcv. 1. The Syriac, Greek, and Latin have a title to this psalm, ascribing it to David, to whom also it seems to be attributed in Heb. iv. 7. For the words "rock of our salvation," the Greek and Latin have "God our Saviour," and the Syriac has "our God the Saviour," or Redeemer.

xcv. 4. "In his hand," i.e., in his power, "are the deep places of the earth." The Greek version here has, "for the Lord will not put away his people, for in his hand are the bounds of the earth, and the heights of the hills are his." The interpolated words, "for the Lord will not put away his people," are not in all Greek copies, but they saying 'Is the Lord among us, or is he not?" This was in the wilderness, where they could not help themselves, but lay at God's mercy; and where God wonderfully helped them, and gave them such sensible proofs of his power and tokens of his favour as never any people had before or since. Note, 1. Days of temptation are days of provocation. Nothing is more offensive to God than disbelief of his promise, and despair of the performance of it because of some difficulties that seem to lie in the way. 2. The more experience we have had of the power and goodness of God, the greater is our sin if we distrust him. What, to tempt him in the wilderness, where we live upon him! This is as ungrateful as it is absurd and unreasonable. 3. Hardness of heart is at the bottom of all our distrusts of God, and quarrels with him. That is a hard heart which receives not the impressions of Divine discoveries, and conforms not to the intentions of the Divine will, which will not melt, which will not bend. 4. The sins of others ought to be warnings to us not to tread in their steps. The murmurings of Israel were written for our admonition, 1 Cor. x. 11. Now here observe,

1st. The charge drawn up in God's name against the unbelieving Israelites, ver. 9, 10. God here, many ages after, complains of their ill carriage towards him, with the expressions of a high resentment. First. Their sin was unbelief. They tempted God, and proved him; that is, they questioned whether they might take his word, and insisted upon farther security, before they would go forward to Canaan, by sending spies; and when those discouraged them, they protested against the sufficiency of the Divine power and promise, and would make a captain, and return into Egypt, Num. xiv. 3, 4. This is called rebellion, Deu. i. 26, 32. Secondly. The aggravation of this sin was, that they saw God's work; they saw what he had done for them in bringing them out of Egypt; nay, what he was now doing for them every day, this day, in the bread he rained from heaven for them, and the water out of the rock that followed them, than which they could not have more unquestionable evidences of God's presence with them. With them even seeing was not believing, because they hardened their hearts, though they had seen what Pharaoh got by hardening his heart. Thirdly. The causes of their sin. See what God imputed it to: "It is a people that do err in their hearts, and they have not known my ways." Men's unbelief and distrust of God, their murmurings and quarrels with him, are the effect of their ignorance and mistake. 1*st.* Of their ignorance; "they have not known my ways." They saw his work, ver. 9, and he made known his acts to them, Ps. ciii. 7, and yet they did not know his ways, the ways of his providence, in which he walked towards them, or the ways of his commandments, in which he would have them to walk towards him. They did not know, that is, they did not rightly understand, and therefore did not approve of these. Note, The reason why people slight and forsake the ways of God is because they do not know them. 2*nd.* Of their mistake; "they do err in their heart;" they wander out of the way, in heart they turn back. Note, Sins are errors, practical errors, errors in heart; such there are, and as fatal as errors in the head. When the corrupt affections pervert the judgment, and so lead the soul out of the ways of duty and obedience, there is an error of the heart. Fourthly. God's resentment of their sin. "Forty years long was I grieved with this generation." Note, The sins of God's professing people do not only anger him, but grieve him, especially their distrust of him; and God keeps an account how often (Num. xiv. 22) and how long they grieve him. See the patience of God towards provoking sinners. He was grieved with them forty years, and yet those years ended in a triumphant entrance into Canaan, made by the next generation. If our sins have grieved God, surely they should grieve us, and nothing in sin should grieve us so much as that.

2nd. The sentence passed upon them for their sin; ver. 11, "Unto whom I sware in my wrath, If they shall enter into my rest," then say I am changeable and untrue; see the sentence at large, Num. xiv, 21, &c. Observe, First. Whence this sentence came—from the wrath of God. He swore solemnly in his wrath, his just and holy wrath; but let not men therefore swear profanely in their wrath, their sinful brutish wrath. God is not subject to such passions as we are; but he is said to be angry, very angry at sin and sinners, to shew the malignity of sin, and the justice of God's government. That is certainly an evil thing which deserves such a recompence of revenge as may be expected from a provoked deity. Secondly. What it was; "that they should not enter into his rest," the rest which he had prepared and designed for them; a settlement for them and theirs. That none of them, who were enrolled when they came out of Egypt, should be found written in the roll of the living at their entering into Canaan, but Caleb and Joshua. Thirdly. How it was ratified; I swore it. It was not only a purpose, but a decree. The oath shewed the immutability of his counsel, "The Lord sware, and will not repent;" and it cut off the thought of any reserve of mercy; God's threatenings are as sure as his promises.

Now this case of Israel may be applied to those of their posterity that lived in David's time, when this psalm was penned. Let them hear God's voice, and not harden their hearts as their fathers did, lest, if they were stiffnecked like them, God should be provoked to forbid them the privileges of his temple at Jerusalem, of which he had said, "This is my rest." But it must be applied to us Christians, because so the apostle applies it. There is a spiritual and eternal rest set before us, and promised to us, of which Canaan was a type. We are all (in profession at least) bound for this rest, yet many that seem to be so come short, and shall never enter into it. And what is it that puts a bar in their door? It is sin, it is unbelief; that sin against the remedy, against our appeal. They that, like Israel, distrust God, and his power and goodness, and prefer the garlick and onions of Egypt before the milk and honey of Canaan, will justly be shut out from his rest; so shall their doom be, themselves have decided it. "Let us therefore fear," Heb. iv. 1.

PSALM XCVI.

This psalm is part of that psalm which was delivered into the hand of Asaph and his brethren, 1 Chr. xvi. 7, by which it appears both that David was the penman of it, and that it has reference to the bringing up of the ark to the city of David; whether that long psalm was made first, and this afterwards taken out of it, or this made first, and afterwards borrowed to make up that, is not certain: but this is certain, that though it was sung at the translation of the ark, it looks farther to the kingdom of Christ, and is designed to celebrate the glories of that kingdom; especially the accession of the Gentiles to it. Here is, I. A call given to all people to praise God, to worship him, and give glory to him, as a great and glorious God, ver. 1—9. II. Notice given to all people of God's universal government and judgment, which ought to be the matter of universal joy, ver. 10—13. In singing this psalm we ought to have our hearts filled with great and high thoughts of the glory of God, and the grace of the Gospel, and with an entire satisfaction in Christ's sovereign dominion, and in the expectation of the judgment to come.

O SING unto the LORD a new song:
Sing unto the LORD, all the earth.
2 Sing unto the LORD, bless his name;
Shew forth his salvation from day to day.
3 Declare his glory among the heathen,
His wonders among all people.
4 For the LORD is great, and greatly to be praised:
He is to be feared above all gods.
5 For all the gods of the nations are idols:
But the LORD made the heavens.
6 Honour and majesty are before him:
Strength and beauty are in his sanctuary.
7 Give unto the LORD, O ye kindreds of the people,
Give unto the LORD glory and strength.
8 Give unto the LORD the glory due unto his name:
Bring an offering, and come into his courts.
9 O worship the LORD in the beauty of holiness:
Fear before him, all the earth.

These verses will be best expounded by pious and devout affections, working in our souls towards God, with a high veneration for his majesty and transcendent excellency. The call here given us to praise God is very lively, the expressions raised and repeated, to all which the echo of a thankful heart should make agreeable returns. We are here required to honour God,

First. With songs, ver. 1, 2. Three times we are here called to "sing unto the Lord." Sing to the Father, to the Son, to the Holy Ghost, as it was in the beginning, when the morning stars sung together, is now, in the church militant, and ever shall be in the church triumphant. We have reason to do it often, and we have need to be often minded of it, and stirred up to it. "Sing unto the Lord," that is, "Bless his name," speak well of him, that you may bring others to think well of him. 1. Sing a new song; that is, an excellent song, the product of new affections, clothed with new expressions. We speak of nothing more despicable than an old song, but the newness of a song recommends it; for there we expect something surprising. A new song is a song for new favours, for those compassions which are new every morning. A new song is a New Testament song, a song of praise for the new covenant, and the precious privileges of that covenant. A new song is a song that shall be ever new, and shall never wax old, or vanish away; it is an everlasting song, that shall never be antiquated or out of date. 2. Let all the earth sing this song; not the Jews only, to whom hitherto the service of God had been appropriated, who could not sing the Lord's song in (would not sing it to) a strange land; but let all the earth, all that are redeemed from the earth, learn and sing this new song, Rev. xiv. 3. This is a prophecy of the calling of the Gentiles: all the earth shall have this new song put into their mouths, shall have both cause and call to sing it. 3. Let the subject matter of this song be his salvation; the great salvation which was to be wrought out by the Lord Jesus; that must be shewed forth as the cause of this joy and praise. 4. Let these songs be sung constantly, and not only in the times appointed for the solemn feasts, but from day to day. It is a subject that can never be exhausted. Let day unto day utter this speech, that under the influence of gospel devotions, we may daily exemplify a gospel conversation.

Secondly. With sermons; ver. 3, "Declare his glory among the heathen, even his wonders among all people." 1. Salvation by Christ is here spoken of as a work of wonder, and that in which the glory of God shines very bright. In shewing forth that salvation, we declare God's glory as it shines in the face of Christ. 2. This salvation was in the Old Testament times, as heaven's happiness is now, a glory to be revealed; but in the fulness of time it was declared, and a full discovery made of that, even to babes, which prophets and kings desired and wished to see, and might not. 3. What was then discovered was declared only among the Jews, but it is now declared among the heathen, among all people. The nations which long sat in darkness now see this great light. The apostles' commission to preach the Gospel to every creature is copied from this: "Declare his glory among the heathen."

Thirdly. With religious services, ver. 7—9. Hitherto though in every nation they that feared God, and wrought righteousness, were accepted of him, yet instituted ordinances were the peculiarities of the Jewish religion; but in gospel times the kindreds of the people shall be invited and admitted into the service of God, and be as welcome as ever the Jews were. The court of the Gentiles shall no longer be an outward court, but shall be laid in common with the court of Israel. All the earth is here summoned to fear before the Lord, that is, to worship him according to his appointment. "In every place incense shall be offered to his name," Mal. i. 11; Zec. xiv. 17; Isa. lxvi. 23. This indeed spoke mortification to the Jews, but withal it gave a prospect of that which would redound very much to the glory of God, and to the happiness of mankind.

Now observe how the acts of devotion to God are here described. 1. We must give unto the Lord; not as if God needed any thing, or could receive any thing from us or any creature, which was not his own before, much less be benefited by it; but we must in our best affections, adorations, and services return to him what we have received from him, and do it freely, as what we give; for God loves a cheerful giver. It is debt, it is rent, it is tribute, it is what must be paid, and if not will be recovered; and yet if it come from holy love, God is pleased to accept it as gift. 2. We must acknowledge God to be the sovereign Lord, and pay homage to him accordingly; ver. 7, "Give unto the Lord glory and strength," glory and empire, or dominion, so some. As a king he is clothed with robes of glory, and girt with the girdle of power, and we must subscribe to both. "Thine is the kingdom," and therefore "thine is the power and the glory." Give the glory to God; do not take it to yourselves, nor give it to any creature. 3. We must "give unto the Lord the glory due unto his name;" that is, to the discovery he has been pleased to make of himself to the children of men. In all the acts of religious worship this is that which we must aim at, to honour God, to pay him some of that reverence which we owe him as the best of beings, and the fountain of our being. 4. We must bring an offering into his courts. We must bring ourselves in the first place, the offering up of the Gentiles, Rom. xv. 16. We must offer up the sacrifices of praise continually, Heb. xiii. 15; must often appear before God in public worship, and never appear before him empty. 5. We must worship him in the beauty of holiness: in the solemn assembly, where Divine institutions are religiously observed, the beauty of which is their holiness, that is, their conformity to the rule. Worship him with holy hearts, sanctified by the grace of God, devoted to the glory of God, and purified from the pollutions of sin. 6. We must fear before him. All the acts of worship must be performed from a principle of the fear of God, and with a holy awe and reverence.

are found in some Latin ones. With little variation, they appear in Rom. xi. 2, from which, indeed, they may have been taken. A further variation appears in the Greek of verse 3 in some copies, where we read "a great king over all the earth," for "a great king over all gods." The sense of the first clause of verse 4 in the Hebrew is that the most secret or innermost recesses of the earth are under the control of the Lord. For "the strength of the hills," or mountains, some would explain, "the wealth of the mountains," but the ancient explanation, "heights of the mountains," is preferable; Montanus has "summits," which is a good rendering.

xcv. 6. "Let us kneel:" the Greek has "let us weep," and is followed by the Vulgate; but the Syriac agrees with the Hebrew—"Let us kneel."

xcv. 7. For "people of his pasture, and the sheep of his hand," the Syriac reads "his people, and the sheep of his pasture."

xcvi. 1. Observe that this psalm is extracted from the longer one

In the midst of these calls to praise God and give glory to him, glorious things are here said of him, both as motives to praise, and matter of praise. "The Lord is great, and" therefore "greatly to be praised," ver. 4, and to be feared; great and honourable to his attendants; great and terrible to his adversaries. Even the new song proclaims God great as well as good; for his goodness is his glory. And when the everlasting Gospel is preached, this is it, "Fear God, and give glory to him," Rev. xiv. 6, 7.

1st. He is great in his sovereignty over all that pretend to be deities. None dare vie with him: "He is to be feared above all gods," all princes, who were often deified after their deaths, and even while they lived were adored as petty gods; or rather, all idols, the gods of the nations, ver. 5. All the earth being called to sing the new song, they must be convinced that the Lord Jehovah, to whose honour they must sing it, is the one only living and true God; infinitely above all rivals and pretenders. He is great, and they are little: he is all, and they are nothing. So the word used for idols signifies; for "we know that an idol is nothing in the world," 1 Cor. viii. 4. 2nd. He is great in his right, even to the noblest part of the creation; for it is his own work, and derives its being from him. "The Lord made the heavens," and all their hosts, they are the work of his fingers, Ps. viii. 3; so nicely, so curiously are they made. The gods of the nations were all made gods, the creatures of men's fancies; but our God is the creator of the sun, moon and stars, those lights of heaven, which they imagined to be gods, and worshipped as such. 3rd. He is great in the manifestation of his glory both in the upper and lower world, among his angels in heaven, and his saints on earth; ver. 6, "Splendour and majesty are before him" in his immediate presence above, where the angels cover their faces, as unable to bear the dazzling lustre of his glory. "Strength and beauty are in his sanctuary," both that above, and this below. In God there is every thing that is awful, and yet every thing that is amiable. If we attend him in his sanctuary, we shall behold his beauty, for God is love; and experience his strength, for he is our rock. Let us therefore go forth in his strength, enamoured with his beauty.

10 Say among the heathen that the LORD reigneth:
The world also shall be established that it shall not be moved:
He shall judge the people righteously.
11 Let the heavens rejoice, and let the earth be glad;
Let the sea roar, and the fulness thereof.
12 Let the field be joyful, and all that is therein:
Then shall all the trees of the wood rejoice
13 Before the LORD: for he cometh,
For he cometh to judge the earth:
He shall judge the world with righteousness,
And the people with his truth.

We have here instructions given to those who were to preach the Gospel to the nations, what to preach; or to those who had themselves received the Gospel, what account to give of it to their neighbours, what to say among the heathen. And it is an illustrious prophecy of the setting up of the kingdom of Christ upon the ruins of the devil's kingdom, which began presently after his ascension, and will continue in the doing till the mystery of God be finished.

First. Let it be told that the Lord reigneth, the Lord Christ reigneth, that King whom God determined to set upon his holy hill of Zion. See how this was first said among the heathen by Peter, Acts x. 42. Some of the ancients added a gloss to this, which by degrees crept into the text, 'The Lord reigneth from the tree.' So Justin Martyr, Austin, and others, quote it, meaning the cross, when he had this title written over him, "The King of the Jews." It was because he became obedient to death, even the death of the cross, that God exalted him, and gave him a name above every name, a throne above every throne. Some of the heathen came betimes to inquire after him that was born king of the Jews, Mat. ii. 2. Now let them know that he is come, and his kingdom is set up.

Secondly. Let it be told that Christ's government will be the world's happy settlement. "The world also shall be established, that it shall not be moved." The natural world shall be established. The standing of the world and its stability is owing to the mediation of Christ. Sin had given it a shock, and still threatens it; but Christ as Redeemer upholds all things, and preserves the course of nature. The world of mankind shall be established, shall be preserved till all that belong to the election of grace are called in, though a guilty, provoking world. The Christian religion, as far as it is embraced, shall establish states and kingdoms, and preserve good order among men. The church in the world shall be established, so some, that it cannot be moved; for it is built upon a rock, and the gates of hell shall never prevail against it. It is a kingdom that cannot be shaken.

Thirdly. Let them be told that Christ's government will be incontestably just and righteous. "He shall judge the people righteously," ver. 10; "Judge the world with righteousness, and with his truth," ver. 13. Judging is here put for ruling; and though this may be extended to the general judgment of the world at the last day, which will be in righteousness, Acts xvii. 31, yet it refers more immediately to Christ's first coming, and the setting up of his kingdom in the world by the Gospel. He saith himself, "For judgment am I come into this world," Jno. ix. 39; xii. 31; and that all judgment was committed to him, Jno. v. 22, 27. His ruling and judging with righteousness and truth signifies, 1. That all the laws and ordinances of his kingdom shall be consonant to the rules and principles of eternal truth and equity, that is, to the rectitude and purity of the Divine nature and will. 2. That all his administrations of government shall be just and faithful, and according to what he hath said. 3. That he shall rule in the hearts and consciences of men by the commanding power of truth, and the spirit of righteousness and sanctification. When Pilate asked our Saviour, "Art thou a king?" He answered, "For this cause came I into the world, that I should bear witness unto the truth," Jno. xviii. 37; for he rules by truth, commands men's wills by informing their judgments aright.

Fourthly. Let them be told that his coming draws nigh; that this king, this judge, standeth before the door; "for he cometh, for he cometh." Enoch, the seventh from Adam, said so; "Behold, the Lord cometh," Jude 14. Betwixt this and his first coming the revolutions of many ages intervened, and yet he came at the set time; and so sure will his second coming be; though it is now long since it was said, "Behold he comes in the clouds," Rev. i. 7, and yet he is not come. See 2 Pet. iii. 4, &c.

Fifthly. Let them be called upon to rejoice in this honour that is put upon the Messiah, and this great trust that is to be lodged in his hand; ver. 11, 12, "Let heaven and earth rejoice, the sea, the field, and all the trees of the wood." The dialect here is poetical; the meaning is, 1. That the days of the Messiah will be joyful days, and as far as his grace and government are submitted to they will bring joy along with them. We have reason to give that place, that soul joy into which Christ is admitted. See an instance of both, Acts viii., when Samaria received the Gospel, "there was great joy in that city," ver. 8. And when the eunuch was baptized, "He went on his way rejoicing," ver. 39. 2. That it is the duty of every one of us to bid Christ and his kingdom welcome; for though it comes conquering and to conquer, yet it comes peaceably. "Hosanna, blessed is he that cometh;" and again, "Hosanna, blessed be the kingdom of our father David," Mar. xi. 9, 10; not only, "Let the daughter of Zion rejoice, that her king comes," Zec. ix. 9, but let all rejoice. 3. That the whole creation will have reason to rejoice in the setting up of Christ's kingdom, even the sea, and the field. For as by the sin of the first Adam the whole creation was made subject to vanity, so by the grace of the second Adam it shall, some way or other, first or last, be "delivered from the bondage of corruption into the glorious liberty of the children of God," Rom. viii. 20, 21. 4. That there will in the first place "be joy in heaven, joy in the presence of the angels of God;" for when the First-begotten was brought into the world they sung their anthems to his praise, Lu. ii. 14. 5. That God will graciously accept the holy joys and praises of all the hearty wellwishers to the kingdom of Christ, be their capacity never so mean. The sea can but roar, and how the trees of the wood can shew that they rejoice, I know not; but "he that searcheth the heart knows what is the mind of the spirit," and understands the language, the broken language, of the weakest.

PSALM XCVII.

This psalm dwells upon the same subject, and is set to the same tune, with the foregoing psalm. Christ is the Alpha and the Omega of both; they are both penned, and are both to be sung, to his honour, and we make nothing of them if we do not in them make melody with our hearts to the Lord Jesus. He it is that reigns to the joy of all mankind, ver. 1. And his government speaks, I. Terror to his enemies; for he is a prince of inflexible justice and irresistible power, ver. 2—7. II. Comfort to his friends and loyal subjects, arising from his sovereign dominion, the care he takes of his people, and the provision he makes for them, ver. 8—12. In singing this psalm we must be affected with the glory of the exalted Redeemer; must dread the lot of his enemies, and think ourselves happy if we are of those that kiss the Son.

THE LORD reigneth; let the earth rejoice:
Let the multitude of isles be glad thereof.
2 Clouds and darkness are round about him:
Righteousness and judgment are the habitation of his throne.
3 A fire goeth before him,
And burneth up his enemies round about.
4 His lightnings enlightened the world:
The earth saw, and trembled.
5 The hills melted like wax at the presence of the LORD,
At the presence of the Lord of the whole earth.

THE SUMMIT OF STROMBOLI.

6 The heavens declare his righteousness,
And all the people see his glory.
7 Confounded be all they that serve graven images,
That boast themselves of idols:
Worship him, all ye gods.

in 1 Chron. xvi. 18—36, where it constitutes verses 23—34, but with a few variations. The Septuagint says this psalm was compiled "when the Temple was built after the captivity," which is by no means improbable.

xcvi. 6. For "strength and beauty are in his sanctuary" we find "strength and gladness are in his place" in 1 Chron. xvi. 27, but the sense is nearly identical. The sanctuary is God's holy place, and there is a well-known saying "that a thing of beauty is a joy for ever;" beauty and gladness are closely allied in moral and spiritual things as well as in natural.

xcvi. 8. For "come into his courts" we find "come before him" in 1 Chron. xvi. 29. The explanatory phrases point to this as the later form of the psalm.

xcvi. 10. The stability of the world is mentioned in Psa. xciii. 1, in almost the same words as here. The first clause, which should be rendered "say among the Gentiles The Lord reigneth," is in

PSALM XCVII.

What was to be said among the heathen in the foregoing psalm, ver. 10, is here said again, ver. 1; and is made the subject of this psalm, and of Ps. xcix., "The Lord reigns." That is the great truth here laid down. The Lord Jehovah reigns; he that made the world governs it; he that gave being, gives motion and power, gives law and commission, gives success and event. Every man's judgment proceeds from the Lord, from his counsel and providence, and in all affairs both public and private he performeth the thing which he himself has appointed. The Lord Jesus reigns; the providential kingdom is twisted in with the mediatorial, and the administration of both is in the hand of Christ; who therefore is both the head of the church, and head over all things to the church. The kingdom of Christ is so constituted as that,

First. It may be matter of joy to all; and it will be so if it be not their own fault. "Let the earth rejoice," for hereby it is established, Ps. xcvi. 10; it is honoured and enriched, and in part rescued from the vanity which by sin it is made subject to. Not only let the people of Israel rejoice in him as King of the Jews, and the daughter of Zion as her King, but let all the earth rejoice in his elevation; for the kingdoms of the world shall more or less, sooner or later, become his kingdom. "Let the multitude of isles," the many or great isles, "be glad thereof." This speaks the language of our country, which is a great isle, and has many belonging to it; however, it speaks comfort in general to the Gentiles, whose countries are called the isles of the Gentiles, Gen. x. 5. There is enough in Christ for the multitude of the isles to rejoice in; for though many have been made happy in him, yet still there is room. All have reason to rejoice in Christ's government.

1. In the equity of it. There is an incontestable instance in all the acts of his government, both legislative and judicial; sometimes indeed "clouds and darkness are round about him," his dispensations are altogether unaccountable; "His way is in the sea, and his path in the great waters." We are not aware what he designs, what he drives at, nor is it fit that we should be let into the secrets of his government. There is a depth in his counsels which we must not pretend to fathom; but still, "righteousness and judgment are the habitation of his throne." A golden thread of justice runs through the whole web of his administration. In this he resides, for it is his habitation; in this he rules, for it is the habitation of his throne. His commandments are and will be all righteous. 'Righteousness and judgment are the basis of his throne,' so Dr. Hammond; for therefore his throne is for ever and ever, because his sceptre is a right sceptre, Ps. xlv. 6. "The throne is established in righteousness." Even "the heavens declare his righteousness," ver. 6, that is, it is as conspicuous and as illustrious as the heavens themselves. The angels of heaven will declare it, who are employed as messengers in the administration of his government; and therefore know more of it than any of his creatures. His righteousness is incontestable, for who can contradict or dispute what the heavens declare? Ps. l. 6.

2. In the extent of it in the upper and lower world. 1st. All the men on earth are under his government. Either he is served by them, or he serveth himself by them; "All the people see his glory," or may see it. The glory of God in the face of Christ was made to shine in distant countries: among many people, more or less among all people. The Gospel was preached, for aught we know, in all languages, Acts ii. 5, 11; miracles were wrought in all nations, and so all the people saw his glory. "Have they not heard?" Rom. x. 18. 2nd. All the angels in heaven are so; perhaps we should not have found this truth in those words, ver. 7, "Worship him, all ye gods;" if we had not been directed to it by the inspired apostle, who from the Septuagint version of those words, makes the Messiah to be introduced into the upper world at the ascension, with this charge, Heb. i. 6, "Let all the angels of God worship him;" which helps us with a key to this whole psalm, and shews us that it must be applied to the exalted Redeemer, who is gone into heaven, and is on the right hand of God, which intimates that all power is given him both in heaven and earth, "angels, authorities, and powers being made subject unto him," 1 Pet. iii. 22. This speaks the honour of Christ, that he hath such worshippers, and the honour of all good Christians, that they have such fellow-worshippers.

Secondly. Christ's government, though it may be matter of joy to all, yet will be matter of terror to some; and it is long of themselves that it is so, ver. 3—5, 7. Observe,

1. When the kingdom of Christ was to be set up in the world after his ascension, it would meet with many enemies, and much opposition would be given to it. He that reigns to the joy of the whole earth, yet as he has his subjects, so he hath his enemies, ver. 3; that not only will not have him to reign over them, but would not have him to reign at all. That not only will not enter into the kingdom of heaven themselves, but do all they can to hinder those that are entering, Mat. xxiii. 13. This was fulfilled in the enmity of the unbelieving Jews to the Gospel of Christ, and the violent persecution which in all places they stirred up against the preachers and professors of it. These enemies are here called hills, ver. 5; for their height, and strength, and immovable obstinacy. They were the princes of this world that crucified the Lord of glory, 1 Cor. ii. 8; Ps. ii. 1.

2. The opposition which the Jews gave to the setting up of Christ's kingdom turned to their own ruin. Their persecuting the apostles, and forbidding them to speak to the Gentiles, filled up their sin, and brought wrath upon them to the uttermost, 1 Thes. ii. 15, 16. That wrath is here compared, 1st. To consuming fire; which goes before him and burns up his enemies, that have made themselves like chaff and stubble, and have set the briars and thorns before him in battle, Isa. xxvii. 4. This fire of Divine wrath will not only burn the rubbish upon the hills, but will even melt the hills themselves like wax, ver. 5. When our God appears as a consuming fire, even rocks will be wax before him. The most resolute and daring opposition will be baffled "at the presence of the Lord." His very presence is enough to shame and sink it, for he is "the Lord of the whole earth," by whom all the children of men are manageable, and to whom they are accountable. Men hate and persecute God's people, because they think him absent; that the Lord has forsaken the earth, but when he manifests his presence they melt. 2nd. To amazing lightnings, ver. 4, which strike a terror upon many. The judgments of God brought upon the enemies of Christ's kingdom were such as all the world took notice of with terror; "The earth saw and trembled," and the ears of all that heard were made to tingle. This was fulfilled in the destruction of Jerusalem and the Jewish nation by the Romans, about forty years after Christ's resurrection; which like fire wholly destroyed that people, and like lightnings astonished all their neighbours, Deu. xxix. 24. But the heavens declared God's righteousness in it, and all the people to this day see his glory in those lasting monuments of his justice, the scattered Jews.

3. Idolaters also would be put to confusion by the setting up of Christ's kingdom; ver. 7, "Confounded be all they that serve graven images," that is, the Gentile world, who "did service to them that by nature are no gods," Gal. iv. 8; who boast themselves of idols as their protectors and benefactors. Did they that served idols boast of them, and shall the servants of the living God distrust him, or be ashamed of him? "Let them be ashamed that serve graven images." 1st. This is a prayer for the conversion of the Gentiles, that those who have been so long serving dumb idols may be convinced of their error, ashamed of their folly, and may by the power of Christ's Gospel be brought to serve the only living and true God; and may be as much ashamed of their idols as ever they were proud of them: see Isa. ii. 20, 21. 2nd. This is a prophecy of the ruin of those that would not be reformed, and reclaimed from their idolatry; they shall be confounded by the destruction of paganism in the Roman empire, which was fulfilled about three hundred years after Christ; so much to the terror of idolaters, that some think it was the revolution under Constantine that made even the mighty men say to the rocks, "Fall on us and hide us," Rev. vi. 15, 16. This prayer and prophecy is still in force against anti-christian idolaters, who may here read their doom, "Confounded be all they that worship graven images:" see Jer. xlviii. 13.

8 Zion heard, and was glad;
And the daughters of Judah rejoiced
Because of thy judgments, O LORD.
9 For thou, LORD, art high above all the earth:
Thou art exalted far above all gods.
10 Ye that love the LORD, hate evil:
He preserveth the souls of his saints;
He delivereth them out of the hand of the wicked.
11 Light is sown for the righteous,
And gladness for the upright in heart.
12 Rejoice in the LORD, ye righteous;
And give thanks at the remembrance of his holiness.

The kingdom of the Messiah, like the pillar of cloud and fire, as it hath a dark side towards the Egyptians, so it has a bright side towards the Israel of God. It is set up in spite of opposition; and then "the earth saw and trembled," ver. 4; but "Zion heard, and was glad," very glad to hear of the conversion of some, and the confusion of others; that is, the conquest of all that stood it out against Christ. "Rejoice greatly, O daughter of Zion, for behold thy king comes unto thee," Zec. ix. 9. And not Zion only, where the temple was, but even the daughters of Judah rejoiced; the common people, the inhabitants of the villages, they shall triumph in Christ's victories. The command, ver. 1, is, "Let the earth rejoice;" but it is only the sons of Zion, and the daughters of Judah, that do rejoice. All should bid the kingdom of the Messiah welcome, but few do. Now here observe,

First. The reasons that are given for Zion's joy in the government of the Redeemer. The faithful servants of God may well rejoice and be glad,

1. Because God is glorified, and whatever redounds to his honour is very much his people's pleasure. They rejoice "because of thy judgments, O Lord;" which may take in both the judgments of his mouth, and the judgments of his hand, the word of his Gospel, and his works wrought for the propagating of it, miracles and marvellous providences; for in these we must own, "thou, Lord, art high above all the earth," ver. 9. Thou hast manifested thy sovereignty in the kingdom of nature, and thy command of all its powers, and thy dominion over all nations, over all hearts; "Thou art exalted far above all gods," all deputed gods, that is, princes; all counterfeit gods, that is, idols. The exaltation of Christ, and the advancement of God's glory among men thereby, is the rejoicing of all the saints.

2. Because care is taken for their safety. Those that pay allegiance to Christ as a King shall be sure of his protection. Princes are the shields of the earth; Christ is so to his subjects; they may put their trust under his shadow, and rejoice in it; for, ver. 10, "He preserveth the souls of his saints." He preserves their lives as long as he has any work for them to do, and wonderfully delivers them many a time out of the hand of the wicked, their persecutors, that thirst after their blood; for "precious in the sight of the Lord is the death of his saints." But something more is meant than their lives, for they that will be his disciples, must be willing to lay down their lives, and not indent for the securing of them. It is the immortal soul that Christ preserves, the inward man; which may be renewed more and more when the outward man decays. He will preserve the souls of his saints from sin, from apostacy, and despair under their greatest trials; he will deliver them out of the hands of the wicked one, that seeks to devour them. He will preserve them safe to his heavenly kingdom, 2 Tim. iv. 18. They have therefore reason to be glad, being thus safe.

3. Because provision is made for their comfort. Those that rejoice in Christ Jesus, and in his exaltation, have fountains of joy treasured up for them, which will be opened sooner or later; ver. 11, "Light is sown for the righteous," that is, "gladness for the upright in heart." The subjects of Christ's kingdom are told to expect tribulation in the world; they must suffer by its malice, and must not share in its mirth; yet let them know to their comfort, that light is sown for them, it is designed and prepared for them. What is sown will come up again in due time; though, like a winter seedness, it may lie long under the clods, and seem to be lost and buried, yet it will return in a rich and plentiful increase. God's goodness shall be sure of a harvest in the appointed weeks. "They that sow in tears, shall" without fail "reap in joy," Ps. cxxvi. 5, 6. Christ told his disciples at parting, Jno. xvi. 20, "You shall be sorrowful, but your sorrow shall be turned into joy." Gladness is sure to the upright in heart, to those only that are sincere in religion. "The joy of the hypocrite is but for a moment." There is no serenity without a lasting sincerity.

Secondly. The rules that are here given for Zion's joy.

1. Let it be a pure and holy joy. Ye that love the Lord Jesus, that love his appearing and kingdom, that love his word and his exaltation, see that ye hate evil, the evil of sin, every thing that is offensive to him, and will throw you out of his favour. Note, A true love to God will shew itself in a real hatred of all sin, as that abominable thing which he hates. The joy of the saints should likewise confirm their antipathy to sin, and Divine comforts should put their mouths out of taste to sensual pleasures.

2. Let the joy terminate in God; ver. 12, "Rejoice in the Lord, ye righteous." Let all the streams of comfort which flow to us in the channel of Christ's kingdom, lead us to the fountain, and oblige us to rejoice in the Lord. All the lines of joy must meet in him as their centre: see Phil. iii. 1; iv. 4.

3. Let it express itself in praise and thanksgiving. "Give thanks at the remembrance of his holiness." Whatever is the matter of our rejoicing ought to be the matter of our thanksgiving; and particularly, the holiness of God. They that hate sin themselves, are glad that God doth so, in hopes that therefore he will not suffer it to have dominion over them. Note, 1st. We ought to be much in the remembrance of God's holiness, the infinite purity, rectitude and perfection of the Divine nature. We must be ever mindful of his holy covenant, which he hath confirmed with an oath by his holiness. 2nd. He ought to give thanks upon the remembrance of his holiness; not only give him the glory of xcvi. 13. The last words, "he shall judge the world with righteousness, and the people with his truth," are not found in 1 Chron. xvi. 33, where the corresponding passage appears.

xcvii. 1. The Greek and Latin versions ascribe this psalm to David "when his land was restored." The Syriac also refers it to David, and speaks of it as a prophecy of the coming of Messiah, and of his being revealed in the end, which we understand to mean his second coming. Some modern critics think it was written when the second Temple was consecrated.

xcvii. 6. For "all the people" render "all peoples," or "all the nations."

xcvii. 7. Translate "Let all idol worshippers be ashamed who boast in images," &c. Fürst says the word we render "images" it as h is an honour to him, but give him thanks for it as it is a favour to us; and an unspeakable favour it will be if through grace we are partakers of his holiness. It is God's holiness which, above all his attributes, the angels celebrate, Isa. vi. 3, "Holy, holy, holy." Sinners tremble, but saints rejoice, at the remembrance of God's holiness, Ps. xxx. 5.

PSALM XCVIII.

This psalm is to the same purpose with the two foregoing psalms; it is a prophecy of the kingdom of the Messiah, the setting it up in the world, and the bringing in of the Gentiles to it. The Chaldee entitles it a prophetical psalm. It sets forth, I. The glory of the Redeemer, ver. 1—3. II. The joy of the redeemed, ver. 4—9. If we in a right manner give to Christ this glory, and upon right grounds take to ourselves this joy in singing this psalm, we sing it with understanding. And if they then who saw Christ's day at a distance, and in the promise only, must rejoice and triumph thus, much more reason have we to do so, that see these things accomplished, and share in the better things provided for us, Heb. xi. 40.

A Psalm.

O SING unto the LORD a new song;
For he hath done marvellous things:
His right hand, and his holy arm;
Hath gotten him the victory.
2 The LORD hath made known his salvation:
His righteousness hath he openly shewed
In the sight of the heathen.
3 He hath remembered his mercy and his truth
Toward the house of Israel: [God.
All the ends of the earth have seen the salvation of our

We are here called upon again to "sing unto the Lord a new song," as before, Ps. xcvi. 1. Sing a most excellent song, the best song you have. Let the song of Christ's love be like Solomon's on that subject,—a song of songs. A song of praise for redeeming love is a new song, such a song as had not been sung before; for this is a mystery which was hid from ages and generations. Converts sing a new song, very different from what they had sung; they change their wonder, and change their joy, and therefore change their note. If the grace of God put a new heart into our breasts, it will therewith put a new song into our mouths. In the new Jerusalem there will be new songs sung, that will be new to eternity, and never wax old Let this new song be sung to the praise of God, in consideration of these four things:

First. The wonders he hath wrought. "He hath done marvellous things," ver. 1. Note, The work of our salvation by Christ is a work of wonder. If we take a view of all the steps of it from the contrivance of it, and the counsels of God concerning it before all time, to the consummation of it, and its everlasting consequences when time shall be no more, we shall say, God has in it done marvellous things; it is all his doing, and it is marvellous in our eyes. The more it is known, the more it will be admired.

Secondly. The conquests he has won. "His right hand and his holy arm hath gotten him the victory." Our Redeemer hath surmounted all the difficulties that lay in the way of our redemption, has broken through them all, and was not discouraged by the services or sufferings appointed him. He hath subdued all the enemies that opposed it, hath gotten the victory over Satan, disarmed him, and cast him out of his strongholds, hath spoiled principalities and powers, Col. ii. 15; has taken the prey from the mighty, Isa. xliv. 24, and given death his death's wound; he hath gotten a clear and complete victory, not only for himself, but for us also; for we through him are more than conquerors. He got this victory by his own power; there was none to help, none to uphold, none that durst venture into the service, but his right hand and his holy arm, which is therefore always stretched out with good success, because it is never stretched out but in a good cause. 'This has gotten him the victory, hath brought him relief or deliverance,' so Dr. Hammond. God's power and faithfulness, called here his right hand and his holy arm, brought relief to the Lord Jesus in raising him from the dead, and exalting him personally to the right hand of God; so he applies it.

Thirdly. The discoveries he has made to the world of the work of redemption. What he has wrought for us he hath revealed to us, and both by his Son. The gospel revelation is that on which the gospel kingdom is founded; "The word which God sent," Acts x. 36. The opening of the sealed book is that which is to be celebrated with songs of praise, Rev. v. 8, because by it was brought to light the mystery which had long been hid in God. Observe, 1. The subject of this discovery. His salvation and his righteousness, ver. 3. Righteousness and salvation are often put together, as Isa. lxi. 10; xlvi. 13; li. 5, 6, 8. Salvation speaks the redemption itself, and righteousness the way in which it was wrought,—by the righteousness of Christ. Or, the salvation includes all our gospel privileges, and the righteousness all our gospel duties; both are made known, for God hath joined them together, and we must not separate them. Or, righteousness is here put for the way of our justification by Christ, which is revealed in the Gospel to be by faith, Rom. i. 17. 2. The plainness of this discovery. He hath openly shewed it, not in types and figures, as under the law, but it is written as with a sunbeam, that he that runs may read it. Ministers are appointed to preach it with all plainness of speech. 3. The extent of this discovery. It is made in the sight of the heathen, and not of the Jews only. "All the ends of the earth have seen the salvation of our God," for to the Gentiles was the word of salvation sent.

Fourthly. The accomplishment of the prophecies and promises of the Old Testament in this; ver. 3, "He hath remembered his mercy and his truth towards the house of Israel." God had mercy in store for the seed of Abraham, and had given them many and great assurances of kindness he designed them in the latter days; and it was in pursuance of all those that he raised up his Son Jesus, to be not only a "light to lighten the Gentiles," but "the glory of his people Israel;" for he sent him in the first place to bless them. God is said, in sending Christ, to "perform the mercy promised to our fathers, and to remember the holy covenant," Lu. i. 72. It was in consideration of that, and not of their merit.

4 Make a joyful noise unto the LORD, all the earth:
Make a loud noise, and rejoice, and sing praise.
5 Sing unto the LORD with the harp:
With the harp, and the voice of a psalm.
6 With trumpets and sound of cornet
Make a joyful noise before the LORD, the King.
7 Let the sea roar, and the fulness thereof;
The world, and they that dwell therein.
8 Let the floods clap their hands:
Let the hills be joyful together
9 Before the LORD; for he cometh to judge the earth.
With righteousness shall he judge the world,
And the people with equity.

The setting up of the kingdom of Christ is here represented as a matter of joy and praise.

First. Let all the children of men rejoice in it; for they all have, or may have, benefit by it. Again and again we are here called upon by all ways and means possible, to express our joy in it, and give God praise for it. "Make a joyful noise," as before, Ps. xlv. 1, 2. "Make a loud noise," as those that are affected with those glad tidings, and are desirous to affect others with them; "Rejoice and sing praise;" sing Hosanna, Mat. xxi. 9; sing Hallelujahs, Rev. xix. 6. Let him be welcomed to the throne as new kings used to be, with acclamations of joy and loud shouts till the earth ring again, as when Solomon was proclaimed, 1 Kin. i. 40; and let the shouts of the crowd be accompanied with "the singers and players on instruments," Ps. lxxxvii. 7; lxviii. 25, as is usual in such solemnities. 1. Let sacred songs attend the new king. "Sing praise, sing with the voice of a psalm." Express your joy, thus proclaim it, thus excite it yet more, and thus propagate it among others. 2. Let these be assisted with sacred music, not only with the soft and gentle melody of the harp, but, since it is a victorious king whose glory is to be celebrated, who goes forth conquering and to conquer, let him be proclaimed with the martial sound of the trumpet and cornet, ver. 6. Let all this joy be directed to God, and expressed in a solemn, religious manner; "make a joyful noise to the Lord," ver. 4. "Sing to the Lord," ver. 5; do it "before the Lord, the King," ver. 6. Carnal mirth is an enemy to this holy joy. When David danced before the ark he pleaded, "it was before the Lord;" and the piety and devotion of the intention not only vindicated what he did, but commended it. We must rejoice before the Lord whenever we draw near to him, Deu. xii. 12; before the Lord Jesus, and before him not only as the Saviour, but as the King, the King of kings, the church's King, and our King.

Secondly. Let the inferior creatures rejoice in it, ver. 7—9. This is to the same purpose with what we had before, Ps. xcvi. 11—13, "Let the sea roar," and let that be called,—not as it used to be, a dreadful noise, but—a joyful noise; for the coming of Christ, and the salvation wrought out by him, hath quite altered the property of the troubles and terrors of this world, so that when the floods lift up their voice, lift up their waves, we must not construe that to be the sea roaring against us, but rather rejoicing with us. Let the floods express their joy as men do when they clap their hands; and let the hills, that trembled for fear before God when he came down to give the law at mount Sinai, dance for joy before him when his Gospel is preached, and that word of the Lord goes forth from Zion in a still small voice. "Let the hills be joyful together before the Lord." This intimates that the kingdom of Christ would be a blessing to the whole creation, but that, as the inferior creatures declare the glory of the Creator, (Ps. xix. 1.) so they declare the glory of the Redeemer, for by him all things not only subsist in their being, but consist in their order. It intimates likewise, that the children of men would be wanting in paying their due respects to the Redeemer, and therefore he must look for his honour from the sea and the floods, which would shame the stupidity and ingratitude of mankind. And, perhaps, respect is here had to the new heavens and the new earth, which we yet, according to his promise, look for, 2 Pet. iii. 13; and this second mention of his coming, after the like, Ps. xcvi., may principally refer to his second coming, when all these things shall be so dissolved as to be refined. Then shall he come to judge the world with righteousness; and in the prospect of that day all that are sanctified do rejoice, and even the sea, and the floods, and the hills would rejoice if they could. One would think that Virgil had these psalms in his eye, as well as the oracles of the Cumean sybil, in his fourth eclogue, where he either ignorantly or basely applies to Asinius Pollio the ancient prophecies which at that time were expected to be fulfilled; for he lived in the reign of Augustus Cæsar, a little before our Saviour's birth. He owns they looked for the birth of a child from heaven, that should be a great blessing to the world, and restore the golden age;

Jam nova progenies cœlo demittitur alto,
'A new race descends from the lofty sky,' that should take away sin;

Te duce, si qua manent sceleris vestigia nostri,
Irrita perpetua solvent formidine terras.
'Thy influence shall efface every stain of corruption,
And free the world from alarm.'

Many other things he saith of this long-looked-for child, which Ludovicus Vives, in his notes on that eclogue, thinks applicable to Christ; and he concludes, as the psalmist here, with a prospect of the rejoicing of the whole creation herein;

Aspice, venturo lætentur ut omnia sæclo.
'See how this promised age makes all rejoice.

And if all rejoice, why should not we?

PSALM XCIX.

Still we are celebrating the glories of the kingdom of God among men, and are called upon to praise him, as in the foregoing psalms; but those psalms looked forward to the times of the Gospel, and prophesied of the graces and comforts of those times. This psalm seems to dwell more upon the Old Testament dispensation, and the manifestation of God's glory and grace in that. Let not men in expectation of the Messiah's kingdom and the evangelical worship neglect that divine regimen they were then under, and the ordinances that were then given them, but in them see God reigning, and worship before him according to the law of Moses. Prophecies of good things to come must not lessen our esteem of good things present. To Israel indeed pertained the promises which they must believe; but to them pertained also the giving of the law and the service of God, which they must also dutifully and conscientiously attend to, Rom. ix. 4. And this they are called to do in this psalm; where yet there is much of Christ, for the government of the church was in the hands of the eternal Word, before he was incarnate; and, besides, the ceremonial services were types and figures of evangelical worship.

means small images of gods, which among the Egyptians and Phœnicians gave oracles, or were fancied to do so.

xcvii. 8. "The daughters of Judah" may, in accordance with a common idiom, denote the towns and villages of Judah. With little difference, the same words appear in Psa. xlviii. 11: "Let Mount Zion rejoice, let the daughters of Judah be glad, because of thy judgments."

xcvii. 11. The declaration that "light is sown for the righteous" is partly explained in the following clause, that "gladness (is sown) for the upright in heart." As joy is compared with beauty, so is it symbolised by light. Light is sown for the good even now, and amid all troubles and darkness they may expect to realise it in due time.

xcviii. Title. Instead of the short Hebrew title "a psalm," the Syriac has this: "of David, concerning the deliverance of the people from Egypt, when they triumphed and prevailed; and spiritually, a prophecy concerning the coming of the Messiah, and

The people of Israel are here required to praise and exalt God, and to worship before him in consideration of these two things: I. The happy constitution of the government they were under, both in sacred and civil things, ver. 1—5. II. Some instances of the happy administration of it, ver. 6—9. In singing this psalm we must set ourselves to exalt the name of God, as it is made known to us in the Gospel, which we have much more reason to do than they had that lived under the law.

THE LORD reigneth; let the people tremble:
He sitteth between the cherubims; let the earth be moved
2 The LORD is great in Zion;
And he is high above all the people.
3 Let them praise thy great and terrible name;
For it is holy
4 The king's strength also loveth judgment,
Thou dost establish equity,
Thou executest judgment and righteousness in Jacob.
5 Exalt ye the LORD our God,
And worship at his footstool;
For he is holy.

The foundation of all religion is laid in this truth,—that the Lord reigneth. God governs the world by his providence, governs the church by his grace, and both by his Son. We are to believe not only that the Lord liveth, but that the Lord reigneth. This is the triumph of the Christian church, and here it was the triumph of the Jewish church, that Jehovah was their king; and hence it is inferred, "Let the people tremble;" that is, 1. Even let the subjects of this kingdom tremble, for the Old Testament dispensation had much of terror in it. At mount Sinai Israel, and even Moses himself, did exceedingly fear and quake; and then God was terrible in his holy places; even when he appeared in his people's behalf he did terrible things. But we are not now come to that mount that burned with fire, Heb. xii. 18. Now "the Lord reigns, let the earth rejoice." Then he ruled more by the power of holy fear, now of holy love. 2. Much more let the enemies of this kingdom tremble, for he will either bring them into obedience to his golden sceptre, or crush them with his iron rod. The Lord reigns, though the people be stirred with indignation at it; though they fret their hearts out, their rage is all in vain; he will set his king upon his holy hill of Zion in despite of them, Ps. ii. 1, 6. First or last he will make them tremble, Rev. vi. 15, &c. "The Lord reigns, let the earth be moved." Those that submit to him shall be established, and not moved, Ps. xcvi. 10; but they that oppose him will be moved. Heaven and earth shall be shaken and all nations; but the kingdom of Christ is what cannot be moved. The things which cannot be shaken shall remain, Heb. xii. 27. In these is continuance, Isa. lxiv. 5. God's kingdom, set up in Israel, is here made the subject of the psalmist's praise.

First. God presided in the affairs of religion; "He sitteth between the cherubims," ver. 1, as on his throne, to give law by the oracles thence delivered, as on the mercy-seat, to receive petitions. This was the honour of Israel, that they had among them the Shechinah, or special presence of God, attended by the holy angels. The temple was the royal palace, and the holy of holies was the presence-chamber. "The Lord is great in Zion," ver. 2; there he is known and praised, Ps. lxxvi. 1, 2; there he is served as great, more than any where else. He is high there above all people; as that which is high is exposed to view and looked up to, so in Zion the perfections of the Divine nature appear more conspicuous and more illustrious than any where else. Therefore "let them" that dwell in Zion, and worship there, "praise thy great and terrible name," and give thee the glory due unto it, "for it is holy." The holiness of God's name makes it truly great to his friends, and terrible to his enemies, ver. 3. This is that which they above adore: "Holy, holy, holy."

Secondly. He was all in all in their civil government, ver. 4. As in Jerusalem was the testimony of Israel, whither the tribes went up, so there were set thrones of judgment, Ps. cxxii. 4, 5. Their government was a theocracy. He raised up David to rule over them, (and some think this psalm was penned upon occasion of his quiet and happy settlement in the throne,) and he is the king whose strength loveth judgment. He is strong; all his strength he has from God, and his strength is not abused for the support of any wrong, as the power of great princes often is, but it loveth judgment; he doth justice with his power, and doth it with delight. And herein he was a type of Christ, to whom God would give the throne of his father David, to do judgment and justice. He has power to crush, but his strength loves judgment; that is, he doth not rule with rigour, but with moderation, with wisdom, and tenderness. The people of Israel had a good king; but they are here taught to look up to God as he by whom their king reigns. "Thou dost establish equity;" that is, God gave them those excellent laws by which they were governed, and "thou executest judgment and righteousness in Jacob;" that is, he not only by his immediate providences often executed and enforced his own laws, but took care for the administration of justice among them by civil magistrates, who reigned by him, and by him did decree justice. Their judges judged for God, and their judgment was his, 2 Chr. xix. 6.

Putting these two things together, we see what was the happiness of Israel above any other people, as Moses had described it, Deu. iv. 7, 8, that they had God so nigh unto them, sitting between the cherubims, and that they had statutes and judgments so righteous by which equity was established, and God himself ruled in Jacob, from which he infers this command to that happy people; ver. 5, "Exalt ye the Lord our God, and worship at his footstool;" give him the glory of the good government you are under, as it is now established both in church and state. Note, 1. The greater the public mercies are which we have to share in, the more we are obliged to bear a part in the public homage paid to God. The setting up of the kingdom of Christ especially ought to be the matter of our praise. 2. When we draw nigh to God to worship him, our hearts must be filled with high thoughts of him, and he must be exalted in our souls. 3. The more we abase ourselves, and the more prostrate we are before God, the more we exalt him. We must worship at his footstool; that is, at his ark, which was as the footstool to the mercy-seat between the cherubims; or, we must cast ourselves down upon the pavement of his courts. And good reason we have to be thus reverent, for he is holy; and his holiness should strike an awe upon us, as it doth on the angels themselves, Isa. vi. 2, 3.

6 Moses and Aaron among his priests,
And Samuel among them that call upon his name;
They called upon the LORD, and he answered them.
7 He spake unto them in the cloudy pillar:
They kept his testimonies,
And the ordinance that he gave them.
8 Thou answeredst them, O LORD our God;
Thou wast a God that forgavest them,
Though thou tookest vengeance of their inventions
9 Exalt the LORD our God,
And worship at his holy hill;
For the LORD our God is holy.

The happiness of Israel in God's government is here farther made out by some particular instances of his administration, especially with reference to those that were in their day the prime leaders and most active useful governors of that people—Moses, Aaron, and Samuel, in the former of whom the theocracy, or Divine government began, for they were employed to form Israel into a people, and in the last of whom that form of government in a great measure ended; for, when the people rejected Samuel, and urged him to resign, they are said to reject God himself, that he should not be so immediately their king as he had been, 1 Sam. viii. 7, for now they would have a king like all the nations. Moses as well as Aaron is said to be among his priests, for he executed the priest's office till Aaron was settled in it, and he consecrated Aaron and his sons; therefore the Jews call him the priest of the priests. Now concerning these three chief rulers observe,

First. The intimate communion they had with God, and the wonderful favour to which he admitted them. None of all the nations of the earth could produce three such men as these, that had such an intercourse with heaven, and whom God knew by name, Ex. xxxiii. 17. Here is,

1. Their gracious observance of God. No kingdom had men that honoured God so as these three men of the kingdom of Israel did. They honoured him, 1st. By their prayers. Samuel, though not among his priests, yet was among them that called on his name; and for this they were all famous, they called upon the Lord; they relied not on their own wisdom or virtue, but in every emergency had recourse to God; towards him was their desire, and on him their dependence. 2nd. By their obedience. "They kept his testimonies, and the ordinances that he gave them;" that is, they made conscience of their duty, and in every thing made God's word and law their rule, as knowing that unless they did so, they could not expect their prayers should be answered, Pr. xxviii. 9. Moses did all according to the pattern shewn him; it is often repeated, "according to all that God commanded Moses, so did he." Aaron and Samuel did likewise. These were the greatest men, and most honourable, that were most eminent for keeping God's testimonies, and conforming to the rule of his word.

2. God's gracious acceptance of them. "He answered them," and granted them the things which they called upon him for; they all wonderfully prevailed with God in prayer; miracles were wrought at their special instance and request; nay, he not only condescended to do that for them which they desired, as a prince for a petitioner, but he communed with them as one friend familiarly converseth with another; ver. 7, "He spake unto them in the cloudy pillar." He often spake to Samuel; from his childhood the word of the Lord came to him; and probably sometimes he spake to him by a bright cloud overshadowing him; however, to Moses and Aaron he often spake out of the famous cloudy pillar, Ex. xvi. 10; Num. xii. 5. Israel is now minded of this, for the confirming of their faith, that though they had not every day such sensible tokens of God's presence as the cloudy pillar was, yet to them that were their first founders, and to him that was their great reformer, God was pleased thus to manifest himself.

Secondly. The good offices they did to Israel. They interceded for the people, and for them also they obtained many an answer of peace. "Moses stood in the gap, and Aaron between the living and the dead;" and when Israel was in distress, Samuel cried unto the Lord for them, 1 Sam. vii. 9. This is here referred to, ver. 8, "Thou answeredst them, O Lord our God," and at their prayer "thou wast a God that forgavest" the people they prayed for; and though "thou tookest vengeance of their inventions," yet thou didst not cut them off from being a people, as their sin deserved. "Thou wast a God that wast propitious for them, (so Dr. Hammond,) for their sakes, and sparedst the people at their request, then when thou wast about to take vengeance of their inventions;" that is, when thy wrath was so highly provoked against them that it was just ready to break in upon them, to their utter overthrow. These were some of the many remarkable instances of God's dominion in Israel more than in any other nation, for which the people are again called upon to praise God; ver. 9, "Exalt the Lord our God," on account of what he hath done for us formerly as well as of late, "and worship at his holy hill of Zion," on which he hath now set his temple, and will shortly set his king, Ps. ii. 6, the former a type of the latter. There, as the centre of unity, let all God's Israel meet with their adorations, "for the Lord our God is holy," and appears so, not only in his holy law, but in his holy Gospel.

PSALM C.

It is with good reason that many sing this psalm very frequently in their religious assemblies, for it is very proper both to express and to excite pious and devout affections towards God in our approach to him in holy ordinances; and if our hearts go along with the words, we shall make melody in it to the Lord. The Jews say it was penned to be sung with their thank-offerings; perhaps it was; but we say that as there is nothing in it peculiar to their economy, so its beginning with a call to all lands to praise God, plainly extends it to the gospel-church. Here, I. We are called upon to praise God, and rejoice in him, ver. 1, 2, 4. II. We are furnished with matter for praise; we must praise him, considering his being and relation to us, ver. 3, and his mercy and truth, ver. 5. These are plain and common things, and therefore the more fit to be the matter of devotion.

A Psalm of praise.

MAKE a joyful noise unto the LORD, all ye lands.
2 Serve the LORD with gladness:
Come before his presence with singing.
3 Know ye that the LORD he is God:
It is he that hath made us, and not we ourselves;
We are his people, and the sheep of his pasture.

the calling of the Gentiles to the faith." In the Greek and Latin Vulgate it is merely called "a psalm of David." The Chaldee or Targum calls it "a prophetic psalm," without indicating what it is prophetic of.

xcviii. 1. The Hebrew of the latter clause is, literally, "His right hand and his holy arm hath saved him," or brought salvation for himself, i.e., the salvation which he has revealed to the Gentiles, as mentioned in the next verse. It seems not reasonable to limit it to the deliverance of Israel, because of the allusion to the Gentiles in verse 2, to the ends of the earth in verse 3, and to all the earth in verse 4. We therefore think the Chaldee and Syriac right in regarding the psalm as prophetic of a glorious future.

xcviii. 6. The more literal rendering of this verse is, "With trumpets and sound of horn, make a noise before the king Jehovah."

xcviii. 8. For "let the floods clap their hands" we must render "let the rivers clap their hands," or applaud.

4 Enter into his gates with thanksgiving,
And into his courts with praise:
Be thankful unto him, and bless his name.
5 For the LORD is good; his mercy is everlasting;
And his truth endureth to all generations.

Here, First. The exhortations to praise are very importunate. The psalm doth indeed answer the title, "a psalm of praise." It begins with that call which of late we have several times met with, ver. 1, "Make a joyful noise unto the Lord, all ye lands," or all the earth, all the inhabitants of the earth. When all nations shall be discipled, and the Gospel preached to every creature, then this summons will be fully answered to. But if we take the foregoing psalm to be (as we have opened it) a call to the Jewish church to rejoice in the administration of God's kingdom which they were under, (as the four before it were calculated for the days of the Messiah,) this psalm perhaps was intended for proselytes, that came over out of all lands to the Jews' religion. However, we have here,

1. A strong invitation to worship God: not that God needs us, or any thing we have, or can do, but it is his will that we should serve the Lord, should devote ourselves to his service, and employ ourselves in it, and that we should not only serve him in all instances of obedience to his law, but that we should come before his presence in the ordinances which he has appointed, and in which he hath promised to manifest himself, ver. 2; that we should enter into his gates, and into his courts, ver. 3; that we should attend upon him among his servants, and keep there where he keeps court. In all acts of religious worship, whether in secret or in our families, we come into God's presence, and serve him; but it is in public worship especially that we enter into his gates, and into his courts. The people were not permitted to enter into the holy place, there the priests only went in to minister; but let the people be thankful for their place in the courts of God's house, to which they were admitted, and gave their attendance there.

2. Great encouragement given us in worshipping God, to do it cheerfully; ver. 2, "Serve the Lord with gladness." This intimates a prediction that, in gospel times, there should be special occasion for joy. And it prescribes this as a rule of worship, Let God be served with gladness. By holy joy we do really serve God; it is an honour to him to rejoice in him, and we ought to serve him with holy joy. Gospel worshippers should be joyful worshippers. If we serve God in uprightness, let us serve him with gladness; we must be willing and forward to it; glad when we are called to go up to the house of the Lord, Ps. cxxii. 1; looking upon it as the comfort of our lives to have communion with God; and we must be pleasant and cheerful in it, must say, "it is good to be here," approaching to God in every duty, as to God our exceeding joy, Ps. xliii. 4. We must "come before his presence with singing," not only songs of joy, but songs of praise; ver. 4, "Enter into his gates with thanksgiving." We must not only comfort ourselves, but glorify God with our joy, and let him have the praise of that which we have the pleasure of. "Be thankful to him, and bless his name;" that is, 1st. We must take it as a favour to be admitted into his service, and give him thanks that we have liberty of access to him, that we have ordinances instituted, and opportunity continued, of waiting upon God in those ordinances. 2nd. We must intermix praise and thanksgiving with all our services. This golden thread must run through every duty, Heb. xiii. 15, for it is the work of angels. "In every thing give thanks," in every ordinance, as well as in every providence.

Secondly. The matter of praise, and motives to it, are very important; ver. 3, 5, "Know ye" what God is in himself, and what he is to you. Note, Knowledge is the mother of devotion and of all obedience. Blind sacrifices will never please a seeing God. Know it; that is, consider and apply it, and then you will be more close and constant, more inward and serious, in the worship of him. Let us know then these seven things concerning the Lord Jehovah, with whom we have to do in all the acts of religious worship:

1. "That the Lord he is God," the only living and true God; that he is a being infinitely perfect, self-existent, and self-sufficient, and the fountain of all being. He is God, and not a man as we are. He is an eternal Spirit, incomprehensible and independent; the first cause and last end. The heathen worshipped the creatures of their own fancy; "the workmen made it, therefore it is not God." We worship him that made us and all the world. He is God, and all other pretended deities are vanity and a lie, and such as he hath triumphed over.

2. That he is our Creator. "It is he that hath made us, and not we ourselves." I find that I am, but cannot say, I am that I am, and therefore must ask whence am I? Who made me? "Where is God my Maker?" And it is the Lord Jehovah; he gave us being, gave us this being; is both the Former of our bodies, and the Father of our spirits. We did not, we could not, make ourselves. It is God's prerogative to be his own cause; our being is derived and depending.

3. That therefore he is our rightful owner. The Masorites, by altering one letter in the Hebrew, read it, 'He made us, and his we are,' or to him we belong. Put both the readings together, and we learn, that because God made us, and not we ourselves, therefore we are not our own but his. He hath an incontestable right to and property in us and all things. His we are, to be acted by his power, disposed of by his will, and devoted to his honour and glory.

4. That he is our sovereign ruler. "We are his people," or subjects, and he is our prince, our rector, or governor, that gives law to us as moral agents, and will call us to an account for what we do. "The Lord is our judge, the Lord is our lawgiver;" we are not at liberty to do what we will, but must always make conscience of doing as we are bidden.

5. That he is our bountiful benefactor. We are not only his sheep, whom he is entitled to, but "the sheep of his pasture," whom he takes care of. 'The flock of his feeding,' so it may be read: therefore the sheep of his hand, at his disposal, because the sheep of his pasture, Ps. xcv. 7. He that made us maintains us, and gives us all good things richly to enjoy.

6. That he is a God of infinite mercy and goodness; ver. 5, "The Lord is good," and therefore doth good; "his mercy is everlasting;" it is a fountain that can never be drawn dry. The saints that are now the sanctified vessels of mercy, will be to eternity the glorified monuments of mercy.

7. That he is a God of inviolable truth and faithfulness. "His truth endureth to all generations," and no word of his shall fall to the ground as antiquated or revoked; the promise is sure to all the seed from age to age.

PSALM CI.

David was for certain the penman of this psalm, and it has in it the genuine spirit of the man after God's own heart: it is a solemn vow he made to God when he took upon him the charge of a family, and of the kingdom. Whether it was penned when he entered upon the government immediately after the death of Saul, as some think, or when he began to reign over all Israel, and brought up the ark to the city of David, as others think, is not material; it is an excellent plan or model for the good government of a court, or the keeping up of virtue and piety, and by that means good order in it. But it is applicable to private families; it is the householder's psalm. It instructs all that are in any sphere of power, whether larger or narrower, to use their power so as to make it a terror to evil-doers, but a praise to them that do well. Here is, I. The general scope of David's vow, ver. 1, 2. II. The particulars of it, that he would detest and discountenance all manner of wickedness, ver. 3, 5, 7, 8. And that he would favour and encourage such as were virtuous, ver. 6. Some think this may fitly be accommodated to Christ the son of David, who governs his church, the city of the Lord, by these rules, and who loveth righteousness and hateth wickedness. In singing this psalm families, both governors and governed, should teach and admonish, and engage themselves and one another to walk by the rule of it, that peace may be upon them, and God's presence with them

A Psalm of David.

I WILL sing of mercy and judgment:
Unto thee, O LORD, will I sing.
2 I will behave myself wisely in a perfect way.
O when wilt thou come unto me?
I will walk within my house with a perfect heart
3 I will set no wicked thing before mine eyes:
I hate the work of them that turn aside;
It shall not cleave to me
4 A froward heart shall depart from me:
I will not know a wicked person.
5 Whoso privily slandereth his neighbour, him will I cut off:
Him that hath an high look and a proud heart will not I suffer.
6 Mine eyes shall be upon the faithful of the land, that they may dwell with me:
He that walketh in a perfect way, he shall serve me.
7 He that worketh deceit shall not dwell within my house:
He that telleth lies shall not tarry in my sight.
8 I will early destroy all the wicked of the land;
That I may cut off all wicked doers from the city of the LORD.

David here cuts out to himself and others a pattern both of a good magistrate and a good master of a family, and if these were careful to discharge the duty of their place it would contribute very much to a universal reformation. Observe,

First. The chosen subject of the psalm; ver. 1, "I will sing of mercy and judgment;" that is, 1. Of God's mercy and judgment; and then it looks back upon the dispensations of providence that had been concerning him since he was first anointed to be king, during which time he had met with many a rebuke, and much hardship on the one hand, and yet on the other hand had many wonderful deliverances wrought for him and favours bestowed upon him. Of these he will sing unto God. Note, 1st. God's providences concerning his people are commonly mixed both of mercy and judgments; God hath set the one over against the other, and appointed them April-days, showers and sunshine. It was so with David and his family; when there was mercy in the return of the ark, there was judgment in the death of Uzza. 2nd. When God in his providence exerciseth us with a mixture of mercy and judgment, it is our duty to sing, and sing unto him, both of the one and of the other; we must be suitably affected with both, and make suitable acknowledgments to God of both. The Chaldee paraphrase of this is observable, 'If thou bestowest mercy upon me, or if thou bring any judgment upon me, before thee, O Lord, will I sing my hymns for all:' whatever our outward condition is, whether joyful or sorrowful, still we must give glory to God, and sing praises to him; neither the laughter of a prosperous condition nor the tears of an afflicted condition, must put us out of tune for sacred songs. Or, 2. It may be understood of David's mercy and judgment; he would in this psalm promise to be merciful and just, or wise, for judgment is often put for discretion. To do justly and love mercy is the sum of our duty; these he would covenant to make conscience of in that place and relation to which God had called him, and this in consideration of the various providences of God that had been concerning him. Family mercies and family afflictions are both of them calls to family religion. David puts his vow into a song or psalm, that he might the better keep it in his own mind, and frequently repeat it, and that it might the better be communicated to others, and preserved in his family for a pattern to his sons and successors.

Secondly. The general resolution David took up to carry himself carefully and conscientiously in his court, ver. 2. We have here, 1. A good purpose concerning his conversation, concerning his conversation in general, how he would behave himself in every thing; he would live by rule, and not at large, nor walk at all adventures; he would, though a king, by a solemn covenant, bind himself to his good behaviour. And concerning his conversation in his family particularly, not only how he would walk when he appeared in public, when he sat on the throne; but how he would walk within his house, where he was more out of the eye of the world, but where he still saw himself under the eye of God. It is not enough to put on our religion when we go abroad, and appear before men, but we must govern ourselves by it in our families. Those that are in public stations are not thereby excused from care in governing their families; nay, rather they are most concerned to set a good example of ruling their own houses well, 1 Tim. iii. 4. When David had his hands full of public affairs, yet he returned to bless his house, 2 Sam. vi. 20. He resolves, 1st. To act conscientiously and with integrity, to walk in a perfect way, that is, in the way of God's commandments; that is a perfect way, for "the law of the Lord is perfect." This he will walk in with a perfect heart, with all sincerity, not dissembling either with God or men. When we make the Word of God our rule, and are ruled by it, the glory of God our end, and aim at it, then we walk in a perfect way with a perfect heart. 2nd. To act considerately and with discretion, "I will behave myself wisely;" 'I will understand,' or 'instruct myself in a perfect way;' (so some;) I will walk circumspectly. Note, We must all resolve to walk by the rules of Christian prudence in the ways of Christian piety. We must never turn aside out of the perfect way under pretence of xcviii. 9. The words "before the Lord, for he cometh," are repeated in some of the Greek copies, nearly as in Psa. xcvi. 13. The repetition is not well supported.

xcix. 1. For "people" we must render "peoples" or "nations." "He sitteth between the cherubims," or dwells between them, refers to the cherubim over the mercy-seat, where the Divine glory was manifested. This is the true explanation of the phrase, as appears from Ex. xxv. 20—22, and similar passages.

xcix. 4. Rosenmüller suggests that the first clause means, "and (let them praise, verse 3) the strength of the king who loveth judgment." This is a reasonable explanation, and on the whole we prefer it. Some, however, would treat the word "strength" as an adjective, and add it to the previous verse: "for he is holy and strong, a king who loveth judgment."

xcix. 5. More literally, "Exalt the Lord our God, and worship at the footstool of his feet; he is holy." The Latin Vulgate, as followed behaving ourselves wisely; but while we keep to the good way we must be wise as serpents. 2. Here is a good prayer: "O when wilt thou come unto me!" Note, It is a desirable thing when a man hath a house of his own to have God come to him, and dwell with him in it; and those may expect God's presence that walk with a perfect heart in a perfect way. If we compare the account which the historian gives of David, 1 Sam. xviii. 14, we shall find how exactly it answers his purpose and prayer, and that neither was in vain. David, as he purposed, behaved himself wisely in all his ways, and as he prayed the Lord was with him.

Thirdly. His particular resolution to practise no evil himself; ver. 3, "I will set no wicked thing before mine eyes;" that is, I will not design or aim at any thing but what is for the glory of God and the public welfare. He will never have it in his eye to enrich himself by impoverishing his subjects, or enlarge his own prerogative by encroaching on their property. In all our worldly business we must see that that be right and good which we set our eyes upon, and not any forbidden fruit, and that we never seek that which we cannot have without sin. It is the character of a good man that he shuts his eyes from seeing of evil, Isa. xxxiii. 15. Nay, I hate the work of them that turn aside from the paths of equity, Job xxxi. 7; not only I avoid it, but abhor it, it shall not cleave to me; if any blot of injustice should come on my hands, it shall be washed off quickly.

Fourthly. His farther resolution not to keep bad servants, nor to employ those about him that were vicious. He will not countenance them, nor shew them any favour, lest thereby he should harden them in their wickedness, and encourage others to do like them. He will not converse with them himself, nor admit them into the company of his other servants, lest they should spread the infection of sin in his family. He will not confide in them, nor put them in power under him, for they would certainly hinder every thing that is good, who did themselves hate to be reformed. When he comes to instance in particulars, he doth not mention drunkards, adulterers, murderers, or blasphemers; such gross sinners as these he was in no danger of admitting into his house: nor did he need to covenant particularly against having fellowship with them; but he instanceth in those sinners who were less scandalous, but no less dangerous, and in reference to whom he needed to stand upon his guard with caution, and to behave himself wisely.

1. He will have nothing to do with spiteful malicious people, they are ill-natured, and will bear a grudge a great while, and care not what mischief they do to those they have a pique against; ver. 4, "A froward heart," one that delights to be cross and perverse, "shall depart from me," as not fit for society, the bond of which is love. "I will not know," that is, I will have no acquaintance or conversation, if I can help it, with such a wicked person, for a little of the leaven of malice and wickedness will leaven the whole lump.

2. Nor with slanderers and those who take a pleasure in wounding their neighbours' reputation secretly; ver. 5, "Whoso privily slandereth his neighbour," either raises or spreads false stories to the prejudice of his good name, "him will I cut off" from my family and court. Many endeavour to raise themselves into the favour of princes by unjust representations of persons and things which they think will please their prince: "If a ruler hearken to lies, all his servants are wicked," Pr. xxix. 12. But David will not only not hearken to them, but will baulk the preferment of those that hope thus to curry favour with him. He will punish not only those that falsely accuse another in open court, but that privily slander another. I wish David remembered this vow in the case of Mephibosheth and Ziba.

3. Nor with haughty, conceited, ambitious people; none do more mischief in a family, in a court, in a church, for "only by pride comes contention;" therefore him "that hath an high look and a proud heart will I not suffer." I will have no patience with them that are still grasping at all preferments, for it is certain they do not aim at doing good, but only at aggrandizing themselves and their families. God resists the proud, and so will David.

4. Nor with false deceitful people, that make no conscience of a lie or a fraud; ver. 7, "He that worketh deceit," though he may insinuate himself into my family, yet as soon as he is discovered, he "shall not dwell within my house." Some great men know how to serve their own purposes by such as are skilful to deceive, and they are fit tools for them to work by, but David will make use of no such as agents for him; "he that telleth lies shall not tarry in my sight," but shall be expelled the house with indignation. Herein David was a man after God's own heart, for a proud look and a lying tongue are things which God hates. And he was also a type of Christ, who will in the great day banish from his presence all that love and make a lie, Rev. xxii. 15.

Fifthly. His resolution to put those in trust under him that were honest and good; ver. 6, "Mine eyes shall be upon the faithful in the land." In choosing his servants and ministers of state he kept to the land of Israel, and would not employ foreigners; none shall be preferred but true-born Israelites, and those such as were Israelites indeed, "the faithful in the land," for even in that land there were those that were unfaithful. These faithful ones his eyes shall be upon, to discover them and find them out, for they were modest, did not crowd into the city, to court preferment, but lived retired in the land, in the country, out of the way of it. Those are commonly most fit for places of honour and trust that are least fond of them, and therefore wise princes will spy out such in their recesses and privacies, and take them to dwell with them, and act under them. "He that walks in a perfect way," that makes conscience of what he saith and doth, "he shall serve me." The kingdom must be searched for honest men to make courtiers of, and if any man were better than another, he must be preferred. This was a good resolution of David's, but either he did not keep to it, or else his judgment was imposed upon, when he made Ahithophel his right hand. It should be the care and endeavour of all masters of families, for their own sakes and their children's, to take such servants into their families as they have reason to hope fear God. The Son of David has his eyes upon the faithful in the land; his secret is with them, and they shall dwell with him. Saul chose servants for their goodliness, 1 Sam. viii. 16, but David for their goodness.

Lastly. His resolution to extend his zeal to the reformation of the city and country as well as of the court; ver. 8, "I will early destroy all the wicked of the land," that is, all that are discovered and convicted, the law shall have its course against them. He would do his utmost to destroy all the wicked, so as that there might be none left that were notoriously wicked; he would do it early, that is, he would lose no time, and spare no pains, he would be forward and zealous in promoting the reformation of manners and suppression of vice, and those must rise betimes that will do any thing to purpose in that work. That which he aimed at was not only the securing of his own government and the peace of the country, but the honour of God in the purity of his church, "That I may cut off all wicked doers from the city of the Lord;" not Jerusalem only, but the whole land was the city of the Lord; so is the gospel church. It is the interest of the city of the Lord to be purged from evil-doers, who both blemish it and weaken it, and it is therefore the duty of all to do what they can in their places towards so good a work, and to be zealously affected in it. The day is coming when the Son of David shall cut off all wicked doers from the new Jerusalem, for there shall not enter into it any that do iniquity.

PSALM CII.

Some think David penned this psalm at the time of Absalom's rebellion; others, that Daniel, Nehemiah, or some other prophet penned it for the use of the church when it was in captivity in Babylon, because it seems to speak of the ruins of Zion, and of a time set for the rebuilding of it, which Daniel understood by books, Dan. ix. 2. Or perhaps the psalmist was himself in great affliction, which he complains of in the beginning of the psalm, but (as in Ps. lxxvii. and elsewhere) he comforts himself under it with the consideration of God's eternity, and the church's prosperity and perpetuity, however it was now distressed and threatened. But it is clear by the application of ver. 25, 26, to Christ, Heb. i. 11, 12, that the psalm has reference to the days of the Messiah, and speaks either of his affliction, or the afflictions of his church for his sake. In the psalm we have, I. A sorrowful complaint which the psalmist makes either for himself, or in the name of the church, of great afflictions which were very pressing, ver. 1—11. II. Seasonable comfort fetched in against these grievances, 1. From the eternity of God, ver. 12, 23, 27. 2. From a believing prospect of the deliverance which God would in due time work for his afflicted church, ver. 13—22, and the continuance of it in the world, ver. 28. In singing this psalm, if we have not occasion to make the same complaints, yet we may take occasion to sympathize with those that have, and then the comfortable part of the psalm will be more comfortable to us in the singing of it.

A Prayer of the afflicted, when he is overwhelmed, and poureth out his complaint before the LORD.

HEAR my prayer, O LORD,
And let my cry come unto thee. [trouble;
2 Hide not thy face from me in the day when I am in Incline thine ear unto me: in the day when I call Answer me speedily.
3 For my days are consumed like smoke,
And my bones are burned as an hearth.
4 My heart is smitten, and withered like grass;
So that I forget to eat my bread.
5 By reason of the voice of my groaning
My bones cleave to my skin.
6 I am like a pelican of the wilderness:
I am like an owl of the desert.

OWLS.

7 I watch, and am as a sparrow alone upon the house top.
8 Mine enemies reproach me all the day;
And they that are mad against me are sworn against me.
9 For I have eaten ashes like bread,
And mingled my drink with weeping,
10 Because of thine indignation and thy wrath:
For thou hast lifted me up, and cast me down.
11 My days are like a shadow that declineth;
And I am withered like grass

The title of this psalm is very observable: it is "a prayer of the afflicted;" it was composed by one that was himself afflicted, afflicted with the church and for it; and on those that are of a public spirit afflictions of that kind lie heavier than any other. It is calculated for an afflicted state, and is intended for the use of others that may be in the like distress; "for whatsoever things were written aforetime were written" designedly "for our use." The whole Word of God is of use to direct us in prayer; but here, as often elsewhere, the Holy Ghost has drawn up our petition for us, has put words into our mouths; Hos. xiv. 2, "Take with you words." Here is a prayer put into the hands of the afflicted; let them set, not their hands, but their hearts to it, and present it to God. Note, 1. It is many times the lot of the best saints in this world to be sorely afflicted. 2. Even good men may be almost overwhelmed with their afflictions, and may be ready to faint under them. 3. When our state is afflicted, and our spirits overwhelmed, it is our duty and interest to pray, and by prayer to pour out our complaints before the Lord; which intimates the leave God gives us to be free with him, and the liberty of speech we have before him, as well as liberty of access to him; it intimates also what an ease it is to an afflicted spirit to unburthen itself by an humble representation of its grievances and griefs. Such a representation we have here; in which,

First. The psalmist humbly begs of God to take notice of his affliction, and of his prayer in his affliction, ver. 1, 2. When we pray in our affliction, 1. It should by the English Romanist version, has "adore his footstool, for it is holy;" but this is absurd, for the Hebrews did not adore the ark, here supposed to be called the footstool of God. The Papists might just as well translate Psa. v. 7, "I will adore thy holy temple," and not as they do, "I will adore towards thy holy temple." The fancy that the ark was a type of Christ's body, and therefore adored, is groundless. The Chaldee renders our passage, "Worship at the temple of his holiness." See the next note.

xcix. 9. "Worship at his holy hill." In the Hebrew this exactly conforms with verse 5, but the Latin Vulgate, as represented by the Douay Bible, translates "adore ye in his holy mount." To be consistent, they should have put "adore ye his holy mount," which they did not venture to do.

c. 3. Instead of "and not we ourselves," there is a various reading in the Hebrew, "and his we are," which is adopted by the Chaldee translator. Symmachus renders, "He made us when we be our care that God would graciously hear us; for if our prayers be not pleasing to God, they will be to no purpose to ourselves. Let this therefore be in our eye, that our prayer may come unto God, even to his ears, Ps. xviii. 6; and in order to that let us lift up the prayer, and our souls with it. 2. It may be our hope that God will graciously hear us, because he has appointed us to seek him, and has promised we shall not seek him in vain. If we put up a prayer in faith, we may in faith say, "Hear my prayer, O Lord." Hear me, that is, 1st. Manifest thyself to me; "hide not thy face from me" in displeasure "when I am in trouble:" if thou dost not presently free me, yet let me know that thou favourest me; if I see not the operations of thy hand for me, yet let me see the smiles of thy face upon me. God's hiding his face is trouble enough to a good man, even in his prosperity; Ps. xxx. 7, "Thou didst hide thy face, and I was troubled;" but if when we are in trouble God hides his face, the case is sad indeed. 2nd. Manifest thyself to me; not only hear me, but answer me; grant me the deliverance I am in want of, and in pursuit of; "answer me speedily, even in the day when I call." When troubles press hard upon us, God gives us leave to be in prayer thus pressing upon him, yet with humility and patience.

Secondly. He makes a lamentable complaint of the low condition to which he was reduced by his afflictions.

1. His body was macerated and emaciated, and he was become a perfect skeleton, nothing but skin and bones. As prosperity and joy are represented by making fat the bones, and the bones flourishing like an herb: so great trouble and grief are here represented by the contrary; "My bones are burnt as an hearth," ver. 3; "they cleave to my skin," ver. 5; nay, "my heart is smitten, and withered like grass," ver. 4; it toucheth the vitals, and there is a sensible decay there. "I am withered like grass," ver. 11, scorched with the burning heat of my troubles. If we be thus brought low by bodily distempers, let us not think it strange; the body is like grass, weak, and of the earth, no wonder it withers then.

2. He was very melancholy, and of a sorrowful spirit: he was so taken up with the thoughts of his troubles, that he forgot to eat bread, ver. 4; he had no appetite to his necessary food, nor could he relish it. When God hides his face from a soul, the delights of sense will be sapless things. He was always sighing and groaning, as one pressed above measure, ver. 5, and this wasted him and exhausted his spirits. He affected solitude, as melancholy people do. His friends deserted him and were shy of him, and he cared as little for their company; ver. 6, 7, "I am like a pelican in the wilderness," or a bittern, (so some,) that makes a doleful noise; "I am like an owl," that affects to lodge in deserted, ruined buildings. "I watch, and am as a sparrow on the house top;" I live in a garret, and there spend my hours in poring on my troubles, and bemoaning myself. Those who do thus when they are in sorrow, humour themselves indeed, but they prejudice themselves, and know not what they do, nor what advantage they hereby give to the tempter. In affliction we should sit alone, to consider our ways, Lam. iii. 28; but not sit alone to indulge sr inordinate grief.

3. He was evil spoken of by his enemies, and all manner of evil said against him. When his friends went off from him, his foes set themselves against him; ver. 8, "Mine enemies reproach me all the day;" designing thereby both to create vexation to himself,—for an ingenuous mind regrets reproach,—and to bring an odium upon him before men. When they could not otherwise reach him they shot these arrows at him, even bitter words, and in this they were unwearied, they did it all the day, it was a continual dropping. His enemies were very outrageous: "They are mad against me," and very obstinate and implacable; they are sworn against me, as the Jews that bound themselves with an oath to kill Paul; or, They have sworn against me as accusers, to take away my life.

4. He fasted and wept under the tokens of God's displeasure; ver. 9, 10, "I have eaten ashes like bread," that is, instead of eating my bread, I have lain down in dust and ashes, and "I have mingled my drink with weeping;" when I should have refreshed myself with drinking, I have only eased myself with weeping. And what is the matter? He tells us, ver. 10, "Because of thy wrath." It was not so much the trouble itself that troubled him, as the wrath of God, which he was under the apprehensions of as the cause of the trouble. This, this was the wormwood and the gall in the affliction and the misery. "Thou hast lifted me up and cast me down;" as that which we cast to the ground with a design to dash it to pieces; we lift it up first that we may throw it down with the more violence. Or, Thou hast formerly lifted me up in honour, and joy, and uncommon prosperity; but the remembrance of that aggravates the present grief, and makes it the more grievous. We must eye the hand of God, both in lifting us up, and casting us down, and say, Blessed be the name of the Lord, who both gives and takes away.

5. He looked upon himself as a dying man; "My days are consumed like smoke," ver. 3, which vanisheth away presently. Or, They are consumed in smoke, of which nothing remains. They are like a shadow that declineth, ver. 11; like the evening-shadow, or a forerunner of night approaching. Now all this, though it seems to speak the psalmist's personal calamities, and therefore is properly a prayer for a particular person afflicted, yet is supposed to be a description of the afflictions of the church of God, with which the psalmist sympathizeth, making public grievances his own. The mystical body of Christ is sometimes, like the psalmist's body here, withered and parched, nay, like dead and dry bones. The church sometimes is forced into the wilderness, seems lost, and gives up herself for gone, under the tokens of God's displeasure.

12 But thou, O LORD, shalt endure for ever;
And thy remembrance unto all generations.
13 Thou shalt arise, and have mercy upon Zion:
For the time to favour her, yea, the set time, is come.
14 For thy servants take pleasure in her stones,
And favour the dust thereof.
15 So the heathen shall fear the name of the LORD,
And all the kings of the earth thy glory.
16 When the LORD shall build up Zion,
He shall appear in his glory.
17 He will regard the prayer of the destitute,
And not despise their prayer.
18 This shall be written for the generation to come:
And the people which shall be created shall praise the LORD.
19 For he hath looked down from the height of his sanctuary,
From heaven did the LORD behold the earth;
20 To hear the groaning of the prisoner;
To loose those that are appointed to death;
21 To declare the name of the LORD in Zion,
And his praise in Jerusalem;
22 When the people are gathered together,
And the kingdoms, to serve the LORD.

Many exceeding great and precious comforts are here thought of, and mustered up to balance the foregoing complaints, for "unto the upright there ariseth light in the darkness," so that though they are cast down they are not in despair. It is bad with the psalmist himself, bad with the people of God, but he hath many considerations to revive himself with.

First. We are dying creatures, and our interests and comforts dying, but God is an everliving, everlasting God; ver. 12, "My days are like a shadow;" there is no remedy, night is coming upon me; but "thou, O Lord, shalt endure for ever." Our life is transient, but thine is permanent; our friends die, but our God dies not; what threatened us cannot touch him; our names will be written in the dust, and buried in oblivion, but "thy remembrance shall be unto all generations," to the end of time, nay, to eternity, thou shalt be known and honoured. A good man loves God better than himself, and therefore can balance his own sorrow and death with the pleasing thought of the unchangeable blessedness of the Eternal Mind. God endures for ever, his church's faithful patron and protector; and his honour and perpetual remembrance being very much bound up in her interests, we may be confident that they shall not be neglected.

Secondly. Poor Zion is now in distress, but there will come a time for her relief and succour; ver. 13, "Thou shalt arise, and have mercy upon Zion." The hope of deliverance is built upon the goodness of God, "Thou wilt have mercy upon Zion," for she is become an object of thy pity; and upon the power of God, "Thou shalt arise, and have mercy," shalt stir up thyself to do it, shalt do it in contempt of all the opposition made by the church's enemies; "the zeal of the Lord of hosts shall do this." And that which is very encouraging is, that there is a time set for the deliverance of the church, which not only will come some time, but will come at the time appointed, the time which Infinite Wisdom hath appointed, and therefore it is the best time; and which Eternal Truth has fixed it to, and therefore it is a certain time, and shall not be forgotten or farther adjourned. At the end of seventy years the time to favour Zion, by delivering her from the daughter of Babylon, was to come, and at length it did come. Zion was now in ruins, that is, the temple that was built in the city of David: the favouring of Zion is the building of it up again, as it is explained ver. 16. This is expected from the favour of God; that will set all to rights, and nothing but that, and therefore Daniel prays, Dan. ix. 17, "Cause thy face to shine upon thy sanctuary, which is desolate." And the building up of Zion is as great a favour to any people as they can desire. No blessing more desirable to a ruined state than the restoring and re-establishing of their church privileges. Now this is here wished for and longed for,

1. Because it would be a great rejoicing to Zion's friends; ver. 14, "Thy servants take pleasure" even "in the stones" of the temple, though they were thrown down and scattered, "and favour the dust," the very rubbish and ruins of it. Observe here, That when the temple was ruined, yet the stones of it were to be had for a new building, and there were those who encouraged themselves with that, for they had a favour even for the dust of it. Those that truly love the church of God, love it when it is in affliction as well as when it is in prosperity; and it is a good ground to hope that God will favour the ruins of Zion, when he puts it into the heart of his people to favour them, and to shew that they do so by their prayers and by their endeavours; as it is also a good plea with God for mercy for Zion, that there are those who are so affectionately concerned for her, and are "waiting for the salvation of the Lord."

2. Because it would have a good influence upon Zion's neighbours, ver. 5. It will be a happy means perhaps of their conversion, however of their conviction; for "so the heathen shall fear the name of the Lord," shall have high thoughts of him and of his people, and even the kings of the earth shall be affected with his glory. They shall have better thoughts of the church of God than they have had, when God by his providence thus puts an honour upon it. They shall be afraid of doing any thing against it when they see God taking its part; nay, they shall say, "We will go with you, for we have seen that God is with you," Zec. viii. 23: thus it is said, Est. viii. 17, that "many of the people of the land became Jews, for the fear of the Jews fell upon them."

3. Because it would redound to the honour of Zion's God; ver. 16, "When the Lord shall build up Zion." They take it for granted it will be done, for God himself hath undertaken it, and "he shall then appear in his glory;" and for that reason all that have made his glory their highest end, desire it and pray for it. Note, The edifying of the church will be the glorifying of God, and therefore we may be assured it will be done in the set time. They that pray in faith, "Father, glorify thy name," may receive the same answer to that prayer which was given to Christ himself by a voice from heaven, "I have both glorified it, and I will glorify it yet again," though now for a time it may be eclipsed.

Thirdly. The prayers of God's people now seem to be slighted, and no notice taken of them, but they will be reviewed, and greatly encouraged; ver. 17, "He will regard the prayer of the destitute." It was said, ver. 16, that God will appear in his glory, such a glory as kings themselves shall stand in awe of, ver. 15. When great men appear in their glory, they are apt to look with disdain upon the poor that apply themselves to them, but the great God will not do so. Observe, 1. The meanness of the petitioners, they are the destitute; it is an elegant word that is here used, which signifies the heath in the wilderness, a low shrub or bush, like the hyssop of the wall. They are supposed to be in a low and broken state, enriched with spiritual blessings but destitute of temporal good things: the poor, the weak, the desolate, the stripped; thus variously is the word rendered; or it may signify that low and broken spirit which God looks for in all that draw nigh to him, and which he will graciously look upon. This will bring them to their knees. Destitute people should be praying people, 1 Tim. v. 5. 2. The favour of God to them, notwithstanding their meanness. He will regard their prayer, and will look at, will peruse their petition, 2 Chr. vi. 40, and he will not despise their prayer. More is implied than is expressed. He will value it, and be well pleased with it, and will return an answer of peace to it, which is the greatest honour that can be put upon it. But it is thus expressed because others despise their praying; they themselves fear God will despise it; and he was thought to despise it while their affliction was prolonged, and their prayers lay unanswered. When we consider our own meanness and vileness, our darkness and deadness, and manifold defects in our prayers, we have cause to suspect that our prayers will be received with dis were not," and the Arabic is similar. Jerome took the same reading as the Chaldee, and we regard it as the more natural.

ci. 1. By "mercy and judgment" some understand the different aspects in which the psalmist would display himself to the good and to the bad.

ci. 2. Some render "I will act wisely in a perfect way when thou shalt come to me." This gives good sense. The psalmist will do all he vows if God abides with him.

ci. 3. "Wicked thing" in the Hebrew is "thing of Belial," as in Psa. xli. 8, where it means, as here, something wicked, or wickedness.

ci. 8. "The city of the Lord" is Jerusalem, although it might represent the community of Israel.

cii. Title. This title appears almost the same in the Septuagint. The author is unknown, but the date almost certainly is that of the exile to Babylon.

cii. 3. "My bones are burned as an hearth:" we think this means dain in heaven; but we are here assured of the contrary, for we have an Advocate with the Father, and are under grace, not under the law. This instance of God's favour to his praying people, though they are destitute, will be a lasting encouragement to prayer; ver. 18, "This shall be written for the generation to come," that none may despair, though they be destitute, nor think their prayers forgotten because they have not an answer to them presently. Others' experiences should be our encouragements to seek unto God, and trust in him. And if we have the comfort of others' experiences it is fit we should give God the glory of them: "The people which shall be created shall praise the Lord," for what he hath done both for them and for their predecessors; many that are now unborn, by reading the history of the church, shall be wrought upon to turn proselytes. The people that shall be created anew by Divine grace, that are a kind of firstfruits of his creatures, shall praise the Lord for his answers to their prayers when they were more destitute.

Fourthly. The prisoners under condemnation unjustly seem as sheep appointed for the slaughter, but care shall be taken for their discharge; ver. 19, 20, "God hath looked down from the height of his sanctuary, from heaven," where he hath prepared his throne, that high place, that holy place; thence "did the Lord behold the earth," for it is a place of prospect, and nothing on this earth is or can be hid from his all-seeing eye. He looks down not to take a view of the kingdoms of the world and the glory of them, but to do acts of grace, "to hear the groaning of the prisoners," which we would desire to be out of the hearing of; and not only to hear them, but to help them, "to loose those that are appointed to death," then when there is but a step between them and it. Some understand it of the release of the Jews out of their captivity in Babylon; God heard their groaning there as he did when they were in Egypt, Ex. iii. 7, 9, and came down to deliver them. God takes notice not only of the prayers of his afflicted people, which are the language of grace, but even of their groans, which are the language of nature. See the Divine pity, in hearing the prisoners' groans, and the Divine power, in loosing the prisoners' bonds; even when they are appointed to death, and are pinioned and double shackled: we have an instance in Peter, Acts xii. 6.

Such instances as these of the Divine condescension and compassion will help, 1. "To declare the name of the Lord in Zion," and to make it appear that he answers his name which he himself proclaimed, "The Lord God, gracious and merciful;" and this declaration of his name in Zion shall be the matter of his praise in Jerusalem, ver. 21. If God by his providences declare his name, we must by our acknowledgments of them declare his praise, which ought to be the echo of his name. God will discharge his people that were prisoners and captives in Babylon, "that they may declare his name in Zion," the place he has chosen to put his name there, and his praise in Jerusalem, at their return thither. In the land of their captivity they could not sing the songs of Zion, Ps. cxxxvii. 3, 4, and therefore God brought them again to Jerusalem that they might sing them there. For this end God gives liberty from bondage; "Bring my soul out of prison, that I may praise thy name," Ps. cxlii. 7; and life from the dead, "Let my soul live, and it shall praise thee," Ps. cxix. 175. 2. They will help to draw in others to the worship of God; ver. 22, "when the people of God are gathered together at Jerusalem," (as they were after their return out of Babylon,) many out of the kingdoms joined with them "to serve the Lord." This was fulfilled, Ezr. vi. 21, where we find that not only the children of Israel that were come out of captivity, but many that had "separated themselves to them from among the heathen," did "keep the fast of unleavened bread with joy." But it may look farther, at the conversion of the Gentiles to the faith of Christ in the latter days. Christ has proclaimed liberty to the captives, and the opening of the prison to them that were bound, that they may declare the name of the Lord in the Gospel church, in which Jews and Gentiles shall unite.

23 He weakened my strength in the way;
He shortened my days. [days:
24 I said, O my God, take me not away in the midst of my Thy years are throughout all generations.
25 Of old hast thou laid the foundation of the earth:
And the heavens are the work of thy hands
26 They shall perish, but thou shalt endure:
Yea, all of them shall wax old like a garment;
As a vesture shalt thou change them, and they shall be 27 But thou art the same, [changed:
And thy years shall have no end.
28 The children of thy servants shall continue,
And their seed shall be established before thee.

We may here observe,

First. The imminent danger that the Jewish church was in of being quite extirpated and cut off by the captivity in Babylon; ver. 23, "He weakened my strength in the way." They were for many ages in the way to the performance of the great promise made to their fathers concerning the Messiah, longing as much for it as ever a traveller did to be at his journey's end. The legal institutions led them in the way; but when the ten tribes were lost in Assyria, and the two almost lost in Babylon, the strength of that nation was weakened, and in all appearance its days shortened, for they said "our hope is lost, we are cut off for our parts," Eze. xxxvii. 11; and then what comes of the promise that Shiloh should arise out of Judah, the star out of Jacob, and the Messiah out of the family of David? If these fail, the promise fails. This the psalmist speaks of as in his own person, and it is very applicable to two of the common afflictions of this time: 1. To be sickly; bodily distempers soon weaken our strength in the way, make the keepers of the house to tremble, and the strong men to bow themselves. 2. To be short-lived; where the former is felt, this is feared. When in the midst of our days, according to a course of nature, our strength is weakened, what can we expect, but that "the number of our months should be cut off in the midst," and what should we do but provide accordingly? We must own God's hand in it, for in his hand our strength and our times are; and must reconcile it to his love, for it has often been the lot of those that have used their strength well, yet to have it weakened; and of those who could very ill be spared, yet to have their days shortened.

Secondly. A prayer for the continuance of it; ver. 24, "O my God, take me not away in the midst of my days." Let not this poor church be cut off in the midst of the days assigned it by the promise; let it not be cut off till the Messiah is come; "Destroy it not, for that blessing is in it," Isa. lxv. 8. It is a criminal, but for the sake of that blessing which is in her, she pleads for a reprieve. This is "a prayer for the afflicted," and which with submission to the will of God we may in faith put up, that God would not "take us away in the midst of our days;" but that if it be his will, he would spare us to do him farther service, and to be made riper for heaven.

Thirdly. A plea to enforce this prayer taken from the eternity of the Messiah promised, ver. 25—27. The apostle quotes these verses, Heb. i. 10—12; and tells us, "He saith this to the Son," and in that exposition we must acquiesce. It is very comfortable, in reference to all the changes that pass over the church, and all the dangers it is in, that "Jesus Christ is the same yesterday, to day, and for ever." "Thy years are throughout all generations," and cannot be shortened. As it is likewise comfortable in reference to the decay and death of our own bodies, and the removal of our friends from us, that God is an everliving God, and therefore, if he be ours, in him we may have everlasting consolation. In this plea observe how, to illustrate the eternity of the Creator, he compares it with the mutability of the creature, for it is God's sole prerogative to be unchangeable.

1. God made the world, and therefore had a being before it from eternity; the Son of God, the eternal Word, made the world. It is expressly said, "All things were made by him, and without him was not any thing made that was made;" and, "therefore the same was in the beginning" from eternity "with God, and was God," Jno. i. 1—3; Col. i. 16; Eph. iii. 9; Heb. i. 2. Earth and heaven, and the hosts of both, include the universe and its fulness, and these derive their being from God by his Son; ver. 25, "Of old hast thou laid the foundation of the earth," that is founded on the seas, and on the floods, and yet it abideth; much more shall the church which is built upon a rock. "The heavens are the work of thy hands," and by thee are all their motions and influences directed; God is therefore the fountain, not only of all being, but of all power and dominion. See how fit the great Redeemer is to be intrusted with all power both in heaven and in earth, since he himself, as Creator of both, perfectly knows both, and is entitled to both.

2. God will unmake the world again, and therefore shall have a being to eternity; ver. 26, 27, "They shall perish," for "thou shalt change them," by the same almighty power that made them; and therefore, no doubt, "thou shalt endure; thou art the same." God and the world, Christ and the creature, are rivals for the innermost and uppermost place in the soul of man, the immortal soul; now what is here said, one would think, were enough to decide the controversy presently, and to determine us for God and Christ. For, 1st. A portion in the creature is fading and dying; "They shall perish," they will not last so long as we shall last; the day is coming when "the earth and all the works that are therein shall be burnt up;" and then what will become of those that have laid up their treasure in it? Heaven and earth "shall wax old as a garment," not by a gradual decay; but when the set time comes, they shall be laid aside like an old garment that we have no more occasion for. "As a vesture shalt thou change them, and they shall be changed;" not annihilated, but altered it may be, so as that they shall not be at all the same, but "new heavens and a new earth." See God's sovereign dominion over heaven and earth; he can change them as he pleaseth, and when he pleaseth, and the constant changes they are subject to in the revolutions of day and night, summer and winter, are earnests of their last and final change, when the heavens and time (which they measure) shall be no more. 2nd. A portion in God is perpetual and everlasting; for "thou art the same," subject to no change, "and thy years have no end," ver. 27. Christ will be the same in the performance that he was in the promise; the same to his church in captivity that he was to his church at liberty. Let not the church fear the weakening of her strength or the shortening of her days, while Christ himself is both her strength and her life, and he is the same; and hath said, "Because I live ye shall live also." Christ came in the fulness of time, and set up his kingdom, in spite of the power of the Old Testament Babylon, and he will keep it up in spite of the power of the New Testament Babylon.

Fourthly. A comfortable assurance of an answer to this prayer; ver. 28, "The children of thy servants shall continue." Since Christ is the same, the church shall continue from one generation to another. From the eternity of the Head we may infer the perpetuity of the body, though often weak and distempered, and even at death's door. They that hope to wear out the saints of the Most High will be mistaken. Christ's servants shall have children; those children shall have a seed, that is, a succession of professing people. The church as well as the world is under the influence of that blessing, "Be fruitful and multiply." These children shall continue, not in their own persons, by reason of death, but in their seed, which shall be established before God, that is, in his service, and by his grace. The entail of religion shall not be cut off while the world stands; but as one generation of good people passeth away, another shall come, and thus the throne of Christ shall endure.

PSALM CIII.

This psalm calls more for devotion than exposition; it is a most excellent psalm of praise, and of general use. The psalmist, I. Stirs up himself and his own soul to praise God, ver. 1, 2, for his favour to him in particular, ver. 3—5, to the church in general, and to all good men, to whom he is and will be just, and kind, and constant, ver. 6—18, and for his government of the world, ver. 19. II. He desires the assistance of the holy angels and all the works of God in praising him, ver. 20—22. In singing this psalm we must in a special manner get our hearts affected with the goodness of God, and enlarged in love and thankfulness.

A Psalm of David.

BLESS the LORD, O my soul:
And all that is within me, bless his holy name.
2 Bless the LORD, O my soul,
And forget not all his benefits:
3 Who forgiveth all thine iniquities;
Who healeth all thy diseases;
4 Who redeemeth thy life from destruction; [cies;
Who crowneth thee with lovingkindness and tender mer-
5 Who satisfieth thy mouth with good things;
So that thy youth is renewed like the eagle's.

David is here communing with his own heart; and he is no fool that thus talks to himself, and excites his own soul to that which is good. Observe,

First. How he stirs up himself to the duty of praise, ver. 1, 2. 1. It is the Lord that is to be blessed and spoken well of, for he is the fountain of all good, whatever are the channel or cisterns. It is to his name, his holy name, that we are to consecrate our praise, giving thanks at the remembrance of his holi-

---

"as if on fire," though it must be owned that our version gives a striking comparison—my bones are like the stones of a fire-place, always burning, though not consumed and destroyed.

cii. 4. "My heart is stricken like grass and withers:" just as the grass is sun-struck and withers, so grief smites my heart, and it languishes.

cii. 11. For "declineth" we should read "lengthens" or "extends," which is a more correct version.

cii. 12—22. A catalogue of hopes follows the list of sorrows occupying the previous verses. In the enumeration of his troubles the psalmist is intensely personal, probably because it was meant that every Israelite who used the psalm should make the national calamity and grief his own. Here, however, the speaker never appears in his individual character, probably because the hope of the people was common to them all. "The Lord will have compassion upon Zion, because the appointed time to do so is come." This ness. 2. It is the soul that is to be employed in blessing God, and all that is within us. We make nothing of our religious performances if we do not make heart-work of them; if that which is within us, nay, if all that is within us be not engaged in them. The work requires the inward man, the whole man, and all little enough. 3. In order to our return of praises to God, there must be a grateful remembrance of the mercies we have received from him. "Forget not all his benefits." If we do not give thanks for them, we do forget them, and that is unjust as well as unkind; since in all God's favours there is so much that is memorable. O my soul! to thy shame be it spoken, thou hast forgotten many of his benefits; but sure thou wilt not forget them all, for thou shouldest not have forgotten any.

Secondly. How he furnisheth himself with abundant matter for praise, and that which is very affecting; Come, my soul, consider what God has done for thee.

1. He hath pardoned thy sins, ver. 3. He hath forgiven and doth forgive all thine iniquities. This is mentioned first, because by the pardon of sin that is taken away which kept good things from us, and we are restored to the favour of God, which bestows good things on us. Think what the provocation was, it was iniquity, and yet pardoned; how many the provocations were, and yet all pardoned; he hath forgiven all our trespasses. It is a continued act; he is still forgiving, as we are still sinning and repenting.

2. He hath cured thy sickness. The corruption of nature is the sickness of the soul, it is its disorder, and threatens its death. This is cured in sanctification; when sin is mortified, the disease is healed; though complicated, it is all healed. Our crimes were capital, but God saves our lives by pardoning them; our diseases were mortal, but God saves our lives by healing them. These two go together, for "as for God his work is perfect," and not done by the halves; if God take away the guilt of sin by pardoning mercy, he will break the power of it by renewing grace. Where Christ is made righteousness to any soul, he is made sanctification, 1 Cor. i. 30.

3. He hath rescued thee from danger. A man may be in peril of life, not only by his crimes or his diseases, but by the power of his enemies; and therefore, here also we experience the Divine goodness: "who redeemed thy life from destruction," ver. 4, from the destroyer; from hell, (so the Chaldee;) from the second death. The redemption of the soul is precious, we cannot compass it, and therefore are the more indebted to Divine grace that has wrought it out, to him who hath obtained eternal redemption for us: see Job xxxiii. 24, 28.

4. He hath not only saved thee from death and ruin, but has made thee truly and completely happy, with honour, pleasure, and long life. 1st. He hath given thee true honour, and great honour, no less than a crown; "He crowneth thee with his lovingkindness and tender mercies;" and what greater dignity is a poor soul capable of, than to be advanced into the love and favour of God? "This honour have all his saints." What is the crown of glory but God's favour? 2nd. He hath given thee true pleasure; he "satisfieth thy mouth with good things," ver. 5; and it is only the favour and grace of God that can give satisfaction to a soul, can suit its capacities, supply it needs, and answer its desires. Nothing but Divine wisdom can undertake to fill its treasures, Pr. viii. 21; other things will surfeit but not satiate, Eccl. vi 7; Isa. lv. 2. 3rd. He hath given thee a prospect and pledge of long life; "Thy youth is renewed like the eagle's." The eagle is long-lived, and, as naturalists say, when she is near a hundred years old, casts all her feathers, (as indeed she changes them in a great measure every year at moulting-time,) and fresh ones come, so that she becomes young again. When God by the graces and comforts of his Spirit recovers his people from their decays, and fills them with new life and joy, which is to them an earnest of eternal life and joy, then they may be said to return to the days of their youth, Job xxxiii. 25.

6 The LORD executeth righteousness and judgment
For all that are oppressed.
7 He made known his ways unto Moses,
His acts unto the children of Israel.
8 The LORD is merciful and gracious,
Slow to anger, and plenteous in mercy
9 He will not always chide:
Neither will he keep his anger for ever.
10 He hath not dealt with us after our sins;
Nor rewarded us according to our iniquities.
11 For as the heaven is high above the earth,
So great is his mercy toward them that fear him
12 As far as the east is from the west,
So far hath he removed our transgressions from us.
13 Like as a father pitieth his children,
So the LORD pitieth them that fear him.
14 For he knoweth our frame;
He remembereth that we are dust.
15 As for man, his days are as grass:
As a flower of the field, so he flourisheth.
16 For the wind passeth over it, and it is gone;
And the place thereof shall know it no more.
17 But the mercy of the LORD is from everlasting to everlasting upon them that fear him,
And his righteousness unto children's children;
18 To such as keep his covenant, [them.
And to those that remember his commandments to do

Hitherto the psalmist had only looked back upon his own experiences, and thence fetched matter for praise; here he looks abroad and takes notice of his favour to others also, for in them we should rejoice, and give thanks for them; all the saints being fed at a common table, and sharing in the same blessings.

First. Truly God is good to all; ver. 6, 'He executeth righteousness and judgment," not only for his own people, but "for all that are oppressed;" for even in common providence he is the patron of wronged innocency, and one way or other will plead the cause of those that are injured against their oppressors. It is his honour to humble the proud, and help the helpless.

Secondly. He is in a special manner good to Israel, to every Israelite indeed, that is of a clean and upright heart.

1. He hath revealed himself and his grace to us; ver. 7, "He made known his ways unto Moses," and by him "his acts to the children of Israel;" not only by his rod to those who then lived, but by his pen to succeeding ages. Note, Divine revelation is one of the first and greatest of Divine favours with which the church is blessed; for God reduceth us to himself by revealing himself to us; and gives us all good by giving us knowledge. He hath made known his acts and his ways, that is, his nature, and the methods of his dealing with the children of men, that they may know both what to conceive of him, and what to expect from him; so Dr. Hammond. Or, by his ways we may understand his precepts, the way which he requires us to walk in; and by his acts, or designs, as the word signifies, his promises and purposes what to do with us. Thus fairly doth God deal with us.

2. He hath never been rigorous and severe with us, but always tender, full of compassion, and ready to forgive. 1st. It is in his nature to be so: ver. 8, "The Lord is merciful and gracious." This was his way which he made known unto Moses at mount Horeb, when he thus proclaimed his name, Ex. xxxiv. 6, 7, in answer to Moses' request, Ex. xxxiii. 13, "I beseech thee shew me thy way, that I may know thee." It is my way, saith God, to pardon sin. First. He is not soon angry; ver. 8, he is "slow to anger," not extreme to mark what we do amiss, nor ready to take advantage against us. He bears long with those that are very provoking, defers punishing that he may give space to repent, and doth not speedily execute the sentence of his law. And he could not be thus slow to anger if he were not plenteous in mercy, the very Father of mercies. Secondly. He is not long angry; for, ver. 9, "He will not always chide," though we always offend, and deserve chiding. Though he signify his displeasure against us for our sins by the rebukes of providence, and the reproaches of our own consciences, and thus cause grief; yet he will have compassion, and will not always keep us in pain and terror, no, not for our sins, but, after the spirit of bondage, will give the spirit of adoption. How unlike are those to God who always chide, who take every occasion to chide, and never know when to take up! What would become of us, if God should deal so with us? "He will not keep his anger for ever" against his own people, but will gather them with everlasting mercies, Isa. liv. 8; lvii. 16. 2nd. We have found him so. We, for our parts, must own, that "He hath not dealt with us after our sins," ver. 10. The Scripture saith a great deal of the mercy of God, and we may all set to our seal that it is true; that we have experienced it. If he had not been a God of patience we had been in hell long ago; but He hath not "rewarded us after our iniquities;" so they will say who know what sin deserves. He has not inflicted the judgments which we have merited, nor deprived us of the comforts which we have forfeited; which should make us think the worse and not the better of sin; for God's patience should lead us to repentance, Rom. ii. 4.

3. He hath pardoned our sins; not only mine iniquity, ver. 3, but our transgressions, ver. 12. Though it is of our own benefit by the pardoning mercy of God that we are to take the comfort, yet of the benefit others have by it we must give him the glory. Observe, 1st. The transcendent riches of God's mercy; ver. 11, "As the heaven is high above the earth," so high that the earth is but a point to the vast expanse; so God's mercy is above the merits of those that fear him most; so much above and beyond them that there is no proportion at all between them. The greatest performances of man's duty cannot demand the least tokens of God's favour as a debt, and therefore all the seed of Jacob will join with him in owning themselves less than the least of all God's mercies, Gen. xxxii. 10. Observe, God's mercy is thus "great towards them that fear him," not towards them that trifle with him. We must fear the Lord and his goodness. 2nd. The fulness of his pardons, an evidence of the riches of his mercy; ver. 12, "As far as the east is from the west," (which two quarters of the world are of greatest extent, because all known and inhabited, and therefore geographers that way reckon their longitudes,) "so far hath he removed our transgressions from us," so that they shall never be laid to our charge, nor rise up in judgment against us. The sins of believers shall be remembered no more, shall not be mentioned unto them; they shall be sought for and not found. If we thoroughly forsake them, God will thoroughly forgive them.

4. He hath pitied our sorrows, ver. 13, 14. Observe, 1st. Whom he pities; "Them that fear him;" that is, all good people who in this world may become objects of pity upon account of the grievances which they are not only born, but born again to. Or it may be understood of those who have not yet received the spirit of adoption, but are yet trembling at his word; those he pities, Jer. xxxi. 18, 20. 2nd. How he pities; "As a father pities his children;" and doth them good as there is occasion. God is a father to them that fear him, and owns them for his children, and he is tender of them as a father. The father pities his children that are weak in knowledge, and instructs them; pities them when they are froward, and bears with them; pities them when they are sick, and comforts them, Isa. lxvi. 13; when they are fallen, and helps them up again; when they have offended, and, upon their submission, forgives them; when they are wronged, and rights them. Thus "the Lord pities them that fear him." 3rd. Why he pities; "For he knoweth our frame." He has reason to know our frame, for he framed us, and having himself made man of the dust, "he remembers that he is dust," not only by constitution but by sentence; "Dust thou art." He considers the frailty of our bodies, and the folly of our souls, how little we can do, and expects accordingly from us; how little we can bear, and lays accordingly upon us; in all which appears the tenderness of his compassion.

5. He hath perpetuated his covenant mercy, and therefore provided relief for our frailty, ver. 15—18. See here, 1st. How short man's life is, and of what uncertain continuance. The lives even of great men and good men are so, and neither their greatness nor their goodness can alter the property of them. "As for man, his days are as grass," which grows out of the earth, rises but a little way above it, and soon withers and returns to it again: see Isa. xl. 6, 7. Man in his best estate seems somewhat more than grass; he flourishes and looks gay; yet then he is but like a flower of the field, which, though distinguished a little from the grass, will wither with it. The flower of the garden is commonly more choice and valuable, and though in its own nature withering, yet will last the longer for its being sheltered by the garden wall, and the gardener's care; but the flower of the field (to which life is here compared) is not only withering in itself, but exposed to the cold blasts, and liable to be cropped and trodden on by the beasts of the field. Man's life is not only wasting of itself, but its period may be anticipated by a thousand accidents. When the flower is in its perfection, a blasting wind, unseen, unlooked-for, passeth over it and it is gone; it hangs the head, drops the leaves, dwindles into the ground again, and the place thereof, which was proud of it, now knows it no more. Such a thing is man: God considers it, and pities him; let him consider it himself, and be humble, dead to this world, and thoughtful of another. 2nd. How long and lasting God's mercy is to his people, ver. 17, 18. It will continue longer than their lives, and will survive their present state. Observe, First. The description remarkable utterance in verse 13 seems to denote that the original occasion of this psalm was the close of the captivity of Babylon. The time for restoration was come; that was the first ground of assurance, and the attitude of the people supplied a second. Some difficulty has been felt about the order of thought in verses 15—17, but it may easily be removed if the punctuation is altered, and the version worded as follows: "And the Gentiles shall fear the name of the Lord, and all kings of the earth (shall fear) thy glory, when the Lord buildeth Zion, appeareth in his glory, respecteth the prayer of the destitute, and despiseth not their prayer." Verse 18 expresses an intention or a persuasion—i.e., either the writer intends to record the Lord's intervention, or he is persuaded that it will be recorded. The things to be commemorated appear to be summed up in verses 19—22, the first of which needs a little different translation: "when he hath looked down from the height of his sanctuary, the Lord from heaven hath looked on earth."

of those to whom this mercy belongs. They are such as fear God; that is, are truly religious from a principle. 1st. They live a life of faith; for they keep God's covenant; having taken hold of it, they keep hold of it, fast hold, and will not let it go. They keep it as a treasure, keep it as their portion, and would not for all the world part with it, for it is their life. 2nd. They live a life of obedience; they "remember his commandments to do them," else they do not keep his covenant. Those only shall have the benefit of God's promises that make conscience of his precepts. See who they are that have a good memory, as well as a good understanding, Ps. cxi. 10, those that remember God's commandments, not to talk of them, but to do them, and to be ruled by them. Secondly. The continuance of the mercy which belongs to such as these. It will last them longer than their lives on earth, and therefore they need not be troubled though their lives be short, since death itself will be no abridgement, no infringement of their bliss. God's mercy is better than life; for it will outlive it. 1st. To their souls, which are immortal, to them "the mercy of the Lord is from everlasting to everlasting;" from everlasting in the counsels of it, to everlasting in the consequences of it; in their election before the world was, and their glorification when this world shall be no more; for they are predestinated to the inheritance, Eph. i. 11, and "look for the mercy of the Lord, the Lord Jesus, unto eternal life." 2nd. To their seed, which shall be kept up to the end of time, Ps. cii. 28. His righteousness, the truth of his promise, unto children's children, provided they tread in the steps of their predecessors' piety, and keep his covenant as they did, then shall mercy be preserved to them even to a thousand generations.

19 The LORD hath prepared his throne in the heavens;
And his kingdom ruleth over all.
20 Bless the LORD, ye his angels,
That excel in strength, that do his commandments,
Hearkening unto the voice of his word.
21 Bless ye the LORD, all ye his hosts;
Ye ministers of his, that do his pleasure.
22 Bless the LORD, all his works
In all places of his dominion:
Bless the LORD, O my soul.

Here is, First. The doctrine of universal providence laid down, ver. 19. He hath secured the happiness of his peculiar people by promise and covenant; but the order of mankind and the world in general he secures by common providence. The Lord hath a throne of his own, a throne of glory, a throne of government. He that made all rules all, and both by a word of power. He hath prepared his throne, has fixed and established it, that it cannot be shaken. He has foreordained all the measures of his government, and doth all according to the counsel of his own will. He has prepared it in the heavens, above us, and out of sight; for he holdeth back the face of his throne, and spreadeth a cloud upon it, Job xxvi. 9; yet can himself judge through the dark cloud, Job xxii. 13. Hence the heavens are said to rule, Dan. iv. 26. And we are led to consider this by the influence which even the visible heavens have upon this earth, their dominion, Job xxxviii. 33; Gen. i. 16. But though God's throne is in heaven, and there he keeps his court, and thither we are to direct to him, "Our Father, which art in heaven," yet "his kingdom ruleth over all." He takes cognizance of all the inhabitants, and all the affairs, of this lower world, and disposeth all persons and things according to the counsel of his will to his own glory; Dan. iv. 35, His kingdom ruleth over all kings, and all kingdoms, and from it there is no exempt jurisdiction.

Secondly, The duty of universal praise inferred from it. If all are under God's dominion, all must do him homage.

1. Let the holy angels praise him; ver. 20, 21, "Bless the Lord, ye his angels." And again, "Bless the Lord, all ye his hosts; ye ministers of his." David had been stirring up himself and others to praise God, and here, in the close, he calls upon the angels to do it. Not as if they needed any excitement of ours to praise God, they do it continually; but thus he expresses his high thoughts of God, as worthy of the adorations of the holy angels; thus he quickens himself and others to the duty, with this consideration,—that it is the work of angels; and comforts himself in reference to his own weakness and defect in the performance of this duty, that there is a world of holy angels who dwell in God's house, and are still praising him. In short, the blessed angels are glorious attendants upon the blessed God. Observe, 1st. How well qualified they are for the post they are in. They are able; for they "excel in strength;" they are 'mighty in strength,' so the word is. They are able to bring great things to pass, and to abide in their work without weariness; and they are as willing as they are able. They are willing to know their work; for they hearken to the voice of his word; they stand expecting commissions and instructions from their great Lord, and always behold his face, Mat. xviii. 10, that they may take the first intimation of his mind. They are willing to do their work; they do his commandments, ver. 20; they do his pleasure, ver. 21. They dispute not any Divine commands, but readily address themselves to the execution of them. Nor do they delay; but fly swiftly. 'They do his commandments at hearing;' or, 'as soon as they hear the voice of his word,' so Dr. Hammond. "To obey is better than sacrifice;" for angels obey, but do not sacrifice. 2nd. What their service is. They are his angels, and ministers of his: His, for he made them, and made them for himself; His, for he useth them, though he doth not need them; His, for he is their owner and lord; they belong to him, and he has them at his beck. All the creatures are his servants, but not as the angels that attend the presence of his glory. Soldiers and seamen, and all good subjects, serve the king; but not as the courtiers do, the ministers of state, and those of the household. First. The angels occasionally serve God in this lower world; they do his commandments, go on his errands, Dan. ix. 21, fight his battles, 2 Kin. vi. 17, and minister for the good of his people, Heb. i. 14. Secondly. They continually praise him in the upper world; they began betimes to do it, Job xxxviii. 7; and it is still their business, from which they rest not day or night. Rev. iv. 8. It is God's glory that he hath such attendants; but more his glory that he neither needs them nor is benefited by them.

2. Let all his works praise him; ver. 22, "All in all places of his dominion;" for because they are his works they are under his dominion, and they were made and are ruled, that they may be unto him for a name and a praise. "All his works;" that is, all the children of men in all parts of the world, let them all praise God; yea, and the inferior creatures too, which are God's works too. let them praise him objectively, though they cannot actually do it, Ps. cxlv. 10. Yet all this shall not excuse David from doing it, but rather excite him to do it the more cheerfully, that he might bear a part in this concert; for he concludes, "Bless the Lord, O my soul," as he began, ver. 1. Blessing God, and giving him glory, must be the alpha and omega of all our services. He began with, "Bless the Lord, O my soul:" and when he had penned and sung this excellent hymn to his honour, he doth not say, 'Now, O my soul, thou hast blessed the Lord, sit down and rest thee,' but "Bless the Lord, O my soul," yet more and more. When we have done never so much in the service of God, yet still we must stir up ourselves to do more. God's praise is a subject that will never be exhausted: and therefore we must never think this work done till we come to heaven where it will be for ever in the doing.

PSALM CIV.

It is very probable that this psalm was penned by the same hand, and at the same time with the former; for as that ended this begins with "Bless the Lord, O my soul," and concludes with it too, ver. 35. The style indeed is somewhat different, because the matter is so. The scope of the foregoing psalm was to celebrate the goodness of God, and his tender mercy and compassion, to which a soft and sweet style was most agreeable: the scope of this is to celebrate his greatness and majesty and sovereign dominion, which ought to be done in the most stately lofty strains of poetry. David in the former psalm gave God the glory of his covenant-mercy and love to his own people; in this he gives him the glory of his works of creation and providence, his dominion over, and his bounty to, all the creatures. God is there praised as the God of grace, here as the God of nature. And this psalm is wholly bestowed on that subject; not as Ps. xix., which begins with it, but passeth from it to the consideration of the Divine law; not as Ps. viii., which speaks of this, but prophetically, and with an eye to Christ. This noble poem is thought by very competent judges, not only for piety and devotion (that is past dispute), but for flight of fancy, brightness of ideas, surprising turns, and all the beauties and ornaments of expression, far to excel any of the Greek and Latin poets upon any subject of this nature. Many great things the psalmist here gives God the glory of, I. The splendour of his majesty in the upper world, ver. 1—4. II. The creation of the sea and the dry land, ver. 5—9. III. The provision he makes for the maintenance of all the creatures according to their nature, ver. 10—18, and again, ver. 27, 28. IV. The regular course of the sun and moon, ver. 19—24. V. The furniture of the sea, ver. 25, 26. VI. God's sovereign power over all the creatures, ver. 29—32. And lastly, he concludes with a pleasant and firm resolution to continue praising God, ver. 33—35; with which we should heartily join in singing this psalm.

BLESS the LORD, O my soul.
O LORD my God, thou art very great;
Thou art clothed with honour and majesty.
2 Who coverest thyself with light as with a garment:
Who stretchest out the heavens like a curtain:
3 Who layeth the beams of his chambers in the waters:
Who maketh the clouds his chariot:
Who walketh upon the wings of the wind:
4 Who maketh his angels spirits;
His ministers a flaming fire:
5 Who laid the foundations of the earth,
That it should not be removed for ever.
6 Thou coveredst it with the deep as with a garment:
The waters stood above the mountains.
7 At thy rebuke they fled;
At the voice of thy thunder they hasted away
8 They go up by the mountains; they go down by the valleys
Unto the place which thou hast founded for them.
9 Thou hast set a bound that they may not pass over;
That they turn not again to cover the earth.

When we are addressing ourselves to any religious service, we must stir up ourselves to take hold on God in it, Isa. lxiv. 7; so David doth here. Come, my soul, where art thou? What art thou thinking of? Here is work to be done, good work, angels' work, about it in good earnest, let all thy powers and faculties be engaged and employed in it. "Bless the Lord, O my soul!" In these verses,

First. The psalmist looks up to the Divine glory shining in the upper world, which, though it is one of the things not seen, yet faith is the evidence of it. With what reverence and holy awe doth he begin his meditation, with that acknowledgment, "O Lord my God, thou art very great." And it is the joy of the saints that he that is their God is a great God. The grandeur of the prince is the pride and pleasure of all his good subjects. The majesty of God is here set forth by divers instances; alluding to the figure which great princes in their public appearances covet to make; their equipage compared with his (even of the Eastern kings, who most affected pomp,) is but as the light of a glowworm compared with that of the sun when he goes forth in his strength. Princes appear great,

1. In their robes. And what are God's robes? "Thou art clothed with honour and majesty," ver. 1. God is seen in his works; and those speak him infinitely wise and good, and all that is great. "Thou coverest thyself with light as with a garment," ver. 2; "God is light," 1 Jno. i. 5; "The Father of lights," Jas. i. 17; "He dwells in light," 1 Tim. vi. 16. He clothes himself with it. The residence of his glory is in the highest heaven; that light which was created the first day, Gen. i. 3. Of all visible beings, light comes nearest to the nature of a spirit; and therefore with that God is pleased to cover himself, that is, to reveal himself under that similitude; as men are seen in the clothes with which they cover themselves,—and so only, for his face cannot be seen.

2. In their palaces or pavilions, when they take the field. And what is God's palace and his pavilion? He "stretcheth out the heavens like a curtain," ver. 2; so he did at first, when he made the firmament, which in the Hebrew has its name from its being expanded or stretched out, Gen. i. 7. He made it to divide the waters as a curtain divides between two apartments: so he doth still, he now "stretcheth out the heavens like a curtain;" that is, keeps them upon the stretch, and they "continue to this day according to his ordinance." The regions of the air are stretched out about the earth, like a curtain about a bed, to keep it warm, and drawn between us and the upper world to break its dazzling light; for though God covers himself with light, yet in compassion

cii. 23—28. These verses are a general rehearsal of the two chief sections of the psalm, beginning with sorrow and ending with confidence. The ancient versions of verse 23 especially differ from our own, and there are a few Hebrew copies with various readings, but our version may stand. Verses 25—27 contain a magnificent conception of God, the like whereof will not be found in ancient secular literature.

ciii. 5. The word rendered "mouth" is variously explained by critics. Some understand it to mean the "heart" or "soul," as the noblest part of man; others interpret it of "age," as the Targum; others again explain it of the "cheek," and hence the "mouth." On the whole, the meaning of "age," that is, advancing years, seems preferable.

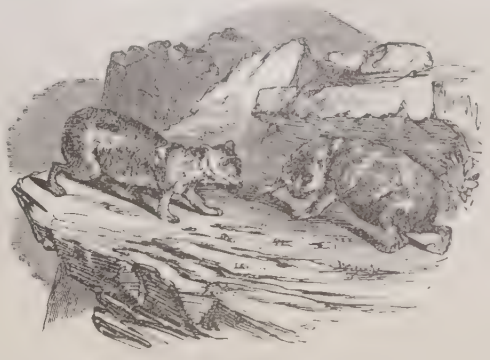
ciii. 9. The words "his anger" are added by the translators, to develop the idea of the verb. The same has been correctly done in Jer. iii. 5, 12.

to us he makes darkness his pavilion, thick clouds are a covering to him. The vastness of this pavilion may lead us to consider how great, how very great, He is that fills heaven and earth. He hath his chambers, his upper rooms, so the word signifies; the beams whereof he lays in the waters, the waters that are above the firmament, ver. 3; as he has founded the earth upon the seas and floods, the waters beneath the firmament. Though air and water are fluid bodies, yet by the Divine power they are kept as tight and as firm in the place assigned them as a chamber is with beams and rafters. How great a God is he whose presence-chamber is thus reared, thus fixed!

3. In their coaches of state, and their stately horses, which add much to the magnificence of their entries. But God "makes the clouds his chariots," in which he rides strongly, swiftly, and far above out of the reach of opposition, when at any time he will act by uncommon providences in the government of this world. He descended in a cloud as in a chariot to mount Sinai to give the law; and to mount Tabor to proclaim the Gospel, Mat. xvii. 5; and he "walketh" (a softly pace, indeed, yet stately,) "upon the wings of the wind:" see Ps. xviii. 10, 11. He commands the winds, directs them as he pleaseth, and serves his own purposes by them.

4. In their retinue, or train of attendants. And here also God is very great; for, ver. 4, "He maketh his angels spirits." This is quoted by the apostle, Heb. i. 7, to prove the preeminence of Christ above the angels. The angels are here said to be his angels and his ministers, for they are under his dominion, and at his dispose. They are winds, and a flame of fire; that is, they appeared in wind and fire, so some; or they are swift as winds, and pure as flames; or he maketh them spirits, so the apostle quotes it. They are spiritual beings; and whatever vehicles they may have proper to their nature, it is certain they have not bodies as we have. Being spirits, they are so much the farther removed from the incumbrances of the human nature, and so much the nearer allied to the glories of the Divine nature; and they are bright, and quick, and ascending, as fire, as a flame of fire. In Ezekiel's vision they ran and returned like a flash of lightning, Eze. i. 14. Thence they are called seraphim, 'burners.' Whatever they are, they are what God made them, what he still makes them; they derive their being from him, having the being he gave them, are held in being by him, and he makes what use he pleaseth of them.

Secondly. He looks down, and looks about, to the power of God shining in this lower world. He is not so taken up with the glories of his court as to neglect even the remotest of his territories; no, not the sea and dry land.



1. He hath founded the earth, ver. 5. Though he has hung it upon nothing, Job xxvi. 2, (ponderibus librata suis,—'balanced by its own weight,') yet it is as immovable as if it had been laid upon the surest foundations. He hath built the earth upon her basis, so that though it has received a dangerous shock by the sin of man, and the malice of hell strikes at it, yet it shall not be removed for ever; that is, not till the end of time, when it must give way to the new earth. Dr. Hammond's paraphrase of this is worth noting: 'God has fixed so strange a place for the earth, that being a heavy body, one would think it should fall every minute; and yet, which way soever we would imagine it to stir, it must, contrary to the nature of such a body, fall upwards, and so can have no possible ruin, but by tumbling into heaven.'

2. He hath set bounds to the sea, for that also is his.

1st. He brought it within bounds in the creation. At first the earth (which, being the more ponderous body, would subside of course) was covered with the deep; ver. 6, "The waters were above the mountains," and so it was unfit to be, as it was designed, an habitation for man; and therefore on the third day God said, "Let the waters under the heaven be gathered unto one place, and let the dry land appear," Gen. i. 9. This command of God is here called his rebuke, as if he gave it because he was displeased that the earth was thus covered with water, and not fit for man to dwell on. Power went along with this word; and therefore it is also called here the voice of his thunder, which is a mighty voice, and produceth strange effects, ver. 7. "At thy rebuke," as if they were made sensible that they were out of their place, "they fled, they hasted away;" they called, and not in vain, to the rocks and mountains to cover them. As it is said on another occasion, Ps. lxxvii. 16, "The waters saw thee, O God, the waters saw thee, they were afraid." Even those fluid bodies received the impression of God's terror. But "was the Lord displeased against the rivers?" No; it was "for the salvation of his people," Hab. iii. 8, 13. So here, God rebuked the waters for man's sake, to prepare room for him; for men must not be made as the fishes of the sea, Hab. i. 14; they must have air to breathe in. Immediately therefore, with all speed, the waters retired, ver. 8; they go over hill and dale, (as we say,) "go up by the mountains, and down by the valleys." They will neither stop at the former, nor lodge in the latter, but make the best of their way "to the place which thou hast founded for them," and there they make their bed. Let the obsequiousness even of the unstable waters teach us obedience to the word and will of God; for shall man alone of all the creatures be obstinate? Let their retiring to, and resting in, the place assigned them, teach us to acquiesce in the disposals of that wise providence which appointeth us the bounds of our habitation.

2nd. He keeps it within bounds, ver. 9. The waters are forbidden to pass over the limits set them; they may not, and, therefore, they "do not turn again to cover the earth." Once they did in Noah's flood, because God bade them; but never since, because he forbids them, having promised not to drown the world again. God himself glories in this instance of his power, Job xxxviii. 8, &c.; and useth it as an argument with us to fear him, Jer. v. 22. This, if duly considered, would keep the world in awe of the Lord and his goodness, that the waters of the sea would soon cover the earth if God did not restrain them.

10 He sendeth the springs into the valleys,
Which run among the hills.
11 They give drink to every beast of the field:
The wild asses quench their thirst. [tation,
12 By them shall the fowls of the heaven have their habi-
Which sing among the branches.
13 He watereth the hills from his chambers:
The earth is satisfied with the fruit of thy works.
14 He causeth the grass to grow for the cattle,
And herb for the service of man:
That he may bring forth food out of the earth;
15 And wine that maketh glad the heart of man,
And oil to make his face to shine,
And bread which strengtheneth man's heart.
16 The trees of the LORD are full of sap;
The cedars of Lebanon, which he hath planted;
17 Where the birds make their nests:
As for the stork, the fir trees are her house
18 The high hills are a refuge for the wild goats;
And the rocks for the conies.

* CONIES.

Having given glory to God, as the powerful protector of this earth, in saving it from being deluged, here he comes to acknowledge him as its bountiful benefactor, who provides conveniences for all the creatures.

First. He provides fresh water for their drink. "He sendeth the springs into the valleys," ver. 10. There is water enough, indeed, in the sea, that is, enough to drown us, but not one drop to refresh us, be we never so thirsty, it is all so salt; and therefore God has graciously provided water fit to drink. Naturalists dispute about the origin of fountains; but, whatever are their second causes, here is the first cause, it is God that sends the springs into the brooks, which walk by easy steps between the hills, and receive increase from the rain water that descends from them. These give drink, not only to man, and those creatures that are immediately useful to him, but "to every beast of the field," ver. 11; for where God has given life he provides a livelihood, and takes care of all the creatures; even "the wild asses," though untameable, and therefore of no use to man, yet are welcome to "quench their thirst;" and we have no reason to grudge it them, for we are better provided for, though born like the wild ass's colt. We have reason to thank God for the plenty of fair weather with which he has provided the habitable part of his earth, which otherwise would not be habitable. That ought to be reckoned a great mercy, the want of which would be a great affliction; and the more common it is, the greater mercy it is. Usus communis aquarum,—'Water is common to all.'

Secondly. He provides food convenient for them, both for man and beast. The heavens drop fatness; they hear the earth, but God hears them, Hos. ii. 21. He "waters the hills from his chambers," ver. 13; from those chambers spoken of, ver. 3, the beams of which he lays in the waters; those store chambers, the clouds that distil the fruitful showers. The hills that are not watered by the rivers, as Egypt was by the Nile, are watered by the rain from heaven, which is called the river of God, Ps. lxv. 9, as Canaan was, Deu. xi. 11, 12. Thus the earth is satisfied with the fruit of his works, either with the rain it drinks in,—the earth knows when it has enough, it is pity that any men should not,—or with the products it brings forth. It is a satisfaction to the earth to bear the fruit of God's works for the benefit of man, for thus it answers the end of its creation. The food which God brings forth out of the earth, ver. 14, is the fruit of his works, which the earth is satisfied with. Observe how various and how valuable its products are: for the cattle there is grass, and the beasts of prey, that live not on grass, feed on those that do. For man there is herb, a better sort of grass, (and a dinner of herbs and roots is not to be despised,) nay, he is furnished with wine, and oil, and bread, ver. 15. We may observe here concerning our food that which will help to make us both humble and thankful:

1. To make us humble, let us consider that we have a necessary dependence upon God for all the supports of this life; we live upon alms, we are at his finding, for our own hands are not sufficient for us; that our food comes all out of the earth, to mind us whence we ourselves were taken, and whither we must return; and that therefore we must not think to live by bread alone, for that will feed the body only, but must look into the Word of God for the meat that endures unto eternal life. It is also humbling to consider that we are upon the matter fellow commoners with the beasts; the same earth, the same spot of ground, that brings grass for the cattle, brings corn for man.

2. To make us thankful, let us consider, 1st. That God not only provides for us, but for our servants. The cattle, that are of use to man, are particularly taken care of; grass is made to grow in great abundance for them, when "the young lions," that are not for the service of man, often "lack, and suffer hunger." 2nd. That our food is nigh us, and ready to us. Having our habitation on the earth, there we have our storehouse, and depend not on "the merchant ships that bring food from afar," Pr. xxxi. 14. 3rd. That we have even from the products of the earth, not only for necessity, but for ornament and delight, so good a master do we serve. First. Doth nature call for something to support it and repair its daily decays? Here is bread, which strengthens man's heart, and is therefore called the staff of life: let none that have that complain of want. Secondly. Doth nature go farther, and covet something pleasant? Here is "wine, that makes glad the heart," refresheth the spirits, and exhilarates them, when it is soberly and moderately used: that we may not only go through our business, but go through it cheerfully. It is pity that should be abused to overcharge the heart, and unfit men for their duty, which was given to revive their heart, and quicken them in their duty. Thirdly. Is nature yet more humoursome, and doth it crave something to ornament it too? Here is that also out of the earth, "oil to make the face to shine," that the countenance may not only be cheerful but beautiful, and we may be the more acceptable to one another.

Nay, the Divine providence not only furnisheth animals with their proper food, but vegetables also with theirs; ver. 16, "the trees of the Lord are full of sap;" not only men's trees, which they take care of, and have an eye to in their orchards, and parks, and other inclosures, but God's trees, which grow in the wildernesses, and are taken care of only by his providence, yet they are full of sap, and want no nourishment. Even the cedars of Lebanon, an open forest civ. 3. All this is metaphorical, and must be explained accordingly. The "chambers," or upper chambers, are the realms of ether, which seem to rest upon the ocean.

civ. 4. Another explanation is, "who maketh the winds his messengers, flaming fire his ministers." The true sense seems to be, "who maketh spirits his messengers, flaming fire his ministers." In Heb. i. 7 it is distinctly referred to angels. Those who adopt the explanation first given apply the words to the stormy wind and lightning, which they say are the messengers and ministers of God The Chaldee gives, "who maketh his messengers (or angels) swift like the wind, his ministers strong like flaming fire."

civ. 8. The marginal rendering is more literal—"the mountains ascend, the valleys descend;" but the text may be justified.

civ. 11. Wild asses appear to have been of two sorts, and from the frequency with which they are mentioned, must have been common. At present they rarely occur west of Bashan.

though they are high and bulky, and require a great deal of sap to feed them, have enough from the earth. They are trees which he hath planted, and which therefore he will protect and provide for. We may apply this to the trees of righteousness, which are the planting of the Lord, planted in his vineyard: these are full of sap; for what God plants he will water, and "they that are planted in the house of the Lord, shall flourish in the courts of our God," Ps. xcii. 13.

Thirdly. He takes care that they shall have suitable habitations to dwell in. To men God has given discretion to build for themselves, and for the cattle that are serviceable to them; but there are some creatures which God more immediately provides a settlement for.

1. The birds. Some birds by instinct make their nests in the bushes near rivers; ver. 12, by the springs that run among the hills some of "the fowls of heaven have their habitation, which sing among the branches." They sing, according to their capacity, to the honour of their Creator and benefactor; and their singing may shame our silence. Our heavenly Father feedeth them, Mat. vi. 26, and therefore they are easy and cheerful, and take no thought for the morrow. The birds being made to fly above the earth, as we find, Gen. i. 20, they make their nests on high on the tops of trees, ver. 17. And it should seem as if nature had an eye to this in planting the cedars of Lebanon, that they might be receptacles for the birds. Those that fly heavenward shall not want resting-places. The stork is particularly instanced in. The fir-trees, which are very high, are her house, her castle.

2. The lesser sort of beasts; ver. 18, The wild goats, having neither strength nor swiftness to secure themselves, are guided by instinct to the high hills, which are a refuge to them; and the rabbits, which are also helpless animals, find a shelter in the rocks, where they can set beasts of prey at defiance. Doth God provide thus for the inferior creatures, and will he not himself be a refuge and dwelling-place to his own people?

19 He appointed the moon for seasons:
The sun knoweth his going down.
20 Thou makest darkness, and it is night:
Wherein all the beasts of the forest do creep forth
21 The young lions roar after their prey,
And seek their meat from God.
22 The sun ariseth, they gather themselves together,
And lay them down in their dens.
23 Man goeth forth unto his work
And to his labour until the evening.
24 O LORD, how manifold are thy works!
In wisdom hast thou made them all:
The earth is full of thy riches.
25 So is this great and wide sea,
Wherein are things creeping innumerable,
Both small and great beasts.
26 There go the ships: [therein.
There is that leviathan, whom thou hast made to play
27 These wait all upon thee;
That thou mayest give them their meat in due season.
28 That thou givest them they gather:
Thou openest thine hand, they are filled with good.
29 Thou hidest thy face, they are troubled:
Thou takest away their breath, they die, and return to their dust.
30 Thou sendest forth thy spirit, they are created:
And thou renewest the face of the earth.

We are here taught to praise and magnify God,

First. For the constant revolutions and succession of day and night, and the dominion of sun and moon over them. The heathen were so affected with the light and influence of the sun and moon, and their serviceableness to the earth, that they worshipped them as deities; and therefore the Scripture takes all occasions to shew that the gods they worshipped are the creatures and servants of the true God; ver. 19, "He appointed the moon for seasons," for the measuring of the months, the directing of the seasons for the business of the husbandman, and the governing of the tides. The full and change, the increase and decrease of the moon, exactly observe the appointment of the Creator; so doth the sun, for he keeps as punctually to the time and place of his going down as if he were an intellectual being, and knew what he did. God herein consults the comfort of man.

1. The shadows of the evening befriend the repose of the night; ver. 20, "Thou makest darkness, and it is night," which, though black, contributes to the beauty of nature, and is a foil to the light of the day; and under the protection of the night "all the beasts of the forest creep forth" to feed; which they are afraid to do in the day, God having put the fear and dread of man upon every beast of the earth, Gen. ix. 2, which contributes as much to man's safety as to his honour. See how nearly allied they are to the disposition of the wild beasts that wait for the twilight, Job xxiv. 15, and have fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness; and compare to this the danger of ignorance and melancholy, which are both as darkness to the soul. When, either of those ways, it is night, then all the beasts of the forest creep forth; Satan's temptations then assault us, and have advantage against us. Then the young lions roar after their prey; and, as naturalists tell us, their roaring terrifies the timorous beasts, so that they have not strength or spirit to outrun them, which otherwise they might do, and so they become an easy prey to them. They are said to seek their meat from God, because it is not prepared for them by the care and forecast of man, but more immediately by the providence of God. The roaring of the young lions, like the crying of the young ravens, is interpreted asking their meat of God. Doth God put this construction upon the language of mere nature, even in venomous creatures, and shall he not much more interpret favourably the language of grace in his own people, though it be weak and broken, groanings which cannot be uttered?

2. The light of the morning befriends the business of the day; ver. 22, 23, "The sun ariseth," (for as he knows his going down, so, thanks be to God, he knows his rising again,) and then the wild beasts betake themselves to their rest. Even they have some society among them, for they "gather themselves together, and lay them down in their dens," which is a great mercy to the children of men, that while they are abroad, as becomes honest travellers between sun and sun, care is taken that they shall not be set upon by wild beasts; for they are then drawn out of the field, and the sluggard shall have nowhere to excuse himself from the business of the day, with this, that there is a lion in the way. Therefore, then, "man goes forth to his work and to his labour." The beasts of prey creep forth with fear; man goes forth with boldness, as one that hath dominion. The beasts creep forth to spoil and do mischief; man goes forth to work and do good. There is the work of every day which is to be done in its day, which man must apply to every morning,—for the lights are set up for us to work by, not to play by,—and which he must stick to till evening. It will be time enough to rest when the night comes, in which no man can work.

Secondly. For the replenishing of the ocean; ver. 25, 26, as "the earth is full of God's riches," well stocked with animals, and those well provided for, so that it is seldom that any creature dies merely for want of food, "so is this great and wide sea," which seems a useless part of the globe, at least not to answer the room it takes up; yet God has appointed it its place, and made it serviceable to man, both for navigation,—"there go the ships," in which goods are conveyed to countries vastly distant, speedily, and much cheaper than by land-carriage,—and also to be his storehouse for fish. God made not the sea in vain, no more than the earth; he made it to be inherited, for "there are things swimming innumerable, both small and great animals," which serve for man's dainty food. The whale is particularly mentioned in the history of the creation, Gen. i. 21, and is here called the leviathan, as Job xli. 1. He is made to play in the sea; he hath nothing to do as man hath, that goes forth to his work; he hath nothing to fear, as the beasts have, that lie down in their dens, and therefore he plays with the waters. It is pity any of the children of men, that have nobler powers, and were made for nobler purposes, should live as if they were sent into the world, like leviathan into the waters, to play therein, spending all their time in pastime. The leviathan is said to play in the waters because he is so well armed against all assaults that he sets them at defiance, and laughs at the shaking of a spear, Job xli. 29.

Thirdly. For the seasonable and plentiful provision which is made for all the creatures, ver. 27, 28. 1. God is a bountiful benefactor to them. He gives them their meat; he opens his hand, and they are filled with good. He subsists the armies both of heaven and earth; even the meanest creatures are not below his cognizance. He is open-handed in the gifts of his bounty, and is a great and good housekeeper that provides for so large a family. 2. They are patient expectants from him. They all wait upon him; that is, they seek their food according to the natural instinct God has put into them, and in the proper season for it, and affect not any other food, or at any other time than nature has ordained. They do their part for the obtaining of it; what God gives them they gather, and expect not that providence should put it into their mouths; and what they gather they are satisfied with. They are filled with good, and desire no more than what God sees fit for them, which may shame our murmurings, and discontent, and unsatisfiedness with our lot.

Fourthly. For the absolute power and sovereign dominion which he has over all the creatures, by which the species of each are still continued, though the individuals of each are daily dying and dropping off. See here, 1. All the creatures perishing; ver. 29, "Thou hidest thy face," withdrawest thy supporting power, thy supplying bounty, and they are troubled presently. Every creature hath as necessary a dependence upon God's favour as every saint is sensible he has, and therefore saith with David, Ps. xxx. 7, "Thou didst hide thy face, and I was troubled." God's displeasure against this lower world for the sin of man is the cause of all that vanity and burthen which the whole creation groans under. "Thou takest away their breath," which is in thy hand, and then, and not till then, "they die, and return to their dust," to their first principles. The spirit of the beast that goes downward is at God's command as well as the spirit of a man which goes upward. The death of cattle was one of the plagues of Egypt, and is particularly taken notice of in the drowning of the world. 2. All preserved, notwithstanding, in a succession; ver. 30, "Thou sendest forth thy spirit, they are created." The same Spirit, that is, the same Divine will and power by which they were all created at first still preserves the several sorts of creatures in their being, and place, and usefulness; so that, though one generation of them passeth away, another comes, and from time to time they are created; new ones rise up instead of the old ones, and this is a continual creation. Thus the face of the earth is renewed from day to day by the light of the sun which beautifies it anew every morning; from year to year by the products of it, which enrich it anew every spring, and put quite another face upon it from what it had all winter. The world is as full of creatures as if none died, for the place of those that die is filled up. This, the Jews say, is to be applied to the resurrection, which every spring is an emblem of, when a new world rises out of the ashes of the old one.

In the midst of this discourse the psalmist breaks out into wonder at the works of God; ver. 24, "O Lord, how manifold are thy works!" They are numerous, they are various, of many kinds, and many of every kind, and yet "in wisdom hast thou made them all." When men undertake many works, and of different kinds, commonly some of them are neglected, and not done with due care; but God's works, though many, and of very different kinds, yet all are made in wisdom, and with the greatest exactness; there is not the least flaw or defect in them. The works of art, the more closely they are looked upon with the help of microscopes, the more rough they appear; the works of nature through these glasses appear more fine and exact. They are all made in wisdom, for they are all made to answer the end they were designed to serve, the good of the universe, in order to the glory of the universal Monarch.

31 The glory of the LORD shall endure for ever:
The LORD shall rejoice in his works.
32 He looketh on the earth, and it trembleth:
He toucheth the hills, and they smoke.
33 I will sing unto the LORD as long as I live:
I will sing praise to my God while I have my being.
34 My meditation of him shall be sweet:
I will be glad in the LORD.
35 Let the sinners be consumed out of the earth,
And let the wicked be no more.
Bless thou the LORD, O my soul. Praise ye the LORD.

civ. 16. "The trees of the Lord" may be so called because they are uncultivated by man, and are cared for by God alone.

civ. 17. The stork is a migratory bird, and about Lady-day visits Palestine in immense flocks, which build their nests in ruins, trees, or any convenient place. Several sorts of fir and pine are found in the Holy Land, but the text points to no particular species.

civ. 18. The wild goat of Palestine is an ibex, and Dr. Tristram says, "It inhabits exclusively the more desolate and rocky parts of the country." "Conies" in this verse are not rabbits, which are unknown in the country, but a small animal called hyrax, resembling a rabbit in size and habits, but different in form. It lives in holes among the rocks, and is so wary and timid, that although common, it is seldom seen.

civ. 26. It seems impossible to apply the references to the leviathan to one kind of animal. The name was probably given to any great creature which lived in the water. Hence, while at one

The psalmist concludes this meditation with speaking,

First. Praise to God, which is chiefly intended in the psalm.

1. He is to be praised, 1st. As a great God, and a God of matchless perfection. "The glory of the Lord shall endure for ever," ver. 31. It shall endure to the end of time in his works of creation and providence; it shall endure to eternity in the felicity and adoration of saints and angels. Man's glory is fading, God's glory is everlasting; creatures change, but with the Creator there is no variableness. 2nd. As a gracious God. "The Lord shall rejoice in his works." He continues that complacency in the products of his own wisdom and goodness, which he had when he "saw every thing that he had made, and, behold, it was very good, and rested the seventh day." We often do that which upon the review we cannot rejoice in, but are displeased at, and wish undone again, blaming our own management. But God always rejoiceth in his works, because they are all done in wisdom. We regret our bounty and beneficence, but God never doth; he rejoiceth in the works of his grace, his gifts and callings are without repentance. 3rd. As a God of almighty power; ver. 32, "He looketh on the earth, and it trembleth," as unable to bear his frowns; trembleth as Sinai did at the presence of the Lord; "he toucheth the hills, and they smoke." The volcanoes, or burning mountains, such as Ætna, are emblems of the power of God's wrath fastening upon proud unhumbled sinners. If an angry look and touch hath such effects, what will the weight of his heavy hand do, and the operations of his outstretched arm? "Who knows the power of his anger?" Who then dare set it at defiance? God therefore rejoiceth in his works, because they are all so observant of him; and he will in like manner take pleasure in them that fear him, and that tremble at his word.

2. The psalmist will himself be much in praising him; ver. 33, "I will sing unto the Lord, unto my God," will praise him as Jehovah, the Creator, and as my God, a God in covenant with me; and this not now only, "but as long as I live, and while I have my being." Because we have our life and being from God, and depend upon him for the support and continuance of it, as long as we live and have our being we must continue to praise God; and when we have no life, no being on earth, we hope to have a better life and a better being in a better world, and there to be doing this work in a better manner, and in better company.

Secondly. Joy to himself; ver. 34, "My meditation of him shall be sweet." It shall be fixed and close, it shall be affecting and influencing, and therefore it shall be sweet. Thoughts of God will then be most pleasing when they are most powerful. Note, Divine meditation is a very sweet duty to all that are sanctified. "I will be glad in the Lord;" that is, it shall be a pleasure to me to praise him; I will be glad of all opportunities to set forth his glory; and I will rejoice in the Lord always, and in him only. All my joys shall centre in him, and in him they shall be full.

Thirdly. Terror to the wicked; ver. 35, "Let the sinners be consumed out of the earth, and let the wicked be no more." 1. They that oppose the God of power, and fight against him, will certainly be consumed. None can prosper that harden themselves against the Almighty. 2. They that rebel against the light of such convincing evidence of God's being, and refuse to serve him whom all the creatures serve, will justly be consumed. They that make that earth to groan under the burthen of their impieties, which God thus fills with his riches, deserve to be consumed out of it, and that it should spue them out. 3. They that heartily desire to praise God themselves cannot but have a holy indignation at those that blaspheme and dishonour him, and a holy satisfaction in the prospect of their destruction, and the honour that God will get to himself upon them. And even this ought to be the matter of their praise; while sinners are consumed out of the earth, let my soul bless the Lord that I am not cast away with the workers of iniquity, but distinguished from them by the special grace of God. When the wicked are no more, I hope to be praising God world without end; and, therefore, "praise ye the Lord;" let all about me join with me in praising God. "Hallelujah." Sing praise to Jehovah. This is the first time that we meet with Hallelujah, and it comes in here upon occasion of the destruction of the wicked; and the last time we meet with it, it is upon the like occasion, when the New Testament Babylon is consumed: this is the burthen of the song, Hallelujah, Rev. xix. 1, 3, 4, 6.
